his resurrection,* who at Mal. iv. 4, 5, appeared together as closing the old covenant,† and now, in the heavenly imperial council before the throne of the μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα, "excellent glory," stand upon the threshold of the new covenant, as the Baptist in the character of the typical Elias did upon earth for the people. Μετ' αὐτοῦ ὁυλλαλοῦντες, "talking with him"—by this one well-chosen word (which Mark and Luke also retain), does Matthew veil from us the wondrous words of the symphony, in those higher regions yet concealed from us by the cloud of the ascension, where the Son receives from the Father honor and glory in the words, This is, etc. Luke is permitted to lift the veil a little, and plainly to show us (what we might of ourselves guess and perceive) the sufferings of Christ, announced to the disciples a week before, as the centre-point of these heavenly words, from the sanctuary of which, the supreme Præses of the council then again refers us to the earthly words of Christ. They spoke of his decease, which (now near at hand) he should accomplish at Jerusalem, to accomplish which he now, a second time, more especially consecrates himself to the Father, devotes and fortifies himself, as the first time at the εἴσοδος, or "coming" (literally entrance), Acts xiii. 24. Ἔξοδος (literally exit) here certainly does not signify (according to Schleiermacher) the "calling" to be fulfilled (δρόμος, Acts xiii. 25; xx. 24), but evidently, in the first place, the end of life, as in Wis. vii. 6; 2 Pet. i. 15; still not without a prospective glance at the turning of death into life, so that the "rising again" (ch. xvi. 21, xvi. 9, 23), is at all events included—the victorious accomplishment, result, and issue of this death, which for him and us is at the same time ἡ εἴσοδος εἰς τὴν αἰώνιον βασιλείαν, "the entrance into the everlasting kingdom" (2 Pet. i. 11; just as at Heb. xiii. 7). Let it be considered what the apostle (2 Pet. i 16), means by δύναμις καὶ παρουσία, "power and coming." Those who have prepared the way for him to this from of old (מִקֶּדֶם), and are, therefore, well acquainted with it, now speak with him and to him concerning it, but still more he to them,* putting himself in the position of one ready to answer their questions, in order that they may rejoice before him in his glory with more perfect understanding and clearer view than the disciples, who are as yet heavy with the sleep of earth —also, indeed (as Roos mentioned), that they may now bear to the invisible world tidings of Christ's willingness to undergo the redeeming death now near at hand.

Then the light-cloud becomes to the earthly eyes the blinding, overshadowing darkness of the sanctuary; the two are already entered into it, the three are terrified without, for it is not yet time to build the eternal tabernacles of glory on the earth, which must first receive for its purification the blood of Christ from the hands of sinners. Jesus alone remains before their eyes, and the supremely decisive voice of the eternal Father in the inaccessible light which no man hath seen nor can see, comes from out the cloud. Even when the vail of the heaven is for a moment withdrawn, we are only referred back to earth, to the Son of Man and of God struggling in lowliness, passing by suffering into glory. The second voice of the Father, which directs to the words of the Lord Jesus, as the first did to his person, speaks in the words of Scripture, of Psalms, Prophets, and Law (Psa. ii. 7; Isa. xlii. 1, 4; Deut. xviii. 15, 18), and invests him with the honor of king because he is the Son (Psa. ii. 6), of priest as making an atonement with which God is well pleased, of prophet, who is to be heard along with and above the law and the prophets, inasmuch as he bears testimony of himself and the Father's purpose in him.

The disciples fall in great fear on their face; he, however, in most exalted dignity, calmness, and might, touches them, as once Gabriel did the prophet (Dan. viii. 18, ix. 21, x. 10), and speaks to them his old familiar words "Arise and be not afraid," with a new and peculiar significance at this moment—not yet as afterwards, Rev. i. 17, 18, and yet already as the same one.

Verse 9. Christ calls it a ὅραμα, vision, i. e., ἃ εἶδον, what things they had seen, as Mark says, in Luke ἃ ἑωρακασιν, which they had seen, and includes in this the whole manifestation and revelation, together with the voice which they heard; for certainly this was no ordinary seeing and hearing, but a perceiving with the opened eyes of a faculty of percep-

* In the bodies of both we find a wonderful exception to the general fate of death, although the lawgiver actually died beforehand on account of sin, while the prophet was already lifted up nearer to the victory over death. Not that they were actually, before the resurrection of Christ, the first-fruits, clothed with the final resurrection body, but their death and state after death has yet something in it specially mysterious. Here lies still another secret: if already at that time, as the Talmudical Tract. שְׁקָלִים (Shekalim) teaches, the half shekel for the temple was collected in the month Adar, and if there was ground for the tradition in Josephus of Moses' death having happened on the first of Adar, then was Christ transfigured, perhaps, on the anniversary of the Lawgiver's death.

† Therefore not merely (according to Von Gerlach): The Founder and the Restorer of the kingdom of God in the Old Testament. ...

* As, in this instance, Ebrard, who in other respects with good apologetical intention is for remaining as much as possible on the surface, cannot refrain from saying here finely: "In the transfiguration, Jesus had given to the fathers of the old covenant the blessed knowledge of his willingness to redeem them by his death, and, at the same time, to the publishers of the new covenant the unity of that covenant with the old, and Christ as the Fulfiller of the law and the prophets, was visibly manifested." Only, in order not to go against the ἔλεγον of Luke, we must not exclude the joint-witness already proceeding from them.

tion which is ordinarily closed, and which was partly brought about in the disciples by their falling into sleep, through the divinely inverted reaction against the influences from beneath (Num. xxiv. 3, 4.) But there is a great mistake in supposing that this sleep-waking seeing and hearing, to which we have only a remote analogy in somnambulism, and in the vision of Balaam* is something inferior and uncertain, and not rather a waking, to which the common form of waking stands in the same relation as does the state of dreaming. Christ speaks here truly, not according to that usage of men, which puts the ὅραμα βλέπειν, "to see a vision" (Acts xii. 9), in opposition to the reality of a thing that has actually taken place. To begin by proving this, appears to us as needless for believing readers, as it would be vain for unbelieving ones. True, indeed, a preacher in the open pulpit in Görliz, on the 6th Sunday in Epiphany, has even recently ventured to explain the whole occurrence as a dream-vision;† this preacher must certainly also hold the second epistle of Peter to be apocryphal! But, in answer to all critics who take this epistle, which seals the evangelical record, to be not genuine, we only exclaim with the most perfect confidence, in place of adducing any external grounds: O ye psychologists, O ye Christian psychologists! the supposition that words, doctrines, testimonies, such as are to be found in the second epistle of Peter, from the beginning to the end of it, have proceeded from a forger's own invention, that such strength, such enlightenment, such confidence of speech, could exist in one and the same mind along with a pious fraud—that this μυθολόγος (legend-speaker), when, in a "second epistle," he designedly counterfeits the person of the apostle, still exhorting, confessing, and prophesying before his death, has had the impudence expressly to renounce σεσοφισμένοι μύθοι, "cunningly devised fables," and with this impudence at the same time has such gifts of knowledge and of boldly original discourse—this hypothesis contradicts all the psychology of Christian feeling, and this the true defenders of the genuineness of the epistle should not be ashamed openly to confess as the dictate of their Christian feeling.* Truly when Peter then wrote, he knew not what he was doing.

So much concerning the word ὅραμα, "vision," in the mouth of Jesus, whom we are to hear, and with him, those of whom he has said: Whosoever heareth you heareth me! and whom he indirectly commands to make known this ὅραμα afterwards, in that he forbids them to do so till after the resurrection. He includes the testimony concerning his glory as Son, now seen and experienced, in the first prohibition (chap. xvi. 20, 21), and thereby points once more to the "rising again" which was then not heard. Now, indeed, the disciples must take up this word, and retain it for a while, but they rather take it in some figurative sense than in the proper sense, and make out of the clearest letter a dark question, because they would not understand the death spoken of before (Mark, ver. 10). You are to tell it to no one, not even to your fellow-apostles. How hard may it have been for them to obey this command, with their habit, otherwise laudable and amiable, of repeating and communicating to one another all that happened to the Master! But in order that they may not be vain of this preference shown to them in being selected as eye-witnesses, and that the others may not in their present folly envy them on this account, in order that the whole thing may remain what it is and should be, not a spectacle for eyes that are intent on seeing wonders, but a testimony afterwards to be transferred by the Spirit to the word so as to be believed, a voice of the Father—for this end Christ has admitted only three to the knowledge of it, and now forbids even these to speak of it before the time. They must also obtain their honor in the matter by denying themselves. First: Can ye be silent? are ye worthy to meditate on, and to keep holy mysteries? Then shall ye at one time tell them before the world!

And his disciples, of course the three who now descend with him from the mountain (see more exactly Mark, ver. 9, 14), embrace the opportunity, ere they are compelled to be silent, now when they are coming down to put to him one of the many questions which perplex their minds. They do not venture to come out with the great cardinal question about the rising again (of course not the resurrection in general as believed among the Jews, but the rising again of Christ, of whose death they will hear nothing); but, next to

* It is difficult to explain in Luke διαγρηγορήσαντες, "when they were awake." If it were taken to signify watching the whole time through (as πάσης τῆς νυκτὸς διαγρ, Herodian, iii. 4, 8), this would be a complete contradiction to βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ. Better certainly: Watching in the intervals, as in diseased sleep.

† J. L. Haupt in Nehmiz and Sonntag's Predigtsammlung: "Christ himself calls it a vision, and seems to guard his disciples against the delusion that they had actually seen Moses and Elias, inasmuch as he afterwards explained to them that Elias is already come"—namely in John the Baptist, and nothing farther! Neander also unfortunately finds it to be a dream (the disciples having dreamt of the impending event at Jerusalem!)—yet mentions himself, indeed, the strong objection that then the three had the same dream—he solves it, however, still worse by the supposition that after all it was only Peter; and speaks, moreover, of John's not mentioning it in a manner which we must pronounce foolish and unjustifiable. Thus does Neander place himself on a level with Hennel, who reduces the whole to a dream of Peter.

* Very beautifully has Bonnet, in his excellent writing, La Parole et la Foi (Geneva and Paris, 1851, directed against Scherer), thus adduced the argument for the second epistle of Peter, p. 27, 30.

this, it was most natural for them to ask about the appearing of Elias. That Elias must come before the Messiah, had perhaps already before this suggested itself as a matter of secret doubt to their minds; in Matt. chap. xi. 14, Christ had already explained this of the Baptist, and their ears indeed had heard what was then said; now, however, another Elias, the personal Elias, has just appeared to them, and scarcely have they seen and heard what then appeared to them, when it has vanished again, and they are to tell it to no one! All this brings powerfully to their minds the saying of the scribes, and the question how all this perplexing appearance, which has just been presented to their eyes, stands related to that saying. Not that the meaning of their question could be: It is certainly only a saying of the Scribes—but: Wherefore has he again disappeared, and are we not to make it known? What avails it that he is come? and in what way hast thou meant that John also is the future Elias? They do not, however, speak out clearly all these questions, as indeed in the confusion of the moment, they must have been complicated in their own minds; but, in the manner of men who are shy in putting a question, and who never speak clearly out, they ask generally: What then do the Scribes say? i. e., what dost thou say to this, that they say and teach? Inform us of this matter, and give us the solution of it! (This is the sense of the ὅτι, that, in Mark, which puts the question indirectly; it is not equivalent to διότι or διατί, wherefore, afterwards in ver. 28, as in the Sept., in Josephus, and also in the profane writers, but to be supplemented thus: How does it therewith stand related that—?) And if we only ask him concerning all that the Scribes say, he gives willingly the right information, as much as we can bear.

Verses 11, 12. Whoever, in this answer of Christ, would explain away the manifest and striking confirmation of the fact, that a coming of Elias was yet to take place, must do great violence to the words, and will never be able to strain the future ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα, "shall restore all things," in form and import, so as to be applicable also to John the Baptist. In Mark, the first clause stands as plain, though not so precise, with ἀποκαθιστᾷ, "restoreth," in the present, as in Matthew there is only the directly confirmatory ἔρχεται, cometh ("shall come"). Christ cannot possibly have intended to say any thing else, as the words run, than quite decidedly: By all means the Scribes are right; Elias comes or must come first, ere the entire setting up of the Messiah's kingdom, in the most proper and final sense, takes place. He does not, indeed, hereby confirm the errors and fables which the earlier or later Scribes connected with it, he only confirms in general the doctrine and expectation, not as a saying of the commentators, but as a simply to be read γέγραπται, "it is written." For as has been already said, by אֵת אֵלִיָּה הַנָּבִיא, "Elijah the prophet," with the article, the sacred text in Malachi can only mean the historical person; so much the more certainly as, immediately before, Moses is designated by a like nomen proprium, hence the Sept. has rendered it precisely by τὸν Θεσβίτην, "the Tishbite." The Christian Scribes of the present day, indeed, easily settle such matters—"they rough-plane it very cleverly, and say, It is a Jewish representation—though they are not well acquainted even with Jewish representations."* But the Church fathers teach, with the Jews, a future return of Elias, because Christ has here confirmed it as it stands written. Justin, for example, acknowledges this to Trypho; Augustine connects Israel's conversion, and their final true and spiritual understanding of the law as fulfilled in Christ, with the labors of this prophet (de civ. Dei, lib. 20, c. 29). The more particular investigation of all this, and the question whether Elias is also one of the two witnesses in the Apocalypse, does not belong to this place, where we have only to establish the clear statement of Christ.

Ἀποκαταστήσει πάντα, shall restore all things—this connects well with the expression of the Sept., ὃς ἀποκαταστήσει καρδίαν (who will restore the heart) for לֵב הֵשִׁיב, but, by the πάντα, all things, conjoined with it, the idea is so much extended as to become almost something different from the bringing back of the hearts of the fathers to the children, which is there said. Καθιστάναι, means to set up, to restore—compounded with ἀπό, it is intensified so as to mean: Perfectly or entirely to set up, to bring any thing to pass, so as to be what and how it should be.† Yet there lies here in the πρῶτον, first, a necessary limitation of the πάντα, implying that the forerunner does not already set up the kingdom (Acts i. 16)—for what then would remain to be done by Christ himself? Consequently: He will put every thing in order for the kingdom, will completely accomplish the work of making ready a people prepared for the Lord (Luke i. 17), committed to him as his office, in a wider and more proper sense of its fulfillment than John preliminarily and typically did. It is not a restitutio omnium rerum in integrum (restoration of all things to their entireness) that is spoken of here, any more than afterwards at Acts iii. 21, where, moreover, this manifoldly significant word is differently applied, so as to refer to the presentation of all that has been prophesied of in its fulfilled reality. What Elias agreeably to his character did at first in the kingdom of God, by pointing powerfully to the Lord in a period of most melancholy degeneracy, and as a reforming prophet repairing the altar of the Lord that was broken down (1 Kings xviii. 30), in order that the fire from heaven might come down upon it—the same is represented as being done by him, also at his return, and that with abundantly more effect. This he shall do—how could Christ mean by this the work of the Baptist, who had already come (ἤδη ἦλθε), which remained for the most part fruitless, whose coming together with his rejection, and his being given over to the will of the unrighteous, forms rather the sharpest antithesis to the first ἔρχεται or "cometh?"

And yet in the words, But I say unto you, Christ certainly says in addition to this that, in a certain sense, the person of John was also meant by the prophecy respecting Elias. We see, therefore, that this prophecy, according to Christ's manner of interpretation, which affords a rule for many others, fulfills itself twice, and his present statement is in perfect harmony with what he said before at ch. xi. 14 (as we there explained it). Every half fulfilled prophecy will, at one time, be entirely fulfilled, so that not an iota of its word shall fail of fulfillment; many, even by far the most of prophecies again, have their typical before their final fulfillment. They knew not the first Elias—would not take him for what he was (ch. xi. 14),* but did to him whatsoever they listed—and yet only what was at the same time already foreseen, ordained, and written (comp. Matt. xxvi. 24 with Luke xxii. 22). They have done what happened to him; for Christ imputes not merely to Herod and Herodias, what they did according to the mind and in the name of many, and reckons in the ἐποίησαν, "have done," all that the people collectively did against him, which proceeded from the οὐκ ἐπέγνωσαν, "they knew not," the natural result of which was the martyrdom of the preacher of repentance, who was as it were left in the lurch by the nation.† In like manner it awaits the Son of Man (now in the immediate future) also to suffer from them! This simple extract of the principal thing in Matthew is explained by the fuller and more exact statement in Mark, where, by a striking turn, the question immediately follows—properly a convictive counter-question to the disciples: How then (if there be only one coming of the Messiah and Elias) can it be written of the Son of Man, that he must suffer many things and be set at naught? (ἵνα for ὅτι, ver. 30, and the strong expression ἐξουδενωθῇ, not without reference to Isa. liii. 3 נִבְזֶה וְלֹא חָשָׁב, Dan. ix. 26 וְאֵין לוֹ, in both of which passages the Sept. has quite mistaken the meaning). Inasmuch as the scribes do not read and understand this, their saying about the coming of Elias is one-sidedly false; rightly understood, however, the two things are quite compatible, for there is a first and second Elias, just as there is a first and second coming of the Son of Man. That the Scribes have derived their saying, Elias must first come, in general truly from the Scripture, although they do not understand what this specially means, is finally denoted again by the words as it is written of him, in which it is maintained that the sufferings of the first Elias, as well as those of the Messiah, were the subject of prophecy. For it will not do to supply here merely, in general, that he is to come; yet our interpretation is still too dim-sighted to discover with certainty, where the prophecy of John's fate is to be found. Some have said that from the foretold sufferings of Christ an inference may be made impliedly to those of his forerunner, or that the record of the Tishbite's life shows us the antitype in the type.* Both of these conjectures, however, are insufficient, the latter also, whatever truth belongs to it, does not go the full length, as the agreement fails precisely in the death of Elias; it is reasonable, therefore, in us to wait for a future opening up of the Scripture. He who, in regard to the prophetical word, cannot bring his proud, learned heart to this, as in many places it is proper to do, is not qualified for attaining by humble investigation to an understanding of prophecy. He, in fine, who "is not ashamed"† to declare that it is preposterous "to find in the Old Testament the Christian idea of the suffering Messiah," and who, in the character of a Christian scribe, is so bold as to contradict the Lord Jesus to his transfigured face—such a one we should in vain ask to read and hear how Christ again, in all that he says, points back to his sufferings, of which it stands written, how he "manifestly distinguishes between his first and second coming, and thus alone gives the key to the understanding of all the Old Testament prophets."

* "Thus is many a great man not known during his lifetime, even supposing that he also were prophesied of in the Bible!" (Roos).

† Sepp, strange to say, finds here the first information and discovery made by Christ to his disciples, that John the Baptist was killed.

* So Hengstenberg: Christ considers the history of Elias as a prophecy of the history of John; he shows how even John cannot at all be Elias if he did not experience contradiction of sinners, rejection and suffering.

† De Wette, Practical explanation of the Psalms, p. 18, 19—a scarcely credible specimen of confused statements with bold assertions is this little work as a whole, to be abused in which, I reckon an honor. Should not the author, now dead, have been himself a little ashamed of this opposition, in his last and better days?

THE LUNATIC, THE UNBELIEVING AND PERVERSE GENERATION.

What a change, to which we find nothing similar in the life of Christ! From the Mount of Transfiguration, out of the opened heaven, he comes down to the vale of tears, and finds the distress of a more than ordinary fearful case of demoniacal possession, finds the mockery of the Scribes directed against the disciples who were left behind, finds the unbelief in Israel, unbelief also in his own disciples, and his difficult work with this generation begins forthwith anew. From the sanctuary, into which his perfect faith has introduced him, he comes forth—and what a spectacle meets his view! Nothing more natural than that all he now says should bear the stamp of holy passion and zeal coming from the depths of his bosom, as well as that the ground-tone of it all continues to be a complaint against their unbelief, and the overpoweringly pressing invitation to faith. Matthew gives prominence to the two principal sayings in which this is expressed, giving only so much of the narrative as is necessarily connected with these; Mark is able, again from good sources, vividly to paint the whole occurrence, and, besides, he preserves important words spoken by Christ in conversation with the father of the lunatic, as also at the healing of the latter; Luke alone adds at least the circumstance, that it was an only son.

The disciples, who remained below, should have cast out the devil in the absence of their Master, for to them in the meantime the demoniac had been brought; but they could not, although Luke has recorded at the beginning of the same chapter, that Christ had given them authority and power over all devils.* This caused a pressing of the people around the poor disciples to their shame, a reasoning among the Scribes certainly not friendly to them, and thus the Master finds them when he returns to them! All the people are "struck with fear" at his presence suddenly appearing in these circumstances, they are moved with something more than accustomed reverence,† and hasten to him, humbly saluting him: it is hereby indicated, however, that the Scribes did not join with them. And he immediately begins by inquiring what is the matter, and where help is wanted. He asked—not the Scribes (which is a reading arising from a false interpretation), probably also not merely the people who ran to him, but, as was very natural, all in common, including his disciples as the principal persons to whom he had come: *Why dispute ye with one another? What are you about, that I should find you in such commotion? But the ashamed disciples are silent, nor do the Scribes think proper to acknowledge before the Master what they have been saying against the disciples. Instead of them, the man about whose case the question was, the agitated and sadly disappointed father of the possessed, takes up the word, and relates the case with a terrible description of the malady, and a melancholy charge against the disciples: They could not—they were not able. The first answer of Christ, however, is a strongly vented word of grief, an accusation of unbelief against the whole race in common, into whose midst he must thus again enter; this word has very strikingly been preserved almost literally the same by all the three Evangelists.

Verse 17. An expression of holy impatience, to reach the goal which he had just been so near on the Mount; the vehement indignation of warm love, which seeks only faith to call forth the helping power and glory of God (Luke ver. 43; John xi. 40); the inward grief of him who was holy and righteous in the truth of God, and to whom the perversity of men is so hard to bear! It is with him a different zeal from that of Moses (Num. xx. 10), which was sinful, because it becomes no one, who is himself a sinner, to rebuke in his own might. How long shall I continue with you, labor almost in vain among you, who even yet do not believe? How long shall I still suffer you? Only he can speak thus who, as the holy One among sinners, bore the burden of all (Gal. vi. 2), and whose whole life was in the innermost sense, from the very first, a profound suffering through the feeling and enduring of sin. Thus according to the Father's counsel it was necessary in this word, which

* According to Lange, this loss of former power was "probably a consequence of the great depression, which the communication of Christ regarding his impending sufferings had produced in them."

† This may be sufficiently explained also without supposing, as many do, an after-lustre of the transfiguration. What was proper for Moses was beneath the dignity of Christ; besides here the miraculous sight was not meant as an after-lustre for his people.

* I do not retract this, although Alford has contradicted me, and I read Mark ix. 16 with many now: ἐπηρώτησεν αὐτοῖς (which here almost recurs to the αὐτούς and αὐτοῖς, ver. 14, but takes in, however, the ὄχλος named ver. 15)—as also with the received text and several: συζητεῖτε πρὸς αὐτούς (Cod. A. ἑαυτούς). Quite naturally, inasmuch as all were gathered round the disciples when Christ came to them, he does not immediately single out the disciples alone (as Alford has misunderstood me), but puts them in this first address, as afterwards (ver. 16), together with the entire unbelieving generation. It is his first impression which here finds the expression: What have you sons of men already again found to dispute and be in distress about?

was drawn from the usually closed depths of his heart, immediately after the revelation of his glory, to manifest the glory also of his human endurance, the pain of divine love in his human nature, which was alike strongly susceptible of this on account of meekness and purity. If we had not this word, and that other in Luke xii. 50, we should want the true, entire insight into the self-denying, atoning nature even of his whole earthly course in our flesh and blood. What complainings, known only to the Father, does this single expression, which he neither can nor will restrain, pre-suppose? He takes, however, this expression also of most immediately personal feeling—so entirely do all his thoughts continually move in the sphere of Holy Writ—directly from that first complaint of God against his people in Deut. xxxii. 5, 20 (where the Sept. has in the first of these verses γενεὰ σκολιὰ καὶ διεστραμμένη, in the second ἐξεστραμμένη. There also follows at ver. 20, οὐκ ἔστι πίστις ἐν αὐτοῖς, as the right rendering of לֹא אֱמֻן בָּם*, in whom is no faith—this, however, Christ puts with emphasis before in his ἄπιστος). This rebuking complaint then applies again to all in common, to whom he has now come,† in whose unbelief he sees represented mankind, especially all Israel as it is, the perverse generation by nature and from of old; nay, the repetition of that word of the Spirit in the mouth of Christ already points beforehand to the rejection of this people on account of their unbelief, which is further prophesied of in Deut. xxxii. First of all, however, the words apply to the hastily judging people, as also to the scribes, who were malignantly rejoicing at the impotency of the disciples, then, in particular, to the father of the demoniac, as we shall immediately see; finally, also in no less measure to the disciples, who were bringing shame upon him below, when he was receiving honor above—they certainly deserve on this occasion to be classed with the multitude.‡ Still the rebuking complaint is by no means to be regarded as a repulse, implying that he now ceased to bear and to love (already in the ἕως πότε, how long, he represents himself as obediently waiting with patience), but with all the more effect on this account does the majestically brief command of the Helper follow: Bring him hither to me, him who is in need of help!—as in every thing there is ever again the one thing: Bring him only to Me!

What Matthew hastily sums up in ver. 18, in order to connect with it the other word concerning unbelief, is given by Mark in full detail. The evil spirit, at the look of Jesus, immediately raises the frightful paroxysm in the person who had been brought to him. But without any trace or tincture of that horror which had restrained the faith of the disciples, with a calmness which is at the same time a feeling of deep sympathy with the wretchedness before him, Christ looks on the tearing, rolling, and foaming child, wisely delays the help in order that all who were agitated might be tranquilized and prepared for the salutary impression, and kindly asks the father how long it is since this happened to the poor boy; τοῦτο, with full and hearty sympathy and consideration—as much as to say, This is indeed very bad and melancholy! The father, as if it were necessary to keep up this sympathy, begins anew to describe the case in stronger terms than before, and as he before complained that the disciples could not help him, so now, in his anguish, he speaks very unbelievingly indeed (differently from the leper in Matt. viii. 2) the bold word: But if thou canst do any thing, more than the disciples in thy name—help us, have compassion on us! This us, proceeding from paternal love, this cry for pity would in ordinary circumstances, notwithstanding all the boldness of the if, have moved Christ immediately to say: Be whole!—Now, however, his mind is so full of thoughts about faith and unbelief, that the bodily malady, bad as it is, falls into the background; he delays still the help which will certainly come, and must first speak and testify of faith. One feels the sublimity of this single interest and zeal with which Christ here speaks and acts, as opposed to the last impotent raging of the spirit that is to be cast out. The poor father almost doubts whether he can do any thing; in the reply which he gives, Christ leads him into his own heart: If thou couldst believe! This is the principal thing—my power will then certainly show itself.* If he spoke so doubtingly to Christ with this "If," with what doubts is he likely to have gone at first to the disciples, when the Master whom he wanted was not there. His faith could and must first of all do the most, as the Son appears almost passively incapable; his unbelief, next to the power of the malady, had ‡ Schleiermacher finds such a reference to the disciples, although certainly unwarranted, yet, in the connection, very natural. (According to him the whole story of the transfiguration, and what belongs to it in Matthew, has undergone "a transformation into something strange and odd, an unfortunate complication.") On the other hand, Neander will not at all admit that the "harsh rebuke" was intended for the weak apostles, whom on other occasions Christ treats so gently; they would not, in that case, he thinks, have asked him as afterwards follows. The word according to him, was spoken chiefly to the father of the possessed, and with him to all who should at any time desire merely bodily help.

* Which the more recent commentators without reason deny, see Isa. xxvi. 2 3, 4; Hab. ii. 4.

† In Mark ver. 19, αὐτοῖς and ὑμᾶς are connected exactly with ver. 16.

* On the neuter τό, before entire clauses, see Winer, § 20. Others construe: As regards this (that thou saidst): εἰ δύνασαι,—know that all is possible, etc. (in which πιστεῦσαι must fall out as not genuine). Others again artificially construe, by reading the imper. mid. πίστευσαι, as if it meant: Only believe that εἰ δύνασαι!

been to the disciples the obstacle that had put out their little spark of faith. He who does not believe can do nothing, and he who can, is yet not able to show the unbeliever any thing within the sphere of the operations of this miraculous power of God over nature, and that, moreover against the power of hell. But all things are possible to him that believeth! Who needs an interpretation of this word in order to understand it? And who can fathom its immeasurable depth of meaning, who can exhaust it in thought and feeling? Christ repeats the All things are possible to the disciples, with a Nothing shall be impossible to you (ver. 20); we will speak of it when we come to that verse.

It is not our plan to interpret the words of men to Jesus, otherwise there would be much to say upon the ingenuous exclamation of the man (Mark, ver. 24), which, amid all his unbelief, the Holy Ghost puts into his lips, in order that it might afterwards have a place in the Gospel for the instruction of the whole world. We only say here again, that we deeply pity any one who does not feel constrained to acknowledge such narratives and sayings, as Mark here gives, to be unsearchable, the origin of which was possible only as facts in the living conflict of the Son of God with the children of men. Where do we read the like? Where has the like been done? Into whose mind could such things come if they did not actually take place? Perhaps even yet Christ would have spoken further of faith and unbelief, but the press of the people around the person who was ill, and the talk about him, increased, and this at length moves him (as Mark, exact even to the last feature, observes) to speak his word of power as Helper, and, on account of the unbelief which was there, where faith must needs co-operate in order to the exertion of his power, he speaks here in a greater number of words than we have an example of any where else. He addresses the spirit at some length, puts his I command thee in opposition to the command of the disciples, which had been powerless, and which had made the devil so bold, and, in order to give the most perfect assurance to the father and son and all the hearers, he adds the command, which occurs only here, that it should depart from him for ever, never again to enter into him. What condescension here marks the work and faithfulness of Christ, in the regard which he shows to every circumstance! Now the deaf spirit must hear the command addressed to him, now the evil spirit departs after venting his rage for the last time.

The disciples, however, have not yet heard aright the Master's word to the unbelieving generation, and from their great slowness to hear, it has never occurred to them, at least not come home to them as the principal thing, to apply it also to themselves! This Matthew records of himself along with the others, and lets us see, at the same time, only by this, what he has no where expressly told us, namely, that the disciples hitherto from the time that Christ gave them power, had been able to cast out devils, and that the present was the first astonishing case of failure. Many and various may have been their thoughts and conjectures as to wherein the cause of this failure lay: too many spirits in the diseased person, or one that was too powerful for them? his own great sin, or that of his father? their own sinfulness? perhaps the dispute about precedency which had already been raised by the separation of the three disciples, and which soon came to light? or some other secret ban lay in the midst of them? The Master, however, says it, and comprises it in one word: Because of your unbelief!

Verse 20. This is also a general and fundamental answer, brought to us from the Mount of Transfiguration, to all our inability both past and present. It is, at the same time, a most friendly rebuke, as afterwards it is said of the Comforter, that he shall reprove the world of sin, in that they believe not. Three times, so far as we know, has Christ in almost the same words, attributed so great effects to faith, or rather this greatest one of all, that nothing is to be impossible to it; we find a repetition of it, not merely in Matt. xxi. 21, but also previous to this in Luke xvii. 6. When Christ spoke with the father of the demoniac, he disclosed his unbelief to him as the obstacle that stood in the way; now, however, he lays the blame on the disciples. Let each have his own! Let every one seek and find out his own sin! The disciples ought certainly to have been able with their strong faith to overcome even the unbelief of the man (because it was not complete unbelief), and to remove it as a mountain; this is evidently implied in the words of Christ. This is the first and only occasion (besides Mark xvi. 14; John xx. 27, after the resurrection), on which Christ so literally applies to the disciples this word of severe rebuke, "unbelief;" instead of this he usually, when reproving their unbelief, kindly addresses them by, "O ye of little faith!" The expression in Mark iv. 40, however, borders upon it: How is it that ye have no faith? namely, now in readiness, as the other way of taking it runs: Where is your faith? Thus and no otherwise is here to be understood the expression "If ye have faith"—not merely, if ye possess faith in general, but if ye have it ready, and hold it fast for the moment when ye are called to use it, and to prove it. Then, however, all distinction between little and much, small and great faith, properly speaking, falls to the ground, the smallest measure of real, living power of faith, disturbed at the moment by no unbelief and doubt, is sufficient to accomplish the greatest things, just as a small spark actually burning kindles an entire ὕλη ("matter," James iii. 5). For either, on the one hand, faith remains faith, or, on the other, unbelief remains unbelief! It is precisely this mountain before their eyes—therefore does Christ take the similitude from it, and again speak biblically and proverbially at the same time. Mountains are obstacles which are to be removed out of the way; as in Isa. xl. 4, out of the way of the coming Lord; Zech. iv. 7, the hindrances to the building of the temple. As with us it is quite common to say (although, since the period of railways, this expression has almost lost its force) that there is still many a hill to be surmounted, that one has not yet got over all the mountains in the way. Among the Jews an eloquent teacher is called עֹקֵר הָרִים, one who tears up mountains. This, now, Christ takes as a figure and example of any miraculously powerful effect of faith, when he immediately goes on to say in general: Mountains shall remove out of their place if ye bid them, all things will be obedient to what you say, *nothing will be impossible to you! to you even as to God (ch. xix. 26; Luke i. 37). Thus does Christ put the omnipotence of God into our hand of faith. Thus he says to us that faith, because it lays hold on the omnipotence of God, can, in virtue of this, work miracles—but how and to what purpose does he mean this? He speaks of the wonders of God's power in the sphere of external nature, in order to awaken and strengthen our faith in the miracles of grace wrought in the hearts of men.† He, in the first place, rebukes that unbelief, so deeply-rooted in man (since Satan's first lie, which separated the world from God) and to this day so prevalent in Christendom, which looks upon nature with its objects and laws as if the supreme free will of the living God had not remained immanent in it from the creation onwards (Heb. xi. 3). Not as the scoffers who, speaking scoffingly even of a creation, affirm that all things remain as they were from the beginning of the creation. As if the one original law of the power of freedom, of spirit and will, is not to be reckoned as a living, penetrating element in all "laws," and to be received as a never failing pre-supposition. God does as he will with the powers of heaven and of earth (Dan. iv. 32)—can still always make what he will, can create also something new in the old creation (Psa. cxv. 3; Num. xvi. 30). Whatsoever he will, he does, in heaven and on the earth, in the sea and in all deep places (Psa. cxxxv. 6). He removes mountains ere they are aware of it, moves the earth out of its place; speaks to the sun and it riseth not, and seals up the stars; he alone spreads out the heaven and walks on the waves of the sea. To this simplicity of Job (ch. ix. 5–8) must all the learning of natural science return in the spirit of a little child, if, as an idolatrous illusion, it would not rest in mediate causes, and in that which in itself is nothing. Nothing stands so fast, not even the granite of the original mountains,* as not to be subject every moment to the mighty hand of God; and this puts such power into the hand of our faith, into the word of our confidence: Ye shall point out to the mountain its place, saying ἐντεῦθεν ἐκεῖ, "Hence to yonder place," and it will obey! Nothing therefore is said at all, and one knows not of what one speaks, if these promised miracles in external nature are cast aside, and only the similitude left over; this were to forget the simple proposition, that every similitude must first be true and real in its substratum, in order that with this any thing may reasonably be compared; otherwise the promise cancels itself, and becomes its opposite. If we might answer: But really to remove actual hills, this certainly cannot be, Lord—then would his word to us rather mean: It is equally impossible for your faith to remove many an obstacle! It is here, just as at Ezek. xxxvii., where, in the figurative resurrection, the literal must also be guaranteed, for otherwise the meaning and answer of the Son of Man to the question of God would be quite just: Lord, as little as these dead bones can become again alive, so little also can these dry bones of the house of Israel. We will not here relate and examine, as regards the actual removing of mountains, the sayings and stories to which Bengel alludes in his Factum tamen est aliquando (it has sometimes taken place nevertheless);† that faith has wrought miracles in the outer world, and still sometimes works them, is disputed only by those fools who think that, with their unbelief, they can blow away all the Facta of history, and when such a work is wrought, it is at bottom all one whether it be a seed-corn or a mountain that miraculously gives place to faith. Finally, however, which is the more real and actual, the sphere of spirit, or that of matter, which latter Heinroth, for example, has declared to be a "hypothesis?" Which is more difficult (to speak with Christ truly in place of our folly, Matt. ix. 5), to remove a mountain, or to tear out a root of sin from the heart, to remove a σκάνδαλον of unbelief, so that faith may have free course, moreover, to show the way to the spirits of hell, who do not merely lie like the mountains in the place

* Which ὑμῖν abundantly refutes that cunning refinement that timidly turns away from the words by reading the foregoing word in Mark ix. 23: Πάντα δυνατά, omnia effici possunt, a Deo scilicet; τῷ πιστεύοντι, in usum confidentium!

† Others, indeed, less in harmony with the proverbial usage, are for finding an allusion to those passages where mountains are also kingdoms, powers of the world—nay "this mountain" (which, however, would not at all be suitable) is said precisely to be the power of the heathen world—as elsewhere the fig-tree is Judaism! (Evang. Kirchenz. 1847, p. 948).

* Not even the equilibrium of the heavenly bodies, which it is reckoned would compensate for all permanent disturbance (for example, in the solar system, balancing Jupiter by Saturn!).

† Nor the lauded act of Father Rodinger in behalf of the holy Elizabeth of Marburgh, whose doubts he removed by transplanting trees (Luke xvii. 6) from one shore of the river to the other (Sepp, iii. 241).

where God has created them? To create a new heart is more than to create a new heaven and new earth; when God shall have prepared his chosen ones by the work of thousands of years, he will then, by the word of his power, transform the earth for them, in one day. In this lies the reason why faith which can do all things has yet seldom (or perhaps never) removed mountains; for the same faith knows also that such things render no service to the kingdom of God, and it will work only for the kingdom of God. The difficult mountains for faith lie elsewhere, the greater miracles are the miracles of grace in the heart of man. It is true, indeed, since even grace does not compel, that our faith also, however strong, cannot bid away the sin of another; but our own sin will yield to faith, which brings the omnipotence of God into its will, and our own faith can work much good, can overcome much opposing unbelief, can so suffer and love a whole unbelieving and perverse generation, that something may be made of it which can be made only thus. To this the word of Christ points, and gives us, in the bosom of a sharp rebuke, a most cheering consolation, inasmuch as he attributes such great power even to the small grain of mustard seed. It is our duty then when we have any faith, as it were by a second potency, to believe in the right and might of our faith,* not to let it fall aside, but by watching, praying, fasting, to keep the mustard seed in growth and exercise, so that, when the occasion comes, we may have faith to remove precisely this mountain which is now in our way, if only another unbelief do not keep it fixed by the root.

Verse 21. Christ says two things in the But here: first, that he had meant the casting out of devils by the similitude of removing mountains; and, secondly, that to control spirits, to break the evil will, the wicked power in the kingdom of sin and of rebellion against the Almighty, who tolerates it according to the law of freedom, and even removes it only thus, is indeed another and greater thing than the simple working of miracles in helpless nature. This may perhaps be the deepest meaning of the expression This kind —this kind of mountains in the way, of things to be removed for the kingdom of God—or somewhat more nearly as a certain Bible glosses it: This kind of enemies of man, the devils. In so far we could not insist on maintaining precisely, that here (as at ch. xii. 45) Christ speaks of a particular kind of worse, or stronger devils; and yet, on the other hand, the ἐκπορεύεται seems to point to others which go out more easily, and we have nothing to say against its being so understood at the same time, so much the less that Mark gives only this word, which, by itself and without the foregoing antithesis, must be so understood. Probably the disciples also had been thinking of specially obstinate spirits; Christ then would in the second place confirm this thought of theirs, after having in the first place particularly spoken of unbelief. Instead of the strong and ever prepared faith, to which even the worse sort also must yield, he calls it now very significantly praying and *fasting; he thereby goes still a step deeper into the matter, and gives unasked an answer to the second question which the disciples should have put: Why, then, had we not our faith now, but unbelief? You have not carefully enough kept and exercised your faith. This is done by prayer; he who lives in prayer lives in faith, and if we are found praying in connection with any work we have to do, it will then be seen how much the earnest prayer of faith can do. Finally, fasting is a help to prayer, sobriety and temperance in what pertains to the bodily life, the opposite of which can only strengthen the flesh against the spirit. Fasting, then, when joined with prayer, and used as a help to it, is also of great value; this Christ would not have to be forgotten, and he speaks it out on this opportunity, in order to put it as a counterpoise to the misunderstanding of what he had formerly said, ch. ix. 15. What he says in the first place, of quite literal bodily fasting, may indeed be further understood of the turning away from the world and nature in general, which will assist in turning to God (prayer). Whether, as Oetinger thinks, the disciples in general or immediately before, to speak very plainly, "ate and drank too much"—we leave undetermined; that they, however, at all events deserved and needed this hint, is quite as certain as that we all have great reason to observe what Christ has here said, and diligently to apply the means here prescribed when we have any thing in hand that will not go on so easily or so speedily as we would wish.

* As Trahndorff most recently (Der welthistor. Zweifel, p. 35, 39) concedes the victory only to this "faith in the power of faith."

* Whereby he certainly does not mean, as rationalistic folly has perverted it: They should in future cause such a diseased person to pray and fast more!

SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUFFERINGS.

This had already been said before the transfiguration (ch. xvi.), and is now repeated after it, stronger emphasis being laid in the repetition on the killing and rising again (Mark καὶ ἀποκταν θείς): It remains so; the μέλλει, shall, is not taken back, although I should still walk with you a while in Galilee. The new addition, which Luke alone therefore gives, at the beginning of ver. 44, is an echo of what Christ said to the three disciples (vers. 12, 13): The Son of Man shall be betrayed into the hands of men, that they may do to him likewise what they will, as they did to John. The hands of men, to whom the heavenly Son of Man is, notwithstanding the likeness thus denoted, here opposed, as he was before to the whole unbelieving and perverse generation —are wicked hands, for their will and intention is wicked; this David already knew right well (1 Chron. xxii. 13).* But by whom is the παραδίδοσθαι or betrayal performed? Who delivers him up? Afterwards, at ch. xx. 18, 19, mention is made of his being delivered up to the Gentiles, which indeed is an important, and therefore also a predicted element in the sufferings of Christ; but there also this παραδώσουσιν, "shall deliver up," is preceded by a παραδοθήσεται, "he shall be betrayed." There the traitor is specially included in the first delivering up (John vi. 64, xiii. 11, 21), here, however, all men are viewed as opposed to the παραδιδούς or betrayer. Christ, therefore, speaks here of the counsel of God (as in Acts ii. 23; Rom. viii. 32), whose hand gives over his Son, as the Son of Man, to men from one hand to another, first to Judas, who delivers him up to the high priests, and these to the Gentiles and the unjust.

In Luke we have beforehand the words: Let these sayings sink down into your ears! and Von Meyer's note, with which many agree, refers this to the foregoing: "This praise and testimony of God's miraculous power for your future confirmation"—for you will need it when my sufferings begin. This, certainly, yields a good sense, but then there are no words of praise and astonishment at the μεγαλειότης τοῦ θεοῦ, "mighty power of God," noticed, and therefore Luke could scarcely denote this by, these sayings; the expression appears to us rather to be parallel with the immediately following τὸ ῥῆμα τοῦτο, "this saying," and is perhaps a resumption of ver. 28, the Evangelist unconsciously taking up the expression there.* Only thus does the ὑμεῖς, you, form a proper antithesis to the people, who are again intent on seeing outward signs of glory and power: Ye know better now what immediately awaits me; let it sink, if not into your hearts, yet into your ears, hear and retain at least the λόγοι, words, that have been already said and must ever again be said! (For, etc.) Consequently, it is just inversely as regards the foregoing interpretation: Forget not in your joy that I must suffer and die, so that you may continue humble, and not neglect prayer and fasting for the removal of the great mountains which still lie in the way to glory! The faith of Christ did not say to Golgotha, Be thou removed. His prayers and fastings did not cast the devil out of Judas, nor the devil Judas out of the circle of the apostles. He endured the cross, and thus removed out of the way the mountain of the world's sin and the world's guilt, so that now salvation is made possible to every one that believes (ch. xix. 25, 26). Thus ever and ever again does the word concerning the sufferings of Christ afford the true understanding, the true limitation and fulfillment, of all his other words; this is the purpose of God who delivers up the Son, the only key to all his ways, showing how, and how far, the sin which had its origin in freedom can, by his hand and the hand of men, be alone abolished in freedom.

* It would, however, be too harsh to say (with Richter's House Bible), that in the term "man," Christ always understands what is worst.

* Hence Alford quite correctly understands it still more exactly as if it meant: These my (for some time past) repeated words to you about suffering and dying—you are forthwith to hear again what you have almost forgotten, scarcely heard!

THE TRIBUTE PENNY AND STATER

(MATT. XVII. 25–27.)

The seventeenth chapter is a principal chapter, quite complete in itself—not merely in the Gospel of Matthew, but in the life of Christ himself. First, there is the transfiguration above on the heights of assured victory, obtained by faith, which already actually takes beforehand something from sight, the second sealing by the Father (John vi. 27), with the accordant testimony of Scripture and nature, of this and of the invisible world; the Son of Man standing upon the threshold between life and death, almost as if there were here no gates, and becoming conscious of the fact that in him indeed is the life and the light of men; even here, however, the μέλλει παθόχειν ὑπ' αὐτῶν, "he shall suffer of them," is confirmed and prepared. And now, in the contrast which is yet at the same time no contrast, we find the same Son of Man below carrying on his painful work against the power of death and the grave, bearing the burden of the unbelieving generation, which is laid on him alone (Acts xiii. 18, ἐτροποφό-ρησεν—Deut. xxxii. 11; Num. xi. 11, 12; Isa. xlvi. 3, lxiii. 8, 9) to remove in his faith —the word of his mouth, which also lifts the veil a little from the inner sanctuary, where this holy one of God prays and fasts in most willing, self-emptying love to sinners. Finally, in the third place, in order that this chapter may be complete, there is also a testimony to his outward subjection to law and tribute, although he is the free Son; how he turns even his kingly power only to the purpose of obedience, such as is proper to the subject!* All these things in this connection are no cunningly devised fables invented by a Gospel writer, no phantasmagoria of a dreaming Church which has been built upon no corner-stone, whose dreams (contrary to all psychology of the human race) had produced unheard-of results in the actual world up till then, and (contrary to all the history of the human race) had, in addition to this, transformed the actual word in the subsequent time, as is evident at this day in the Church which is not yet overcome by the gates of hell, in the kingdom which ever continues to come with power. Who then can with "reason," i. e., at least, with consistency, deny the actual truth of these narratives and testimonies, except those to whom the whole history of the world and their own personal life has become a phantasmagoria, an illusion! But those people whom another has made so wise to choose Blocksberg* for Tabor,† should yet, if they thoroughly examine their own self-consciousness and that of the world, be afraid of the future weighty dreams of their poor souls, and should give a little more study to Hamlet's soliloquy. If they can make easy work of the first part, "To be, or not to be, that is the question" in the idea, still the conscience does not comprehend it; the fear of death (Heb. ii. 15), shows ever again only a sleeping instead of a not-being, and—"What in that sleep of death, for dreams may come"—that is the question! "Is it not thus," the Lord God asks also Cain. Oh ye poor ones, who wilfully deny the Redeemer with your feigned words (2 Pet. ii. 3), which even now every breath of morning air that blows from the great day of the Lord into your souls, scatters like chaff before the wind!

Already from the profound connection of the incident of the tribute money with the whole chapter to which it belongs, enough will appear to warrant our not calling this "the most difficult miraculous story in the Gospel record," with a believing commentator who, in the love of his faith, inclined a little too much to the men of the idealistic school, and who now that he has gone to his rest, understands all better. We ask wherein lies this difficulty, if only we keep to that central point from which alone the entire life and labors of Jesus can be understood! Already Bengel, who for the exegesis of the Scripture must ever anew be revived, has expressed almost every thing in the words: "In medio actu submissionis emicat majestas;" only we might still more aptly invert the expression: In the midst of the majesty, to which the fishes of the sea when it is necessary are subservient, submission maintains itself.

The tax which is here indicated by the article τὰ δίδραχμα as well-known to Jewish readers was certainly the half shekel of the temple tribute (2 Kings xii. 4: 2 Chron. xxiv. 6, 9; comp. Neh. x. 32), which had its origin as in Exod. xxx. 13, and was afterwards kept up.‡ (Although the Sept., reckoning accord-

* The remark that Matthew alone, the former tax-gatherer, has preserved the account of the stater goes to substitute what is merely human in the place of much deeper motives in the Evangelist for the connection.

* Namely of the Idealist who quite correctly says: "In truth, if I am all that, then am I mad to-day!" Goethe's Faust is their Bible.

† We abide by the usual name, although Robinson has refuted it.

‡ True, indeed, even Wieseler recently understands the civil tax to the Roman emperor, but we protest against this explanation. It greatly weak-ing to Alexandrine double drachms, puts δίδραχμον for שֶׁקֶל, Gen. xxiii. 15, 16; Exod. xxi. 32, xxx. 13, 15, &c., and for מַחֲצִית הַשֶּׁקֶל, בֶּקַע מִשְׁקָל, Gen. xxiv. 22; Exod. xxxviii. 26, puts δραχμή, nay at Exod. xxx. 13 ἥμισυ τοῦ δίδραχμου; yet Josephus, Bell. Jud. vii. 26, and Philo have the Attic reckoning as here, in like manner Aquila, Exod. xxxviii. 26, δίδραχμον.) According to the Talmudical Tract שְׁקָלִים (Shekalim), the payment was not a thing of compulsion, but a voluntary work of legal piety; hence, the modest question of the tribute-gatherers here, which yet at the same time, has something odious in it: Does your Master pay this tax? or does he omit this, in the exercise of his well-known freedom?* They avoid the Master himself, as they always do, and address themselves to the spokesman Peter, who was settled in Capernaum, as Jesus himself was to a certain extent. Peter says, of course, Yes, because he knew what to say, from what had taken place on a former occasion; but his prompt answer is immediately followed by embarrassment, on finding that there is no money in the bag. For this is presupposed in the account, as otherwise Christ would not have devised means of providing in another way.

Christ foreknew all this, because it was ordained that he should now know it, in the Father's counsel, according to which the conclusion of the seventeenth chapter of Matthew was ordained to be just what it is, and not otherwise; he anticipates the embarrassed question with an explanation, which (to remove this mistake beforehand) is certainly not meant to find fault with Peter's Yes, as if it had been too rashly and inconsiderately spoken.† Such an idea seems to us to shift the entire meaning of the thing, and to be itself inconsiderate. What other answer should Peter have given than the historical truth which was known to him, and concerning which he was asked? Should he have said something to this effect: He has been in the general habit of paying, but whether he will do so on this occasion, I know not? Or, what he was forbidden to say: He is God's Son, and free from the temple tribute? Christ then does not mean this, nor is there in what he says the slightest censure of Peter. His question, What thinkest thou, Simon? also anticipates the thoughts of Simon only in this, that the latter might afterwards have deemed it to be strange, and properly speaking, unjust that the Son of God should be put into embarrassment by this tax, paid by subjects to the house of his Father! These after-thoughts were quite as natural and right as the first answer; the προέφθασεν, "prevented," means in general that Christ, in all that he said, anticipated the thoughts of Peter, and met these with a distinct solution of the difficulty. Christ, in order to demonstrate by general analogy the truth of the claim, according to which he would certainly be exempt from this tax, now compares the great King in Jerusalem, the God of Israel, with the kings of the earth, into whose ranks he has actually entered by the theocratical constitution. The kings of the earth take neither τέλη (of things), nor κῆνσον (of the person), neither tax nor custom of any kind whatever, from the princes, their own sons—thus says the heavenly One, over whom the Voice from heaven bore testimony shortly before that He is the Son. Peter, when again asked, must give an answer which is quite right, and yet contradicts his former Yes. Christ first brings this contradiction between his right and his conduct into full prominence in the expressed inference: Then are the children, properly the sons, free. Was the half shekel originally a ransom for the person, (אִישׁ כֹּפֶר נַפְשׁוֹ), as afterwards, at ver. 27, ἀντί indicates, it follows that the Redeemer himself was as free from this, as from that in Luke ii. 23. But that in the application of what he has said he still retains the plural, which before was quite proper, instead of saying, Then am I as the Son of God, free—in this lies one of the most striking expressions of condescension which he ever made. The paying of tribute being in itself something outward, belonging to this world, he might, indeed, as he was ever ready to do in such cases, rank himself along with them: That we ens the idea of the viós (vers. 25, 26), removes the equally clear and significant connection with the transfiguration, and rejects the profound meaning lying precisely therein. We agree in this instance with Neander, who, in like manner against Wieseler, observes: "The entire significance of the account rests precisely on this, that it is no common political, but a Temple tax." When the Church fathers (Clemens, Origen, Augustine, Jerome), understand it of the imperial tax, they have thereby certainly missed the import of the entire incident—as the English writer Trench has, by a thorough investigation, made out. That Wieseler attempted "so forced an interpretation" as this only for the sake of his harmony has with truth been represented to him also in Tholuck's Litt. Anzeiger.

* Whether, according to Pirke Aboth, c. 4, §. 5, Rabbis were actually exempt from taxation, is uncertain, and so far as regards that period may rather be doubted from this account. Others think that, because Jesus had for a long time been away from Capernaum, this made the tribute-gatherer uncertain. Perhaps it may also (with Braune) be understood as if the question, "Does your Master pay?" was nothing more than a polite way of asking payment.

† Peter could and durst not on his part answer otherwise. It is mere trifling in Lange, when he makes this Yes of Peter, mistakenly described as "inconsiderate," to be typical again of the error of the Catholic Church, in fettering the freedom of Christ by the Temple-obligations of the old covenant! By such a mode of interpretation one may disguise the most natural things. Seeing that I myself, as is well-known, must bear to have a false profoundness objected to me, I am all the more inclined and bound to protest wherever I really find the proper limit transgressed.

may not offend, give it for me and thee. But here the external closely and profoundly borders upon the internal, and even here he assigns at the same time to his disciples as sons the right of freedom, which yet belongs to him alone as the Son! He says this with the same prospective glance, as we find at Mark ii. 27, 28, the Son of Man brings to all men in him, new freedom and dominion; see our earlier interpretation at Matt. xii. 8. He kindly looks forward and sees, as in Simon the future Peter, so in his disciples and the members of his family collectively, the future sons of God, and as is indeed right, predicates of them on account of their calling, the same claim which he in person inalienably possesses.

Christ might have borrowed or begged the stater from many a one to whom it would have been the greatest honor and joy to give it to him, but this certainly would not have been consistent with what is due to the honor of the Son, who might indeed accept such gifts of love for his earthly wants, but not ask them.* Then must Peter, as fisher, render service, in order to fetch what was needed from God's treasury, and, by an act quite in the way of his calling as a fisher, learn how this treasury stands ever open to the faith of God's children. A miracle, in many respects great, is performed in a small thing, on account of the great significance belonging to it. With a foreknowledge, which is at the same time more than a foreknowledge, the assurance namely that it has been ordained and commanded in the Father's counsel and might, Christ says every thing to Simon beforehand ere it takes place. He will immediately catch something with his hook, the first fish will bring money —and that in its dumb, but here loudly-speaking mouth (Job. xii. 8)—finally, just so much as is necessary for the moment, neither more nor less, a stater or four drachms.† The same take,* and give to them, the tax-gatherers, who are asking it, for me and thee. Thus does Christ separate again the we who had just been united, not without a hint that it was a condescension. For the others no payment is to be made in Capernaum, because the tax was gathered from every one only in the place where he lived; according to the symbolical sense, however, Peter is the representative of all for whom Christ himself pays, inasmuch as he bids them pay in his fellowship and as his followers.

We now return to what was said at the beginning. Even the miraculous power which proves his dignity and freedom as a Son, He makes use of in a way of humble self-denial. And wherefore? But that we may not offend! Hear, hear ye proud ones among the disciples of the lowly One, ye champions of faith who are apt to forget the love, ye Quakers with the hat of self-will upon your head, to whom, with all your good intention, the true Spirit has not yet shown the true relation of Christ and his New Testament theocracy to the kingdom of this world! True, if ye are sons in the Son, ye are all free—free however, not from, but to, the fulfilling of all righteousness. Consider, moreover, that the kings of the earth do not know you as such, in your heavenly sonship, that ye are rather to abide here as strangers—and give no offence. Child of God in the faith which removes mountains, use this thy very power as a son in the humility of faith, by submission to the hands of men. Thou shouldst sooner and rather procure by thy faith the tribute pence, than needlessly remove the mountains out of the way; rather work a miracle for this than give any offence by thy power and freedom, laying down σκάνδαλα (stumbling-blocks) instead of removing them.

* He could say to no one: Be so good as give the tax for me! The remark of Hess, however, reaches somewhat too far: "It appears, he would in this case on purpose not pay the temple tax with another's money"—if by this is to be understood: Not even with the contributions of his followers that were then in the purse. Whence, then, did he pay before? There was therefore at that time certainly nothing in the purse.

† In Stilling's Heimweh is related how the fish snatched away the shining piece of money dropped by a man on the shore, and as being too large to swallow, had kept it in its throat until Peter soon after came with the hook. Thus must some one have lost it, for the service of the Master. This is possible, but not necessary, and it is better not to add any stories of ours to that which is given us, by going farther back into the depths of the sea.

* Observe here, Christ says, Take the stater, and not the fish, which yet Lange makes Peter to have brought to the tax-gatherers as payment in natura (worth a stater), after having opened its mouth, i. e., in poetical expression, loosened it from the hook! Lange thinks at least that the apostle at all events delivered what was required to the tax-gatherers in a miraculous form—either that he gave the fish as caught at Christ's word, or that he related to them the miracle with the money. We think, however, that the testimony of the power of Jesus here belonged only to the disciples and not at all to the tax-gatherers; otherwise we should lose the principal point of the whole, namely, the humility that would not offend.

THE TRUE GREATNESS OF THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST—THE POWER OF THE CHURCH TO BIND AND TO LOOSE.

(Matt. xviii. 3–20; Mark xi. 33–50; Luke ix. 48–50.)

It is self-evident that ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ, "at the same time," is not literally to be strained, as expressing immediate connection, but (although it is certainly more than merely ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, "on that day,") it leaves room, at all events, for the return of Peter from procuring the tribute money; for afterwards (ver. 21), he is present, and has heard every thing along with the rest. The dispute as to precedency had already broken out before on the way to Capernaum, while, in addition to the internal grounds for such questioning, which already lay of necessity in the thoughts and inquiries of the disciples respecting the mysterious advent of the kingdom of heaven, and their personal position in that kingdom, outward occasions also had now come in rapid succession (ch. xvi. 19, 28; xvii. 1). Whether Peter was destined to occupy a place above the others, and what that was, what besides was meant by Christ in the repeated separation of the three disciples from the twelve—this was more directly interesting and important to them than the dying and rising again of the Son of Man! At least their thoughts soon turn from the one to the other, and only the latter gives rise to a warm and lengthy discussion, because it concerns their persons. The question in dispute, which Matthew states in the uncaptiously general form τίς ἄρα μείζων ἐστίν, "Who [then] is the greatest," has yet another personal motive lying behind it: Which of us shall receive special precedence, and the place of honor (ch. xx. 21), or rather is already destined to this by Christ?* Mark, with his more concise τίς μείζων, expresses this in his connection still more strongly. Luke most distinctly τό, τίς ἂν εἴη μείζων αὐτῶν—i. e., of course not greater than them, but which of us shall be greater than the rest (comp. Luke xxii. 24). Not, however, altogether, as Winer also understands this passage: that they were thinking of a single major ceteris or princeps (as in other places the comparative is thus put for the superlative, Matt. xiii. 32, μεῖζον τῶν λαχάνων), they were rather thinking, as the occasion led them to do, of several who might receive precedence; although Christ afterwards, in his answer, very strikingly makes a proper superlative of it, in order to place in opposition to it his μικρότερος ἐν πᾶσιν, least one among all. That Peter was not the speaker on this occasion we take to be quite as natural as that he afterwards again comes prominently forward (Matt. ver. 21); properly considered, however, the προσῆλθον λέγοντες, "came saying," of Matt. is to be taken not literally but in the higher truth, according to the manner of this Evangelist in other places (comp. ch. viii. 5, 6), for according to Mark Christ asked what they had been disputing about on the way, but they held their peace, being ashamed. Or must we suppose that they afterwards spoke out? This mode of reconciling the Evangelists can hardly be the right one, and might rather impair the truth as well of Matthew's as of Mark's account.* What Luke, in an expression intermediate between the two, says: ἰδὼν τὸν διαλογισμὸν τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, perceiving the thought of their heart—rightly shows, that Matthew has concisely represented the silent confession of the disciples before him who knew their thoughts, as a λέγειν or "said," in instructive contradiction to our registering exactness in regard to what is merely external.

We have now, however, in the first place again to show, that the whole answer of Christ, which Matthew gives without interruption on to ver. 20, was actually spoken then by him (ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ), and that nothing foreign is added from any other place; that is, not that no pause, interruption, or digression may have taken place—for Mark and Luke have introduced in the course of it the question of John respecting the exorcist in the name of Jesus, who had not been called, and several other sayings of Christ; but that Christ actually at that time spake all this in close succession. As Christ does not let himself be driven by those digressions from pursuing the course of his thoughts, until the question of the disciples has been completely answered and despatched, so also does Matthew here, as it were, not let himself be hindered from laying before us in one whole the profound and grand connection of his words spoken upon this occasion. We will therefore

* Of course, as the clause "in the kingdom of heaven" clearly shows, the entire question refers to the future position, by no means only (as Neander says): Who among them is now already by zeal in the service of Christ, in virtue of his personal qualities and services the greater? The disciples will certainly anticipate the future a little—so much is true in this; but that only present worthiness qualifies for the kingdom of heaven—this is precisely what the answer of Christ opens up to them.

* In which case Roos, for example, is for bringing out, that the subsequent question was put in a more generalized, less faulty form, than the first dispute, "who among them is the greatest!" We think that this "among them" is self-evident also in Matthew and Mark (Mark, πρὸς ἀλλήλους).

here also do him justice, and reserve the consideration of the sayings in Mark and Luke, although they are historically parallel, for our commentary on those places. We also leave aside, in the meantime, the immediately following parable addressed to Peter (although Matthew includes it, ch. xix. 1, rightly in the these sayings) as a corollary, which it only is in reality, and look only at the profound connection in which Christ, according to Matt. vers. 3–20, gives answer and instruction as to the true greatness of his disciples in relation to one another. This is and remains truly the grand theme, the leading idea, which every thing follows in consecutive order.

Christ does not satisfy himself with saying what lay on the surface as the most immediate answer, namely, wherein this true greatness of his disciples consists, but takes a deeper and wider view of it, and discusses the important point thus raised so completely for his disciples in all future time, that he shows besides whereon it is founded, and finally, how it expresses itself. These are the three principal parts of the whole. It consists in humility first of all, but at the same time also in the love which naturally flows from humility, and is given with it, which despises or neglects no other person as little (whereby, already at the beginning, the foundation is laid for the inference which points out the expression of such love). In humility: without which no one can in any wise be a disciple, can in any wise enter into the kingdom of heaven, or belong to it (ver. 3)—with which every humble disciple stands on one and the same level of greatness (ver. 4). In love: which here is positively a δέχεσθαι, an acknowledging, helping, reception of every other little one, as standing on the same level with myself (ver. 5)—negatively, a not offending (ver. 6). This latter (because, as we shall see, occasion was given for this in the circumstances) is farther carried out in an emphatic admonition respecting offences: the "Wo to the world!" begins from without (ver. 7)—what is said as to the unavoidableness and yet the criminality of offences goes deeper into the thing (ver. 7)—and finally, the way pointed out to self-denial, to the slaying of inward offences in themselves, completes the information for the disciples if they would not fall into the "Wo to the world!" and "Wo to the man!" (vers. 8, 9). For this is the only way by which the disciples of Jesus can attain to, or maintain humility, which in relation to others becomes love; thus alone is offence avoided and destroyed in the root.

But after Christ has thus represented the matter to his disciples in so severe and difficult a light, after he has thus plainly shown them that the return to a childlike state here required of them is truly no child's play, but can be attained only by the manliest internal struggles with the members of the old man, which unhappily have already grown strong—he does not stop here, but comforts them again by kindly opening up to them, how the greatness of the little ones, whom we are not to despise and offend but love (consequently, which also lies behind this: the loving patience of Christ towards the other little ones, who, alas! as yet offend in their weakness), is founded on the great salvation through the Son of Man. If already, at ver. 5, preparing the way for this, it was said that a little child is to be so highly esteemed because Christ is in him—Christ now first, at ver. 10, comprises it in one weighty and mysterious proposition: the greatness of the little ones (i. e., as the interpretation will show, the dignity of those who are as yet indeed weak, but who are, precisely on this account, disciples of child-like humility) rests on this, that they are highly honored before God. And wherefore, whence is this? The more particular development of this follows immediately: For the Son of Man is come to save the children of men! (ver. 11). To this literal statement is added the parable of the seeking love of the shepherd (vers. 12, 13), a parable which puts to shame every proud thought that goes against the love of Christ, and which exhorts to the imitation of his example in going forth to seek others. Then follows, in conclusion, as the highest step in the ascent, the gracious good pleasure of the Father towards the little ones (ver. 14). In this love of the Father, manifested in the redeeming Son, must the genuine humility and love of all his genuine children be founded, and must seek to know naught else but this: I myself am not lost only from such love, and no other must be lost from my want of love.

Christ might now have stopped here, but he has yet more to say. The dispute of the twelve about precedence has again opened up to his inner view the entire future of his Church, which is to proceed from these disciples. It is natural that he should specially refer this dispute to that word which was given to Peter before the others (ch. xvi. 18, 19), in order now, at the same time, to exhibit its true meaning in opposition to any misunderstanding of it. Accordingly, in order thoroughly to exhaust this theme, so as to be understood in all future time, he shows how one day the greatness of his disciples (according to which there is no μείζων, prae ceteris, but only a common rivalry of love, on the part of every little one who will be great in Christ, towards every other little one who also belongs to Christ), how this greatness should and will express itself in the fellowship of all the redeemed who believe on him. If the first two parts of the discourse spoke of individuals, we have now, in the third part, a term expressive of union; hitherto it has been, παιδίον τοῦτο, ὃς ἐάν, τοιοῦτον ἕν, εἷς τῶν μικρῶν τούτων, "this little child," "whosoever," "one such," "one of these little ones"—now, however, it is ἀδελφός, "brother," now the children are represented as brothers and sisters in the household of God, who, in their intercourse with one another, are neither to give nor to take offence, but in the power of Christ, who is with them and in them, to manifest the love that seeks and saves. If the second part contained a retrospective glance at the first and innermost ground of all this new order of love and humility, which is henceforward to be the true order of precedence (the "house-law of humility" for the family of God), at the coming of the Son of Man into the world for its salvation—there follows now, on the other hand, a prospective glance at the future state of his kingdom. The true greatness of the disciples of Christ expresses itself in the unity and power of his Church; unity, namely, in the love, and power in the truth of God (which latter will certainly not be wanting in genuine love). The unity of love is, according to the connection with what goes before, necessarily represented in the well-regulated conduct of the individual, as a member of the Church, in the case of offences (vers. 15, 17). It shows itself, in the first place, always as unity of love, in the censure of the brother who sins, which is to be administered in a manner equally sparing, and seeking, by successive steps, to remove the offence; but if the sin yields not to love, it must certainly become also unity in the truth, inasmuch as the Church (not the individual!) at last excludes, and meanwhile drives out the impenitent person from its pale. This, again, as the transition to what follows—The Church has power in Christ who has invested it with his own power! What it does upon earth in the name of Christ, that does Christ in it as being also valid in heaven, and this is finally the true common greatness reaching to heaven of the united disciples of Christ, in which even every μείζονες, "greater ones," of the twelve disappears, and, therefore, certainly every precedence of any kind on the part of a Peter, John, and James. Vers. 18–20 speak of the power of the Church, so that the power first comes into prominence, and then in the conclusion, which points backwards, it is declared what and where this Church is. It is a power (and the way was prepared for this by what goes before), to bind also with judgment, as to loose with forgiveness (with friendly rebuke which aims at forgiveness and reconciliation), therefore, the severe power of truth; in and along with all this, however, it is a power to pray, the more excellent power of unceasing love, which with its faith penetrates into the love and gifts of the heavenly Father. And, finally, who has this power? The Church! Where is the Church? Wherever there is a living part of its great whole, an outgoing of its unity, which cannot be separated by place or by number, where even two or three are met together in the name of Jesus! And the ground? Because he himself is among them and in them, as already in every individual little one who believes on him, ver. 5.

Verses 2, 3. All heathen antiquity knew almost nothing of the dignity and honor of humility, and could not even find a word which clearly expresses this; the Roman modestia does not suffice for this, while the Greek ταπεινόφρων, ταπεινοφροσύνη only struggles to free itself from censure, so as to be regarded as praiseworthy.* In the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament alone do we find preparatory intimations of that which the first great ταπεινῶν ἑαυτόν, "He that humbleth himself," can alone fully express. He, however, speaks the new great word as simply and unpretendingly as if it had always been self-evident. Every child had spoken it, and shown it to those who were grown up; a presentiment of it lay certainly in every puero debeter reverentia (to the very boy reverence is due) that found expression, in every unexpressed receptivity for childlike feeling and childlike ways: yet this presentiment in all its forms waited until Jesus placed the child in the midst, and with his word unloosed that word which assigns its due praise to humility, and which had hitherto been fast bound by pride in the breast of man. In this most profound and general reference of his doctrine to the symbol of it and prophetic testimony to it, as yet present in man, lies the deepest reason why Christ here does not speak but show; by no means merely with the purpose (with which the most superficial view is wont to stop short) of vividly impressing his disciples, then present, with a lasting memorial of this important lesson. This child still stands ever in the midst of us, where we see it, and now looking on it, think of the words of the Master! That there was at that time a child near at hand, had been provided for by the Father for this occasion. Christ called it to him—consequently it could already understand a call, and could walk; he not merely placed it in the midst, but took it up also in his arms (according to Mark), in order to give expression by action to his love for such little ones—it was, therefore, certainly as yet a παιδίον of tender age. At all events it was no ill-bred child, not one that would not come on being called, that cried or made resistance, not one that stood still when the strange, friendly man called, but a genuine, true child, such as is meant by the word.† Christ, indeed, as Mark portrays the scene, had first sat down, as it were on the seat of judgment, for the solemn determination of this certainly most important question, had called to him the council of the twelve, to whom now a grand fundamental principle of the kingdom is to be opened up in presence of the rest of the people who stood by, both great and small, as we see from

* Tholuck cites from Plutarch (de prefectibus in virtute, cap. 10) "one of those few passages where ταπεινός stands in an honorable signification," and compares Plato, de legg. lib. iv. p. 15, Bipont.

† Which, moreover, received no injury or offence from being thus set up before others—so that Weisse might spare the objection: Against such conduct of Jesus an intelligent pedagogue would have much to say!

the child being there,* and then (after having given expression to another word against the ambition of θέλειν πρῶτος εἶναι), he forcibly and unexpectedly puts them all to shame by this little child before all the bystanders, and yet in such a way, as could only appeal with amiable truth to the pure human feeling. What a majesty of love and truth in this, Verily I say unto you! As children—he thereby says, at the same time, that it is not the child personally that is meant, but that it only stands there as a child in general. Ye should, all of you, be children, who, properly speaking, know nothing either of comparative or of superlative in their innocently positive existence, who have no questioning one with another as to who shall be greater in their paradise and kingdom of heaven; but if, unhappily, ye are otherwise—then must ye now be converted, and again become so! You apostles also, even you, if, and because, ye would be the greater! That they themselves, the twelve, were chosen to something special in the kingdom of heaven was, not indeed without reason, a settled matter with them beforehand; the question therefore now was, who among them is greater. But here Christ cuts away that first ground from beneath their feet, and plainly announces to them: If ye do not become quite different from, quite the reverse of what ye have now shown yourselves to be, ye shall not at all (οὐ μή) enter into the kingdom of heaven. A terribly unexpected word for these servants of the kingdom, who had thought such a thing as this next to impossible, who had learned hitherto with their Lord to use the word "in the kingdom of heaven" as a great thing already done and determined for them! What is of the first importance is, to enter into that kingdom; that is already a great thing, nay, the alone great thing without distinction, which is reserved only for the humble. To be called an apostle, and not to be in the kingdom of heaven? We know well that this, alas! turned out to be true in the case of one of the disciples.

Here the natural understanding in us all is ready to revolt—here the blind folly of the proud takes offence: Is this then what is called advancing and becoming something, if one must turn round, go backwards, and become a little child? But whoever puts the question of Nicodemus to the Master πῶς δύναται, "How can it be?" has already the answer just such as he there gave it, namely, that he does not mean here certainly a literal turning back and beginning anew in the bodily sense, but a being born again of the Spirit to a new, spiritual, and truly childlike state which even children have not, properly speaking, with respect to their bodily age, but only show it in the figure: ὡς τὰ παιδία, as little children. Although the entire analogy between this requirement of Christ and that which has respect to the new birth retains its essential truth (for στραφῆτε does not merely stand adverbially related to γένησθε, as שׁוּב, but expresses beforehand more than this, and contains the proper leading idea)—yet, along with the strictness, there is something comforting in the expression "as children," and in the "become," which leaves much time for patience. God trains his children to be small as we do ours to be great, and the growth of the internal man is a continual growing downwards to this humility and simplicity. Christ here again calls to mind the τέκνα and νήπιοι, children and babes (chap. xi. 19–25), which ought, indeed, already to have occurred to Peter at chap. xvi. 17. What is the tertium comparationis for this as, on which it all hinges? Scarcely can it be altogether expressed by any other single word than just childlike; yet there are two principal ideas which directly after appear prominently in the words of Christ himself, and which point to all that is implied in that expression, namely, humility, in which a man humbles himself (ver. 4), and then (what is implied therein), trust on the part of those who believe on him (ver. 6.)* "As this child"—only look at it, and observe how it has now shown itself, and stands before your eyes. A child is called, and comes; is placed, and lets itself be placed; is embraced, and lets itself be embraced; it follows, obeys, receives (Mark x. 15), mistrusts not, resists not, is prepared and tractable for every one greater than itself, just because it knows this: I am a child, and that is a friendly man! Such humble trust in receiving and obeying, simply yielding up of ourselves to the love and power of God, which embraces us in Christ, and seeks to lift us up from earth to heaven—such is the childlike state which conducts into the kingdom of heaven. "As a child always believes itself to be safe when it has laid itself in its mother's lap, or when the mother holds out her hand to it"—so it is with the childlike faith in the gracious word of the heavenly Father, revealed in his Son.

Verse 4. The general principle is now repeated with a view to its application to the individual. Every one who has become like such a child, is always, in relation to others, and in proportion as this is wanting in them, the greater and greatest in the kingdom of heaven. Here Christ actually makes a superlative of the comparative, but immediately again cancels it by ὅστις, whoever, in order without distinction to attribute the same greatness to every humble one (hence in Luke οὗτος ἔσται μέγας, "the same shall be great"). Erasmus is excellent here: Quisquis igitur demiserit semetipsum, hic est ille maximus in regno cœlorum (whoever therefore shall humble himself, he is that greatest one in the kingdom of heaven). In like manner he is equally striking in bringing out a delicate shade of the thought not to be overlooked, which the original text does not express: "Demiserit semetipsum, sicut est puer iste;" for, taken strictly, this child needed not to humble itself, so as to be converted and become as a child; it is so already, and Christ can only have meant to say: He who humbles himself to become (in a higher sense) such as this child is.* Happy he in whom this is fulfilled, so that Christ may set him, on account of his humility, before others, with the testimony and commendation: Ye must become as this childlike person, who is the great one before me! But whence and wherefore this greatness of the little ones? Truly only from the goodness and grace of him, who takes such a child in his arms and blesses it, who alone exalts those who humble themselves (chap. xxiii. 12), who imparts himself and his highest glory, won by the deepest humiliation, to all his believing followers. This is said in what immediately follows.

Verse 5. The connection with what goes before is twofold, so that the discourse, which is in the utmost degree compressed, already begins something new, while it finishes what goes before. The little one who altogether unassumingly yields himself up to me, is and becomes great, for I bend myself down to him, and turn in to him. This important leading point, here indicated (as a glance forward to the second principal part, vers. 10, 14), being as it were the still hidden key for the solution of the enigmatic saying respecting the greatness of the little ones,† is, however, only expressed as the ground of a second discourse, in which a further advance is made. The first was: Whosoever shall himself be as this child! Now, the other is: Whosoever receives such a child! There can be no question that Christ now, in the first τοιοῦτον, "such an one" (after τὰ παιδία and τὸ παιδίον τοῦτο), passes from the figure to its application, from children to childlike men (comp. afterwards chap. xix. 14, τῶν γὰρ τοιούτων). Certainly not merely: Such a child as this well-behaved one here, for oftentimes even children are at an early age corrupted; but, now onwards, Christ means his disciples, if and in so far as they resemble children, and may even be so called (as, at ver. 6, the evident explanation follows). The little ones who believe on him are the same as those of whom he spoke in chap. x. 40–42; all the more certainly, as the promise to him who receives such (he receiveth me) is only a repetition of what is there said, and this repetition (according to Mark. ver. 41, and Luke, 48), was expressed still more fully. If, at ver. 6, the offending follows as the direct antithesis to the receiving (ὃς ἐάν, ὃς δ' ἄν), then Christ certainly uses the two expressions such children and such little ones as believe on me, synonymously. Those commentators, however, on the other hand, who exclude children in the proper sense, are not less erring than those who understand them alone; for the full and true sense of what Christ thus expresses comprehends both in one: such as are truly childlike children are in reality the first among the "children of God," and heirs of the kingdom of heaven (otherwise there would be no ground for the application, Mark x. 14). Hence also Luke, ver. 48, although not exactly, yet not wrongly, has put τοῦτο τὸ παιδίον, this little child. The whole of what is said in vers. 5 and 6 as also in vers. 10, 11, 14 in Matthew is, at the same time, rightly to be understood and used of the little child, although the fides implicita of baptized children is not, as some have confidently maintained, to be demonstrated from ver. 6.

One child receives another, and makes no evil distinctions, of which in its simplicity it knows nothing; humility uprightly honors its equal; he who is little in his own eyes esteems the little one beside him as worthy of the acknowledgment that he should do to him as to himself—consequently as worthy of love. To take up or receive is the opposite of proud rejection, of unloving neglect, it is precisely as the προσλαμβάνεσθαι, or "receiving," of Rom. xv. 7; to love, to do good to, as we also say, to interest oneself in any one (literally to receive any one to oneself). Comp. again Mark ix. 41, where the doing a kindness to a disciple, which is expressed in terms taken from Matt. x. 42, forms the same antithesis to σκανδαλίζειν or "offend," as here the δέχεσθαι or "receiving." (The ἔσχατος, Mark ver. 35, corresponds to the παιδίον τοιοῦτον ἕν of Matthew, the διάκονος εἶναι to the δέχεσθαι.) Now Christ says, promising in quite a general form: Whoso from his own humility despises not one of my children, one of those who believe on me, be he even the lowest and least whom one might easily despise, but lovingly receives him for my name's sake, because I have received him, and because I will that he be received! This whoso is then in the first place to be applied to those who are as yet standing without, to whom, however, Christ himself now comes in him who is to be received, and receives them also into the kingdom of heaven, inasmuch as he is received by them. A spiritual child has in a certain sense quite as much, nay more, that is fitted to awaken favor and to call forth love than a child in the bodily sense. Whoso is capable of perceiving this, and acknowledging it in action, thereby proves himself to be equally childlike and worthy of the kingdom of heaven. Whoso brings himself down to the lowly, humbly receives the humble, becomes by the very act one of them: thus the door of the kingdom of heaven stands wide open for those who love (chap. xxv. 40), as, in the first ὅστις οὖν, "whosoever, therefore" (ver. 4), for those who are humble. So much the more does it follow as a matter of course, that one child of God should receive another, that one who is already in the kingdom of heaven should receive all who enter by the right door. Since every one who is least is at the same time the greatest, why should not every one prove his humility in love towards every other, and hold him in respect as in the place of Christ?

* Already Laur. Valla: Iste parvulus non se humiliat, sed humilis est.

† For Christ maintains not merely at first, ver. 3, that humility, consciousness of our own littleness, poverty, and impotence is the condition of entering into the kingdom of heaven, but he goes on to say (ver. 4), that always every one who humbles himself, is and remains the greater in the kingdom of heaven.

Verse 6. Between vers. 5 and 6 now comes, according to Mark and Luke, the question of John respecting the unknown disciple who did not as yet belong to the fellowship of Christ's followers, who, notwithstanding, cast out devils in the name of Jesus, and whom the apostles had forbidden to do so. To this then, at the same time, the warning of Christ refers: Whoso shall offend, hurt, despise, not acknowledge, one of those who believe on me, in his retired and separate faith as a beginner, does what is wrong. This, however, is by no means the sole reference, but only one which comes unsought for in addition to the other. Matthew rightly lets Christ proceed, without giving this incident as the occasion of his words, for even without this occasion he would actually have continued his discourse in the connection of the principal thoughts such as we have noticed above. And even although precisely at the moment no such offence had occurred, Christ might, and must indeed, following out the antithesis, warn against it; but an offence had actually already occurred, inasmuch as (according to Mark ver. 35, ἐφώνησε τοὺς δώδεκα), besides the little child whom he called to him (which can hardly have been there alone), there were others standing by, other disciples also, and beginners in the faith, with respect to whom the warm dispute of the twelve must certainly have caused an offence. These others over whom the disciples exalted themselves, while yet at the same time setting a bad example before them, Christ in his wisdom indirectly permits to hear his whole discourse to the apostles, and he compensates for the offence by placing the little child between the two parties—this is to be carefully observed, in order again to mark the tenderness of his manner of acting, which is always suitable to the occasion.

We are to offend no believer, the little one or neophyte all the less because he is the most easily offended and hurt. Whoso does this—again, first of all, one who still belongs to the world without, a proud and unloving one, who has no mind to acknowledge the little ones in the kingdom of heaven, who are yet the great ones. In so far this offending forms the contrast to that word in chap. xvii. 27, according to which the children of God are not to offend the world. If however Christ meant this alone, then he would again have added, for my name's sake, for this would most directly express the ground upon which the world offends those who believe. But the words, who believe on me, which are added instead, include the still heavier offence of those who themselves believe, and who ought, therefore, certainly to acknowledge the faith of every other little one, to despise and offend no fellow-believer. Wo to him who gives offence! This Christ expresses, first of all—before he once and again literally utters it—by a proverb which describes one of the rarest forms of capital punishment, namely the καταποντίζεσθαι, or being drowned, as it was practiced among the heathen, and hence probably had, in Galilee, given rise to a proverb. Christ will speak very strongly and emphatically, he therefore represents the proverbial case in the strongest form; not merely by πελάγει τῆς θαλάσσης, the depth of the sea (πέλαγος, the main sea, the middle where the sea is deep, as opposed to the shallow water near the shore, Acts xxvii. 4, 5), but in addition to this by the very concrete expression μύλος ὀνικός, an [ass's] mill-stone. According to the ancient custom, which extended even to more modern times (comp. Wetstein on this), a weight—most naturally a stone (Jer. li. 63)—was suspended round those who were thus to be drowned, in order to ensure their sinking, and as a mark of disgrace, as we may well suppose, it was hung round the neck of the criminal. Now "millstone" is farther proverbial for a heavy stone (Rev. xviii. 21), and Christ makes this still stronger (perhaps of himself, perhaps the proverb already ran thus) by the very special form μύλος ὀνικός.* He will say then that such a fearful and ignominious corporeal punishment were better for a man—than what? In the first place, and most directly: better than that (or before that) he should do this, and thus become himself a stone of stumbling to his brother! And thus the words are literally repeated in Luke xvii. 2. But there, as also here, follows the further sense when ever we ask, Why so? Better than the wo (ver. 7) which he incurs by such conduct, than the eternal fire (vers 8, 9)—better than this, any merely temporal punishment of death in the deepest water.† O thou tender love, how sharply dost thou speak against the offending of thy beloved little ones, and yet how is thy holy anger against those who are destitute of love, itself nothing but burning love, which would ward off sin and its condemnation!

* For, which is a secondary thing, neither according to some is the nether mill-stone as bearer, nor, according to others, the upper as worker, compared to an ὄνος or "ass." That would be strange, and does not admit of being proved, nor does the fact of its being precisely the upper or the nether serve to strengthen the saying. But it is the stone of a mill turned by an ass, mola asinaria, as we distinguish jumentarias molas from manuariis, i. e., a mill driven by asses, not a hand-mill, in which case it denotes the largest and heaviest kind of stone.

† In the water all flesh drowns, but the fire judges the spirits. Thus might the flood, by the destruction of the flesh, save the spirits from the last judgment (1 Pet. iii. 19; iv. 1, 6).

For the rest, it is self-evident, which we would here further only indicate for reflection, that all that is said in vers. 3–6, is with great compression and profound penetration, put in so decided a form, because Christ every where comprehends in the first beginning the entire consequence and development. He who only begins with the "being converted and becoming," already enters into the kingdom of heaven, and must then, indeed, remain in it and go on. The μείζων, μέγας, "greatest," "great," is already attributed to the first self-abasement, because it is the first step on the right way; but in it the whole way and course is further included. It is the same with the receiving (ver. 5), the same with the offending (ver. 6), in which not every individual act of offence (for who is not guilty of this?) but the continuing in such a disposition, receives so terrible a threatening.

Verse 7. Wo to the world! This now expresses the open opposition of those who are without, and unhappily continue without, to all who are in the kingdom, as μικροί and μεγάλοι, "least" and "great," to whom, in vers. 8, 9, the "thy" applies. Wo to the world because of the offences, more exactly ἀπό, from or out of the offences, which it gives and takes out of its own evil will; thus does it prepare for itself the wo which is not ordained for it. That offences come, that men in the world will offend one another and be offended—ἀνάγκη ἐστίν, Luke xvii. 1, ἀνένδεκτόν ἐστι, this is indeed, alas! inevitable, as the world and man are; this is not so quickly to be done away with, and that for a twofold reason. First, with respect to their origin, they are a necessary consequence of the natural corruption in which men cannot, indeed, be or do otherwise; so long as the world remains and chooses to remain the world, it cannot be otherwise in it. But secondly, also, with respect to their end or design, these offences, tolerated by the long-suffering and wisdom of God, are themselves a necessary means also to the coming of his kingdom, and are used for the trial and confirmation of believers, as those who continue in them must serve for its manifestation and its development for the judgment—meanwhile, also, for giving the salutary experience of sin to many who shall afterwards become believers. The fundamental idea is the same as at 1 Cor. xi. 19. God would indeed otherwise suspend the freedom of men, which he never does, and would hinder a free development in the recovery of the lost, in so far as such will let themselves be recovered from the world. He must then, instead of patiently bearing with men, rather at once drown them all, which in the absolute sense would not really be better for the individual and the whole, as was affirmed in the proverb before only in a relative sense. There is then a necessity for these offences, yet not an absolute necessity any where; for the world can also receive the children of Christ in his name, Christ is sent to it himself, and in his followers, for blessing and not for wo. Already, before pronouncing the wo, he has first exclaimed: Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me!* Therefore only take thou no offence in a world full of offences, and thus wilt thou be helped. And above all things, give none thyself as much as in thee lies, i. e., no evil, culpable offence; for that the truth and love of Christ shall and must always itself be the greatest offence to the world, and that the wo arising from this rests only upon its head, we have already seen at chap. xv. 12–14. Wo to the man through whose own fault, contrary to the will of God, the offence comes, i. e., is given or received! This second exclamation is not quite the same as the first, Wo to the world! but again (as in these sayings the word is ever capable of a two-sided application) makes the transition to those who no longer belong to the world, and yet are guilty of an offence. Wo to the man without distinction and exception, who, as man, and following the bent of his natural corruption, acts in the same way as the evil world; for all that offends, whatsoever it be, is still the world, although within the kingdom of heaven, although in a disciple of Christ. Wo to the same man when, instead of a pure turning from such an offence, he continues and goes on in it; the wo of the offence shall remain upon his head notwithstanding the divine counsel, according to which offences are permitted and in so far ordained. This is expressed here precisely as it is afterwards at chap. xxvi. 24, and may even here have been intended to carry a secret hint and terror to the conscience of Judas. Wo to the man, even were he an apostle, he is yet himself an offence and a devil among the twelve. Perhaps, as was the case at other times, as at the anointing of Christ by the woman in Bethany, this Judas may even have been the originator, or at least the promoter, of the evil thoughts connected with this unhappy dispute among the disciples. This, however, is only conjecture and uncertain; with more certainty we now apply the word of Christ with most perfect justice to another: Wo to the φιλοπρωτεύων (ambitious) in the Church, the pseudo-Peter and haughty servus servorum Dei, who with false key shuts the kingdom of heaven, offends and corrupts the faithful, nay, builds up a world full of offences (which yet is held to be the true Church), as the Babylon which is afterwards to be thrown down as a millstone is cast into the sea! (Rev. xviii. 21).

Verses 8, 9. If Christ, who cites the word

* Rud. Matthai says here quite correctly: The wo is the consequence not of the fact that offences must come, but that they are come, the consequence not of the necessity but the actuality of offences. The second clause confirms not the wo, but the offences of the first clause.

of God in the Old Testament Scripture, puts his own new word on a level of authority with it, seals this with, "Verily I say unto you," summons his contemporaries, and not these alone, to hear, whosoever among them has ears—who assures us that his words shall survive heaven and earth, and declares that the office of the future Comforter, who is to reprove the world and to lead believers into all truth, is to interpret his words, and to bring them to the understanding—if Christ, who, as the risen one, himself brings to the remembrance of his disciples the words which he spoke when he was yet with them, so that thereby they begin now to understand these words and the Scripture—if he had not also before this at times cited and repeated his own words, there would be wanting what is more appropriate to him—the highest Prophet, over whom the Father himself cites the prophecy "Him shall ye hear,"—than to the former prophets who already did the same. But he did this, and so we find it in the Scripture, in which his words are now embodied by the Spirit. And when he repeats the same sayings in a different connection, he will thereby teach those who hear and who interpret them, not merely that we have not yet enough heard and understood them, but also that their deep-searching import has been expressed, and finds its application in more than one immediate connection. Thus he cites here a word which he had already spoken in the Sermon on the Mount (chap. v. 29, 30), where we have interpreted it. There, as here, to offend means to give occasion to sin, to tempt; there it was the adulterous lust of the flesh that was immediately spoken of, here it is every incentive to sin in general that is meant, and is comprehended in the great sum-total of all the offences in the world that come from men, or rather the inner offence, which comes to every one from his own flesh, is disclosed as their original ground and root, which is to be cut away. Wouldst thou not give offence without, so that the wo may not fall upon thee? Guard then against the offence within, and that with all severity! Slay the old man, from which it comes, with the salutary death that issues in life. In the words "thy hand or foot," Christ now again turns from the world to his disciples, and addresses every one who either is such or would like to become such; for only in reference to them does he use the familiar and confidential "thou" since the Sermon on the Mount, others he addresses invariably by "you." (He could not say, for example, John viii. 24: If thou believest not, thou shalt die in thy sins.) In addition to this, the fact that I am offended by my own members, by myself, here pre-supposes the internal conflict of the old man with the new; the world knows not and feels not this, he who feels it is already no longer of the world. And yet, on the other hand, the offending world is still in him, and to overcome it there, is not a thing that calls for soft measures. Observe here the great difference between being like a child in the natural and in the spiritual sense, the manful struggle implied in the constant turning so as to become as children! Children play in innocent delight with themselves, with their hands and feet, but a spiritual child, because he is always in the process of becoming (i. e., of ceasing to be), cuts them off and plucks them out. In the Sermon on the Mount, Christ, following the order according to which there is first the looking upon with desire, and then the lusting to commit the deed, puts the eye before the hand: now, looking still deeper into the matter, he inverts this order because the offence ever arises anew, and, even after the cutting off of hand and foot (which latter is here added by way of amplification), the eye yet comes after. It might, so to speak, be thought that the acting and walking being suppressed, the secret desire is now harmless; but if thou art not on thy guard against this, it will soon get hand and foot for itself again. The eye must not be spared, because the members are cut off! Here stands the emphatic word, It is better for thee! (καλόν σοι, another expression for συμφέρει γάρ σοι, chap. 5), which corresponds to the συμφέρει before, ver. 6; comp. the closer connection (Mark ix. 42, 43). On the at once sharply ironical and severely rebuking sense in which the entering into life as a cripple is to be understood, we have already spoken at the other place where it occurs; here the εἰσελθεῖν is quite parallel to the first εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν from which the discourse set out. We have already given our opinion also as to the further application of this to the casting away of all that might be near and dear to us, as hand or eye, whenever it offends us; here it is again evident that this cannot be the most immediate, or the sole meaning, but, most properly, the internal offence in ourselves stands opposed to every offence of an outward kind. And yet it is not to be connected merely with incitements to sin against the law of love and truth, with anger, lust, and lies in the grosser sense, but the flesh which is to be slain must be detected and pursued, even in those spiritual forms which it assumes; the eye of criticism and asceticism must also be plucked out, and the hand of industrious zeal for public good, and the foot of all our own ways of virtue, must be cut off; or, to speak with Lange, also the talents of penetration—progress—energy.

Finally, observe that here Christ says not merely εἰς τὴν γέενναν τοῦ πυρός, "into hell fire," instead of εἰς γέενναν, "into hell" (chap. v.), but now, for the first time εἰς τὸ πῦρ τὸ αἰώνιον, into the eternal fire—which predicate is not connected with the word at chap. xiii. 42. Here it is already as at chap. xxv. 41, and it is a return to the ἄσβεστον, "unquenchable" of the Baptist (chap. iii. 12) which is therefore, in Mark ix., put in place of the expression here used, and to which are added the explanatory words concerning the unquenchable fire here omitted by Matthew and concerning the salutary salt of the other fire, which is not yet the unquenchable, the eternal, fire in the proper sense; of which we shall speak when we come to the interpretation of Mark.

Verse 10. We know who these little ones are: not merely children, but also such as are childlike, in humility and weakness—believers on him; although it is not again exclusively these latter, but, in a certain measure, actual children also to whom they are compared, and beside whom they are placed. The child set in the midst stands always there, although it is only by carrying out the fundamental view of the whole subject, that the discourse can further apply to it. The offending proceeds from a despising and proud overlooking; therefore, in the words, "Take heed," Christ most directly addresses the disciples who wished to be the greater. But the plural, which again occurs after the singular, includes the world along with the disciples, as both have been comprehended together since ver. 7. What all-embracing transitions in the incomparable discourse of Christ! From one child which must preach humility to the apostles, he passes to the entire great world full of offences, and the wo proceeding therefrom! from the eternal fire of hell, to the angels in heaven before the face and throne of God! from the sharpest wo back to the tenderest love, which will have no human child to be despised! Before Christ fully expresses the ground-idea of this second part of his discourse, namely, that the greatness which is graciously ascribed to the little ones is founded on his redeeming grace, according to the Father's good pleasure, he first prepares the way for this, by representing the angels* as an intermediate rank between God and man, related to both. The whole doctrine of Scripture concerning angels represents them thus: they are indeed above us with respect to our present position; but yet with respect to our calling to the glory of Christ, and renewal after the image of God, they serve us. Their very name, angels or messengers, represents these heavenly spirits as united to the earth and us. So highly is man honored before God, so highly honored is every individual of these little ones! The world as such enjoys indeed, somewhat, the protection and service of the angels, but only remotely and indirectly, not in the personal appropriation which is here denoted by their angels. This αὐτῶν, "their," standing together with ἑνός, "one," has certainly a specializing force, and does not again merge into an absorbing generality the prominence given to every individual; it points therefore, indeed, although only by way of allusion, to special guardian-angels of persons, in regard to which the unanimous doctrine of the Church fathers* had no doubt, since Christ had said "I say unto you." Yet not so that every man as such has his guardian-angel, and keeps him all his life long; this is a privilege of those little ones, i. e., as well of the natural as the spiritual children, inasmuch as the former, before the outbreak of corruption, the latter after this, as being on the way to blessedness, are capable of such guidance, and (by their humility) are worthy of it. Every child has his angel until sin drives him out, as we may yet trace it in the reflection of the angelic appearance on the countenance and in the form of children; children as such belong as yet to the "children of God," until the offence from within and without causes them to be lost. Every believer again, who may be saved through the grace of redemption, gets, as a new spiritual child, his angel again, and especially needs him in his weakness as a beginner now for protection and for monitions of a deeper kind, than the weak, foolish children in bodily danger. We forget the angels far too much, although Christ reminds us of them in the daily prayer (in the third petition); we speak in particular to our children far too little about their angels, and we ourselves as believers do not think enough of ours. This is at the same time a sinful despising of these exalted servants of the Most High, who yet so faithfully stoop down to us; it is also a despising of him who sends them. The angels are in heaven, and yet occupied at the same time in service and business on earth about their wards; for the heaven is not closed in space over the earth, but is ever open to us in every thing which it sends: where the angels of God go and stand, there also is heaven, and the face of God, which they at all times, διαπαντός, without interruption from any thing else, behold. I cannot at all find in this expression, as most commentators do, a special designation "of distinguished throne angels," (according to the analogy of those who stood nearest to the oriental kings, Esth. i. 4, comp. elsewhere, Tob. xii. 15, which I do not despise as apocryphal, for see Luke i. 19); if such a high angel were given to every little one, where then would remain the rest, and how could this be demonstrated?† But it is a general designation of these pure spirits, who are not like men separated from God; it signifies that even those who always and every where behold the face of God, yet at the same time, like the Father himself, look lovingly on the children and little ones (Psa. cxiii. 5, 6). Thus much only may lie in the expression, which connects the high rank and glory of the servants precisely with the littleness of those who are served, namely that the less, and the more needful of help, the protege is, so much the mightier is the protector who is given to him; although again it is not this alone that can determine the selection and arrangement in these things, which a vail hides from our eyes, for then we might scarcely be mistaken if we supposed that Gabriel was the guardian angel of the child Jesus. We do not see all this, and yet Christ calls to us in an awakening voice, See to it! Let the eye of faith be thoroughly open for what I say unto you! Wherever there is a child of God (in every sense), there the heaven is opened and let down to it, there is Bethel. Enter in, offend not thyself and the child, but go in, and share in the grace. This grace, however, is that which comes from the Father through the one only Son of Man. Therefore he does not say here at first: The face of their Father (namely, the Father of the little ones, since for the angels, God is certainly not Father), but of my Father!

* Out of which Lange, against all certainty of the letter, here frames the "life-images, light-images," "genii," of men! Only, at Acts xii. 15 "his angel," might, according to the popular belief, signify something similar, the "announcement" or "appearance" of Peter.

* See the citation of passages in J. F. Von Meyer's Blätter für höhere Wahrheit, i. 183—in part after Fr. Schmidt's treatise in Illgen's Denkschrift, with an interesting supplement from the occulta philosophia of Corn. Agrippa.

† The sainted Von Meyer also certified to me that he did not mean his note (which I can not but so understand) to be understood of special angels of a higher class.

Verse 11. For—not because the children of men have deserved it, nor because the children, before the outbreak of corruption, already carried it within them, and could enter into the kingdom of heaven by their own actual innocence. Oh no! They are all the lost, but I am come to save and to bless the lost (Luke xix. 10). What an immeasurable word again so simply spoken! There stands the ladder of Jacob before our eyes: below are the little ones, then their angels, then the heavenly Son of Man, he who comes as the original angel from the presence and from the bosom of the Father—and then above him (ver. 14) the Father himself, and his good pleasure.

Verses 12—14. We will not now enter particularly into this parable, but reserve it for Luke xv., where, with strengthened repetition, it opens up the grand profound connection of a series of parables. Instead of ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, "in the desert," there, we have here ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη, "into the mountains," which certainly at first sight appears to be the same, and yet is not so. There ἔρημος (מִדְבָּר) is not so much the desert where they have gone astray, as the pasturage, the heath, where the ninety and nine graze, well cared for; here, however, Christ alludes to such passages as Jer. l. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 6, 11, 12; here therefore, as appears also grammatically, the ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη, "into the mountains," is to be construed with πορευθείς, "goeth," not with the foregoing ἀφείς, "leaveth." Oh how faithfully and earnestly does this love of the Shepherd seek! and yet it finds not every lost one; hence the joy even of the Son of God himself upon every discovery—"as if he had found a new heaven." Bengel rightly says on the ἐὰν γένηται εὑρεῖν, "if so be that he find it," what is warranted by the expression: Inventio peccatoris est coram oculis Dei quiddam quasi contingens; ergo gratia non est irresistibilis (the finding of the sinner is in the eyes of God as it were something contingent; therefore grace is not irresistible). We do not shrink even from leaving out the quasi (as it were), which a feeling of reverence has dictated. For if the finding comes altogether and alone from the power of God, why then does it not take place at once, but only after a long previous seeking through the entire history of man and of the world? The faithfulness of the seeking love of Christ is, however, in such a parable, held up at the same time before his disciples as an admonition to follow his example; this lies in the question that stands before: What think ye? ye proud ones, who are so ready to despise and offend the little ones? The ὕπαγε, "go" (ver. 15), is to be done in the sense of the πορευθείς, "goeth" (ver. 12), which comes into finer prominence when, as in our language, the same rendering can be given to both words: Go with the same faithfulness of love as thy Master goes after the lost one! Herein is given, at the same time, the connecting link between the third principal part which follows at ver. 15, and the second; the second concludes at ver. 14 with what it began, inasmuch as the Father in heaven wills not that one of these little ones be lost (ver. 10), therefore also that they be not offended by you. Although by the shepherd in the parable is certainly meant the Son (as appears more prominently in Luke xv.), yet it is worthy of notice that Christ here uses another οὕτως, "so," for explanation, and thus rises higher—not: So am I, and do I—but: So is the love of the Father, of course in the Son. "Oh how very different is the great God from us little men! For we little men in our pride look on what is great, but the great God in his compassion looks on what is little, and is great in the little" (Hofacker). Now also when the children of God are viewed in common, Christ says significantly, Your Father (as at ver. 10, My Father)—he will thereby at the same time say: Ye other children of God, who are therefore to resemble your Father in loving the little ones.* It is not the will or the good pleasure literally before the holy wisdom, before the graciously shining face of the Father (רָצוֹן לִפְנֵי יְהוָה), that one should be lost. This mode of expression as a whole (which Peter has well preserved, 2 Pet. iii. 9), is taken from Isa. xviii. 23, xxxiii. 11, and the verily I say unto you (ver. 13), already corresponded to the oath of Jehovah by himself in that passage. Here a sermon is preached to us on the worth of every single human soul before God, here we are comforted against what the appearance of things in the world might otherwise suggest, namely, that the lost one is left to wander about unsought and forgotten. We are to believe that the Father forgets no one, but in this faith we are also diligently to exercise the love that seeks along with him.

* Which Alford has now expressed still more pointedly thus: When he assures of the dignity of the little ones it is "My Father"—when he gives the motive for the conduct of Christians, on the other hand, it is "Your Father."

Verses 15—17. The full and clear understanding of this entire passage is only to be obtained from the connection with the foregoing, as we have traced it above. Christ speaks here for the future of his Church, quite as naturally and unwarrantably as (at chap. x), he connected the prophetic glance into the future with the sending out of the disciples. His starting-point, indeed, was the immediate present, where the warning applies still to the disciples: Otherwise, even ye are not at all in the kingdom of heaven! How they must become children in spirit, and only as such little ones, are to possess in humility, and to manifest in love, the true greatness which belongs to them in common with every other little one—of this he has already plainly spoken. How such love receives, how it does not offend, how it does not despise or neglect any one who, according to the will of the Father, is redeemed by the Son—all this has already been spoken of, in so far as it must follow from the designation, and confirmation of the true greatness of the disciples. But it yet remains now specially to show how the love that proceeds from the seeking shepherd-love of God, and is implanted by the heavenly Father in all his children in the new birth, would express itself in future, when once the kingdom of heaven was founded upon earth and set in order; how the greatness and dignity of every individual in whom Christ is, and lives, and loves, in order to save him and through him others, shall then be joined together into compact unity as a power of his Church, which it exercises so as to prevent the offence of sin (which will still have a place in the midst of it), as strongly as with loving forgiveness it bears such offence. Hitherto the idea has occupied the foreground that love, as it gives no offence itself outwardly, and, moreover, slays the offence within itself, first of all takes no offence from the weakness and sin of a brother, but loves him in the forgiving and reconciling love of the Father's will; now, however, the other side must follow—seeing that yet all sin is and remains an offence—namely, that this love, notwithstanding, cannot against the truth call evil good, cannot in particular softly spare the brother who lays claim to the name of Christ, but must rebuke him with all the severity of seeking love, until he is again found, and restored from the error of his ways. Hitherto it was: Sin not thou against thy brother and partner with thee in redemption! Now it is naturally the other case: But if thy brother sin against thee—how then art thou to prove the love as a holy power given to thee as a member of the great society consisting of all who believe in me? In this way every thing perfectly harmonizes, and only thus can we rightly understand how Christ here further supplements what was already said (at chap. xvi.) respecting his Church, and lays down a fundamental principle for its guidance in regard to offences in the midst of it. Every true theory respecting Church-discipline finds here its twofold and yet single principle, as it were the formal and the material: to remove the offence in truth, to seek the lost one in love (also by rebuke).

Brotherly rebuke is already (Lev. xix. 17, 18) declared to be a duty of love, because we are to love our neighbor as ourselves. As I judge my own sin in myself in order to my satisfaction before God, so also am I to judge that of others, in order that their guilt may not become mine through neglect of this service of love (the complement and extension of what is said in the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. vii. 1–5). Frank rebuke, ἀληθεύειν ἐν ἀγάπῃ, is opposed to the cherishing of hatred or contempt in the heart, and also to that grosser species of falsehood in which one makes an evil report of his neighbor behind his back (Prov. xxvii. 5, 6; Sir. xix. 13–19: Speak, therefore, to thy neighbor, etc., Sir. xx. 2). Let brotherly rebuke first of all be real rebuke, let it be, therefore, honest and true: Thou hast sinned! But then and therein let it be also brotherly, speaking the truth in love, in order to recovery. Not: Judge him, nor even chide him—but ἔλεγξον αὐτόν, convince, convict him of his sin, help him to repent, beseech him to do so with all the power of the reconciling love of God which has already forgiven while it rebukes, and which would fain bring forgiveness to him (Luke xvii. 3, 4). Strive to gain thy brother, to help him again into the right way, to restore him from his fault (Gal. vi. 1): then will be fulfilled either at once Psa. cxli. 5; Prov. xxv. 12, at least afterwards Prov. xxviii. 23, or—thou hast, on thy part, fulfilled thy duty and shalt not incur sin on his account. From this follows further, quite as naturally, that brotherly rebuke, mindful of human weakness, in order lovingly and sparingly to deal with one who in his pride will be easily provoked and offended, by no means goes all at once to him armed with the full public power, but begins quietly and gently before God, and only in the event of being unsuccessful, rises by gradual steps to ever increasing severity.

In denoting these steps for the future praxis of his Church, Christ can now naturally, as he is ever ready to do, connect what he says with the practice already enjoined* and in use in Israel, as in general afterwards, in the entire formation and constitution of the apostolic Church, the Spirit transferred all the pure and available elements of the synagogue. If thy brother sin against thee: this certainly limits my duty and my right to rebuke him, in the first place, to those more immediate cases in which I might rather be tempted to be angry with him, and either privately or publicly to bring unloving complaints against him; still it would be very wrong to understand all that is here said only "of personal grievances and offences."* Rather, in the further application, nay, in the proper and deeper sense of this, it is by no means to be excluded that I, as a child and member of the Church, feel myself to be injured by every sin of a brother, and that in love to him I can and ought to receive and treat every sin of his, that becomes known to me, as committed against me. The genuine brother says then to his brother: Do not injure me by acting thus! What thou hast done has grieved me! Go (ὕπαγε, as at chap. v. 24), wait not till he comes, but go first in a friendly and zealous spirit to him. Rebuke him in the truth indeed, yet also in humility and love as an unselfish child of God, taking care that the beam is not in thine own eye when thou wilt take the splinter out of his; not so much thou, in thine own power, as in the name and authority of him in whose sight ye are brethren, as a serving member of the society of all the brethren. Between thee and him alone,† without the presence of any others to disturb you, whose presence might only hinder the first impression of love by stirring up his pride; yet ye are not alone, for I am present when any thing of this kind is being transacted between two in my name (ver. 20)—your secret meeting is already a Church, thy rebuke is already the first exercise of the power which is given to it in all its members (ver. 18). If happily—and thou shouldst always hope for such a result with the "love that hopeth all things"—he shall hear thee, then hast thou gained thy brother, gained him for God (ver. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 19), for the Church as a brother, for thyself as thy brother! But if not, do not all at once give him up because thy wisdom and love have accomplished nothing, do not rush to the conclusion: He hears not and will not hear, because he has not heard me! Take with thee one or two, of course not the first best, but such as are nearest as regards their knowledge of the case and love to you both; such as in a brotherly spirit can say with you: Thou hast sinned before us and against us—whom he can also honor as brethren, if he will honor any one. This already lies first of all in the expression witnesses; who can witness his sin against him in this interview, which has now more formally constituted itself into a court for deciding a question of peace. At the same time, however, and if there should be no farther witnesses of his sin, they are at least witnesses of his conduct under the rebuke, and in the case of further disobedience, witnesses against him before the Church. This is more than the alone of the first step, but it is not yet the publicity which follows, and which needs no special witnesses; the advance to this further step is, however, already held up to him by way of warning: If thou hearest not us, then we will tell it farther! Here Christ, in order to show that the order of his Church is founded on the justice of God, adduces the Mosaic rule of law, which was always to be observed (Num. xix. 15), of which he also (John viii. 17), makes the highest application to his own person, and here in the next place to his followers. He however counts, of course, the brother who had first entered on the office of brotherly judgment as one of the witnesses, and means therefore one or two in addition to him, that the matter may have two or three witnesses.

As it was before charitably taken for granted that he would hear, so now it is more probable, that if he refused to hear at the first stage, he will continue to do so at the second. Now, but not sooner, although now without sparing, which at this stage would be wrong: Tell it to the Church! What has the Church to do with a sin which thy brother has committed against thee? Certainly he has sinned also against the Church, a member of which he professes to be, he has given an offence which must be removed; the Church, so much as in it lies, may not tolerate and acknowledge in the midst of it impenitent sinners, who will not let the Spirit of God kindly rebuke them in order to their recovery. This her dignity as the Church of God does not permit; thus does Christ here plainly enunciate the principle of all Church-discipline at present understood by so few, in so far as it must advance from admonition to exclusion. This latter is had recourse to, in the first place, not to make better, nor even (in another sense) to rebuke the person excluded, but chiefly to guard the unity and purity of the Church against the obstinate sinner.

Tell it to the Church—thus again does Christ speak quite definitely, and thereby certainly reverts to his first words in chap. xvi. 18: I will build my Church; so much the more certainly, as the whole dispute about rank among the twelve stands in such connection with the word then addressed to Peter, that Christ now finds it necessary for their full information to explain himself on this point. We were heartily sorry to find such a man as Sack* saying: "The opinion that Christ here

* As the Lutheran Francke (Rudelb. Zeitschrift, 1849, 4) does, and now in order to refine away every thing that goes against his Lutheranism, finds in the ἐκκλησία here only a "court of arbitration."

† For with Fritzsche violently to connect μόνου with what follows, contrary to all usage of the New Testament, is not only superfluous, but disturbs the simple emphasis of the legislation as denoting the successive steps.

* Monatschrift für die evangelische Kirche der Rheinprovinz und Westphalens, March, 1843. To this we have now to add, that unhappily even Delitzsch (von der Kirche, p. 9) still repeats such misinterpretation! On the other hand, Nitzsch (Prakt. Theol. i. 236) has acknowledged with assent my statement, that Christ can only have spoken here of his future Church, and besides has himself given some fine observations for the understanding of the entire chapter. Chiefly in support also of a former assertion of ours, he says, that the "rebuker is to bring the matter before the Church, not as the in-actually speaks of the future Christian Church, must certainly be rejected; he speaks of present and not of future relations, ἐκκλησία is equivalent to the synagogue then existing in every larger town with its judicial usages; the whole, therefore admits only of an indirect application to the Christian Church!" Of what such a synagogue did, then, Christ could go on to say: Ye shall do it! Could Christ seriously have referred his disciples, the brethren in his name, to a court of those Pharisees whom yet, in the Sermon on the Mount, he himself had declared to be heathen and publicans, and say of it: Whoso heareth not these, let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican? Already Pfenninger, in his very unbiased philosophical lectures on the New Testament, says against this: "If Jesus says: He that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad, and, he that heareth not your word, shake off the dust of your feet against him—so by the Church he certainly means not a Church of Jews, of whom the greater number hate and deny him, and the few love and believe on him, but must speak these words of a Church of his disciples. Of course! for others would receive no rules of conduct prescribed by him for their churches." We say still further: At that time there was as yet no Church of his disciples; consequently, he speaks of the future Church, of which he has said that he will build it.* It is hoped that the reader has so understood our whole interpretation of this discourse hitherto, from ver. 3, that it appears to him only natural and necessary when now, again, the kingdom of heaven in which the children of God are united as brethren, which was put in opposition to the world full of offences, at last appears as the future Church; it is hoped that we have already learned at chap. x., how Christ is wont in the continuation of his discourses to prophesy, and to make regulations for the future. We do not, however, need all this in order to show what is meant by the Church, but have at ver. 20 the most literally authentic definition from Christ himself in the closest connection: The ἐκκλησία is, where are συνηγμένοι εἰς τὸ ἐμὸν ὄνομα, persons "gathered together in my name;" it will continue to exist upon earth, in its power so to act as I now prescribe to it, if I am in the midst of it. This surely is spoken of his spiritual presence for the future.

The Church is the society, called together in unity of faith and love, of those who believe on him, who are united in his name; a society in which is carried out, and exercised upon earth, what is valid in heaven (before its exalted Lord and Head). This is the simple fundamental idea here clearly expressed. It is at the same time certified here with equal clearness, that it cannot be without sin and offence in the midst of it; for it happens that a brother sins, and must be admonished. It is rather precisely the institution of divine faith and love, the design of which, as it is to call the sinners of all the world to repentance, and to receive every one for the sake of Christ who only begins to humble himself, and to admit him into the ever open gates of the kingdom of heaven—so also to admonish those who already belong to it, and to carry this out in the exercise of long suffering and severity, until those who are entirely disobedient shall be again separated from it. It is, after and beside that first συναγωγή (gathering together, synagogue) of the Jews, the true, really united ἐπισυναγωγή ("assembling together") in which one takes care of the other, in which the exhorting one another (Heb. x. 24, 25) finds its living, progressive exemplification. That the injunction: Tell it to the Church! can in the first place mean only the Church in the place where thou art, the nearest united society of believers to which you belong, is clear—but the Church of every place represents again the entire Church, as is evident from ver. 20, and this also is the basis given in the apostolic constitution which represents in many ἐκκλησίαις (congregations) the one ἐκκλησία (Church). Only thus is the manifestation of the Church in the world at any time possible. True, according to circumstances, in so far as this can be done in truth, the Tell it to the Church! is even in the case of sinning churches to be further applied by bringing it before the greater society; still every little individual society retains its right in the name of the whole, so long as it truly exercises it in his name, in the name of Christ.

The power of rebuke which the individual brother exercised in private, at the first stage, was not only his duty but his right, a right which emanates from the Church to every member of it. But if now further the sinner is rebuked in vain by many (2 Cor. ii 6), before all (1 Tim. v. 20), in the name of Christ—then let him be to thee—who broughtest his case before this court of jurisdiction, and art now discharged of thy brotherly obligation—because he must now be to the whole Church, as the heathen and the publican! (The article has here the force of the plural, denoting the class by the individual example.) The "to thee" is now said to every one. Heathen are those without, not belonging to the people of God; publicans those who, although within, are yet to be reckoned with the heathen; the typical expression taken from the relation and usage then existing, implies the corresponding truth in the future. He has in the first place forfeited his name as a brother, and his right as a brother to be exhorted, for it has become manifest that there is no principle of brotherly feeling in him upon which to take hold; no one in the Church owes any further duty to him as a brother. It is altogether self-evident that, on the further development of the jured private person, but as the first witness, and first receiver of the injury"—inasmuch as "in and along with that brother the Church was already injured."

relations involved in the Church, this implies the denial of Church privileges, exclusion from the sacrament, etc. Here then is no respect of persons, here then is no other sort of judgment appointed beyond that of the Church; as even Pope Sylvester II. himself (Epist. ad Seguin. in Maimburgh and Baronius) has said: "If the Pope of Rome were to sin against a brother, and after repeated admonition would not hear the Church, he should, according to the commandment of Christ, be held as a heathen and publican!" Here, however, we ask in sadness with Wesley, not merely in reference to the Church which must hear when Rome has spoken, but to every degenerate Church of the present time in common: "But if so, in what land do the Christians live?" Christ gives the answer: The gates of hell shall not prevail against it! His Church is still there, if not in the many, yet in the few; their power is still shown, their right exercised, if not in visibly arranged forms, yet silently; and even were the key for binding and loosing to be withdrawn, and lodged in the secret prayer of two or three, it would still be present there, and efficacious for actual binding and loosing, as we shall soon see in what follows.

Verse 18. That by this binding and loosing even here, where the keys are not again expressly mentioned, Christ understands, in the widest scope of the terms, all expression of power and exercise of authority on the part of his Church, which he will one day (if the Church thus acts upon earth in his name) ratify also in heaven—this is not less clear than that the expression still refers most directly to what was said before, consequently to the denial of grace, the withholding of forgiveness, from the heathen and publicans who are shut out, as in the other case to the assurance of grace to penitents. That in this decisive word all precedence of any Peter whatsoever disappears, and that every exercise of any power upon earth, relating to the things of heaven, is represented as an emanation of that power which the Church possesses in its unity, every member of it (were he even an earthly head) only in virtue of his union with the body—this has already been repeatedly said, and yet cannot be enough considered. The Church possesses the word of truth (and with it the Spirit of truth), which it rightly interprets in itself, and by consequence validly applies to those cases that occur, therefore is its binding and loosing, forbidding and permitting, denying and affirming by this word, true and valid, in the whole, and in particular cases. The Church is the body upon earth filled from the heavenly Head with all the fulness of God, i. e., with the holy love of the Father in the Son; therefore, if it has loved as God and with God, so as to seek the lost brother, it may and ought to pass judgment with God upon every one who will not let himself be found and restored. Let us now again connect together the beginning and conclusion of Christ's discourse upon this occasion, let us attentively consider to what a height it has risen from that word with which it began—viz., Become as children, only thus can ye belong to the kingdom of heaven! This is the ruling conquering power which the Father prepares for himself in the little ones. Over the door of the Church it is written, He who comes not hither as a child, where only children alike great and alike little dwell together, let him stay without! But within, these children are sovereign in their sphere against, and over, all that would disturb the holy and blessed fellowship. Christ who builds this Church for himself, and indeed alone governs it, from whose supreme prerogative alone all prerogative and all power that are valid in it must proceed—yet says not: I will keep the keys by me, I will myself on every occasion give the decision directly from the throne! But according to his manner of acting in all his works upon earth, in the kingdom of grace as of nature, he appoints an intermediate agency, in which he transfers the keys to his followers, and yet at the same time keeps them himself. It is said: I in them, as thou in me! (John xvii. 23). For whatever his followers do that is valid, is so only in his name, i. e., because he is in the midst of them, ver. 20. The case then is not at all possible, that they should bind upon earth what he looses in heaven, or loose upon earth what he binds in heaven; whenever such a case occurs, then they are no longer the persons to whom the "Verily I say unto you" applies. The ὅσα ἐάν, whatsoever things, is indeed an exceptionless πάντα, all things, as the words here stand in conjunction with the certain promise expressed in the ἔσται δεδεμένα, λελυμένα, shall be bound, loosed—yet this is far from being true conversely, as if Christ might have said: Whatsoever I bind or loose in heaven, will be bound or loosed by you upon earth. For, in particular, the discipline of the Church exercised in the way of receiving or excluding, the application of the Gospel upon earth in the way of forgiving or retaining sin, can never certainly be quite adequate to that which Christ himself does from heaven; he retains to himself reservata, to bind many things which the eye of the earthly administrator does not reach, and in like manner he has again already loosed many things ere they are recognized or expressed upon earth. Consequently in those cases in which the sentence, valid in heaven, is executed upon earth, the ἔσται, shall be, is rather recognized as an already existing ἐστί, is, and the Church only says: We see and testify that thou art bound in heaven (Acts viii. 21, 23)—we see and testify that Christ hath again loosed thee. Again loosed? Certainly, for precisely on this account does Christ put the binding first, and yet make a loosing to follow. The two are by no means contemporaneously parallel, nor is the first mentioned first only because in it the power of the Church is most strongly evinced when it judges. An irrevocable, irredeemable ban, is far from being spoken of here; in its highest exercise of power the Church looses again precisely what it has bound; it has, however, only bound in order that it may be able again to loose when this is possible. Tho final exclusion of the incorrigible, in virtue of which they are accounted as heathen and publicans, as it is requisite on its own account, so at the same time it is only the last and strongest expression of that love which seeks their recovery; for the heathen and publicans are certainly not excluded from the preaching of the Gospel, which is to be continued in all the world until the end,* and if in this instance brotherly love has come to an end, there yet remains general love, nay, more than this, the love that weeps and intercedes for the lost brother. All this might already be found in ver. 18, did it not come into still clearer prominence in what follows.

Verse 19. In the πάλιν λέγω ὑμῖν, "Again I say unto you," Christ, who here prophesies in a very condensed style respecting the future development of the Church, expresses much by indication. The πάλιν is first of all not properly equivalent to "further," as if something now followed quite different from what goes before, but here also it is the same power that is spoken of as was spoken of there. It happens with the binding and loosing just as with the hearing of prayer; it is valid in heaven only because it is the witness of what was already valid in heaven, just as prayer is heard because by the impulse of the spirit in faith it has already come forth from the supreme counsel and will. All binding and loosing is accomplished by prayer, for the admonition is given in the love of praying faith, and the excluding rebuke is administered in the same love. The Church is only in prayer united, so as to exercise its power, and it, like every individual of its members, performs all its works of authority only as the Son of Man upon earth performed his miracles, namely, as being heard of the Father. Therefore Basilius is quite right when he, here also, specially notices the prayer for forgiveness of sin in behalf of others. It might, indeed, with a certain measure of truth be said in opposition to this: Surely not prayer for him who has just been excluded, for in him the love that seeks the sinner has already so far exhausted itself in rebuke and final judgment, that he must be given up for lost; if all this has been done to him in vain, what can now help him? But viewed strictly, this is valid only ad interim, only with the reservation of the power of God which can yet again restore the lost one (Rom. xi. 23). The last thing which the Church does in its binding, and neither can nor should cease to do, is the same thing which it remains for the individual to do for his enemies, namely, to intercede for him (chap. v. 44). Or, is the Church which prays for all men (1 Tim. ii. 1), to shut out their lost brethren alone from this benefit? Oh! if this were a settled principle in Church discipline, that the lost brother should yet be prayed for, what a power would such binding much oftener evince towards loosing again! Although, of course, the general term γενήσεται, it shall be done, is assigned as a promise to be an inducement to every believing prayer, it yet no where promises an unconditional fulfillment, least of all where it concerns the faith or unbelief of another, which lies as little in our power as in the power of God. It is as we have said on chap. xvii. 20. Finally, the Berleub. Bible (whose grains of gold amid the rubbish let no one despise) is right here also, when it says on vers. 19, 20: "If now, however, things should come to such a strait, that the Church could not exercise this prerogative (of an officially acknowledged binding and loosing), Christ gives the farther assurance, that if only two or three unite together in spirit and in truth in the prayer of faith, these may yet act with effect in the matter, although the world does not acknowledge it. This points to a more straitened state of the Church, and says that we are not to withdraw the hand on this account." Very right and true indeed, for Christ had certainly such thoughts in his mind when, instead of the wide and comprehensive "you" of the entire Church, he says two or three, and at the same time, as the ground of this, substitutes for the testimony without, the private prayer before God. He has here in prospect that state of the Church in which the powerful exercise of the key of office by those who are called "the Church" before the world must be suspended, and when, in place of this, there comes the handful, who are united in true fellowship, praying in secret. In such a prospect he could not and would not say: Where thousands are united—but where two or three are united! It may be questioned whether what is written in Acts iv. 32 has ever been fully realized since the apostolic Church, and whether a larger assembly of the Church has ever been able to determine so perfectly as the first: It seemed good to us, being assembled with one accord, and therefore also: It seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us. When it is remembered that unity in prayer, the innermost unity of believers before God, and the uniting, the agreeing together (συμψωνεῖν), even of two suppliants, for some definite object of prayer, is a thing so difficult and rare even in the case of a believing husband and wife (ex. gr., for the preservation of a dying child), we will at once understand how significant, in all points of view, is the word which Christ has here spoken. He means truly no agreeing of the lips but of the heart, and the Holy Spirit in the heart. Where two together can truly pray for any definite thing in innermost unity, as children before God, this is from God, and is valid before God.

Verse 20. According to Jewish statute a synagogue, to which the Shekinah of the divine presence and hearing descends, must consist at least of ten; a smaller number God despises and reproaches: Wherefore do I come when there is no one there? Yet, on the

* Therefore it was wrong not at once to admit the Pœnitentes as ἀκροωμένους, but first to put them outside the door as προσκλαίοντας, χειμάζοντας; this went beyond the word of Christ, who would allow even every heathen and publican to hear other hand, we find in Pirke Aboth, chap. iii. § 8, the saying: "Wherever two are sitting conversing on the law, there the Shekinah is with them." Here Christ names the smallest society that is possible, two or three (as at ver. 16, united witnesses before the throne of God), and ascribes to them the right and power of a Church in virtue of his presence with them. "He who can say, Thou and I, can speak of a Church, and can lay claim to the common grace" (Zinzendorf). Συνηγμένοι εἰς τὸ ἐμὸν ὄνομα, gather together into ("in") my name, signifies something more than, and different from ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου, in my name, because it closely belongs to συνηγμένοι, and this again signifies: They are assembled, have not merely assembled themselves, are not first comprehended in the συνάγεσθαι. There I am in the midst of them (comp. 1 Cor. v. 4), as the Mediator through whom their prayer is heard, as the giver of that which they ask, as the confirmer of that which comes forth from them as a testimony either publicly or privately. Christ certainly speaks here already in the same sense as at John xiv. 13, 14, and we have here already a prospective glance into the period of his heavenly omnipresence, which at Matt. xxviii. 20, he promised, when about to ascend to the Father. "This must signify a spiritual presence, or nothing, but it is a stupenduous expression" (Pfenninger). Yes, the as yet future spiritualization of his presence when he would be gone to the Father, he then in heaven and his Church on the earth, and yet at the same time, he in the power of the Spirit every where, wherever his disciples are and unite together upon earth—this and nothing else is what clearly lies in these words. We ask, therefore, again: Has he not here spoken with reference to the future Church? Therefore of course it is only: What ye shall bind, for he could not possibly speak of the present, and the final ἐκεῖ εἰμι, "there am I," is only a prophetic present connected with the foregoing futures. His presence depends not on the greater or smaller number of those assembled, and as little on any locality or place (which, in Old Testament fashion, he had again chosen to put his name there); but wherever he is in the midst of his believing and praying people, there is the Church to which he has given this power. Could there be a more severe judgment pronounced against all pseudo-Catholicism than is given in this word, and again a more friendly consolation, a stronger call to make use of this power; addressed to the weak Protestanism which seeks the "invisible Church" elsewhere than upon earth, in the assembly of the faithful, "in all their and our places," which never remains invisible, from which the testimony of the ἐκεῖ εἰμι goes forth ever anew to the world?

THE WICKED SERVANT.

(Matt. xviii. 22–35; Luke xvii. 3, 4.)

Peter has rightly understood verse 17 to the effect, that the exercise of brotherly rebuke, and the gaining of a brother, pre-supposes the mild spirit of forgiving love, and only by this is possible. His thoughts being arrested by this, and flesh and blood again objecting to it, he has perhaps not listened with perfect attention to what follows, namely, the transference of the keys from him to the Church. Or it may be he has apprehended this, so that in his confusion he does not venture to ask: Lord, but how does it then stand with the keys given to me? He rather now withdraws himself into the simple place of a brother in the Church, against whom a brother sins. We are inclined to prefer this explanation, and in so far to reckon it to the apostle's praise that he puts this question at this time; still there remains in it, on the other hand, the carnally proud reluctance to go on granting forgiveness to a brother without count or measure—only the same reluctance indeed, as in all of us, for who would not oftentimes have in heart asked the same question as Peter here does? That Peter lays the matter so frankly before Christ, shows an honesty which is the second thing to be commended in his question, and which always imparts a certain measure of goodness to his ill sayings.

Verse 22. As Christ has repeatedly made use of numbers one or two, two or three, Peter, on his part, will do so also, quite in the manner of Jewish ethics, which measured every thing by numbers. Not merely ἁμαρτήσει καὶ ἀφήσω as a Hebraism for ἁμαρτήσαντι ἀφήσω (so Winer thinks), but in reality: How often may my brother sin against me, with the right and claim to receive forgiveness from me? This might indeed become very frequent and very bad, it must surely then have its limits! Seven times then appear to him all that can possibly be required for a wide ἕως or "oft"*—but the matter stands quite otherwise: For if I can still count, then have I not yet forgotten what went before, and therefore not at all really forgiven from the heart. The answer of Christ indicates this with a quite perceptible irony, when it puts number against number. The first seven times is outbid by multiplication (in nowise by addition: 70 and 7 times), and the meaning of the ἑβδομηκοτάκις ἑπτά can only be: Septies non solum, sed id ipsum septuagies (not merely seven times, but that repeated seventy times over). The formula with the ἑπτά, "seven," instead of ἑπτάκις, "seven times," exactly corresponds to the word of Lamech, Gen. iv. 24, in the Sept., where the Heb. שִׁבְעִים וְשִׁבְעָה, seventy and seven, is certainly to be taken as a multiplication;* grant that it may have been proverbial, still it cannot be supposed that Christ, whose thoughts ever move in the sphere of Scripture, had not here that passage in his thoughts. Thus does the loving forgiveness here come into sharp and significant opposition to the revenge there expressed. But for what space of time is the reckoning to be understood? Seven times a day was also a Bible proverb (Prov. xxiv. 16; Psa. cxix. 165)—hence, in the parallel passage (Luke xvii. 4), the relation of which to the present will there be investigated, this is expressly said. If Peter, as is probable, meant his seven times as applying to the whole life, then, in opposition to this absurdly small measure, Christ with all the greater right puts a proverbially large number, which is properly intended to be no number. He certainly does not say what would be monstrous and inconceivable: Seventy times seven in a day—still less will he advise that a register be kept extending over years until the 490 be completed. But he means by this saying, which is quite as definite as it is indefinite: Let there be no numbering at all!† Such a deliverance of course finds its proportionate application to the loosing again of one who has been bound before the Church, whose forgiving love remains ever open for the excluded one; although an inconsiderately hasty restoration, without a sufficient guarantee for the reality of the Μετανοῶ, "I repent" (Luke xvii.), cannot thereby be enjoyed.

And now the foregoing profoundly compressed saying is expanded into a parable, in which the idea is presented in a striking and popular form. It has quite the appearance of being only a parable, the particulars being represented in the manner of the parable; yet the profound ideas to which it relates are embodied in it in rich fulness, and it is significant even in the minutest details. Preach anew upon it every year and you will not exhaust it, you will ever find something new to draw from it. We will make it our endeavor here, where the superficial school-exegesis makes much shorter work than the exposition for the preacher, at least briefly to indicate all the principal points.

Verses 23—25. Ἀνθρώπῳ βασιλεῖ, "to a king," again not a mere unmeaning variation for βασιλεῖ τινι, to a certain king, but, as has been observed at chap. xiii. 24, 31, and is applicable to all the parables (see immediately again chap. xx. 1): Coelestium similitudines ex humanis! (similitudes of heavenly things from human). If even in the kingdoms of the world, where the right of punishment must upon the whole be maintained firmly and strictly, a king yet exercises the royal right of forgiveness and release, so is it to be in the kingdom of heaven upon earth, in the Church, only according to the holy right of divine compassion. The king is God the Lord in his kingdom, the δοῦλοι are of course not slaves (as is evident from the selling afterwards), they are not even in the first place common subjects, but servants of the crown, and ministers; their reckoning shows in its immense sums, so to speak, "royal debts."* The most immediate application points, therefore, to the apostles and great ones in the Church, who, the more that has been intrusted to them, are capable of making all the greater failure; this, however, does not exclude the farther application to the reckoning before God of every man, according to his high calling. To be able to contract great debts is itself even an honor and dignity. If we understand talents of gold or silver, ten thousand are so much, that even Haman, in the book of Esther (chap. iii. 9), rated at this amount the riches of all the Jews in the land, speaking of it as a large sum. The number corresponds indeed, as a proverbially large amount, to the seventy times seven†—still because a reckoning is spoken of, Christ will at the same time say that God actually counts our sins—and weighs them. There is a sermon by G. K. Rieger (in his Herzenspostille), which, with equal profoundness and ingenuity, enters into this point, and with an inexorable particularity notes and sums up our register of sins through all their titles. Truly the number is

* For partly, the placing the small number after is not agreeable to the most ancient mode of speech, partly there is least of all reason here for making an exception on account of emphasis (as elsewhere occurs once or twice in Genesis)—how flat would be this: Also seventy times and yet seven times in addition thereto! Rather: Septuagies idque septuplum, many times seventy—as already ancient Rabbinical interpretation speaks of שִׁבְעִיעִיּוֹת הַרְבֵּה.

† So also Lange, although he comes to it certainly by a different way, when he takes the seventieth number as the expression of "the endless Sabbath-rest in God, the absolute divine composure, in which alone it is possible always to forgive." How that could lie in the words, we do not comprehend.

* We may certainly also, with Sepp, be reminded here of the colossal lease-systems of that time—only we are not to find precisely the leaseholder Zenodorus of Lebanon expressly denoted here!

† Others are so bold as to find an allusion to the ten commandments (every one of which has been a thousand-fold transgressed?).

for us incalculable, and the heavy weight of every sin that is to be counted already a talent. For of so-called small or light sins there are none. God will reckon with his servants, and he cannot but do so, although he makes the reckoning only to give the acquittance, he brings the sin to knowledge only to forgive it (Isa. i. 18). Without reckoning, there is no discharge, there is here no forgiveness and acquittance in the lump, without previous inspection. The debt stands registered in the conscience, the revealed law brings the contra-book to our unfaithful book-keeping, then it becomes manifest that our cancelling could yet not cancel, but that we ourselves have written: The two books agree with fearful exactness! God reckons with us because it is his will to do so, no avoiding or not willing on our part is in that case of any avail; he wakens the conscience, denounces the curse of the law, begins with visitation and rebuke—all which are included in this reckoning, which is certainly at the same time to be distinguished from the final reckoning that awaits us, spoken of in other parables (as chap. xxv. 19).—When he began to reckon, there came one before him, the first with ten thousand talents—the others owe certainly not less, perhaps more. He was brought before the king, προσηνέχθη, for he came not of himself, had never yet considered the reckoning, but had indifferently and wilfully accumulated debt without limit (Psa. l. 21). He is apprehended also before, and without, his having been able to see and compare the account of his fellow-servants, for this belongs not to the business between him and his Lord. The balance is absolute bankruptcy; he has nothing to pay! There is not even any counter-reckoning in part payment. Where, however, there is nothing, the king has not lost his right, as the half-false proverb runs, at least to punish the wilful bankrupt. The divine right, in its strict demands, is here represented in a human parable; when the king, according to Jewish law (Lev. xxv. 39, 47; Exod. xxii. 3; 2 Kings iv. 1; Amos ii. 6, viii. 6), here commands the debtor, with his wife and children, and all that he has, to be sold, so that he may at least receive something, this representation belongs certainly to the not entirely corresponding figure; still every one with whom the Lord begins to reckon, will feel what it means, without the critics having first to inquire.

Verses 26, 27. The servant who, according to ver. 25, must already have confessed that he had not to pay, does not resolve to beg for forgiveness, but like all bad debtors who are ever speaking of future payment, he proceeds, not without continued presumption, to ask for delay and patience in his difficulty, although with all patience, nothing remains to be obtained. This is meant in the same sense as (in Luke xv. 19) the word of the prodigal son, who still thinks of working off what he owes to his Father. "This is the torment of all consciences when sin comes and gnaws them, they run hither and thither, seek help here and there, and presume still to do a great deal in order to pay God. A heart that is smitten by the law is humbled indeed, therefore it falls down before the Lord and asks grace; but it has still the fault that it will help itself: this cannot be cast out of nature" (Luther). The common expression I will pay thee all (ver. 29), holds good among men—but can it have place between the Most High and us, who are so totally in his debt, and who can only pay every former debt out of his new gift and grace! Thus the Lord pities not only our poverty, but, in addition to this, our foolish anxiety, in which we promise what is impossible, and there is imparted to us unasked, nay, as it were, against our will, full and entire grace. The previous debt is remitted in opposition to our ἀποδώσω σοι, "I will pay;" this remitting of the debt, however, is still to be distinguished (as Luther has rightly indicated by the addition of the word also) from the complete loosing out of the prison which we had properly again deserved by our wrong-asking. Go, thou poor man, and know that thou hast a gracious king!

Verses 28—30. That was a counter-question for Peter: How often and how much must God forgive thee, has he forgiven thee? from which, then, the willingness to forgive his brother must follow as an inference. But how little does the wicked, harsh man learn this self-evident inference! In the ἐξελθών, emphatically placed before, the parable turns to its centre-point: So let us go forth from the presence of God to walk and to act with our neighbor, from the judgment and mercy seat of the royal Father and paternal King, before whom we stood, to our fellow-servants and brethren. But this wicked servant, whom Christ holds up here as a warning example, has learned nothing, has not at all in heart understood or received grace, but carries it away as a robbery. He goes out as soon as he can, light and joyful that he is only free again to go on as before. "He who seeks only forgiveness from God, and not also a new nature, will soon again lose the forgiveness also by new guilt, which he contracts with the old nature."* He finds—as we all find at every step, if only we seek—one of his fellow-servants; it may be one who was inferior to himself, as regards the high place he filled in relation to the King, in which he could contract debts so large; still minister and day-laborer are both servants of the King, the former also only a fellow-servant, and the latter properly a servant and subject of the King, whom no one can seize wrongfully against the law of the kingdom, without offending the King. The debt may, in this case, have been small in comparison with the great debt of the other

* Thus much is true, although, on the part of God, the actual forgiveness of sins at all times affords the beginning of a change of heart. Doubtful, at least liable to be misunderstood, is the still sharper statement of Alford: We may observe, that forgiveness of sins does not imply a change of heart or principle in the sinner.

for the thoughtless spendthrift out of the King's treasury would have the will and power to squander much, and would borrow but little from others; now for the first time, when, by being called to account himself, the idea of remission or payment has come into his consciousness, he thinks of his own Activa (as we would know nothing at all of "sinning against us," did not God first speak to our conscience of sin)—in order thereby to gather as much as possible for the delayed payment; which extreme perversity might then be understood to represent the disposition of the Pharisees who, by severe and harsh judgment, with respect to their neighbor, seek to make themselves righteous before God. This, however, seems to us to lie rather far back, amid the inexhaustible applications of which this parable is capable; what is most directly meant is perversity in general, delineated in the manner of the parable, the perversity that leads us not to have compassion on others when God has had compassion on us (ver 33). The βασιλεύς or Tetrarch appealed on his own behalf to the law of Israel—the servant applies against the common man, his fellow-servant, the still severer Roman law.* The κρατεῖν and πνίγειν, "laying hands on" and "taking by the throat," were, in so far, not properly "unlawful acts of violence," but a practice quite warranted by law, according to which the creditor was allowed even to seize the debtor by the throat, and thus to lead him into custody.† The reading ὅ, τι, what, for εἴ τι ὀφείλεις, if aught thou owest, is certainly only a correction, and the latter is probably no "courtly style of expression," but rather expresses the severity which appeals to the fact with an unavoidable Ergo: If thou owest me anything, now must thou pay, I seize thee, and will not let thee go till thou payest!‡ This would hold good before the tribunal of any earthly kingdom, and must also hold good in the outward sphere of the law, but the law of love in the kingdom of heaven absolutely forbids one, who is himself a pardoned sinner from exercising every legal right against a fellow-sinner.—The scene of humble suppliancy is here repeated in the same words; here, however, it is in its proper place, for one servant may pay to another, in so far as, and what, he owes to him. Christ, in order to bring out the contrast in the parable in the most striking form, selects as the example a truly humble debtor who acknowledges his debts (an ἀδελφὸς μετανοῶν, or at least λέγων, Μετανοῶ, with which we ought to be satisfied); not, as it generally happens, a bad fellow-servant, who produces his counter-reckoning: Thou owest me as much, or more, even, than I owe thee! so that an endless quarrel begins between the sinners as to which of the two is in the other's debt. In opposition to this humble servant, he puts the wicked servant, whose proud, heartless zeal for law is only provoked the more, as very often happens, by the entreaty and confession of the other, instead of letting himself be reminded with shame of his own entreaty before, which was quite the same. He would not, he threw him into prison—this is, in the first stage, the end of the sad story, but not the complete end, for there is yet another Judge above him who judges on earth.

Verses 31—34. Yes, there are also good-hearted servants there, who understand better what in his subjects pleases the King, who, with warm compassion take the part of him who has been thus harshly treated, and cannot forbear telling the whole story which has grieved them, to their Lord, with whom they stand in the confidential relation of a like disposition. These are the pious ones, who send up sighs to the God of love over all the want of love which they see around them; and Christ will teach us by this feature of the parable, that certainly not merely through the omniscience of God, but in this instrumental way, our new debt which we incur when we do not forgive our debtors, must come before God to our deeper shame. Thus must the unmerciful one be put to shame, not only before the All-merciful, but even before his merciful fellow-servants, and in this already lies his convicting sentence: Wherefore didst thou also not act thus?—Sinful man is sad (Psa. cxix. 136)—the subject is grieved and complains of it to the Lord; but God himself the King, in his majesty, is angry. It is a pity that Luther's rendering "mischievous servant" (Schalksknecht), cannot be altered, it certainly does not express properly what is here denoted by the δοῦλε πονηρέ (in Munster very well עֶבֶד בְּלִיַּעַל). Only now is πονηρός, "wicked," to be understood in the most proper sense of the word; not before, with all the wilful contracting of debt in blindness, but now, when he to whom the same things are done, exercises no compassion. For "this is the climax of our depravity, that we are beggars with God, and yet tyrants with our brethren" (Helferich). Now first, after the foregoing σπλαγχνίζεσθαι, "compassion," comes the proper ὀργίζεσθαι, "anger," which must not be overlooked by those soft-hearted ones who conclude far too much from the first exercise of compassion on the part of God, as if he cannot and will not at all be angry. Here again, before the anger breaks out, the King judging the unmerciful servant out of a heart full of compassion, condescendingly demonstrates why he has deserved the epithet πονηρέ. This, however, is also the κρίσις ἀνίλεως, "judgment

* Which mixture of things, according to Hug's remark, perfectly corresponds to that period.

† According to the law in obaeratos, the debtor was adjudged to the creditor: "addicebatur"—so that the latter "in nervum ducebat."

‡ Not (according to Lange) any uncertainty about the proper reckoning: That which thou owest me whatever it be. On the other hand, Alford finely observes, that he is ashamed to name a small sum, and therefore expresses his claim in a general form: Be it much or little, this something, enough thou owest me and must pay!

without mercy" (James ii. 13). I forgave thee all that debt (the entire great reckoning still lies there, not yet irrevocably blotted out and cast away, and is now held up before him anew!)—that was my royal act done in perfect earnest. Wherefore and for what? What hast thou given or offered to me for it? Nothing but an entreaty, and that not even a right one, for forgiveness, but only for patience, till thou shouldst pay though with still more wickedness and a new debt, seeing that thou hadst nothing. But I have reckoned thine anxiety to thee for honesty, and have made thy wrong entreaty itself the legal ground of my compassion, ἐπεὶ παρεκάλεσάς με—as soon as and because thou didst entreat me! Now, that thou shouldst exercise a like compassion, was self-evident; was it not? This smites the conscience, in ourselves moreover, for whom this condition of grace is expressly laid down, as in this parable, so too in all the word of God, and who have it put into our mouths in our daily prayer to the Father. Here we see then that God's forgiveness is not and cannot be ἀμεταμέλητος, "without repentance," so that the remitted account of former sins (2 Pet. i. 9) still hangs over all who turn grace into presumption, and must again become perfectly valid against them (Ezek. xviii. 24, xxxiii. 13). Here we have a decision upon the theological question, utrum peccata semel dimissa redeant (whether sins once remitted may return). Therefore now strict law returns in the King's sentence: Till he should pay all that was due! Of this paying as impossible, and this till as unending, we have already spoken at Matt. v. 26 (of which we are here reminded). Is it till the debt be worked off? It is, however, a prison that is spoken of, and not a house of correction; it will certainly be the πῦρ αἰώνιον, everlasting fire, of ver. 8 (Mark ix. 43, 44).* Or until he learns again to entreat? This he would probably do again immediately, but it would now be still less right to ask than it was the time before. Formerly the king acted only as a creditor towards the debtor, now in addition to this as a judge against the πονηρός, and the βασανισταί (which can hardly be the mere official name for δεσμοφύλακες), he must so execute the aggravated sentence, that any softening of the hard heart that was not softened by love, is as little to be hoped for from this tormenting, as that the poor debtor under the rack can yet gather either a first or a last farthing.

Verse 35. This is also from the Sermon on the Mount, chap. vi. 14, 15. But in the more emphatic repetition here it is no longer your Father as it is there—but, my heavenly Father,* in whose name and commission I, by way of warning, announce to you this principle according to which if you judge yourselves the matter rests there! My Father, who remains not the less King, Lord, and Judge. Οὕτως, So, precisely as the parable represents it, and not otherwise, will he certainly do to you also my disciples and apostles—if ye (of course not in a single instance, but perseveringly and permanently as the definitive result) forgive not your brethren. Τὰ παραπτώματα αὐτῶν, their trespasses, cannot possibly be a spurious addition, but belongs essentially to the conclusion of the parable, as explanation of the δάνεια and ὀφειλόμενα, debt—as, in like manner, the important expression, "from the heart," belongs also essentially to the matter. In this word, finally, all judgment is referred to him who alone knows the heart, before whom every one who forgives not from the heart is already in heaven viewed as bound and shut out, although the Church on earth may not know it.

OF DIVORCE, CELIBACY, AND THE COMING OF LITTLE CHILDREN.

(Matt. xix. 4–14; Mark x. 3–16; Luke xviii. 16, 17.)

The incident here recorded belongs evidently to the close of that last journey to Jerusalem, of which Luke gives so detailed an account, interweaving, at the same time, other things with it. But the same Evangelist, inasmuch as he has already (xvi. 18), adduced an earlier repetition of Christ's principal saying on the subject of divorce, now only mentions the children who were brought to him; this, however, evidently brings him into harmony with the other Evangelists. There is a considerable interval then between Matt. xviii. and xix.; for from chap. xix. onwards to xx. 17; xxi. 1, all is closely connected. To this interval must be assigned the raising of Lazarus, on the remarkable omission of which we shall speak in our interpretation of John. The departing from Galilee and coming to Judea beyond Jordan—in which Matthew and Mark agree—correspond, therefore, with what is said at John xi. 7; x. 40; comp. also here ver. 2 with John x. 41, 42. Probably Matthew includes under these sayings, in the wider sense, the collective sayings of Christ in Galilee now completed; for he often thus thoughtfully sums up particulars in general statements: see, e. g., at the very outset, chap. i. 1, the title to the genealogy, forming at the same time the title to the whole book. Not until after he had risen did Christ come again to Galilee.

* Already Chryost. here: Τουτέστι, διηνεκῶς· οὔτε γὰρ ἀποδώσει ποτέ (that is, perpetually; for he could never repay).

* Ἐπουράνιος (various reading οὐράνιος) occurs with πατήρ only here in the Gospels, nay in the whole New Testament, and in general, only here in Matt. in the first three Gospels.

The question of the Pharisees was, first of all, in an exegetical point of view, difficult; for, in the single passage of the law relating to it, the עֶרְוַת דָּבָר, "matter of uncleanness," might certainly be explained more strictly or more loosely, according to the diverse interests and feelings of the expositors. Hence, the very different interpretations that were given to it, formed the two contending schools of Rabbies Hillel and Shammai. The one which had become dominant allowed full scope to every caprice on the part of the man, as soon as his wife, from any cause whatever, was no longer to his mind (so Sir. xxv. 26, εἰ μὴ πορεύεται κατὰ χειρά σου).* The other, urged by moral instincts, limited the Mosaic expression to gross faults, especially those connected with unchastity. Both schools were wrong. Shammai, although he meant well, yet wrongly inserted into the words of the law what they do not express; for although עֶרְוַת דָּבָר by itself (comp. with chap. xxiii. 15), indicates what is in some way shameful—an important delinquency, not πᾶσαν αἰτίαν,† every cause—still it is preceded by the quite general expression אִם־לֹא תִמְצָא־חֵן בְּעֵינָיו, which can only mean: When she no longer pleases him, he may no longer love her and keep her. That this should only take place in the worst cases Moses evidently explains in the context. Yet he leaves to the feeling and conscience of the man (although the somewhat obscure expression of the law might bind and burden a pious, narrow conscience), the liberty of determining what such cases are; nay, in the first clause, he allows the widest scope to the dislike of the man. Hillel, on the other hand, who was exegetically right, fell into the serious fault of relaxing that proper aversion to divorce which proceeds from the entire spirit of the divine law. He abused the letter of the relaxation, which was outwardly just and right, as if, what the law permitted, only on the pre-supposition of a sinful state of things, might be safely regarded as morally good. Such a controversy of the schools—in which according to the original view of their founders, the one side had some right from an unbiassed exegesis, but the other also a certain right on the score of moral feeling, and both no proper understanding of what the law meant—had naturally become a party quarrel; and the design of the Pharisees is, that Christ should take a side in this strife of the schools. This is the captious element in their tempting question. He must break with the one party or the other. If he sides with Shammai, then he makes himself an object of hatred to the frivolous multitude, and may be called in question by the governor, Herod (who had sinned in this way).* But if he takes part with Hillel, he brings himself into collision with the more seriously disposed of the people, if not into contradiction with his own well-known usual strictness in interpreting the law. His words in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 31, 32)—which were in precise contradiction to the law of Moses, as then understood—perhaps, also, the repetition of these in the denunciation of Luke xvi. 17, 18, had called forth this new question. The fools are for entangling him in the letter of Moses, whose spirit they had missed in their disputation. They come slyly enough with the general question, saying not a word of the passage in Moses, or of Hillel and Shammai; but keeping all this cunningly in reserve. In the form of their question, however, "Is it lawful?" the truth, by no means unknown to the conscience of the questioners, betrays itself in the very first word, unconsciously and against their will. That Moses allowed it is indeed plainly written, as Hillel rightly read it; but that it was not therefore right and lawful before God was testified not merely by the feeling which sought another interpretation, but also by the very form in which these malicious interrogators put their question. "Man is inclined to license"—that is true, therefore he is ever fond of asking, Is not this or that also lawful? But when he thus asks, and would have Yes for answer, he has already uttered, in most cases, the No in his conscience. The erring doctrine and practice of human statute move in the sphere of the lawful or not lawful; whoever enters upon this, will always give offence on one side or the other. But the wisdom of Christ, rising above this entire sphere, enters upon it only so far as to disclose the original ground of divine ordinances in relation to sinful man, and to demonstrate it with incontrovertible simplicity, and with irresistible clearness, by the accordant testimony of nature and Scripture. Thus does he answer the captious question—which is of more importance for all mankind than the tempters were aware of—with a supreme decision, always and every where valid, reaching far beyond the law of Moses, and yet only leading back to the original history of the same Moses; a decision, on the right understanding of which, the entire doctrine concerning marriage in all its aspects and relations develops itself.

There is a plain connection in what Matthew narrates as far as to ver. 15. In strict harmony with the answer given to the question of the Pharisees stands, according to Christ's own design, the further esoteric expla nation respecting the state of celibacy—an explanation occasioned by the doubts of the disciples. But even the blessing pronounced upon the little children must also, according to the Father's wondrous arrangement of events, follow precisely now. Thus the utterances of the Son upon earth are made complete; and every possible misunderstanding of what had just been said about marriage is obviated by his loving recognition and benediction of children, who are themselves indeed God's continual blessing upon marriage.

* "If she go not as thou wouldst have her." It is said expressly in the Tract Gittin, fol. 90: "Even if she had only over-salted his soup"—nay, with shameless license: "Even if he should find a fairer one in whom he has more pleasure!" The repeated rule in the Talmud runs: Hillel looses what Shammai binds.

† Or as Josephus, Ant. iv. 8 23, καθ' ὅς δηποτοῦν αἰτίας, for whatever reasons.

* To what a length the laxity of morals had gone at that time, we may see in Josephus. He coolly tells of himself, that his first wife left him, whilst the second, although the mother of three children, he put away, in order to take the third.

Verses 4—6. Mark having once more lost the proper order and succession of the discourse (as we have already found to be frequently the case with him; for example, in the sayings against human statutes and lip-service), we adhere entirely to Matthew. Our Lord goes back at once to the ground and origin of the marriage relation according to the first creation. He leaves the new, supreme decision respecting all irregularities that may intervene, respecting all laws that condescend to such cases, to be expressed by God (whom he here calls with emphasis ὁ ποιήσας—for which in Mark there is only ὁ θεός). Thus does he teach us in general, in every similar controversy, to ascend to its origin, to find the true restoration of every human relation that has been disturbed by sin, there where its first roots and beginnings lie. But where are we to find these; where do they lie disclosed to our view? As if there were no Scripture which testifies of the beginning and end! Have ye not read? There where alone we can read of these things; where Moses, by the Spirit of God, has written an account of the beginning of the world and of man. What an undeniable attestation have we here against all the confusion of the present criticism of the Pentateuch and of Genesis, from the mouth of Christ, the Fulfiller of all revelation, the Restorer of all disturbed order and forgotten truth, the Critic of all human doctrine that falsely interprets the Word—an attestation not only to the fact that Moses wrote the five books (which is here between question and answer self-evident; in Mark ver. 5, Moses wrote), but that in the first book he actually writes of the first creation! Ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning, which belongs as well to ὁ ποιήσας, he that made, as to ἐποίησεν αὐτούς, made them (Mark, ἀπὸ δὲ ἀρχῆς κτίσεως, i. e., from the creation of the world in general, and the creation of man in particular, from the beginning also of the human creature), significantly corresponds with the בְּרֵאשִׁית, "in the beginning," of Moses, and assures us that in those first chapters, which now indeed few can or will read, the beginning and roots of things as they proceeded from the Creator are truly to be found. Alas! how far is our present groping and presumptuous science from going back, in all and in every thing, to the first verse which is to be found concerning it in Moses! And how in the Uranienburg University of Solyma—"with the clock and the great bell on the beautiful high hill"*—will the inquiries and controversies of men respecting geology and anthropology square with the Genesis already written with the pen of God? We are here further taught, in our interpretation of Scripture, to explain the particular parts by the whole, the later by the earlier, the law by the history, the law of Moses by the primitive history of Moses. In order to determine the import of the command respecting the bill of divorce our Lord here cites two passages from the first two chapters; and (taking for granted, of course, also the unity of the two chapters) brings these into strict connection. The former speaks of the first creation of the man, ere yet the woman was taken from the man, fashioned (not created) out of his side. As we read in Moses the wondrously mysterious, yet not less literally clear, connection of unity and duality: בָּרָא אֹתוֹ—וַיִּבְרָא אֶת־הָאָדָם, "He created him—and he created man," and then again זָכָר וּנְקֵבָה בָּרָא אֹתָם, "male and female created he them" (compare, for the complete interpretation of this, chap. v. 1, 2)—so and not otherwise does Christ speak, making use of the precise and correct rendering of the Septuagint in the neuter: ἄρσεν καὶ θῆλυ ἐποίησεν αὐτούς, not ἄνδρα καὶ γυναῖκα (male and female; not man and woman). God made man in the beginning, certainly "not man-woman," as a theology and exegesis that rejects the mystery half truly protests; yet neither did he make them as two men, a man and a female-man; but as אָדָם, i. e., as man, who as yet had the woman in himself, before the separation was made. Upon this original unity of the two* Christ now grafts the "therefore" in Adam's saying, and by a connection even closer than belongs to it as it there stands. Καὶ εἶπεν, and said, is not precisely an indefinite לֵאמֹר, saying (as if what follows were further said by Adam with reference to this); but it really belongs also to ὁ ποιήσας ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, "he that made them from the beginning." God spoke by Adam, at least so far forth as this, that his word became a γραφή or Scripture, just as he spoke by Sara (Gal. iv. 30) and others. But this is still more emphatically a saying of God, inasmuch as this first word of the awakening man is a prophecy respecting the new relation imparted by the Creator to his new consciousness, and belongs to what has just been done as a divine explanation of it.† Thus does

* Those who as Christians and theologians have the true longing for home have probably read Stilling's Heimweh.

* Which at all events (just as in Moses) lies in the expression. Unsatisfactory and only evasive is the translation: "As the man and as the woman"—even if (with Lange) it were more particularly explained: "The male and the female in their being for each other." Just as little are we at liberty at once to understand by the cited αὐτούς only the "human race."

† Deus utique per hominem dixit quod homo prophetando prædixit (Augustine, de Nupt. ii. 4).

Adam prophesy for the then future of his race; he speaks less of himself than of those who are afterwards to be born as man or woman; for he speaks of father and mother ere yet he has learned by experience the meaning of these names. In every word of this saying there is involved some principle that regulates and determines this relation, which, however, is not now particularly mentioned by Christ, as the occasion did not require that it should be. For example, the appointment of only one wife; in opposition to the unnatural caprice of Lamech, and also to the equally unnatural separation of man and wife (for God did not make two women to provide for the case of separation). It is here implicitly declared also that to the marriage relation belongs a sacredness superior to the sacred obligation of children to parents; consequently that to leave one's wife, to whom one should cleave, is a greater crime than to leave one's parents. Again, that while the man might at first take his sister to wife, he was at all events not at liberty to take his mother, and so on.

As it is agreeable to the object which Christ has here in view to stop at the last words—which he emphatically repeats as the ground of his inference—he cites for further confirmation according to the Sept., which has only the οἱ δύο, the two, as the Samaritan. Pentateuch the שְׁנֵיהֶם, they two. This, although not in the genuine original text, is yet so evidently to be understood there, that Christ bases his entire doctrine upon this "two," to which prominence is given.* They are two, and yet no longer two: this is the shortest and profoundest expression of the mystery of marriage: that great mystery the further typical significance of which the Apostle Paul opens to us in Eph. v. 31, 32. One flesh: this Olshausen (and many others), with a good intention but erroneously, interprets thus: "Not only ἓν πνεῦμα and μία ψυχή, one spirit and one soul, but also σὰρξ μία; marriage in its ideal form appears as the union of the entire human being in love; it pre-supposes unity and concord of spirit and soul." No! that is marriage as humanly idealized, but by no means the real marriage which God has instituted, and will maintain inviolable. If this enthusiastic view of nuptial love were right, then that would be no true marriage where this unity is wanting; then indeed would the discovery of a want of "elective affinity" afford a valid ground of separation. The bodily fellowship is not merely the basis of marriage, but also that which is alone essential; it may indeed, and in a certain sense, should be sweetened and glorified by friendship of soul being superadded, but marriage subsists as such apart from that. Observe the distinction in 1 Cor. vi. 16, 17. One flesh, i. e., one person, forming together one man, within the limits of this life in the flesh, for this world; beyond these limits the death of the flesh has separated the marriage tie. In this alone lies the justification of second marriages, which do no injury to the continuing spiritual fellowship of love with the partner who is gone.*

And now comes the great inference, which appears to be simply a repetition of the old word rightly read, and yet is made the sacred marriage formula of the new Church. God has joined together man and wife, in the first unity and beginning of the man, who was male and female; and therefore, again, in the restoration—as declared by the man—of those who are now two to their original unity. Here consequently is applied in the most important case a universal proposition, the applications of which to cases of every kind are inexhaustible. viz.: That which in general, and in any way, God hath united, let no man in capricious innovation of God's primitive and natural law put asunder! God indeed also separates again: as (for reasons regarding which we are here silent in order not to provoke dispute) he took the woman out of the man; and as he now dissolves marriages by death. What man joins together unjustly, that the judging and saving God wholly separates; but what the sin of man has separated, that he can and will join again together. Ἄνθρωπος μὴ χωριζέτω, Let not man put asunder: this is the answer to the question, Is it lawful for man? The result, then, of this first answer is: Properly there should be no separation;† as there should not be that sin, and that hatred from which alone the bill of divorce and finding no favor can proceed; there should be no separation, as not by adultery, so not by hindering and prohibiting marriage where God will have it. But indeed, before the second question of the Pharisees calls forth the second answer of Christ respecting the permission of separation, the reasonable difficulty suggests itself, Whether all marriages that have been actually contracted, and are admitted as real, are to be regarded as the joining together of God? Here the strict word of our Lord leaves room for many considerations, which may be justified elsewhere from the word of truth. Even the strict Evangelische Kirchenzeitung (June, 1843) itself says: "Marriages are concluded in heaven—now, however, mostly on the low earth, and often still deeper." How then, if any one were just to invert the word of Christ, and to maintain that, because God has not joined together all that passes under the name of marriage, therefore divorces are not to be allowed? Some time ago, the discussion of the new Prussian law of marriage tended to impress upon all the important truth, that a law of marriage should first purify and as much as possible vindicate the sanctity of the marriage contract, before it carelessly confirmed every marriage that is contracted. Certainly man also should not join together without God; this the marriage ceremony expresses, but only shadows it forth, however, without its being on every occasion a truth. To speak again with the Kirchenzeitung: "Is it less culpable when a minister at once pronounces the marriage ceremony upon those, of whom he is convinced that in heart they break the marriage-vow at the moment they are taking it upon them, than it would be to throw away the blessing of the Church in the marriage of persons who are separated contrary to the Church?" But we ask further: Is it possible so to try the heart, in all cases, as that, even in the best condition of Christian states and national Churches, no marriages should receive the form of divine confirmation, which were already null and void from the first? One sees that Christ could not possibly have expressed his sublime law in such a manner as to be rigidly maintained in its application to the outward sinful reality.

* We have not here, however, an argument for a Greek version of the Gospel of Matthew, which is as good as the original, or for the fact that our Lord himself spoke Greek; for Christ might with the same right as the Sept. derive the δύο from the context.

* Compare the doctrine of Rothe, which agrees with the above (Ethik, iii. 638).

† For it is contrary to nature, as Chrysostom said: παρὰ φύσιν τὸ γινόμενον, ὅτι μία διατέμνεται σάρξ.

The first question—which, with the design to "tempt," refers to the passage in the law of Moses, without precisely naming it, and asks, "How understandest thou this, what is thy interpretation?"—our Lord so answers as to pierce their conscience, that very conscience which, notwithstanding the plainly prescribed permission, could yet not forbear asking—"Is it lawful?" How great his condescension! Instead of laying bare and condemning the hostile purpose of the tempters, in the question which was now in the first place addressed to him, he rather grafts his answer on the secret acknowledgment of the truth which the important question, viewed as the question of man in general, implies, namely, "It is not lawful." This, however, he confirms by appealing to the original appointment of God, according to the Scripture; as already expressed in the creation from the beginning, before the taking of the woman out of the man, and then in the first prophecy of the man, respecting the unity of flesh, which continues to subsist in the duality. He has thereby very unexpectedly risen far above the disputed passage of the law taken by itself; this is inconvenient for the inquirers, and perplexes them. They must then, if they would not be at once refuted, resolve to speak out more pointedly and pressingly. Since Christ, going further even than Shammai, will allow no reasons of divorce to be valid, they, after the manner of malicious disputants, naturally leap at once to the other side: Wherefore, then (if it be as thou sayest), did Moses command to give a bill of divorce, and to put her away? That is, Wherefore did he command, and require nothing more than, this form, in order to put her away? Or, How then could Moses prescribe illegal forms for things which are against God's ordinance?

Verses 8, 9. The second answer, still more unexpected than the first, although to the upright conscience long since present and obvious, now puts them to shame, and administers befitting rebuke: "What you call command is only permission, and that, on account of the hardness of men's hearts, against the ordinance of God from the beginning. That ordinance I am come through grace to restore; and therefore I now declare and ordain, without contradiction of Moses, what you already know (from the Sermon on the Mount) as my marriage-law." Our Lord, in the first place, interprets those disputed expressions of Moses which, as specifying the cause of divorce, must be supposed to be in the background of the whole transaction, really in the same way as Hillel; for he admits that Moses has permitted divorce in general, apparently almost for every cause. But he rejects, at the same time, the acceptation of this entire ἐντολή or ordinance of Moses (Mark, ver. 5) as a commandment; and maintains another reading and construction of the whole clause, just as it also stands in our German Bibles. If we read the original text (Deut. xxiv.) correctly, we shall find that the whole of vers. 1–3 forms what we may call the premiss, or preamble, consisting of pre-supposed and at that time acknowledged circumstances and events, and that only ver. 4 contains the conclusion or statement, of the law properly so called.* Moses admits the long existing practice of divorce, and the bill of divorcement, to be valid in the same way as blood-revenge, and many other customs which then obtained; he does not properly speaking ordain the bill of divorce, but only confirms it by expressly mentioning that it must not, as heretofore, be wanting; he adds, however, the highly necessary limitation of the custom, that at least the abomination of running back from a second husband again to the first is not to be permitted. For the rest, he permits it to be done, and takes meanwhile under his legislative care what in the Old Testament was not to be changed without causing greater evil.† Σκληροκαρδία, hardness of heart, the adjective of which occurs, Ezek. iii. 7 (Sept. πᾶς ὁ οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ φιλόνεικοί εἰσι καὶ σκληροκάρδιοι, קְשֵׁי לֵב), is found in Deut. x. 16, Sept. for עָרְלַת לְבַבְכֶם, where the circumcision of the heart is spoken of—we know in what sense Moses speaks of this, and prophesies for the future of a new covenant. (Comp. also Deut. ix. 27, σκληρότητα τοῦ λαοῦ τούτου, קְשִׁי הָעָם, and the קְשֵׁה עֹרֶף, הַוֹּה, and the elsewhere so often said of Israel.) All these passages Christ brings to mind, in order that the lawgiver may be explained from his own words. When he three times repeats with emphasis ὑμῶν, ὑμῖν, ὑμῶν (the hardness of your hearts, your wives), he thereby intimates, in a manner not to be overlooked, the particular and temporary character of the permissive ordinance, as precisely for such a hard-hearted people, in contrast with the ἄνθρωπος, the man, vers. 4–6. Moses, indeed, although Christ purposely mentions only him, rightly permitted this, not arbitrarily as man, but in virtue of a *commission from God. "A law which Moses has given cannot be sinful"—what Moses has allowed, the governor of a country may now permit without sin; "the subjects sin when they avail themselves of the permission, but he is as it were protected by the example of God and of Moses, and sins not when he grants permission to them for the prevention of a greater evil" (Michaelis, Mos. Recht, i. § 2). Much is permitted by the state, and must even be permitted by the Church, although in the eye of conscience it be wrong, although the word of Christ preached in the Church may testify against it.† When the apostle in 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11, adduces the saying of Christ, he represents him, in the words ἐὰν δὲ καὶ χωρισθῇ, but if she depart (quite similarly to the Mosaic phrase), as taking for granted the possible occurrence of such unhappy cases even among Christians, precisely in the same way as here (ver. 9). A forcible hindrance of separation, in the name of Christ and by commission from him for his Church, cannot be what is here spoken of. It is enough that he designates all divorce in general as proceeding from sin, and against God's ordinance (which sooner or later conscience makes known to all who avail themselves of the permission). Enough, that he acknowledges only the πορνεία, fornication—i. e., however, every unfaithfulness performed and consummated by the entire person, and essentially annulling marriage, be it in a work, or lust of the flesh*—as justifying the divorce of those who are already in reality divorced. Enough, that in all other cases he forbids, for all who will hear him in the spirit of free obedience, marriage with another woman as adultery, on account of that which is still valid. On all this—how far it reaches, and how far it is not for outward legislation—we have already expressed our views in our interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount. It remains only to be observed, that while here the λέγω δὲ ὑμῖν, but I say unto you, certainly stands parallel to the foregoing ὑμῖν, to you, in connection with the permission granted by Moses, and addresses the Pharisees (differently from the ὑμῖν addressed to the μαθηταί in the Sermon on the Mount), it yet does not imply that the commandment of our Lord is actually to take the place of the permissive legislation of Moses. For we are evidently to understand and supply: I say unto you, if ye ask me, as at ver. 3, in the spirit of those who would hear my decision on the subject, and follow my word in regard to it. He thus answers the insincere question with all the earnestness of truth.

* To which Michaelis rightly directs attention, Mos. Recht. ii. § 119. For if the law begins already at וְכָתַב לָהּ, then would it further be commanded: She shall marry another man, who shall hate her, and also send her away, etc. Rather does the אוֹ כִּי יָמוּת show plainly that the preamble of the supposed case extends as far as to this point.

According to Mark—who does not accurately know and represent the details of the discourse with the Pharisees, but does not on that account misstate its import—the disciples again privately questioned Christ on the matter. This corresponds with what Matthew relates with a subsequent objection and doubt on the part of the disciples. It is not, however, to be supposed that Mark has erroneously put the repetition of the prohibition of divorce in place of the other esoteric saying about castrating; it is quite possible that both may consist with each other.† Before that happened which Matthew relates, it was very natural that the question should be further asked: Does the matter stand really thus? Art thou perfectly earnest in what thou hast just said to the Pharisees? This Mark, moreover, indicates in the words, "ask him again of the same matter." This Evangelist, finally, has still another sentence peculiar to himself, which can hardly have been merely invented or have lost its proper place: And if a wife shall put away her husband. This happened sometimes, although (as Josephus expressly explains, Ant. xv. 7, 10) not according to Jewish law, which, indeed, in many cases permitted an action on the part of the wife with a

* Origen very wrongly found here what he regarded as a significant distinction between God's command, and Moses' permission yielding to the hardness of heart.

† This goes beyond the mere permission of "magisterial" authority, as Von Gerlach thus softens it. Nay, much more is permitted than he allows, when, ingeniously explaining the words of Luther to this effect, he is for "rejecting all divorced persons from the fellowship of the Christian Church."

* How then if the one partner had for years secretly maintained a refined sensual intercourse with a third person, although without concubitus? Would this in the judgment of Jesus be no πορνεία, no adultery? There is much wanting to prove the assertion (on which Von Gerlach lays so much stress), that in the mouth of Jesus πορνεία can throughout only unequivocally mean the 'bodily act;" comp. what we have said already at the Sermon on the Mount, p. 67.

† It is even possible that Mark here, as generally, narrates with historical exactness; although upon other grounds pertaining to the internal connection, we do not believe this.

view to divorce, but by no means an arbitrary divorce or leaving of her husband, such as that of Salome who wrote a bill of divorce against Costobarus, or that of Herodias who left Herod Philip. When Christ thus mentions instances, as occurring in his own time, of a still worse caprice than was allowed by Moses (though allowed by Greek and Roman law), he thereby indicates more strongly the results of hardness of heart, and thus sets all the more sharply in opposition to all such conduct his own holy ordinance, for the keeping of which he also furnishes the necessary grace.

Verses 11, 12. Hereupon the disciples are alarmed at the idea of an indissoluble union among sinful men—not so much on their own account as on account of other people—seeing that their master had employed the universal "whosoever." They are right in this fear, which would rather not venture on incurring an obligation for the full discharge of which grace is necessary; but, they forget, on the other hand, that to remain unmarried without sin requires a still larger measure of grace. Their frank declaration proceeding from the first strong impression is: If *the case of the man with his wife be so, it is not good to marry, as it appears to us! (are not the Essenes with their celibacy after all in the right?). Our Lord, however, in his answer, points to the still worse evil of lustful desire, or fornication (1 Cor. vii. 1, 2, 9); since only a chaste celibacy can be pleasing to God, and profitable or better for man. He at the same time neglects not the occasion thus presented—in order to the completion of his doctrine for all future disciples—of giving its due merit and honor to celibacy. This he does in such a way as to point out the true and direct path of decision between the first utterance of God—"It is not good for man to be alone"—and that special grace of the New Testament, already allied with the angelic state, which Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 1, acknowledges as the truth corresponding to the ascetical error. He, first of all, explains that chaste celibacy is an exception to the general institution, and can therefore only be given through the will and power of God.† He then declares that such an exception can only be conceived of as threefold. First in the case of such as are naturally and by birth disqualified, and which in the special case corresponds to the ἀρχὴ κτίσεως or "beginning of the creation" in general; this, however, is only a rare circumstance, and constitutes, so to speak, a permision of the Creator. Secondly, in the case of those disqualified by the unnatural act of men (therefore forbidden by Moses, Deut. xxiii. 1; Lev. xxii. 24, to be done to men or beasts); which, however, also constitutes a permission of God, a divine dispensation for those who have been thus dealt with. Finally (and this he means as the principal answer, which was to be explained by the two foregoing parallels), in the case of those who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He concludes, after having at the beginning repelled those who are not called to this, with a confirmation of this last case; a confirmation in which, while he strongly limits its operation, he yet truly acknowledges, nay, almost requires it.

All men cannot receive this saying: Christ certainly does not mean by "this saying" (as Wizenmann in his simplicity supposes) his own prohibition of all divorce except in the case of fornication, that which, as he had just expressed it, had seemed so alarming to the disciples. This would yield, indeed, a very perverted sense. It would mean that the universal grace of the New Testament, for the restoration of all that has been disturbed by sin to the pure ἀρχὴ κτίσεως, or original institution was not given to all; and as if on that account this new appointment of Christ could be required only of those who were specially chosen to keep it. No, our Lord does not here go back to his foregoing words; but he closely connects something new with the word which the disciples had used as the expression of their perplexity. This, and nothing else, he means by the τὸν λόγον τοῦτον, this saying. It is not his intention absolutely to contradict the disciples, who have spoken more truly than they themselves know; but rather to acknowledge that, in a certain case, a partial truth belongs to their rash general proposition. The saying then is, "It is not good to marry"—which, upon other grounds, is in fact true as regards some, those, namely, who have the gift and the calling to abstain (I Cor. vii. 7–17). That thus only can it be rightly understood, is clearly proved by the repetition at the conclusion: He that is able to receive it, let him receive it! The carnal mind also shrinks from the restraints of marriage but only that it may yield itself unrestrained to its lusts; than which nothing can be more evil. Only chaste celibacy can in certain circumstances be better than marriage; or, as Christ here expresses it: for the οὐ γαμῆσαι, not marrying, are required εὐνοῦχοι, "eunuchs." Of these there are three kinds: as some are so without, and some against their own will, so there are others certainly who are so with their own will, yet only according to the will of God. It ought not to be overlooked that, in the first two cases, the expression is indeed in the first place to be taken literally; but even in them it passes into a further meaning, so as to prepare the way for

* Αἰτία is not with Meyer to be explained according to ver. 3: If there is only this single reason for divorce. The μετά will not agree with this. But quite correctly with Luther: The matter of the marriage covenant, namely in its ground, its first institution. Elsewhere also αἰτία has a signification equivalent to ratio, conditio; here, therefore, the original law of the marriage-state. Hesych. τὰ κατ' ἀρχὴν πράγματα. Euthym. ἐὰν τοιαύτη ἐστὶν ἡ αἰτία τῆς συζυγίας.

† This idea seems to us to afford sufficient connection between the question and the answer; there is no necessity for Neander's difficulties, who says that, either the discourse has no such connection, or intermediate words have been left out.

the non-literal continuation and application of it in the third case. A *eunuch from his mother's womb is not merely one who is born and constituted with a real natural defect in this respect; but also, in a certain measure, one who is destitute of the sexual desire that impels to marriage, so that chastity costs him no struggle, and is to him no victory. Being made eunuchs by other men† includes also being restrained or kept back from marriage in the various ways in which this may be done; those cases in which such restraint finds easy obedience in accordance with God's providential arrangements (certainly not the unnaturally forced, and therefore all the more unchaste, celibacy of monks, soldiers, and the like). In so far as this intermediate case stands between the foregoing and the following, it is either similar to the first or the third. Yet Christ essentially distinguishes the first and second as being irregular and wrong, from the third, which he himself ordains and confirms, only however as a rare exception. For he has already acknowledged marriage as the ordinance of the Creator; he himself called a married person to be his first apostle; and his last chosen apostle, although unmarried, not merely confirms in very earnest terms the general ordinance, but in particular speaks of cases (and these not of rare occurrence) in which, as the reverse of what Christ here says, it is rather required of a man that he marry for the kingdom of heaven's sake. Something to this effect lies certainly in 1 Tim. iii. 2; and this may find its application as well in reference to missionaries who seek, by means of female missionaries, to open a door for the Gospel to the wives and daughters of the heathen, as to the pastors of Christendom in town and country. Nay, one might say further, that for example a widower, who again gives a mother to his children against the felt want and inclination of his own heart; and, finally, that every one who cannot live chastely unmarried, and who enters into the married state in order to his sanctification, marries for the sake of Christ and his kingdom. As for those, however, who have made themselves eunuchs, i. e., who by victorious conflict with the lust of the flesh have reached a state in which they feel it no longer (for Christ here denotes the end of a conflict which is indeed not so speedily accomplished, and graciously reckons it finished when it is only begun)—they have certainly done it for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He who undertakes it from other motives, in self-will, without the gift and calling of God, will not accomplish it, can never accomplish it. This, experience testifies, even as our Lord here takes it for granted; for he recognizes no fourth class consisting of those who from pride, avarice, or any other motive, might achieve it. Even he who would deal with himself as Origen did would not thereby destroy the desire, which it is well known may still exist in those who have been bodily castrated (Sir. xx. 3, xxx. 21).

But what is here meant by "for the kingdom of heaven's sake?" We think our Lord comprehends in this expression two sorts of cases: the first, when any one renounces the state of marriage on account of an office, and for the sake of active labor for the kingdom of heaven, as was probably the case with Paul; the second, and this is the most proper and immediate sense of the word, when any one feels in his experience before God that he himself can, and is to be, holy and happy, only in an unmarried state, and that this is for him the appointed way into the kingdom of heaven. In which case, therefore, it must always be acknowledged that Christ knows nothing and says nothing of a relatively greater value belonging to celibacy, or of a higher degree of holiness in it.* For, the kingdom of heaven, into which we are all in various ways to press, and the most of us in the state of marriage, is alone the object and end; while the refraining on the part of some is only the means to that end. Let every one see to it indeed that he be not disobedient, if this means and this way have been appointed for him; let him not think that the δέδοται (it is given) must at once be realized, whenever he thinks so; but let him do his part in order to the acquisition of the gift held out to him, in the painful, gradual, perhaps in the life of the flesh never to be entirely accomplished, εὐνουχίζειν ἑαυτόν, "making himself a eunuch." And in so far our Lord says, last of all: Whoso finds that he can receive it, let him go on with earnestness and zeal! which is certainly at the same time an evangelical counsel, a challenge addressed to all whom it concerns.

Nothing could more appropriately follow these sayings about marriage and celibacy than the requirement to acknowledge that children also (with the blessing of grace) are of the kingdom of heaven—children as the fruit of wedlock, which, notwithstanding what has just been said, is yet always of course blessed of God. As what had just been said might easily be misunderstood by men inclined to ἐθελοθρησκεία, or "will-worship," we see the counter-working wisdom of the Father—who prepares for the Son upon earth the course of his testimony as well as of his sacrifice—in causing at this precise moment the children to be brought to Jesus that he might bless them. Luke, who has not preserved this important connection, points at least by the article in τὰ βρέφη (the infants) to the typical, general significance of the incident: There were once brought to him also the children; and thus did he receive them, these were his words concerning the children!* It, moreover, certainly appears from the expression βρέφη, infants, if it were not already implied in the προσφέρειν, bringing, that they were not even παιδία, little children—as was the child (Matt. xviii.) who was called and placed in the midst of the disciples—but mere infants (1 Pet. ii. 2; Acts vii. 19; Luke ii. 12–16, and even i. 41. On the other hand, ἀπὸ βρέφους, 2 Tim. iii. 15, is used only as a proverbially strong expression). Our Lord was not desired to say any thing to them, but merely to lay his hands on them, and pray over them; or, as the two other Evangelists denote the retiring modesty of the request, to touch them. It was a praiseworthy faith on the part of the mothers who brought them (whoever else the οἱ προσφέροντες, indefinitely named in Mark, may be) thus to expect, from the laying on of the hands of the holy man (according to ancient custom), a real blessing for those who were as yet incapable of receiving the word. The disciples, however, being thus interrupted in a very interesting conversation which they would fain have continued by further questioning, were displeased with the expectation, and harshly repel it as improper. "Do not overpower him; he has more than enough to do with those who are grown up.† What good can such children get from his laying his hands upon them?" Thus "do they chide, with the gravity of young Rabbis, this interruption to a difficult inquiry of their profound school" (Lange). Upon this Christ speaks the great word, which completes what he had previously taught regarding marriage; which rebukes all that proud contempt with which many would in after times look upon the fruit of blessed marriages; and which gives a new and more deeply-reaching commentary on all that had been said in Matt. xviii., and was here so soon forgotten by the disciples.

* Such a one was said by the Jews to be castrated by the sun (one who has never otherwise seen the sun), or by the hand of Heaven.

† In Israel, as already said, unconditionally forbidden by Moses; therefore all the more common in the entire East. Hamann observes rightly for once: Self-castration for the sake of the kingdom of heaven (as afterwards follows) must have been a word which no Jewish head nor Jewish taste was in a condition to understand.

* On which Neander, who himself, as is well known, remained unmarried, notwithstanding speaks very truly; he not inaptly suggests that Christ elsewhere has found fault with the burying of the talent in order to preserve it more safely.

That the "children" and the "such" here, as at chap. xviii., are to be distinguished, and yet that the first certainly include the second, we shall not undertake to prove anew; it is evidently implied in the connecting word for. In like manner, that the kingdom of heaven consists of such children, as also of childlike men—not on account of their own original innocence, but through the saving grace in which they receive it as a gift and blessing—is equally evident: "If they come, and come to me, then of such is the kingdom of heaven." Children and childlike men, then, do not need to be made eunuchs in order to this. If the disciples, in a Pelagian spirit, take it for granted that man, through his own knowing and willing, believing and obeying, must meet the coming of the kingdom with something of his own—Christ, while he does not indeed deny that those commands are elsewhere found, according to which a man must himself take and lay hold, must himself enter by force, must struggle, strive, and persevere, yet sharply and clearly strips this of every thing Pelagian. "Not, the children must first become as you; but, vice versa, you must become as the children" (Richter). The saying, which is added in Mark and Luke, determines this in a simple measured expression: it remains grace and gift, for the attainment of which the receiving, i. e., of course the accepting it, is sufficient; nay, all that goes beyond such acceptance is already too much and a hindrance. In all the so-called co-operation of man there remains always the first and ever present initiative of God's working and giving; the more passively, in the true sense, man comes and takes, the better; and, at the end as at the beginning, he actually enters only by this pure passivity into the kingdom of heaven. Is not a child in the arms of its mother a living and personified call for help? "Receive me, I have nothing, I need every thing, I too would fain find my little place upon earth!" Is it not a living expression of faith? "I reckon and trust that I shall not be left to perish without help!" It is, as it were, an embodied appeal to the faithfulness of the Creator, who does not forsake his work even though marred and corrupted (Isa. xlv. 10, 11). As truly as God has let that child be born, so surely has he also prepared salvation for it; it lives and smiles with a fides implicita in this salvation. As a child—this, in reference to adults, is not being like a machine. For, as the child at least lets itself be carried and brought, and keeps itself quiet when caressed and blessed, so we, on our part, when brought to Christ or drawn to him, must ourselves come and receive; and in so far as a counteractive tendency has been awakened in us, we have enough to do to overcome this, in order not to keep away from ourselves and from Christ. But all this again must be done in childlike simplicity, humility, sense of need, and childlike trust. If we have to do with men, then the true rule is: Be no child, trust, look to—whom? But if we have to do with God, then it cannot often enough be repeated: Be only a child—follow the call, trust to the promise, take the gift, obey the word, all as if thou didst let thyself be lifted, carried, comforted, blessed!

Fully warranted, then, against all unchildlike objection—which does not understand the receiving of the kingdom of heaven—is the use

* One may even say here: Thus do the children ever come protestingly in our way, when we would be too severe against matrimony. Alford understands it only thus: They (the people) brought to him also their children along with them. But this scarcely does justice to the context.

† It is, however, not necessary to suppose with Schleiermacher "that the children were all at once presented in a crowd and throng."

which the Church makes of this declaration and act of her Lord as the institution of infant baptism. He who here blesses children, certainly with no empty and unmeaning ceremony, or merely to please the superstition of those who brought them (does he ever at any other time act thus?), gives also the greater blessing of baptism, which includes the whole kingdom of heaven, to those who are now brought to him; and, just as here, reckons their being brought as a coming. For it is truly a coming, quite as sufficient as that of adults, who have also nothing to bring but themselves and their own sinful nature. If conscious sins have already proceeded from the sinful nature, then repentance and faith belong to a true coming, and without both of these can no one be baptized; but a little child does not need repentance, and the grace in which we believe comes before his faith, just as it comes before ours. Do we not all receive the grace, which we afterwards consciously experience, first unconsciously, as βρέφη, as embryos, so to speak, of the new birth?* He who afterwards believes, as he has already been baptized, is saved; for he also who is baptized because he has believed, received in his faith already the first fruits of the grace of baptism sealed by the outward sacrament. We may therefore boldly say that infant baptism alone corresponds to the idea of the first sacrament, in so far as it is a giving and receiving on the part of God which goes before, lays the foundation, and is alone efficacious.* And if baptized children die, they are saved and blessed, before they could resist. If they die unbaptized? In that case also is fully warranted the use, only less general on account of unbelief, which the Church makes of the same saying, "Suffer the little children to come unto me," in the hymns and funeral orations for consolation at the burial of children. He who lets them die bids them precisely thereby to come to him, and will assuredly have the same blessing for them in the other world, which in this he does not withhold from them. At most, it might still be said, there remains a difference between receiving the grace of inward baptism (which gives all, and which washes away the sinful nature) in this world, and receiving it in the other world; a difference, it may be supposed (for who will say more on these secret things), which always leaves a preference to baptism in the flesh—to be compared, at least in its first stage, with the important difference between adults who have attained regeneration upon earth, and those who receive it in Hades. But this again, in reference to little children, seems not very conceivable.

ON FOLLOWING JESUS, AND THE RENUNCIATION BELONGING THERETO. (THE RICH YOUNG MAN AND THE LABORERS IN THE VINEYARD.)

(Matt. xix. 17–30, xx. 1–16; Mark x. 18–31; Luke xviii. 19–30.)

So far all is again connected. The discourse of Christ progressively develops itself as circumstances give him occasion: it, moreover, completes and supplements itself; here, as elsewhere, advancing from the exoteric to the esoteric in the parable intended for the disciples at the beginning of chap. xx.—which Matthew, alone of the apostles and ear-witnesses, has preserved. Would that the critics of the first Gospel could be persuaded to seek, by patient inquiry and interpretation, to apprehend its relation to the two others—particularly as regards the sayings of Christ—in the way in which it is our aim to present it in this book! Then would the supposition, in other respects so natural, more and more commend itself, that the Church has put, and could only put, at the head of the New Testament canon, a reproduction precisely corresponding to the Aramaic original of the apostle.† The following of Jesus, and the renunciation which that requires, is the subject of the discourse upon which we now enter. The young man, rich in possessions and good works, who offers himself as a follower of Christ, and yet cannot make up his mind to the necessary conditions, affords occasion for showing that, in order to take the first step in following Christ, all riches and possessions (what is outward to be understood as the expression and figure for what is inward) must be renounced. In order to complete this testimony, the question of Peter makes it necessary for our Lord to show that, in continuing to follow him, there is required a further renunciation of all eager seeking after reward, of all self-willed striving after future possession, and of all views of compensation for what has been forsaken. The introductory conversation with the rich young man consists of three questions and their corresponding answers. The first question and answer contain only the preparatory test applied to him; in the second the test

* For "all gifts of God do not enter by the door of the understanding into the soul" (Roos). The first fundamental gift never!

† We do not agree with Harless' "fabula de Matthaeo syro-chaldaice conscripto." With Guerike, we hold to the supposition of an Aramaic original; the translation of which—not always literal, yet always an exact rendering—was executed at all events under the authority of the apostle, either by himself or by others.

* Upon which we have further expressed ourselves in the last part of this work, in the excursus on infant baptism (on Matt. xxviii. 18–20).

is more definitely applied; the third contains, on the other hand, the decisive disclosure of the real state of the case. To the first, partly improper, question (so far improper as it makes the attainment of life to depend upon doing in the false sense of merit) our Lord replies by a test answer: Be it so! only seriously attempt it in this way, and keep the commandments of the good God concerning doing good! On the second question, in which the inquirer foolishly betrays himself, the more definite test answer presses more closely home: The old commandments with which thou art familiar—art thou then really perfect as to these? And now, when the error of the young man comes to full expression (All these have I kept!), Christ also decisively discloses (although still figuratively trying him) what is implied in emptying himself of all his possessions, of all outward and inward riches, as a poor man who will enter into the kingdom of heaven—what is implied in following him, receiving grace from him, and retaining that grace under the cross. That the rich young man goes away gives further occasion to Christ to open up more fully to the disciples, who were then present, the true significance of this incident and of what he had already said. He affirms by way of warning that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven; and in such a manner that the disciples must have understood the general and deep-reaching meaning of the words. Therefore, by the general question at ver. 25, they elicit the concluding declaration: The being saved, with all that belongs thereto, is for men generally (rich and poor) possible only through the omnipotent grace of God. But upon this Peter leaps again from the first and more intelligent question to the other side of the error; he thinks that they had done what was required of the young man, and thus appropriates to himself again as a possession the (not yet inwardly true) renunciation which they had made. For he claims the reward of this as a thing due to him and meritoriously earned. Upon this our Lord declares, finally, that an inconceivable reward of grace is (in future and even now) assuredly prepared, as for the apostles, so for every disciple who forsakes and renounces all in order to follow Christ; but yet there is great danger of losing what is the main element and consummation of the reward, eternal life, if an eager desire of reward should mar and inwardly cancel the act of renunciation. This, as we shall see, is the import of the saying which, in chap. xix. 30 and xx. 16, stands at the beginning and the end of the parable that illustrates it.

Matthew, the eye-witness, introduces the incident, which had made a deep impression upon him, with a Behold! to awaken attention. Luke at least gives it in the same connection; while Mark still more definitely connects it with the foregoing in the words "When he was gone out," i. e., after blessing the children. The indefinite εἷς (a) or τίς (a certain) of Matthew and Mark is afterwards designated by νεανίσκος, young man; according to Luke he was an ἄρχων, president, or ruler of some kind. However much this incident resembles in the beginning that other recorded by Luke, chap. x. 25, there is yet a great difference. This appears in the further course of the reply to the same question; and, moreover, the question is in the other case put in a malicious, tempting spirit, while in this it is asked, notwithstanding the error that accompanies it, in the sincere earnestness of a good intention. The zealous young man has already waited for Christ's coming out; he runs to meet him in the way; he kneels down before him with reverence, and addresses him with the sincere title, good Master (used in the sense in which ἀγαθέ, κράτιστε, and the like were generally used, and as the seven elders of a synagogue were—at least at a later period —called טוֹבִים). There is perhaps less of flattery than of thoughtlessness in this expression; it is inconsiderateness which leads him to use this great word, ἀγαθός, good, in connection with τί ἀγαθὸν ποιήσω, "what good thing shall I do?" This is the error which our Lord lays hold of. He was not precisely a youth, according to the present use of the term; for he says, ver. 20, ἐκ νεότητός μου, from my youth (which indicates one who had passed considerably beyond the stage of νεότης). Yet he was a young man to be a ruler, and this also speaks for the earnestness and zeal of his legal piety.* He has aimed at doing what is good, and would fain produce instances of this goodness; he knows also (what not many so clearly knew and frankly confessed) that the way into the kingdom of heaven, even for Israelites and rulers, is this doing good. He even speaks earnestly of eternal life,† a phrase which occurs literally in the Old Testament only in Dan. xii. 2; but afterwards had a settled place in the deeper doctrine among the Jews (Wis. ii. 23; xv. 3); and, in the time of Christ, was a current idea and expression, adopted, like many others, in the language of that time in anticipation of a fuller revelation. He who thus spoke in earnest had already passed beyond that understanding of the Old Testament promises which cleaves to what is earthly (and for that reason

* How, according to Stein (on Luke, p. 205), Matthew could be induced by the ἐκ νεότητός μου to add his νεανίσκος as a conjecture, seems incomprehensible to us; seeing that the opposite might rather be inferred from that expression, as Neander even infers from the entire style of address.

† Here this expression occurs for the first time, and again only at Matthew xxv. 46 in the first three Gospels; it first comes prominently forward in John. Still it denotes only what is pre-supposed in, and forms the fundamental idea of the entire Bible revelation, even from the Old Testament onwards. Lutz, in his Bibl. Dogmatik, p. 19, affirms this more satisfactorily than he afterwards brings out in detail.

Marcion would here cancel the αἰώνιον). It might almost be said in praise of this ruler, that he desired a better life, even an heavenly (Heb. xi. 16). But apart from what we shall soon find, namely, that in deep reality his heart yet cleaves to the professions of this world, his grand error lies certainly in the ἵνα, that, I may have. He connects the ἔχειν ζωήν, have life (according to Mark and Luke it is even κληρονομεῖν, inherit; he does not perceive the contradiction between this Scripture expression and his meaning), with the deserving and earning ποιεῖν, do. Nay, since, in his question, he goes beyond the ordinary commandments, we see that in his blindness he aims at truly meritorious, extraordinary, works by which he might come to be like the good Master!

Verse 17. The other reading in Matthew, "What askest thou me about the good? One is good!"—although received by many with favor*—we cannot by any means accept, notwithstanding the authorities quoted in its support. It might appear indeed to be quite agreeable to the sense that in περὶ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ, about the good, the idea, the essence of the good should be brought into prominence. But, on the other hand, this is far too abstract for the concrete saying of our Lord, which directly takes up the word of the questioner; since he seldom, and only upon special occasions, speaks in abstract terms. It is rather an early gloss to correct the text; because the τί με λέγεις ἀγαθόν; Why callest thou me good? (confirmed by two other Evangelists) was found to be dogmatically offensive and unintelligible.† If Christ, however, had not really said this, how could any one have been so bold as to put in this expression? And why should Matthew in this place, quite against his usual manner, give the paraphrase instead of the more exact word? He alone has the question and answer quite exact. Twice does the young man make use of the weighty word ἀγαθός, good (the other Evangelists have merely τί ποιήσω, τί ποιήσας); and, strictly corresponding with this, the same word occurs twice also in the answer: "What dost thou mean by this word which thou hast twice used? Be not so hasty with this great word! I am (for thee) not so suddenly a good Master; and there are great doubts about the doing good of those who are not good." The young ruler of course, with all his kneeling reverence, held Christ to be a mere man; and this pre-supposition our Lord condescends for the time to accept for the sake of his other words. In his address to the Lord, the young man, with substantially the same error, calls him ἀγαθός, good; and artlessly without more ado gives himself credit for the capacity ἀγαθόν τι ποιῆσαι, to do that which is good. The same error exhibits itself in ignorance of the evil of fallen man; and further, in not knowing that even the creature who is not fallen has yet not in himself the ground and source of the being good. Christ takes care not to say, I am not good; or, One only is good, my Father.* When he calls himself the good Shepherd, John x. 12, this is more than a good Master; when, John viii. 46, he maintains his sinlessness, he thereby precisely attests the divinity dwelling in his present humanity; for, without this, בֶּן־אָדָם, the Son of Man, and sinner, are one and the same.† He deals more exactly with the word than the rationalists, who "exhaust themselves in phrases, call him the best, noblest, most excellent, most perfect, etc.," and yet deny his divine dignity. He said then to the young ruler what he must say still more strongly to these modern panegyrists, not in kindness, but in anger: "Why callest thou me good?" He, however, at the same time attests his divinity (although he does not speak plainly of what is concealed) when he who knew no sin affirms: "None is good save One, that is God."‡ Luther well compares with this that other word, "My doctrine is not mine"—where Christ in like manner speaks of his humanity as such. Still more profoundly Augustine says here: "Christ knew himself not after the flesh." Oetinger, on the other hand, seems to go too deep when he thinks that God alone is good as being ἀπείραστος κακῶν, not tempted of evil (James i. 13); that the good angels, as being still liable to fall, are not pure before him; and that even the humanity of Christ, as liable to temptation, was not good in the absolute sense. For these ideas, though true in a certain measure, do not belong to the connection here; and would be too far above the

* Amongst whom is Jul. Müller, because this reading suits his philosophy: Christ leads first of all from the particular to the abstract, general idea of the good; then from this to the personal God! (Von der Sünde, i, 110). Schleiermacher nearly to the same effect.

† Origen already read both texts beside each other; the Syriac, however, which has always great value for us, has only the common reading.

* It is so read only in the Clementines, in order to introduce the Marcionitic separation of the good God of Christ, from the merely righteous Lawgiver of the Old Testament (see Hilgenfeld, Clement. Recogn., p. 270). Recently, Vigilantius Rationalis scrupled not to interpret: "only the Father in heaven"—so as to bring out an antithesis to the Son, as at chap. xxiv. 36.

† Never has Jesus any where said (if he says so here it is the only time) that any one honored him too highly; never did he protest against any degree of love, honor, thanksgiving, adoration (Roos, Die Lehre J. Christi, p. 79).

‡ See Hom. lit. Correspondenzblatt, 1829, p. 176: "Choose then, ye friends of reason, between these two conclusions dictated by reason itself. None is good but the one God; Christ is good; therefore Christ is the one God. Or: none is good but the one God; Christ is not the one God; therefore Christ is not good." The same dilemma is presented quite as sharply and correctly in the fine sermon by Nitzch (Selection vi., p. 6)—with which we in general entirely agree as it respects the exegesis of the text.

capacity of the inquirer to be an answer to his question. Nay, we would not even adopt Ullmann's view—that Jesus here calls only God "good" in the most pregnant sense, because the human goodness and morality of Jesus can only be what becomes goodness, such as develops itself and must reach its perfection through conflict—for this necessarily runs into the preceding error.* We abide by the simple sense that Christ—without denying his own goodness or his own divinity, in virtue of which (different from what it is in other men) such goodness dwells in his humanity—testingly corrects the youth, and thus in the first place shames his pride by his own humility. "Thou speakest with too much readiness of doing good; I tell thee it is necessary first to be good (I too should not be good, as thou thinkest, if I were a man as thou supposest); it is necessary in particular for thee to become good, before, in the way of doing, thou canst bring out this or that good thing from the inward treasure (chap. xii. 35). It is necessary to stand in unbroken fellowship with the alone independent original source of all goodness; for out of, and without God, no one is good.† But if, with real and upright earnestness, thou wilt enter into the life of which thou speakest—the good God has long since told thee (so that thou needest not to ask of me) in what way man is again to become holy as God is holy!" As we read in the Talmud (Rosh has-hanah, fol. 59, 1; Zeror hammor, fol. 151, 2), "Nothing is good but the law"—so Christ points to this mirror of the divine goodness and holiness for sinful man, to its particular commandments, which contain answer enough for every τί ἀγαθόν. Wilt thou do good?—then be and become good; God is good—"let his word (and commandment) be thy teacher." Our Lord here, as at ver. 23, makes the eternal life, after which the young man inquires, to be the same with the kingdom of heaven; for he uses the word εἰσελθεῖν, enter into, which is the formula generally used in connection with the latter. For the rest he quotes only the word of Moses (Lev. xviii. 5). He does not say, however, eternal life, because it does not so stand in that passage; but he teaches us to interpret and understand the Mosaic promise as referring to eternal life, just as at Luke x. 25, 28. Those who will not do so, and who understand by the word "life" in the writings of Moses only temporal good, are refuted by Christ himself. Further, our Lord here maintains against the Antinomians, that the law must by all means be kept and fulfilled in order to salvation; only that this is to be done in no other way than that which is by grace.* In the error of those who seek righteousness by works, and apply themselves to this in their own strength, there is a partial and perverted truth; Christ builds upon this, and teaches in the first place to be thoroughly earnest in the endeavor, so as to penetrate through that to the truth. How can he who has not first made the attempt by works, come to that repentance which alone leads to faith in divine grace, and thus to the true establishing of the law?

Verses 18, 19. The commandments—says Christ plainly; and the expression would denote the "ten commandments" almost as definitely to an Israelite, as the same expression would do now to a Christian child. Or, if the usage according to which these commandments were thus designated had by this time begun to be uncertain, Christ here confirms it, and teaches us to recognize in the commandments given from Sinai the permanent kernel of legislation, universally binding in order to eternal life; just as he here, and again chap. xxii. 37–40, makes use of two summary expressions from Moses for the two tables. The ruler must have begun to perceive what the good Master would say; this he betrayed at once when, with an inconsiderately hasty expression of surprise at being thus referred back to old things, he asked—Ποίας; Which? Surely not the old, familiar, common commandments? Mark and Luke (in which we have another instance of their more inexact condensation) pass over, as the foregoing citation from Lev. xviii. 5, so also this characteristic intermediate question. They represent Christ as at once saying, "Thou knowest the commandments." Matthew informs us most exactly how and what Christ spoke; and that he prescribed, not merely to this young man, but at the same time to us all, the true beginning of the catechism in order to a knowledge of sin. Let those Christian catechists who deem the Decalogue imperfect and insufficient to embrace all that men are required to do in order to eternal life; and those, in like manner, who would remove it from the true place which God himself has given to it as the παιδαγωγὸς εἰς Χριστόν, the schoolmaster leading to Christ—see to it that they are not contradicting their Master, who here undeniably fixes its true use and place, at the beginning of the catechism. But why does he begin with the second table? Because this is most fitted to carry conviction from without to the heart; and because it is more natural

* Comp. Wimmer's argument against this, Stud. u. Krit. 1845, 1. What he, however, seeks to bring out by a different interpretation of the εἰ μή—No one is good except under the condition that God, as the original source of all goodness, is the ground also of his goodness—appears to us too far-fetched, and beyond the connection, when put forward on grammatical grounds in this way, although it certainly remains the deeper fundamental idea.

† "The master in Israel (John iii. 2), and the ruler of our text, are to be pronounced alike foolish, because they presume to give judgment upon a thing which they do not yet at all understand" (Stein on Luke, p. 206).

* Wilt thou, an accepted follower of the Saviour, lose again the life received from him, and from being one of the first become one of the last who remain without? Only despise the commandments, as if they were not to be kept precisely by thee!

to test at once man's conduct towards men.* The sum and substance of the first table—Honor God alone!—he has already indicated at ver. 17; nor does he fail here, looking back, to repeat the commandment respecting father and mother (already, chap. xv. 4, brought forward as an important fundamental commandment), as the transition from the first table to the second. He then concludes with what is also explained at chap. xxii. 39, as the sum of the second table; which declares that it must be understood in a spiritual sense as taking cognizance of and judging the disposition of the heart, so that these very words, Thou shalt love! at the same time include and represent the last commandment against coveting. The two other Evangelists do not so carefully preserve the original words; both follow (as also the apostle at Rom. xiii. 9), a transposition to be found in Philo (and which had come to be in use in Jewish schools), of adultery before murder, and leave out the love of our neighbor. Mark gives instead of this a peculiar, and by no means strictly corresponding, expression of the last commandment, which denotes the Οὐκ ἐπιθυμήσεις (Thou shalt not covet), by its most natural expression in the outward act, Μὴ ἀποστερήσῃς (defraud not). Only as given by Matthew does the test of our Lord's question rise with psychological delicacy to its keenest climax: Hast thou kept this? And actually this also. First come the negative commandments, the expression of which has most to do with the outward work and word, and as to which a man most easily justifies himself. Then, more positively, a commandment which points to the disposition of heart; that, viz., which is the first commandment for men, and in which the honor which as a child he gives to God coincides with that which he gives to those who stand to him in the stead of God. Finally comes the wholly positive and inward commandment of love. All this, however, implies in it the rebuking question: Is the man to whom such prohibitions and commands must be given—by nature good? Is he not from his birth a murderer, adulterer, thief, and liar in heart, a child without reverence, a man without love?

Verse 20. The young man is too much blinded to understand Christ's meaning, and now first makes manifest his entire blindness.† He vainly imagines, as, alas! many do still, that he stands perfectly well with the ten commandments! Probably when our Lord began with Thou shalt not kill! he had his answer already on his tongue. When he reached the Honor thy father and mother, he hastened in his thought to add from my youth up—which was a proverbial expression among the Jews for the fulfillment of the law and piety (see Tob. i. 8–10; ii. 13; 2 Tim. iii. 15).* The Lord's last word, however, which should have struck him most keenly, he does not hear at all; and so he delivers himself at once of the fearfully artless lie: All these have I kept, and carefully had respect to! "Thou hast been a reverently obedient child from the womb? Thou hast then loved thy neighbor as thyself thy whole life long?"—And yet the young man does not consciously lie, but seriously thinks that it is as he says; hence, according to Mark, Christ looked upon him with pitying love and kindness. Be not thou, O Christian teacher and evangelist, too soon polemically offended with all who are legally righteous! Do not unwisely and unjustly speak against such mistaken ones with angry dogmatical rebuke! There is a difference to be observed among the self-righteous. This young man is of a nobler nature, and stands unconsciously in a transitional class between the Pharisee and publican, the contrast between whom is portrayed in the parable which, in Luke, immediately precedes. The justitia civilis, the outward keeping of the commandments so far as one knows and can keep them, has a certain worth in its kind—who would not regard such a youth with more pleasure than he would a wild and dissolute transgressor? But, indeed, this very rectitude prevents the heart which honestly strives from being at peace, assured, and tranquil; the more one has kept the commandments, the more urgently will the self-betraying question obtrude, What lack I yet? Such a man understands not his own question; he thinks that he means, Are there not somewhere still more commandments to which I must apply myself?—is there not some special extra-work for my zeal in doing good? But his heart confesses, against his knowledge and will, that there is still one thing, lacking to him. Now, he who goes on self-willed and uninstructed in this way, will doubtless, from a good beginning, land at last in the worst Pharisaism and monasticism; but he who only proceeds with questioning, and comes to the true Master, shall obtain the true answer which will lay open the bottom of the heart.

Verse 21. Thus does the wisdom and love of Christ receive and treat the case. He does not deal unjustly with the young man, as if he understood him arrogantly to say, Am I not then perfect, having kept all the commandments? for then he would not have come to the good Master at all, and would not have stayed to ask any thing more after the first

* As a true catechist must still always hold up prominently before children the second table (with the "Father and Mother" that leads to it; and, in its sum, the love of our neighbor). So, on the other hand, the deeper understanding of the first table is reached only in the second and third parts of it.

† Mark puts into his mouth in this answer again a Διδάσκαλε, now without the rejected epitheton ornans.

* This sufficiently accounts for the expression. We are not under the necessity (with Neander, as already mentioned) of supposing that this was an aged man looking back complacently on his past life, and of correcting the statement of Matthew accordingly.

question. One thing thou lackest still! Thus do Mark and Luke express Christ's meaning; but we must interpret the words, with Luther's marginal note: Thou art still entirely lacking; with one thing thou lackest all—the principal thing! Literally Christ said, If thou wilt be perfect—words which sympathize with, and enter into, the young man's feelings; but at the same time humbly and most keenly convict him. Apparently Christ gives him what he has desired, and points out to him a special work; but observe that what he requires of him is only a simple test, whether he is able really to keep that first commandment of the first table from which all others flow, whether he has even understood its spiritual requirement. "Keep then the first commandment in truth, and show that thy possessions are not Mammon and an idol to thee!" A foolish teacher would have directly contradicted the young man by merely laying down the doctrine that the matter so stands, and following that up with the direct charge, Thou art in thy riches still an idolater! But the wise Teacher lays hold on him by proposing to him something to be done, just as he himself had requested: Go, sell thy goods and give them to the poor, so that thou mayest love these poor as thyself! Not the fanatical advice to throw them into the street or the sea, but to distribute (Luke, διάδος; comp. Luke chap. xi. 22, Acts iv. 35), with the wisdom and joy of love, the superfluity among the needy. It is evident that the outward obeying of this command is to be no general rule for all possessors who would be saved; while Christ gave an earnest command to this young ruler, he imposes it only upon such special individual cases as his was. It is equally clear, further, that this selling all, in itself without price and merit, is required of this individual only as a test; it was but the preparatory act which would disembarrass him for what comes immediately after, viz., Follow me! Still, however, we shall altogether mistake the meaning of Christ—who always in the external meaning includes the interna'—if we do not recognize in his words the figuratively embodied fundamental commandment which he utters, for example, in Luke xiv. 33, comp. Luke xii. 33—"Become poor!" That is the great essential. All that thou hast (Mark and Luke already spiritualizing and explaining: ὅσα ἔχεις)—that is, also the imagined riches consisting in the fulfillment of the law and virtuous deeds, ver. 20. Hast thou, as a monk, parted with thy goods only to be more proud of them in heart, what will that help thee?* The command comes ever anew, penetrates deeper and deeper, until it pierces the heart: Sell also thy imagined possession, expressed in the words, "I have sold all." Follow me, that thou mayest learn in my school what grace is, how thou mayest receive the kingdom of heaven as a little child, and look only to the treasure in heaven. Me—there now stands, supplementing the humble saying at ver. 17, the one Master, as personally and essentially good, to cleave to whom is and becomes alone true doing good. Mark adds (from Matt. x. 38 and similar sayings), Take up the cross; we might certainly doubt whether Christ uttered the word in so discouraging and repelling a manner precisely to this young man; still, as regards the profound and general import of the saying, this is its true meaning.

"A man may pledge and stake his head a hundred times; but if any one were to proceed to take it from him, he would feel for the first time how firmly it sits—how it sticks to him" (Gossner). So is it with the young man here, who now perceives with deep shame how much his idolatrous heart cleaves still to the possession of this world. Caught by his own inquiry after works of perfection, sharply smitten in his own conscience, he cannot turn aside the command of the Master by asking, Where, then, is such a commandment enjoined upon me? With what right dost thou require in the name of God so much as this of me? He feels what our Lord purposed to make him feel. "To disobey is hard for him, and to obey still more hard" (as Roos excellently expresses it). The command addressed to him with friendly look makes his countenance and heart sad; he goes away silent, and his silence says: "No, that I cannot possibly do!" We are not told whether this sadness resulted in the godly sorrow and humility proper to a sinner. But Christ makes him, going away just as he is, a warning example for his disciples; and proceeds more fully to disclose to them the import of what he had said and done.

Verses 23, 24. Proverbial and figurative discourse has always this character, that the outward letter is not to be pressed in the particulars as it is in a doctrinal proposition, but that a background of spiritual meaning all the more deep opens itself up for the application. As our Lord in ver. 24 does not merely repeat with greater emphasis what he had said in ver. 23, but intends rather to lay the real emphasis on the figurative proverb, and to conduct to this by the transition from the case that had just occurred, what is said in ver. 23 acquires also for all subsequent hearers and readers, nay, even for the apprehension of the disciples at the time, a parabolic character. He speaks indeed first of all in strict earnestness of the outwardly rich, to whom the possession of their goods becomes a dangerous hindrance, and that because they do not possess as if they possessed not, because their hearts cleave to their possessions (Psa. lxii. 11). For, "not so much is he rich who possesses a great deal, as he who is possessed of a great deal" (Von Gerlach). Thus do Mark and Luke rightly interpret "they that have riches." Mark—who (as in chap. vii., where human statutes are spoken of, and elsewhere[א] most frequently appends an explanation to the word—here very considerately, in order to obviate all misunderstanding of Christ's words, says, Those who trust in riches (Prov. xi. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 17); and he does so under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, in order that they in the Church who are slow to hear might have the saying of Christ also in this form. It is therefore not with Schleiermacher to be called "a limitation by a later hand;" so much, however, is true, that Christ did not here at first speak thus, otherwise the impression produced on the disciples would not have been so startling—it remains, notwithstanding, undeniably the true interpretation of the meaning of Christ's words. Again it is true that such danger of putting false confidence in their possessions lies very near to all possessors. Does not Christ speak also, Matt. xiii. 22, of the deceitfulness of riches; and does not experience still prove, in spite of the exceptions from Abraham to Joseph of Arimathea, that riches properly speaking, or the possession of many goods, bring with them peculiar and serious dangers, hindrances and temptations? As a rich man, then—i. e., without putting away his riches inwardly, and in some cases also outwardly (the latter is nothing without the former)—no one shall enter into the kingdom of heaven. And one might certainly, speaking strongly, apply the saying with Wesley still further thus: "It is also easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle* than for a rich man to give up trusting in his riches"—although this seems only partly true, and in comparison with the saying of Christ too severe. It is further true, that the poor cleave to the mammon which they do not possess, when with idolatrous covetousness, they strive after it, and will be rich (1 Tim. vi. 9). But the whole of what was exemplified in this incident becomes for Christ a parable embodied in fact, representing a truth which entirely applies only to what is inward. If—as according to Matthew we suppose to be certain, and for a proverbial expression find to be natural—Christ said merely πλούσιος, rich, we have only to call to mind what is said in Luke vi. 24, 25, in order to understand, that he speaks in the deepest sense of the rich in spirit, of such as are rich in genius, in virtues, in knowledge, in honors, etc. This was the real hindrance in the way of the young man; had he been poor in spirit, he would also have been ready to sell his goods. Through the strait gate one must come only poor and naked, not laden with goods and virtues; this lies as much in the nature of the case as that a camel cannot go through the eye of a needle. This our Lord declares to his disciples, addressing them with a friendly τέκνα, "children," as Mark has it;* and we see immediately from their exclamation of amazement and fear that they have understood his meaning.

Verses 25, 26. Who then can be saved! Τίς ἄρα, "Who then"—this is more comprehensive than merely τίς πλούσιος (what rich man). Do not the poor also cleave to their scrap of possession and strive after more; has not every man at bottom something which as his possession he will not let go? If the entrance into the kingdom of heaven is so narrow, who then is small and unencumbered enough to enter! What thou sayest is truly the case of all—we understand thee; then the being saved must be in general a thing of impossibility? Thus do the amazed disciples think; and not of other people merely, of the always not numerous class of the rich to whom they certainly did not belong: they regard themselves as included, inasmuch as they perceive that man must renounce and relinquish all that he has in every sense. Christ, however, confirming this understanding of his words, looked upon them (which ἐμβλέψας, Mark also does not let slip), and spoke, quite openly now, of the salvation of men in general as a thing impossible with man, and only possible through the omnipotence of God. He strengthens the δυσκόλως into ἀδύνατον, the hard into impossible; and thus it is: Who would be saved if it were not for the power of redeeming grace? To man of himself it is impossible even to break through the blindness of the heart, so that as a sinner he shall know and truly see what is lacking to him; then it is impossible to confess this in true penitence before God, and to receive grace in faith; then again always impossible to persevere in grace unto the end. But all is accomplished by the efficacious working of God, by his anticipating, strengthening, and confirming power; certainly not without faith (to which, therefore, all things are possible, Mark ix. 23), but that faith is (although without predestinating, electing compulsion) "in the power of God" (ἐν δυνάμει θεοῦ, 1 Pet. i. 5), as a "faith of the operation of God" (πίστις τῆς ἐνεργείας τοῦ θεοῦ, Col. ii. 12). To this faith that lays hold on the power of God, on the other hand, all is possible that pertains to salvation; from the first becoming poor and following Christ even to the keeping of the commandments, which also is indispensable. Possible—although a difficulty attends it to the last. Christ, indeed, is come to save the lost (Matt. xviii. 11); for otherwise this was not possible even for God. Sin must be blotted out in order that God may remain just in bestowing grace, and man free in receiving it; and atonement was necessary, and such an atonement as sanctifies. This great ἀδύναιον παρὰ ἀνθρώποις, this great impossibility with men, God has brought to pass in the miracle of all miracles, in the incarnate Son !*

* The conjecture of many Greek commentators, following Theophylact (not camel but cable), is no longer thought of by any one; going pre-supposes feet. The similar proverb of the elephant is familiar in the Koran (Sur. vii. 38), and in the Talmud (Buxtorf, Lex. p. 1722), also the camel, more familiar among the Jews, according to Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr., in a proverb respecting a stupid Galilean. Comp. Matt. xxiii. 24. Sepp well observes that in the natural connection of what is said about the entering into the kingdom of God, the eye of a needle, and the door (door, gate), appear as in perspective contrasted with each other.

How ought the disciples now to have reflected upon this important saying, with other and joyful astonishment, at once satisfied and silent and affected in heart! But this was beyond their temper of mind and capacity of apprehension, at least in the case of Peter and most of them; although perhaps John and Nathanael might have thus reflected. Peter soon passes from the first salutary astonishment with which he was struck, to the opposite extreme; he has too hastily appropriated to himself the friendly look with which Christ regarded them, as if it said, "Are not ye yourselves an example how God can save?"—and with great folly brings forward what he himself has done in addition to the omnipotence of God. He hides as usual behind the general we his favorite, I, and says, certainly not without self-complacency: Behold we have left all and followed thee! If these words stood alone without the question (again only preserved by Matthew) which is annexed to them, they might then have been taken in a good sense to mean: Behold the almighty God has made this possible for us, we rejoice in this and are thankful! But it sounds more questionable, t really reverses the whole matter, when he asks τί ἄρα ἔσται ἡμῖν; "What then shall we have?" It is perceived clearly that his meaning is: We have done much better than the young man—and that again the idea of merit creeps forth from his heart. That mild interpretation of the question—deviating from the translation of Luther—viz., "Is our renunciation of all indeed that which thou requirest? what will fall to our lot, or be our sentence? wilt thou pronounce a judgment upon us different from that upon the young man, and let us pass?"—is fully confuted by the answer of Christ. Because Peter has inquired after reward and compensation, Christ says, first of all, what is contained in vers. 28, 29; but because he has asked with a culpable eagerness for reward, the parable concerning the first and the last follows with its earnest warning and rebuke. The matter then stands thus: Peter, who has not yet understood Luke xvii. 10, puts his question in the spirit of Job (chap. xxxi. 2); and betrays what, alas! may still be too often found in the followers of Christ who have left all, a self-righteous regard to the reward of grace, as if it were not pure grace. In such cases the injunction is ever again to be repeated: Sell all that thou hast; renounce also all that thou has received from me, appropriate it not to thyself, as if thou hadst not received it! Look not self-complacently to what thou hast done, but zealously to what thou hast still to do, that thou mayest fulfill thy course! Imagine not that thou art complete and perfect! Ask rather, without ceasing, What lack I yet? This is better than What shall I have, therefore?

Verse 28. The scanty possessions, of which Peter seems somewhat presumptuously to speak when he says, We have given up all (not entirely, however, as they still retained possession of it), were certainly not worth the kingdom of heaven as a purchase-price; and Christ might indeed have sharply ridiculed it. This he does not do, however. He knows well that it is difficult for the fisher to leave his boat, the publican his little house, and every one whatever he calls his own; that in the end the poorest does enough when he renounces his all; and that the heart of the beggar may cleave more to a few pence than that of the rich man to great sums. Nor was that so altogether inconsiderable which, for example, Peter possessed in Capernaum; and the two sons of Zebedee, with their hired servants (Mark i. 20); and Matthew, who could give a great feast in his house. Therefore, with great kindness and grace, he first of all acknowledges that they had actually "followed him" by renouncing all, holds in all honor their obedience to the apostolic calling, and, without finding fault, holds out to them the apostle-thrones as its result; then, however, follows the earnest rebuke of the impure element of self which was mixed up with their renunciation. Not, as many harshly understand the sincere meaning of Christ, that he at first, half ironically,* set before them the glory to which their faithfulness would not fail to attain (which was the self-evident reward of those who were the supreme ministers of the highest King), in order then all the more severely to say: But take care that you do not lose it! No, he is exalted above such feelings and moods; he himself, joyfully prophesying, looks first at the future glory to which he knows that his twelve apostles will attain, and to which he would have them to look up. For we are to rejoice on account of the reward in heaven (Luke vi. 23); the command addressed to the rich young man contained in it also the promise—Thou shalt have treasure in heaven! Mark and Luke leave out the first special promise to the apostles; but Matthew gives it all the more exactly. Ye who have followed me—this not merely acknowledges the past, but lays down at the same time, with the full emphasis of this great word, the condition which still remains; therefore, in latent prophecy, it already excludes Judas, just as later Luke xxii. 28, 30. Still, there are twelve seats; for another shall receive the office of the traitor, and God's plans suffer no defeat on account of individual sinners.* The regeneration, as appears from the explanatory clause which is added respecting the glory of the Son of Man, is the renewal of the world, of the earth (hence the Persian version has, in the new world); a restoration of the primitive state of things on the whole, as well as the regeneration of man, from which the expression, by extension and comparison, is derived.† Not merely the final adoption of the children of God (Rom. viii. 23; Luke xx. 36) in the resurrection of the dead, but the concomitant glorification of all creatures in order to the glory which corresponds to the freedom of the children of God (Rom. viii. 23). This δοξα or glory of the new world, is itself the δόξα of the υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, or Son of Man, in which, however, his special θρόνος will in some way be set up. All the members of the new-born race of this second Adam have a common participation in the glory of the Son of Man; for such as bear honors, however, there are special thrones, from which are to be governed the twelve tribes of Israel; i. e., the new and true Israel, the entire people of God in their multiplicity, formed after the type of those twelve tribes. Accordingly ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ is, in the last sense, equivalent to in my kingdom, Luke xxii. 30 (comp. Matt. xxvi. 29); and the sense in which it is understood by the two sons of Zebedee (Matt. xx. 21) is quite correct. Although finally κρίνειν in this place signifies not judge but govern, as שפט in the Heb., yet Bengel's fine observation is not without ground: Of Christ, it is καθίῃ (sit) in the Active, of the apostles καθίσεσθε (shall be seated) in the Middle;‡ for they take not their seats until they have first stood, with all others, before the judgment throne of him who sits (Luke xxi. 36; 2 Cor. v. 10).

* This interpretation is a strange contrast with that extreme which may be found—and only a specimen of his enfeebling paraphrase—in my predecessor in the exposition of the sayings of Jesus, the notorious Bahrdt. According to him the meaning here is: "That which in the present intractable state of mankind is infinitely difficult, God can make gradually to become easier."

Verse 29. Should not an honest heart have been humbled by the very greatness and loftiness of the promise? Should not Peter and all the apostles have been constrained to say with shame: Lord, this comes to us not as a recompense for leaving our ships and nets; this is grace, and not reward at all! Christ even now, in passing to the intended rebuke, helps them to such thoughts and feelings, inasmuch as, in order to check their special we, he widens the promise. They must learn to speak as the last apostle did, who, according to Christ's choice, came in the room of one who fell from the number of the twelve—the greatest and last apostle: Not to me only shall the crown be given by the righteous Judge, but to all them also that love his appearing (2 Tim. iv. 8). Every one without distinction who has forsaken whatsoever he loved and held dear, whatever his heart clave to (here it is not at first μισεῖν, hate, Luke xiv. 26, which is yet always indispensable, but, the bearing patiently actual loss, the free surrender)—for the sake of Christ (Matt.: "for my name's sake;" Mark: "for my sake and the Gospel's;" Luke: "for the kingdom of God's sake")—shall suffer no loss thereby, but shall obtain most abundant compensation. The so-called sacrifices which are made in the cause of God receive this name at first only with reference to our unbelief; for every such loss brings after it rich gain. The only goods that are named by way of example, are those of house, of family love, and of the earthly possession that most binds the heart; for, of such things the disciples had been speaking. Matthew and Mark have, with slight differences, the same arrangement of the particulars. It begins at first generally with the house; then, in the members of the family, it rises gradually to an ever more difficult renunciation (for one separates himself from brothers and sisters sooner than from parents, while one cleaves to his wife more than to these, and finally, with most intensity to children); and then returns again to the more direct and real property in lands. This we take to be the original form; while Luke gives the substance by an abridgment, in which the arrangement is not so exact. There are many significant things to be noticed in these words; in which we plainly perceive the superintending care of the Holy Spirit, providing against every essentially improper expression, such as might contradict the cautious and well-weighed saying of our Lord. That no divorce can be meant here by the forsaking of wife is self-evident from the declaration so earnestly made by Christ not long before. That he mentions brothers, and sisters, and children in the plural, but only one wife, as also one father and one mother, is in like manner conformable to that declaration in favor of monogamy. Finally, that, in the particular repetition of the persons who are to be received back by way of recompense (which Mark alone gives, and, we can hardly suppose, as a mere amplification), even *mother is specified, while there is no mention again of wife or wives—is wisely and becomingly directed against all fanatical abuse; although it is also true that in a certain sense (only not in the conjugal) compensation will be given also for the wife who has been given up. How and when does Christ promise that this hundredfold (Luke, "manifold"), i. e., this intensive

† To follow Christ in the regeneration (as Göschel, von d. letzten Dingen, p. 23 in one place connects the words) is not a correct expression; but the hope of the near regeneration of the world on account of their own regeneration, is a combination which Göschel correctly gives.

(somewhat as in 1 Sam. i. 8) and much better compensation, shall be made? Now already in this time, or world, which Mark and Luke precisely distinguish from the eternal life in the future world; as also Matthew (at least in his καὶ ζωὴν αἰώνιον). Therefore, by virtue of the spiritual fellowship of goods and of love, this took place in the Church of believers; where Paul found a mother (Rom. xvi. 13) and many children, where Timothy found brothers and sisters (1 Tim. v. 1, 2); and where the great principle holds good, All things are yours! (1 Cor. iii. 22). Even houses and lands in this present time are compensated in this manner. Often indeed quite literally, as when those who forsake them are received by others for the sake of Christ into the joint possession and use of their property; at all events, in the sense of 2 Cor. vi. 10, that Christ takes better care of his followers than if they had retained house and hall with unfaithfulness toward him. All this, however, is μετὰ διωγμῶν, i. e., at present amid persecutions, according to the nature of the kingdom of the cross before the period of glory; not without continued patience for righteousness sake.

Verse 30. And now, after such great promises—the fulfillment of which every one who ventures to put them to the test has in all times experienced—there follows a warning contrast. The saying which contains this, Luke has not subjoined; Mark only gives the simplest expression of it; while Matthew connects it with the parable which illustrates it. Our Lord indeed had already uttered the proverbial saying on another occasion (Luke xiii. 30); here, however, he devotes to it an entire parable, as he does in like manner to that other in Matt. xiii. 12, spoken at a later period, chap. xxv. 14–30; and again to that which is added at chap. xx. 16 ("many are called but few chosen") the entire parable in chap. xxii. 2-14. We will leave, then, this profound saying to explain itself in the parable; and at the outset content ourselves with Meyer's excellent note, which indeed contains every thing: The first "in time, gifts, self-estimation, and appearance" shall be last, and vice versa. We observe now only so much—as indicating the proper direction for the understanding of the parable, which beyond all question culminates in the saying placed before and after it—that Christ according to all evident connection with what goes before means to say: The penny of this country (which, at ver. 29, I promise to all my followers, as a reward of grace to be obtained even here upon earth) I will assuredly pay to every one. But at last (as respects eternal life) it will be otherwise; then shall many who had been preferred remain behind and without, having been sufficiently paid by what they have received; while many late ones shall be advanced.

We must at once, according to what is here indicated, declare against the arbitrary assertion of Neander (with Strauss and De Wette), that both sayings (chap. xix. 30, and xx. 16) are entirely out of their place here, and mar the import of the parable! We are sorry to be obliged to say rather that Neander shows he has entirely misunderstood the parable—a necessary result, indeed, of such rejection of the authentic interpretation of the sacred text.

Chapter xx. 1—16. In order to understand this parable,* so much contested from the beginning, and lately so much mangled and perverted in a multitude of special treatises, it is certainly of decisive importance to settle the principal question, What does Christ mean by the penny, or day's hire? We maintain that all who take it to represent eternal life or blessedness grossly err, and entirely mistake the true meaning of the whole. There are three reasons in support of this, so clear that one must wonder they have not always appeared evident to all. First, eternal life cannot surely be promised as a reward of labor, in the same way as in a legal contract; which is yet plainly the meaning of the συμφωνεῖν, agree, ver. 2, comp. ver. 13. The Lord agreed with the laborers and the laborers with him; and this contract is at all events kept, even without respect to the disposition and worthiness which afterwards shows itself; but it is not thus, assuredly, in the bestowing of eternal life. Then, secondly: The murmurers also receive the penny, and on receiving it complain that what they have received is not so much as is due to them. These, however, as the conclusion of the parable plainly declares, are in reality none of the chosen ones who earn eternal life; otherwise the entire parable would contradict this its conclusion, and all who had been called would come at last into the kingdom of heaven. And yet we must in any case interpret the parable from this concluding sentence, and by no means explain this sentence as incorrectly added here, or (with Calvin) cancel it altogether, when it is found not to fit in with the interpretation given before to the parable. Steffensen (Stud. u. Krit. 1848, 3) with perfect right maintains that our Lord, by adding these concluding words, obliges us to seek precisely in them the principal idea of the parable. That he intends, as has been said in opposition to this, to show, by the striking contradiction implied, "that such a murmuring in heavenly things is in itself inconceivable"—is an idea which itself is inconceivable; because then, contrary to the fundamental rule to be observed in every parable, no reality would correspond with the principal point of the figurative narration. As little can it be understood of a mere offer of the same eternal reward to all objectively, although afterwards the envious ones exclude themselves as being subjectively unworthy to receive it; this explanation (for which Trench decides) is neither agreeable to the text of the parable nor to the nature of the case. We are not even at liberty with many to explain it of the as yet tolerant reception of the murmurers into a kingdom of earthly glory before the last day; for even there, as we are elsewhere sufficiently taught, the unworthy remain without. This lies plainly in the ὕπαγε,* go thy way (ver. 14), which expresses rejection and anger; and together with which, the adjudication "Take that is thine!" can mean nothing else, than what, at another stage, Abraham says to the rich man (Luke xvi. 25). What thou hast contracted for, with that thou art discharged; but now, Away from my service, and from all further intercourse with me! "There can be no blessedness without acceptance with God"—this is the sure point of this parable; as already Gregory the Great (whom Besser cannot confute) has said: "No murmurer can receive the kingdom of heaven; and no one who receives it can murmur." Luther also (to whom the present Lutherans with their artificial exegesis ought in this instance to yield) saw clearly that the murmuring laborers "go off with their penny and are damned." What, then, is the day's hire? The same Luther, who preferred to leave this unsettled as a subordinate point, which is certainly not admissible,† yet goes on to say, "Therefore if we would strictly interpret, we must understand the penny of the temporal good; and the favor of the householder of the eternal good." Melancthon is still more positive that the denarius is not to be explained of the vita aeterna. Valerius Herberger adheres to Luther, when he says: "The object and aim of the parable is not represented in the question, Who obtains the penny—as several have racked their brains to make out, and have only made bad worse—but in this, Who retains the grace of the heavenly Father, so good to all?" Very true; but that we may rightly investigate this latter point, it is necessary that we thus strictly interpret the former; and it needs no racking of one's brains to read that people are here spoken of who obtain the penny, but at the same time lose the grace of the Lord. A simple glance at what goes before suffices to show that the penny is certainly a temporal good, different from eternal life, though not of a merely outward and earthly nature.* It is manifestly that reward, profit, or compensation of whatsoever kind, having no necessary connection with eternal life, which such a hireling question as that of Peter (chap. xix. 27) seeks; and it means precisely the "what" after which that question asked Such a reward the grace and righteousness of God will actually connect with service in the kingdom of God, so that no one shall labor there in vain. Such a portion as is rather of a merely outward kind, as the most direct compensation for any thing that may have been renounced, was spoken of in Mark x. 30. Yet the "promise of this life" which belongs to godliness (1 Tim. iv. 8), includes in it, what must not be overlooked, the internal spiritual enjoyment and reward which all doing of what is good and right carries directly in itself; for also in this sense is Psa. xix. 12 already true, comp. 1 Cor. ix. 18. Who is there that gets harm from following after that which is good (1 Pet. iii. 13), and not rather abundant good? So that those who serve Christ, even with persecutions, and with all manner of afflictions in the world, in the flesh, have yet a better portion than sinners even here. We are by no means to understand a worthless hypocritical self-righteousness in those first who become last, but an actual entering into the calling of God by service and labor, a first laying hold of the promise, apprehended superficially, Do this and live! a promise which leads the humble, who go on to learn in God's school, to blessedness; but which has for the insincere, and those who are eager after rewards, no more than the penny that was bargained for. This penny is very various, but in every case it is exactly that and nothing else at which the striving of the individual aimed. For (as should well be observed) to serve for blessedness as a strict reward, to bargain for the kingdom of heaven as a return for labor—this no one can in truth do, this properly never occurs. Where it seems to occur it will be found that the heart has really meant a Jewish Messiah-kingdom or a Moham-

* To which, strangely enough, there is to be found an analogous saying in the Jerusalem Talmud (see in Lightfoot or Vitringa), although, consistently with Jewish self-righteous feeling, with a different turn at the conclusion: "This one has wrought more in two hours than you the whole day!" Comp. the statements in Döpke (Hermeneutik d. neutest. Schriftsteller, p. 36), but still more exactly in Sepp, ii. 244. The Mohammedan parallel adduced by Trench after Hammer (Theol. Litt. Anz. 1847, p. 252) had certainly its origin in the parable of Christ.

* Rupprecht (Stud. u. Krit. 1847, 2) explains this most groundlessly of a mere command to go away, to leave the presence (as at ver. 4 to labor!). And even in such a departure, that is, from God's countenance, good pleasure, and fellowship, the reward can never be the inheriting of eternal life, named at chap. xix. 29.

† "The point of the parable, therefore, in this Gospel does not lie in the penny, whatever that may be, nor in the distinction of the hours, but in the earning and obtaining—how one may earn the penny." With this in substance agrees what the treatise in Tholuck's Litt. Anz. (1847, p. 275) strangely comes to at last: The denarius has properly no independent interpretation (is therefore nothing at all?), it only expresses what faithful diligence is worth in itself! It appears to us, however, that this says nothing at all; for surely this main feature in the parable must be something.

* In this assertion we are not shaken by the fact that those who have most recently treated the parable are for explaining the penny of eternal life; for their interpretations are truly deficient in the simplicity which would lead to another result. Alford is among those who oppose me, describing the criticism here as "much inferior to his usual remarks;" but I must wait to see whether the second edition, with its more exact references, may more effectually convince him.

medan paradise; always something of the nature of a penny, which, too, he will obtain in so far as it is right and possible, when God at last calls to account. In so far, also, every one receives his penny; the reward in relation to the person and his claim is, in a certain measure, the same for all. Only, we may say, on the other hand, with Dräseke: The same penny is to every one different, according to the hand that receives it, according to the mind that estimates it. Some taste in it from the first a reward of God, a grace and gift of eternal life; others receive it as their reward, as a booty which they have seized; and thus, in their penny, the penny properly so called is lost, it has become by their own fault a mere coin of discharge. "They turn the penny round about in their hand, and know not what they are to make of it." Such persons are represented in the parable to whom it will thus happen in the end; and for such the penny is certainly not eternal life.*

We inquire, further, with reference to the principal feature of the parable, upon which the understanding of the whole depends: What is the day with its twelve hours? How is the earlier and later, the first and last, to be interpreted? If we are at once to say, in order to obviate the other principal error of such an interpretation, that the day is not at all analogous to the period of the world up to the last day—we should speak too hastily by far.† For the parable certainly connects itself, in the first place, with the relation as to time in which the apostles and first disciples of Christ appear—they being the first called at the commencement of the work of the vineyard. But, not only so, there is reflected in it at the same time—looking backwards—the general fundamental relation which is the theme of so many parables; viz., the earlier calling of the Jews with whom God made the covenant of works in form of legal promise, and then the compassion for the Gentiles who were in due time placed on a par with them (Acts xv. 9). To deny entirely this reference and application would be quite as wrong here as it would be to deny it in the parable of the two sons, which is in general cognate with that before us. This is certainly the fundamental type in the background—on which, so to speak, the picture rests—but nothing more; and it is now necessary to observe, that while our Lord sets out from this reference to periods in the world's history, with their earlier and later calls, he immediately again leaves it; so that the parable, as a whole, in its developed form, can by no means be interpreted according to that reference. If, again, the apostles are the first, then, in order to maintain the chronological line from Christ to the judgment, we must take them in connection with the entire first apostolic church. To refer, however, the laborers thus directly to entire nations and churches, instead of individual persons, is in contradiction to the whole moral harmony and tendency of the parable. Nations and contemporaries in respect of calling, are not always of the same character or disposition; least of all does the history of the Christian Church, as a whole, exhibit such a state of things as is here denoted. Father Lambert, indeed, is for understanding it of the first Churches that were called out from the heathen, because they afterwards became proud and envious; that is true, but can it be said of them as a whole that at the first they agreed with Christ in the matter of a reward? Further, can it be said that they actually did the more difficult work—as it is said that they first cleared out the field of the world in order to the planting of the vineyard (which yet was already there)—so that in later times the heat of the conflict became less? In this chronological view we shall no where find what completely corresponds to the features of the parable. Such an interpretation too hastily lays aside the connection with the question of Peter, as also with the saying, quite manifestly referring to individual persons, Many that are first; which, indeed, only correspond to the πᾶς ὅστις (whosoever) before, ver. 29. It would also oblige us to give up all reference of the laborers to such as, like the apostles, serve Christ in the Church by a special office, a reference which, on account of the reasons just given, is predominating though not exclusive. The laborers in the vineyard are, of course, to be distinguished from the stems and branches of the vines; and there is evidently meant here, first of all (without excluding further application), a special call to labor and service, not the general call to salvation: "This special calling is a means to that general one" (Richter's Hausbibel). Further, a systematic chronological interpretation of the day stands too much in the way of the instructive and principal application to the individual Christians of all times; inasmuch as in that case all who live at one period would belong to one hour, and thus the moral point of the whole, so to speak, would be lost. But what if, as we have seen, our Lord only builds, upon the grand typical background of the relation of time between earlier and later calling (as first represented in the relation between the Jews and the Gentiles), a parable which is afterwards differently applied?* We say, first of all, in general, that the whole time of the world is reflected in every period, and repeats itself in every individual life; in order to this meaning, which

* How Alford can say of this eternal life, "To the enviers and grumblers it will be as the fruit which turns to ashes in the mouth"—we confess we cannot comprehend.

† Rupprecht goes too far in his protest against every supposition of Old Testament periods of time, on the ground that all parables respecting the kingdom of God make that kingdom to begin only with Christ. Has he then quite forgotten that the servants were sent to seek fruit from the vineyards before the Son?

* Otherwise expressed: "The difference of hours serves only as a figure for the difference of rank" (Theol. Litt. Anz.).

here comes into prominence in the evident reference to individual persons, we must withdraw our eye from the historical survey of the whole, as Christ himself does, in the particular development of the parable. For, in the first place, it is impossible to show how there can be a continuing to labor on the part of the first till the coming of Christ to judgment;* secondly, in this case all the first would appear as murmuring at last, which is yet far from the meaning of Christ; thirdly, taken in a literally historical view, the penny which was not paid till the evening, must certainly be the participation in the earthly kingdom of Christ, into which, however, as already said, no enviers shall enter. Is then the day to be understood as the lifetime of each individual man? We answer again, as above, that there is some truth in this (for parables in general throw out their light in manifold rays, and are not exhausted by a single fixed sense); but if, with many, we maintain this in a literally historical sense, we shall again miss the true meaning and find contradictions. Not merely, and not as the principal sense, can Christ mean the lifetime of the individual. For, in the first place, it may be said here again that not all who are called in youth are eager for reward, nor are all who are called later in life on that account chosen. Further, the different lifetimes have not all the same beginning and end, they have not a common date of payment; and this is strong enough of itself to limit this chronological view; finally, the preference and precedence of the first, certainly, by no means, refer merely to time. Many a one labors much in a more difficult office than others, bears the heat of the conflict without, while others tarry by the stuff in peace; nay, what is equally to the purpose, many a one is merely first in honor, or moreover, only to his own fancy: I am more, and labor more. What, then, is the day with its hours? No other than a parabolical figurative representation of the relation between first and last existing in all possible forms; certainly, with most immediate reference to time, from which, indeed, the expression "first and last" is derived, but including further all applications to all sorts of precedence, whether founded on truth, appearance, or fancy.

To conclude: this parable, as a whole, in respect to its process of time, is not a chronologically prophetic representation, to be explained in a literally historical manner,† of something that takes place precisely thus (as is the case in other parables; for example the tares and the wheat, the drawing of the net and selecting of the fishes, the casting out of the husbandmen who killed the son, the marriage of the king's son, the ten virgins, the servants with the talents, the great supper)—but a comprehensive figurative representation, taking its rise from the relation of time, but afterwards spiritualized, of something that thus takes place oftentimes and in many ways. The figure brings together and arranges into a totality of impression what is repeated in manifold ways; in such parables, for example, as the building of the house on the rock, the various kinds of ground, the treasure and pearls, the wicked servant, the true and wise servant, the fig-tree in the vineyard, the lost son, the unrighteous householder, Lazarus in Abraham's bosom.*

The point of connection for the parable is no other than the question of Peter: for this reason only those "first" are selected, in ver. 2, who have regard to the reward; and the agreement is as it were an irony coming after the discourse in chap. xix. 27–29. Observe now the different form of the proverbial saying at the beginning and the end, a difference which thus precisely justifies and explains itself. Οἱ ἔσχατοι, οἱ πρῶτοι, "the last," "the first," at the end (with the article) are only to be understood as meaning—those last and first of whom I said at the beginning, many that are first shall be last. For there are certainly first who remain first, and last who remain last. The proposition—all the last become first, and all the first become the last—as if Christ had said this in the οἱ, is in no possible way to be justified.† The difference of disposition between those here represented as first and last, is the principal thing to which the οὕτως ἔσονται, "so shall be," remains applicable.

The limited sphere, then, of the parable is the warning representation of such as are called with a real or seeming preference, and who thereupon do not renounce the eager anxiety for reward—all that is thought to be found in detail beyond this limit is erro-

* Origen fables about the transmigration of souls, according to which the first work on to the end, and even the last have stood idle the whole day (in former bodies)!

† Bengel also cannot quite disengage himself from this misapprehension; and when he understands the space of time comprehended by the parable to be from the first calling of the apostles onwards to the Pentecost, he forgets that, previous to the Pentecost, those who were called had not wrought at all! Chronological fancies respecting the great world-hours are to be found in the Berlenberg Bible, as also in the fathers, according to which the apostles come again at the eleventh hour! Of these Luther said. "Such talk is good for passing the time when one has nothing else to preach." And here, where the parable affords quite different material for preaching, he is quite right.

* In what is here said lies the measure of truth which belongs to the principle laid down by Rudel, that the parables only figuratively represent the last judgment by way of warning; that here, therefore, as a sharp warning, the murmuring disposition which had just been exhibited by Peter, is represented as still the same in future, even at the last judgment (Rudelb. and Guer. Zeitschrift, 1851, 3). Yet we must still reject the consequences which Rudel draws from this view carried to an extreme, as tending to make the historico-dogmatical ground of the parable evaporate into what is merely practical and didactic.

† Although, as it is well known, many (with whom Lisco agrees) have strangely attempted it.

neous. The application, however, to a merely imagined preference is certainly included; for it is in harmony with our Lord's manner to put such conceit to shame by condescending as it were to allow its validity. The object of the parable is finally: First, to detect and put to shame the evil intention; to demonstrate that such a hateful envy lies in the eager anxiety about reward (ver. 15). There is a concealed envy of the favor shown to others; and the saying of the eldest son finds its repetition, alas! even in the circle of the disciples of Christ: "What shall we have therefore?" Beneath this we, there lies hid as its evil motive a secret us in preference to others—which the Lord here brings to light. "This parable hits even excellent people; nay, it terrifies the greatest saints; therefore Christ holds it up before the apostles themselves" (Luther). "How many shining stars have already been struck by the tail of the dragon, and cast down by pride to the earth!" (Rambach). Herberger, rich in anecdote, brings a strikingly illustrative story into his sermon on this text,* which indeed strongly portrays what our Lord here mildly represents, but still corresponds to the reality of the parable.

Secondly, there is then the keen and ever true warning: In such a spirit, thou, now among the first (even thou, Apostle Peter, if it remain in thee, and go on developing itself in thee), mayest at some future time take the reward, and yet lose eternal life—worse than one who is lost, thou mayest remain behind, and without, as a last one in the worst sense (2 John 8). For this is plainly declared by a final climax in the second saying, respecting the called and chosen, which is annexed to the first. Meanwhile let us reflect on this! We shall not at once conclude; but after this general survey consider the details, and thus arrive again at this decisive concluding verse.

Verses 1, 2. God always goes out ἅμα πρωΐ, early in the morning, diligently anticipating those whom he seeks.† At the earliest dawn of the world he began to call such as Enoch and Abraham; long before there was any mention of cultivating a vineyard in the proper sense, had he uttered the word: I am thy reward, walk before me! This is not indeed directly meant here, but, pointing backwards, it is hinted. At all events we learn, from the first word, that it is not caprice on the part of God which calls the late ones so late. Many in preaching from this passage erroneously take pains to show that the compassion of the Lord (for it depends indeed upon this alone, not upon the willing or running of any one) takes effect in some sooner, in others later; and that of this difference in the "hours of grace" we have nothing more to say than, So it seems good in his sight, he has power to do what he will with his own. What truth there is in this is not taught here; the other side rather comes into prominence. If, on the other hand, we refer the first, third, sixth hours, etc., which are selected (with the omission of the intervening ones) to certain terms or epochs in the history of the world, and of an individual lifetime, when the call of grace goes forth more loudly and directly—it is yet to be remembered that the same call also continues to sound through all the intervening times. Those who subsequently went into the vineyard had already been invited in the morning; they knew of the vineyard where work was to be had; and every one that stands at a disadvantage has himself to blame, because he was not there when God called, or disregarded his calling from one hour to another. This is the meaning of the parable, which will also be confirmed by the apparent contradiction in ver. 7. The vineyard may be traced to Isa. v. (and still earlier to the Song of Solomon and Psa. lxxx.), as the similitude retained by Christ to denote God's economy upon earth, his people, his kingdom; the fruit of it is the most excellent, the labor in it is severe and difficult. The laborers correspond indeed in the first place, as we have already seen, to the husbandmen (Matt. xxi. 33); consequently, further, to the apostles and their successors in office in Christendom, of course not precisely according to the outward official title, but according to their divine calling. Yet the word "laborers" warrants further the general application, in so far as, in the vineyard, no one is allowed to remain idle or merely passive. The God who himself alone prepares his people for himself will yet have fellow-workers (1 Cor. iii. 9), as well out of grace as according to that justice which requires a worthiness for his kingdom—a worthiness, however, different from a meritorious claim to reward. Laborers at all events—for although thou art not a gardener, but a branch, thou art yet a living branch, which is not merely the object of cultivation, but in its turn is to bring forth fruit. Hast thou no special commission out of thy house, thou hast at least in thy house (Mark v. 19; Acts xvi. 31), and wherever thou shouldst let thy light shine so as to save others along with thyself. He who entirely neglects the salvation of others will not be likely to attain his own. These are ideas which lie in the background, and do not contradict the main reference to laborers in the more limited sense. Let no one boast of his labor, but praise the rich householder who so kindly cares for the poor; let us know nothing else than what we are wont to say: The gracious Lord hath given me employment. He promises the due reward, the

* A monk died, leaving a great name for sanctity; a robber, who had heard him preach, repented, ran to confess, but fell on the way and broke his neck. A devout man saw both, wept at the death of the saint, but rejoiced at that of the robber. Why so? "When the monk died, the devil took him because of his pride; when the robber broke his neck, angels received his penitent soul."

denarius (which, also in Tacitus, still appears as the usual ample day's wages for working soldiers); but gives infinitely more than this to the faithful who willingly labor for him, and are diligent. But if those who are called at the very first begin distrustfully to ask, How much am I certain to get?—then indeed they are in an evil way, and are to be warned of the unhappy end of such a course.

Verses 3—7. The next, going out at the third hour, πληθούσης ἀγορᾶς, or when the market-place was full (as also ἀγορᾶς πληθώρᾳ occurs), denote precisely the time when the ἀγόραιοι, or gaping idlers, are to be found. So far as this trait taken from man's work can correspond to what is higher, it finely maintains by this interval of three hours the medium between an undue zeal on the Lord's part, leading him to be ever running after laborers as if he needed them, and a neglect that cares not for the people who need him. We see evidently from the whole what is the aim of the master of the vineyard; every expression that might speak of his need is carefully avoided, while, on the other hand, the idleness of the fools is in a kindly manner rebuked. Go ye also into the vineyard—these words presuppose that the others had heard the first calling, or had heard of it; it is spoken of as a thing known; and in the "also," which sets before them the example of those who had gone previously, it is mildly hinted as a fault that they are standing idle. The market place of the world is contrasted with the vineyard of the kingdom of God; the greatest man of business in worldly things is yet only an idle starer, so long as he will not enter upon the true labor, which alone is of any value, which alone brings its reward.* The promise, Whatsoever is right I will give you, contains in the background likewise a hint at the penny, as if it were said—Go ye also (now at least); I will not count the time lost, but give to you also a full day's hire, as is due (only to the others). Or might we say, The Lord himself means by the words only what the reckoners could understand, namely, the part of the penny corresponding to the proportion of hours.† Hardly; if we interpret this in the light of the subsequent development! The indefinite form of the promise implies at the same time even a higher degree of kindness, even more than the first contract, and contains the true answer to the question of Peter, with which every one ought to be satisfied—Only serve the good Lord, it will assuredly do thee no hurt! The later laborers really trust more, they are ashamed of their idleness, and are contented that they are permitted to enter at all. From the ninth hour till the evening, when work ceases, would be once more the same interval of time; but the faithful and good Lord cannot refrain from even yet offering a last term for one last hour. Those whom he now finds are of course somewhat more pointedly rebuked: Why stand ye, why have ye stood all the day idle? Why have ye despised all the former calls, and, as much as in you lies, actually lost the whole day and the last hour, and thus brought a heavy penalty upon yourselves—if ye do not now take what I offer to you? Now there comes an excuse: No one hath hired us! A wonderfully bold speech! seeing that the lord of the vineyard has been calling from early morning, and has now, truly not without justice, charged them with idleness. Christ will certainly represent this excuse as groundless and hypocritical; for before God it will not be held valid. In the eye of man it indeed appears otherwise; we say rightly of many, Ah, if they had only been called earlier! No one has invited them, education has been wanting, they have been surrounded with bad company, perhaps even those who should have worked favorably upon their souls have been false teachers and destroyers. When such a one is called, i. e., when first he distinctly hears the divine call, it is even natural for himself to think—No one has hitherto hired me; now, for the first time, light rises upon me. But when the light shines more clearly, and the call sinks deeper into his heart, he will no longer thus justify his cause, but rather take blame to himself. He will see and acknowledge that God called him even from the first, that he went out of the way of him who called when he saw him coming—in short, that the blame lies on himself alone. Only the poor heathen (in that first reference from which the parable started) may, with any semblance of right, still excuse themselves; no baptized and confirmed Christian, no man amongst us who has learned the ten commandments, and the Lord's prayer, or has ever heard a church bell, will be able to say—No one has hired or invited me! Still, in order to teach us that God's goodness will certainly do injustice to no one who might in any measure be able to excuse himself, Christ frames the parable so as to make the householder kindly overlook the pretext almost as if he admitted its force; and in the promise, which to the last is the same, only slightly touches the conscience: "Go ye also into the vineyard. i. e., like those who have already gone; as ye know that I have often already thus called at the market place. Why, then, have ye disregarded the call?" Thus does God, in his abounding goodness, call kindly to the last; he calls the people only not to remain idle; and those here represented as last are such as enter upon the work merely from shame, which at length seizes them, and without much asking about the hire. They feel, indeed, what their idleness even to the last hour has deserved, and that if they are allowed to work at all it is only of grace; they trust the good Lord, and are far from thinking—The day of labor is now almost as good as past, there will be no wages for the last hour. We learn here, also, that even for the last hour there may be a superabundant recompense. The eleventh hour is still a precious hour of grace. To many it is evidently the last solemn hour of decision; while, to us all, it is at least uncertain at every call whether our last hour may not have come.

* This is precisely what Rupprecht means when he finds here a designation of those "who, in reference to the kingdom of heaven, have yet done nothing." Why then should the market, as "the place where the idle people stand," not signify the world? Let us not, after modern fashion, be too nice in determining biblical, parabolical representations!

† As the Jews (see Lightfoot. Horæ Talmud.) pay differently the שְׂכִיר יוֹם and שְׂכִיר שָׁעוֹת—those who are hired by the day, and by the hour.

Verses 8–11. Every one who will receive wages must work, though it be only one hour; but the labor does not continue always; at the longest it lasts only one day, which is followed by the evening when all labor closes. That, in paying the laborers, the Lord gives orders to begin at the last, signifies in the first place—Give ample payment in general without respect and distinction! Then, however, from consideration of the laborers, and knowledge of their state of mind, he already, in his wisdom, sums all up in two classes, last and first; although there are, so to speak, five different gradations; it is supposed that all represent themselves either presumingly as first, or humbly as last. But since what pleases the Lord is only the humility which he would test and prove, in order afterwards to reward with something much better than the penny, he inverts the false order of precedence set up by his people; he already prophetically intimates what is to happen, by giving the last the first place, and the first the last; but he enjoins, at the same time, that as regards the penny no one, from the beginning to the end, is to be omitted. The diligence and zeal of these last here, who receive the whole day's hire, is, moreover, self-evident; and, so far, what they get is really due to them, according to the alone valid claim of grace. "So in our own times it has been maintained by a rationalistic theology (in a thoroughly Jewish spirit), that the sinner can never repair the neglect of which he has been guilty in the period before his conversion; the loss of time follows the converted person, even into eternity, in an irreparable abridgment of his happiness. But this parable seems framed with a special view of overthrowing such a delusion.* It belongs precisely to the majesty of grace that it can restore to the sinner from the bosom of its eternity even the time that, without it, would be irrecoverably lost" (Lange). Yes; even on our side, a certain truth subjectively corresponds to this, because it may be said, "A single true faithful moment and an entire lifetime, the right true earnest will and the act, are, according to the scale of eternal grace, the same" (Schubert). The faithful first ones of the right stamp know that full well, and do not vex themselves with envy. But others are here represented who murmur. They are called absolutely the first, and not, in express antithesis to the last, those that were hired early in the morning; for the intermediate laborers, who came at the third and sixth hour, may reckon themselves comparatively among the first (compare chapter xxv. 10, "those who were ready"—leaving it quite undetermined whether it applied to any of the foolish virgins). Suffice it to say, that what exactly fulfills the contract now appears to them to be not just, and this merely through comparison with the others; if these others get a penny, even for their hour, they foolishly think that they must receive more, at least a penny for every hour they had worked. It is an evil circumstance that instead of expressing thanks they murmur at the very time they are receiving their wages; but it is still worse that they murmur against the householder, whose bountiful goodness they have just witnessed, but without feeling and joy because that goodness was shown towards others! Here we have selfishness and envy in all its hateful nakedness! If the others had only received a farthing, then they would have been content! Hateful, most hateful!

Verses 12–15. And yet the spirit which Christ here brings to light, in the insolent words of the pretendedly first, is to be found in the hearts of all who are intent on reward, and filled with self-righteousness. They look proudly down on "these last," without knowing what was in their heart; they place themselves in lofty comparison with them, and daringly accuse the gracious householder of being unjust. Observe here the ἐποίησαν and ἐποίησας, the echo of the same work, which cannot be translated. The first ἐποίησα, is thoroughly in the calculating sense: these have earned, deserved, wrought an hour's wages. They themselves have borne the burden of the day, and the heat (τὸν καύσωνα, the scorching wind)—the labor properly so called, and, in addition to this, the fatigue from without (Gen. xxxi. 40); but with all this they have done no more than was due from them, no more than they knew before they would have to do. Viewed more deeply—though the parable could only indicate it—the Lord might well have replied to them, Are ye then become so bitter? How unwillingly, then, have ye labored!* But the house-

* [The doctrine which the author here combats, must be distinguished from the evangelical position, that on the one hand, those converted late in life can only make up by unusual diligence the attainments that would have been theirs by an earlier devotion of themselves to God, and on the other, that mere length of time, irrespective of diligence, does not argue a corresponding growth in grace.—Am. Ed.]

* Luther gives the following turn to this part of the parable: "The day and the heat must be understood not of the time, but with reference to the conscience; therefore as signifying, that the legally righteous go through great and heavy labor, i. e., they go through it with a burdened conscience and an unwilling heart." Lange: "The labor has become hard to them, the burden and heat of the holder, who was good to the idle ones that sought to excuse themselves, continues to be kind even to these; he addresses them in a way that might shame them, as if he actually needed to justify himself. To one among them "who was more ungracious than the rest" (as Bahrdt once expressed it)—we conceive this must be Peter, the spokesman; the spirit, which he showed a little while before, being exhibited in its natural consequence—he addresses words which first fill up the measure of goodness; but which, on that account, all the more keenly pierce. His payment is given to him; but with it the ὕπαγε, go thy way. The Lord condescendingly places himself, as it were, on a level with the servant; yet this friendly ἑταῖρε (good friend) has in it an essential tone of irony.* I do thee no wrong, I give thee what is thine; consider only, thou hast already received it.† If we go beyond the limits of the parable, (whither it is designed to draw us, even in its very limitation, as every parable properly does), the Lord might say: Even were I now to withhold from thee what is "thine" on account of thy murmuring, and to give it to that one (as chap. xxv. 28, 29), I should still do thee no wrong! He says, however, only: I will be gracious—I will give to this one who is last of all, τοὐτῳ τῷ ἐσχάτῳ, the same as to thee. He who has not labored at all, who has rejected my last call, receives indeed nothing at all but the punishment of the self-willed idlers at another term of payment; but this one deserves his wages, in my view, even more than thou; therefore am I good to him, while I must be angry with thee. (David's booty was to be divided even among those who remained by the stuff—is not this the custom and law in Israel, since 1 Sam. xxx. 25?) Art thou, then, a true servant if thou wilt prescribe to thy lord? Is my good will to yield to thy evil will, so that it is not permitted to me to be gracious? Wilt thou forbid me? Be ashamed! Even what I have just called τὸ σόν (what is thine) remains still ἐν τοῖς ἐμοῖς (with my own), and that I gave thee work was only an act of my grace and kindness! I do wrong to no one, not to thee, who art to learn the true suum cuique in the apparent inequality. For hirelings such as thou, enviers such as thou, I can have no further use in my house and vineyard, for I will have real ἑταίρους, friends, who understand and learn my mind, who are happy in my goodness; only for this have I called you all, not for the sake of the work. Is thine eye *evil when, and because, I am good? With this keen question, in which every thing is said, he is dismissed and now stands without, eternally envious at the happiness of the last, which he, as first, has forfeited—if indeed this final judgment does not throw him down on his knees in deepest shame, and make him pray: O Lord forgive me, and receive me yet as the unworthiest and the last.

Verse 16. The entire parable—with the saying from which it sets out, and which it is meant to interpret—leaves still undecided whether the result in the case of all such first ones is that they absolutely remain without.† But that the parable with its warning is intended to reach thus far, is immediately proved by the second saying which is subjoined to it; in which a step is taken beyond the sphere of the parable, or rather in which by keeping fast hold of the ὕπαγε, it first receives the deepest interpretation of its meaning. The direct inference is: Therefore, i. e., by the fault of their own evil disposition—and hence justly—those first whom I mean and have here denoted shall become last.‡ This, however, day is what they chiefly remember in looking back upon it." Very good, but we do not understand how the same Lange can yet make out that these people are saved; but that they are "more legal, more calculating natures, whose capacity for blessedness is not of wide compass." We confess not to be able to find a place for these comparatives under our alternative, according to the analogy of Rom. xi. 6.

* Roos understands it as "seriously meant and with a tone of alienation"—but how so? It must in that case (which cannot be proved) have been a common form of address, like our "good friend!" Non vocabulum benevolentiæ et amicitiæ, sed notitiæ, as Herberger cites; but how do we know that? See again Matt. xxvi. 50.

† That (according to Steffensen) these grumblers who were first had contemptuously let the penny lie untouched, is certainly not true. Therefore neither will it do to explain the meaning thus: "If they took it (even now when advised to do so) repentingly, then at that very moment from being πρῶτοι they became ἔσχατοι; but if they refused to take it, then it was just their pretended merit that was to blame for their losing the reward intended for them." Against this we quote the words of Munchmeyer in opposition to Besser: "It is said here in words too plain and unambiguous to be misunderstood: The first received also each his penny; and when they received it (therefore took it, had taken it), they murmured against the householder" (Luther. Zeitschrift, 1851, 4).

* עַיִן רָע of envy, Prov. xxiii. 6, comp. xxii. 9.

† And in this sense might be said, what Herberger suggests in the wrong place, between vers. 14 and 15, that "here the parable ceases."

‡ "As regards the parable, it is self-evident that all the first in it become last, as it was intended only to show by an example how the first might become last, and the last first; therefore it was not necessary to speak of any exception in the story of the parable. Hence, also, the saying at ver. 16 is different only in words, by no means in sense, from chap. xix. 30; it is used here precisely because it connects so closely with the parable, in which only such first as actually became last are spoken of. and vice versa." In this Rupprecht agrees with Steffensen, who, in like manner, says rightly: "Thus, as is represented in the parable, shall the last, i. e., all who esteem themselves last, be reckoned, before God, or with respect to the inheritance of eternal life, as first; while the first, i. e., all who think themselves first, shall be last before God. For election, or being saved, is by no means given with the calling; he who has actually been called to

does not stand first, but again, in order graciously to recommend humility, it is—The last shall be first! In this has Christ joy, this is what we are rather to keep before us. Scarcely, however, is this said, than there follows, by a closely connecting for, the very difficult saying about the called and chosen, which chap. xxii. 1–14 explains clearly by a new parable. As in that parable those who are called in vain consist partly of such as do not come at all—such as despise the call—partly of those who come falsely, who venture to the wedding-table in their own garments, with still greater contempt of the royal robe of honor—so here the κλητοί (which imports more than merely κεκλημένοι, chap. xxii. 3–8) are such as really enter into covenant and labor, make a beginning in the service of God (not indeed in a pure spirit), but who are afterwards found to be not worthy, not able to stand the test. And certainly in this parable they are the rejected, the not-blessed; by no means (as Lange laboriously argues) the less blessed, having less capacity of blessedness. So much, however, is clear and certain—as from the two parables here and at chap. xxii., so further, from the whole Scripture—that it is not God's arbitrary decree which makes the ἐκλεκτούς, or "elect," but that every one who is called can, and may, and should himself make sure the election thereby offered to him (Rom. xi. 28, 29; 2 Pet. i. 10). Chosen—this is the last admonishing word of the parable, in which it sounds forth its full meaning and aim; this is the thorn which it would leave in our hearts. Few shall in the end come off as chosen—this is what Christ says here, as every where, from Matt. vii. 13, 14. (The many last who shall be first is quite consistent with this as spoken in a different relation altogether.) Few, that is, in comparison with the multitude of the rejected, of the last, or those who remain behind in the worst sense. That, even among these rejected ones, there will be such as long served sourly and discontentedly for the penny, and receive this too, but do not receive, in and with this penny, eternal life—this is most undeniably the mighty warning truth which was here to be testified. This truth, and with it the whole parable, is completely mistaken by those who so interpret as to find in ver. 16 only this, that in the kingdom of God there will, in the end, be no difference between the first and the last! This entirely mistaken idea Rudel at last, with well-meaning ingenuity, carries to a climax when he says: "The first in heaven will also be last, and the last first, according as it is viewed!" This is to corrupt and pervert the clear text by over-acuteness. The truth is this: God will regard all who, up to the period of decision, have not renounced their envious eagerness for reward, as not belonging to his heaven; and having paid them with their (in that case perishable) reward, will reject them.

THIRD ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUFFERINGS—ANSWER TO THE TWO SONS OF ZEBEDEE.

(Matt. xx. 18–28; Mark x. 33–45; Luke xviii. 31–33.)

The indiscreet request of the two disciples for places of honor, preferred at so unseasonable a time (τότε, ver. 20), just when Christ is again prophesying of his sufferings, gives him occasion to address a proper reply to the two disciples; and, in like manner, again more specifically to tell the other ten what properly the fact of his going before through suffering to glory had already intimated. Thus arises again a connected testimony concerning the way to honor through lowliness, to greatness through humility (as in chap. xviii.), or concerning the true relation between lowliness and greatness in the kingdom of God. First of all there is the great truth which, for the disciples as for us all, is so hard to be admitted, the fundamental principle of the kingdom, universally valid alike for the Head and the members, viz., through suffering to glory (Luke xxiv. 26). Christ himself voluntarily goes before in this way (vers. 18, 19), and his disciples are at liberty to go by no other. Their over-curious inquiry after another way here especially presents itself in the form of an ambitious, grasping desire after special glory above others, ver. 21. Our Lord rebukes the want of understanding which does not connect with that glory the sufferings of the Forerunner, those sufferings not yet being understood—and then points out the only true way, vers. 22, 23. The general fellowship in the sufferings of Christ belongs to all, and leads also to the general fellowship in his glory; special preference, however, is no matter of arbitrary distribution before the time, but of the eternal decree in which it is prepared for the individuals who are to receive it. What, therefore, is the principle which for the present obtains in the kingdom of Christ? It is only this—in serving consists true ruling, in humility true greatness! In opposition to the twofold principle in the kingdoms of this world, namely, to rule by the use of power, and by greater power to exalt oneself above others (ver. 25)—comes here the similar, twofold fundamental principle of the kingdom of Christ for his followers (vers. 26, 27)—whom salvation may lose the election by proud self exaltation."

he indeed goes before as the highest example in the renunciation of his power and honor, in the giving up of himself for many. Thus, at ver. 28, the conclusion of the discourse again returns to the beginning of the intimation concerning his sufferings.

Verses 18, 19. This was now the third open prediction which our Lord made of his sufferings, since that which occurred at Cesarea Philippi; and it was followed by only one more last anounncement, two days before the Passover (chap. xxvi. 2). Already (previous to what is here recorded) had the raising of Lazarus taken place; the enmity of Jerusalem —of the "Jews" who were represented in that word—had risen to an official decree of murder; the great conflict of the Holy One with sinners—from which, according to the prophecy of the high priest, was to issue the saving, atoning death of the One for all—approached its crisis. The Captain and Forerunner of our salvation goes before, resolved upon the way of suffering; this Mark, ver. 32, prophetically indicates by selecting the expression ἦν προάγων αὐτούς, "he went before them"—or rather, he records his literal walking before them at that time, as a specific expression and symbol of his going before them in the way of suffering. To his he adds, quite as significantly, that the disciples were amazed; they were filled with astonishment and anxiety at the Master's courage in going to death (comp. John xi. 16); and were afraid for themselves who were to follow him—who now actually followed him with such fear.* Upon this he stands still, calls the hesitating ones encouragingly to him (Mark πάλιν, again, as at chap. ix. 31), and begins again, expressly and without concealment, to tell them the things that were about to happen with all particularity of detail. This he must do as a testimony that he knew it beforehand as the Father's counsel according to the Scripture, and that he freely undertook it—as a gracious provision that the weak ones, when now it is about to take place, may not entirely lose heart and confidence in him—and to point to the fact of his leading the way upon which his disciples are to follow him. He names Jerusalem, in which place, and no where else, his suffering is ordained and prepared to take place (Luke xiii. 33); and in the "we" he again indicates what he had often before declared, and is shortly afterwards again to declare, that they too are to follow him, and have fellowship with him in this. For the rest, his words are only a more exact and detailed repetition of what is said at chap. xvi. 21, xvii. 22, 23, in which latter passage we have already noticed the twofold delivering up which is here mentioned. Here it is not merely to be killed, but to be judicially condemned to death—not merely to be delivered up to "men," but to the Gentiles, the Romans, who as opposed to the Jews, represented the whole Gentile world. The πολλὰ παθεῖν, "suffer many things," is carried out into its most significant details: the being mocked, in which his kingly honor is made a ground of ignominy (in Luke ὑβρισθήσεται, as explaining what severity of wanton ill-treatment was involved in this act of mockery, in Mark and Luke there is also the consummated ignominy of being spit upon); then the being scourged, following in all legal form, and the being crucified; in which lie most properly his sufferings of flesh, in their pain and anguish even to the *death. All is in succession, just as it happened during the last three days; and for the third time also is announced the rising again on the third day! Luke preserves the important additional clause which points in all this to the fulfillment of the Scripture: All things that are written of the Son of Man by the Holy Ghost in the prophets† shall and must be accomplished; consequently, before his glory his sufferings must be fulfilled (which fools cannot find or read in the Scripture)—the one as certainly as the other. Of his being mocked, spit upon, and scourged, it is plainly written in Isa. l. 6. Of the cross the Scripture spoke in types, such as the brazen serpent, and other ways of which we are not now called to speak particularly. Of his being delivered up to the Gentiles we may read in the עֲדַת מְרֵעִים, "the assembly o. the wicked," Psa. xxii. 16;‡ and in other places, perhaps, if our eyes were opened rightly to read.

Luke says, without tautology, very emphatically, "But they understood none of these things;" i. e., from want of understanding and unwillingness of heart, they could and would

* Ἀκολουθοῦντες ἐφοβοῦντο can hardly mean merely, on the way they became ever more afraid! Ἀκολουθεῖν has like προάγειν more significance here.

* How Lange (ii. 3, 1148) finds here "three fundamental forms of temporal death, every preceding one of which ought rightly to exclude that which follows," I do not understand. Was not the scourging the beginning of the crucifixion "according to human law?" What reason was there why one who had been mocked must not also be judged or condemned? Braune observes more correctly the gradation in this trilogy: First, the being mocked, as the comparatively gentle beginning (although, along with the being spit upon, it was already severe enough); then the bodily ill-usage (according to law); then the shameful death.

† The Dat. τῷ υἱῷ not to be construed with τελεσθήσεται, (fulfilled in him), but written, prescribed, ordained for him; properly and precisely pointing to him, so that he should look upon himself in the light of what is thus written, and accommodate himself to it.

‡ In which case what was said in my commentary on this Psalm is retracted; since עֲדָה may be used by catachresis, and the מְרֵעִים may indicate the ἀνόμους in the proper sense, with whom the προσπηγνύναι, Acts ii. 23, is connected quite as directly as at Psa. xxii., the כָּאֲרִי; which refers to this, notwithstanding the objections of recent expositors.

understand nothing of these things, nothing of this matter; therefore was the whole ῥῆμα, the entire saying, hid from them, i. e., its particular words, plain as they were.* A proof of this is immediately furnished in the request of the two sons of Zebedee, who now too hastily catch at the rising again which was before missed, and whose inquiry seems to emanate from the spirit and views of the disciples denoted in Luke xix. 11. What wavering hither and thither between affrighted horror at the sufferings and inquisitive grasping at the glory—because they could not understand both in their connection! The question here presents itself whether it was the mother of the sons of Zebedee (of the father we know nothing further, but the mother's name, according to Matt. xxvii. 56, Mark xv. 40, was Salome) who preferred the request, or the sons themselves. Here, of course, the more exact account of Matthew is to be preferred; and Mark, who generally abridges, only conceives of them as having spoken through the medium of their mother, just as in Matthew also Christ addresses the sons in his reply. It was then, at all events, their request; but it may still be asked whether the thought originated with her. This is certainly probable, as she takes the lead in the speech; the sons had become only less bold, not wiser, by the instructions they had received from the Master (chap. xviii. 1; xix. 30). The question came from the mother, and sprung originally from flesh and blood; but it found its echo in the flesh and blood of the children. For, as Luther's marginal gloss, which almost every one cites, here runs—"the flesh is always for becoming glorious ere it is crucified, exalted ere it is humbled." John, at least, is perfectly satisfied now, as always, with the thought of retaining the nearest place beside his Lord in glory; and in that case it is no matter to him whether it be on the right hand or the left. Did the mother—whose "these my two sons" affords so true a specimen of those maternal wishes and maternal demands, in which self is transferred to the children—think here of the preference already given to the two disciples with Peter (who is now to fall behind them, and be separated from them?) or did she think of the surname sons of thunder, which had been given to them (Mark iii. 17)—or of her own special claim as one who had constantly followed Christ (Mark xv. 41)—or of her relationship to him (certainly unauthenticated) as the sister of Joseph, his foster-father?* All this we do not know, and it would be of little consequence if we did know it; we are to look upon it in the same light in which our Lord did, as in any case an expression and example of a forward ambition on the part of his disciples. Not content with each having one of the twelve thrones, chap. xix. 28 (something like the thrones of the house of David, Psa. cxxii. 5), these two disciples will even have seats on the right hand and on the left! There is something praiseworthy, notwithstanding, in the frankness, as also in the humility, which, with all the pride of the wish, marks the prayer (Mark, δὸς ἡμῖν, give us); and in the strong faith which would even now have exchanged any place of honor in the presence of Herod or Cæsar for fellowship with Christ; which so confidently reckons on the approaching glory of him who was now humbled; and which recognizes the allotment of highest dignity and power as dependent on one word of his pleasure (εἰπὲ ἵνα καθίσωσιν). There yet remains enough of what is evil in the motive that dictated the wish. There was wanting to it only the bold temerity of assigning to themselves these places of honor on the right hand and the left—in which case the Lord would have much more sharply rebuked it than in his kindness he at first does. True, he afterwards, in terms of rebuke, rejects those who seek to be first; but his answer begins in milder terms—Ye know not what ye ask. At the very outset he addresses to them the question which is amplified in the somewhat different representation of Mark (ver. 36), What wilt thou? What will ye? Very improperly—and not so modestly as Bathsheba in 1 Kings ii. 20, with her "one small petition"†—is Christ here required to promise beforehand the indefinite whatsoever. This he never does in such cases; first we must distinctly ask, and then he applies the truth to our want of understanding, and corrects it.

Verses 22, 23 We always, properly speaking, know not what we ask, so long as it is not the Holy Spirit who teaches us to ask (Rom. viii. 26). We understand not the Lord's prayer which is on our lips; the ignorance of the flesh, and the pride of our own spirit, ever secretly pray: "Give thy kingdom to us, let us become something special in thy kingdom!" when we ought simply to say, "Let thy kingdom come to us all upon earth!" In this

* Only a little differently from Lange (Stud. u. Krit. 1839. i. 44), who would understand by ῥῆμα the "whole matter which remained an enigma to them." He afterwards (in Leben Jesu, i. 257) repeats this, but at last (ii. 3, 1148) comes to my interpretation, viz., "the meaning of the saying." Hamann (i. 484) distinguishes between τὸ ῥῆμα and τὰ λεγόμενα—"what he said and what he would give them to understand." So also Sepp: "And they could not comprehend what he would thereby say"—which then, at all events, would be no mere tautological amplification." Less successful appears to us, on the other hand, Alford's exegesis of the οὐδὲν τούτων: Neither the suffering nor the resurrection—for in the ταῦτα there is no separation.

* According to an ancient supposition. The newest hypothesis of Wieseler, which makes Salome to be the sister of Jesus' mother, we shall by and by set aside (on John xix. 26, 27, the third Word from the Cross).

† Although (as Braune observes) the request of Bathsheba may be compared with that here preferred by the disciples in this, that when one is not sure of his case he desires the promise beforehand.

general sense of the first word of sad and gentle rebuke lies a more definite application to the two disciples: Ye know, understand, and consider not what belongs to the becoming great and glorious in my kingdom; and that while ye are thinking only of special pre-eminence in honor, ye have, in asking for this, ignorantly asked for special pre-eminence in ignominy and pain (such places as those of the thieves who were crucified along with Christ, as Lange supposes that Christ has these in his mind here)—for this is the real relation in which these things stand to each other. In general, all glory to be attained in my kingdom is preceded by the condition of suffering; and as regards this there arises the serious question, Can and will ye also have this? Is it not true, also, that in merely human relations every honor has its burden? "Might not the possessors of those honors that are most coveted and striven after upon earth, say to those who envy or desire them, Can ye bear the duties and cares, the appendage that inseparably connects itself with this enjoyment?"* There are royal cups of all sorts, difficult baptisms, or consecrations and preparations for high rank (Prov. xv. 33). Here however, our Lord speaks of a cup and a baptism which are indispensable in order to glory, as for himself, so also for all his followers and friends. Even although, in Matthew, the second clause about the baptism (which, however, Mark also indisputably has) were a later interpolation, it would still be merely the proper restoration of an omission. Christ certainly said both; for the cup and baptism together form two ideas mutually supplementary. The baptism in this double idea is even the more distinctively important, is the decisive thing, and that which is so significantly referred to in the whole subsequent doctrine of the apostles and the discipline of the Church. To drink the cup—is said chiefly of the beginning made by the Forerunner; baptism applies chiefly to us who follow in his fellowship.

It is not then as if the baptism were intended to indicate only a greater measure of sufferings to be poured out on him; for, in opposition to this, it might be affirmed with a certain truth, that the cup in Gethsemane, as the crisis of resolution, was more severe to the Redeemer than the consummation of the baptism on Calvary. But both are essentially the same sufferings viewed in a different aspect. First of all, the cup points to something that is to be inwardly tasted or experienced; while the baptism denotes the same thing as also overpowering us from without. Consequently, the former expresses rather the personal undertaking of a resolute voluntary obedience, i. e., precisely the drinking; hence the expression is afterwards retained especially to denote the alone perfect obedience of the Forerunner. The latter speaks rather of the imposed necessity of patient endurance, of the being baptized (as in no possible sense can any one baptize himself); hence, again, this expression passes over to us, although, in Luke xii. 50, Christ thus designates the holy Δεῖ (necessity) imposed upon himself as the decree of the Father.* Finally, as the cup points backward to the ordaining will of the Father, so there lies in the baptism a hint pointing forwards to the not remaining under the water, to the coming forth and rising again. It is, therefore, the second idea—that of baptism—which first completes the sense of the whole: viz., that of renewing consecration, a previous putting off of what is old, in order to a power and authority granted only in this way (Luke xii. 49, 50). Both expressions are drawn from a profound knowledge of Scripture symbols; the former, especially, is found in manifold anticipation throughout the Old Testament. No where does Scripture allude to a cup of poison or medicine to be drunk; but the origin of the figure is to be sought in passages such as Psa. xi. 6, מְנָת כּוֹסָם, "the portion of their cup;" Psa. xvi. 5, מְנָת־חֶלְקִי וְכוֹסִי, "the portion of my lot and my cup;" according to which a share of the repast is allotted and handed to any one. We then find in the Old Testament mention made of various cups; of a salutary cup of suffering, of a cup of fury, and—of a cup in which both of these ingredients are in a certain measure united. When it is said in Isa. li. 17, that Jerusalem has drunk at the hand of the Lord of the cup of his fury, the cup of trembling, and forthwith is restored as a holy and glorious Zion (chap. lii. 1)—this, according to the profound import and connection of the prophecy of Isaiah, is precisely that cup of suffering and of the cross which all the people of God, whose head Christ is, must drink, and to which all the typical and preparatory sufferings of Israel belong (Psa. lx. 5–7). This is always a כּוֹס יְשׁוּעוֹת, a cup of salvation, which is to be viewed as a benefit, a saving disciplinary correction from the Lord (Psa. cxvi. 12, 13), a מוּסַר שָׁלוֹם, the chastisement of peace (Isa. liii. 5), which finally issues only in salvation. In opposition to this stands the cup of anger and rejection, which neither Christ drinks nor his followers, but the unbelieving and condemned (Psa. lxxv. 9; Ezek. xxiii. 31; Rev. xiv. 10). Yet there is also in the cup of grace a taste of the salutary judicial anger, of the fury that burns hotly against sin—this was exhibited in Christ; as it is still in his followers; and as it is also in rejected Israel (and this is a biblical idea of fundamental importance in order to the understanding of Isaiah and all the prophets), which continues to present, against its knowledge and will, a final historical type of its Messiah.

* Nitzsch's sermon on this text (third Selection); in which, with great acuteness, he interprets its universal application, and shows that the Saviour knew how to cure his disciples of ambitious wishes.

* Which parallel passage refutes Braune's otherwise unfounded distinction—that the cup was given to Christ specially by the Father, but the baptism brought upon him by men.

It is for this that they live as a people, that they may repeat in themselves on a large scale the sufferings of Christ under wrath and desertion; until, at the appointed time, they turn again, as is written in Rom. xi. 15, from the same point of view. Hence we so often read in the Old Testament of a bitter potion, and a grievous cup on account of sin (Jer. viii. 14, ix. 15), in which there is yet, at the same time, a gracious visitation; hence we read so often of a similarity between the judgment of Israel and the judgment of the heathen (Jer. xxv. 15–29; comp. Ezek. ix. 6; 1 Pet. iv. 17; 1 Sam. iv. 21, 22), which yet is no similarity; for Jerusalem awakes again, and its sufferings, through fellowship with Christ's atoning sufferings, become sufferings of restoration. We may perceive at least, from these hints, to what a pervading symbolical usage in the prophetical writings Christ's words here point back, when he speaks of his sufferings as a cup to be drunk; when he thereby discloses that he will take upon himself all that sinful man, all that Israel, has to suffer in order to salvation (not their final condemnation); that fundamentally in himself the truth is to be confirmed and essentially fulfilled—that the cup of wrath is to become a cup of salvation. And thus we may observe that even the cup points to the new blessing and the new life, of which the baptism more distinctly speaks.

For this second word (which is not to be associated with the idea of a "fire-baptism" of suffering; for in Matt. iii. 11, it is the fire of the Holy Ghost, and in Luke xii. 49, 50, the water evidently stands opposed to it) the point of departure lies in the figure and example of floods that drown (Psa. xlii. 7, lxix. 2. cxxiv. 4). As the drinking of the cup is a painful suffering, a tasting of the zeal of God's holiness against the sin of the world, so this suffering consummates itself as a suffering of death (Heb. ii. 9) in the baptism; for, to be baptized is to go down and die. Upon this fundamental signification the command of God to John made the baptism of repentance to rest; in which the principal thing is by no means the cleansing, which only comes in addition, but the typified dying of the old man. This first type more nearly approximates to its truth when Christ himself, who is to baptize with spirit and fire, i. e., life and power, first goes down into Jordan, into the water of death, in order to show how it becomes him to fulfill all righteousness for us, and us in him. What, however, is here as yet only a prophesying symbol, becomes a reality in his death upon the cross. The cross of Christ, in the full sense of the word, is his baptism, which now becomes ours; and in this fellowship of his sufferings and dying we too drink all of his cup. What our Lord says to the sons of Zebedee contains the kernel and germ of all the apostolic doctrine, as expressed, for example, in Rom. vi., and gives the inmost signification of the two sacraments of his Church, by which it is incorporated and united with him (1 Cor. xii. 13). In our case, indeed, it is in the inverted order: Christ alone began by his absolutely drinking of the cup, before that cup became baptism to him: we, on the contrary, must first enter into the fellowship and communication of his baptism, before we can have the right and the power to drink of his cup in voluntary faith. "Ye shall drink of my cup," etc.—in these words we are not to seek any special prophecy of special martyrdom in the case of John and James,* but must understand them thus: Ye shall indeed drink, as it is appointed to all; but, as to special honors and preferences, the matter is different from what ye imagine. Let all false dogmatic teaching which satisfies itself with the formal imputation of the sufferings of Christ, without a real entering into the fellowship with him, ask how it can dispose of the Redeemer's former saying about his cross being intended for all, from which what he here says of his cup and his baptism is, in like manner, to be explained as intended for all—not to speak of the entire doctrine of the apostles on this point. Only this remains as a settled and highly important truth: I drink first, I am first baptized; ye can drink only by the strength that has been gained, the right that has been won, by him who has gone before, and has opened up the way.

Can ye? This question requires, therefore, a twofold answer. As thou, Lord, in our own strength—never! But faith in him who has said, Ye shall drink and be baptized—answers with a joyful and trembling We can. The Yes of the disciples here is not yet this latter, for it anticipates ere Christ has decided, and is also for the most part to be understood only from Luke xviii. 34. It may be very much doubted whether, as Meyer thinks, they understood the figure literally, in its good sense, of the cup and basin of the king used at meals (Luke xxii. 30; Mark vii. 4); for, as Olshausen rightly observes, the testing question, Can ye, indicated not an honor, but something hard and difficult connected with the honor. Their answer is, taking the most favorable view of it, to be compared with the well-meant ignorant promise of Peter (John xiii. 37); if, indeed, the intensity of their regard for the places of honor did not prompt them to answer, We can, almost without thought, at all hazards. Further, there still lies in the background, as a tacit pre-supposition, the intermediate sentence—Then shall ye all also sit, rest, and reign with me; ye shall all participate with me in the glory which shall follow the suffering. Not merely, Ye twelve on your twelve thrones; but, as the apostolic doctrine

* To which view Lange still adheres; he further remarks on the not less but rather greater participation of John in the inward sympathetic experience of the suffering and dying of Christ. We understand, throughout, only the general participation of all Christians. As Koitsch sings, in his classical hymn, "O source of life;" and in the 6th verse—For all who drink with thee of the cup which thou hast drunk in suffering here, shall there eternally rejoice with thee.

rns (Rom. viii. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12; 1 Pet. i. 11, v. 1; 1 John iii. 2), and as Christ in the last revelation actually promises to every one who has opened the door to him, and has overcome: To him will I give to sit with me on my throne (Rev. iii. 21). This latter is the strongest expression, denoting a degree of honor beyond which no other expression goes —and yet from the relative character of all human symbolical phraseology, even in the holy Scriptures, this expression does not exclude the fact, that in the general participation in the glory of Christ there are special degrees and honors. This Christ acknowledges here, and speaks, as the sons of Zebedee have spoken, of sitting on his right hand and on his left. We doubt whether he thereby confirms the supposition that two of the disciples would actually be thus distinguished; and should prefer to understand that he merely adopts from their prayer the words which he uses in his answer: What ye imagine and represent by these places of honor, i. e., special honor, and dignity above others in general. Of this he now testifies by a twofold antithesis: This belongs not to me, but to the Father; this comes not from my giving, but from the Father's preparing. Not mine to give—of course, in the sense of the petition, not mine now as Son of Man, inasmuch as I myself am yet in lowliness, and yet in the way of suffering; and not according to the way and manner of men in earthly kingdoms, into which there might enter partiality and caprice. The δοῦναι (to give) of the answer corresponds to the δὸς ἡμῖν (give to us) of the question: Therefore it does not belong to me to give, it certainly does not belong to you to require or to ask it! The ἡτοίμασται, for whom it is prepared, points to the ground of the special destination, endowment, calling, equipment, keeping of certain individuals for special grace above the general grace, laid in the beginning, nay, in the eternity, of the supreme decree of the Father; and it is intended, at the same time, to intimate that those who are thus ordained to special honors must also themselves be specially prepared for these honors. There is again no absolute antithesis in the saying as a whole; for it is prepared of the Father for all in common, who inherit the kingdom (chap. xxv. 34); and moreover it is the Son, exalted by the Father, who will finally confer these special distinctions, as is plain from the ever-recurring δώσω, ποιήσω, "I will give," "I will make to sit down," etc., of the seven apocalyptical epistles, compared with the "I appoint" of Luke xxii. 29. (Οὐκ ἔστιν ἐμὸν δοῦναι ἀλλ' οἷς ἡτοίμασται is not to be rendered with Erasmus, "Non est meum dare sed iis continget;" but if the ἡτοίμασται stands opposed to the ἐμόν falsely pre-supposed by the disciples, there yet belongs another and a true δοῦναι to the οἷς; and ἀλλά has the sense of εἰ μή, comp. Mark iv. 22, ix. 8; Matthew xvii. 8.)

With such an absolute refusal of the premature request the ten might have been satisfied; but the same pride that prompted the two to prefer such a request dwells also in them, and feels itself so offended by that act of presumption as not to be able at once to forget it: These two disciples would be greater than we! It only expresses itself in another form, while they exalt themselves in jealous displeasure, which they probably betray also in words. The all-surveying wisdom of the faithful Master at once perceives this; and, in order that equal justice may be dealt, he fails not to rebuke in them also the self-exaltation which will admit of no precedence beside itself. The continuation of the answer many have understood as if it only meant to say: Be not angry at the two, envy them not, even although it were prepared for them of the Father to sit on my right hand and on my left (which his answer at least left undetermined); for, if they are appointed to such honor, there is first ordained for them also a greater measure of humiliation—the higher any one would rise, the deeper must he first sink. But such a side-glance at the two, by way of comparing them with the rest, is here very remote from the Lord's simple saying, which is rather meant merely to return and point back to a lesson of universal significance, that in the kingdom of Christ humility alone is true greatness, and that serving is and leads to true reigning.

Verses 25–27. To point back to this—for already, at chap. xviii. 3, 4 (comp. Luke ix. 48), the Lord had said what he here more strongly impresses upon the forgetful disciples, further developing words which he afterwards (Matt. xxiii. 11, 12; Luke xxii. 25–27) again and again repeats.* Christ shows with great and strongly contrasting earnestness the difference and contrariety which exist between the heavenly and the earthly kingdom, the kingdom of God and the kingdoms of this world. The latter, as being built on the natural condition and natural mind of men generally, presuppose in their dominions and dignities the ambitious and selfish use of power, as all experience shows. Ye know: this does not apply to the saying and doctrine as a whole, as if it meant, "I have already often said to you that your being great consists in being little." But it applies, as may be plainly seen, only to the first clause—Ye know well how it goes in the kingdoms of the world, particularly now under the dominion of the Romans; and, in addition to this, at all events in the background—Ye know it from yourselves, inasmuch as your conscience testifies that, by nature, ye would be no exception. The ἄρχοντες τῶν ἐθνῶν, "princes of the Gentiles," are called in Mark more precisely οἱ δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν, "they which are accounted to rule;" and this remarkable expression—be it originally from the mouth of Christ, or an amplification of the

* Luke, as he gives the saying which Christ uttered at the Supper, in nearly the same form as this, has here omitted the first statement of it.

Evangelist which truly corresponds to the meaning of Christ—calls for explanation. We admit the truth of Winer's remark when we, in the first place, grammatically interpret it of those who pass for the rulers of the nations, who are thus acknowledged, who have the concomitant respect and consideration (comp. Gal. ii. 2, 6, 9; Luke xxii. 24; and in the History of Susanna (ver. 5), οἱ ἐδόκουν ἡυβερνᾶν τὸν λαόν). But in this first, and so to speak uncondemning sense, which acknowledges the thing as it is, there yet lies a slight antithesis to the real and actual truth, in so far as the respect of outward acknowledgment before men is a πρόσωπον not respected of God (Gal. v. 6); the appearing as ruler is in fact only a seeming. Hence the Vulgate is right with its qui videntur principari, even were we further to understand qui sibi videntur.* For there corresponds to the outward seeming and acknowledgment an inward thinking and imagining themselves to be what they pass for; whoever has the power in his hands also fancies that he may arbitrarily use it; so that (here at least, where Christ speaks of the self-willed disposition and conduct of the rulers of the world) the δοκεῖν or "being accounted" passes ironically into the same signification which it has, for example, at Luke viii. 18; 1 Cor. x. 12.† Christ will have in his kingdom no mere δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν in any sense whatever, but true rulers in full right; in the one sole might of ministering love, which is then in reality only his own, the sole legitimate power of the one Ruler.‡ He will have no mere external dominion over men outwardly, without subjection of their hearts; no mere seeming and being called "great," without the inward dignity of real worth and pre-eminence. Therefore, of the rulers of the world it is κατακυριεύειν, "exercise dominion," and κατεξουσιάζειν, "exercise authority," that are used; κατά often denoting the bad side of the accompanying idea, for example in the word of Peter (1 Pet. v. 3), where there is perhaps an allusion to this saying of Christ. The second αὐτῶν seems indeed, like the first, to belong to ἐθνῶν—"over them" and "upon them," both referring to "the Gentiles"—and in the repetition at Luke xxii. 25, it is certainly not otherwise to be taken; still, we are disposed to pay some regard to Grotius, who here refers the second αὐτῶν to the ἄρχοντας just named—"upon them" to "the princes." There then arises without violence a still deeper sense, which certainly quite corresponds to the meaning of Christ. As the rulers or ἄρχοντες in general exercise their power over the nations, so, by way of recompense, the same thing happens to them from those who are great and greater among themselves, who, in turn, subdue and enslave the weaker; thus there is in the world a gradual scale according to which dominion is exercised in an ever ascending degree, just as any one is able to make himself great, and aims at making himself greater than others. Not so with you! Christ does not (for this would only be in turn to exercise dominion on his part) do away with all this striving on the part of the rulers and great ones upon earth, which proceeds from the natural disposition of men; but he builds his kingdom, in which the power of ministering love is the great ruling principle, in, and under, these historical forms of national government. He does not disturb political dignities from without, with all their degrees of rank and power, although unfortunately they carry in them ambition and self-will; but he heals and renews from within outwardly, inasmuch as he puts his humble disciples here and there in the place of rulers, and at all events prepares for them, even in this world, a dominion of spiritual power—until the σχῆμα, the fashion of this world shall pass away, when the order of the kingdom of God may be represented also outwardly. In this kingdom there are also degrees of rank and power, as we have already seen; for in this place our Lord does not say—With you let there be no μέγας or πρῶτος, no "great" or "first," let no one aim at becoming such! But as regards the warrant to aim at this, and the way of attaining to it, the matter stands inversely as compared with the kingdoms of this world: he who will become truly great (not merely be accounted, or imagine himself, great), let him earn this distinction as a servant; whoso will be truly the first, let him seek dignity and honor in deeper humiliation; so that he may, with willing love, yield himself as a servant or slave to the last and the least—without detriment to his freedom, which is rather thus made manifest (1 Cor. ix. 19). And this ὃς ἐὰν θέλῃ, he that will, Christ proposes to them all, in order to heal and give a right direction to their strivings after greatness. To strive in this way after the highest honors and crowns of ministering love, with a holy sanctified ambition, the Lord here most earnestly summons all his disciples, setting before them the prize: "Go and serve; he who does this best shall be, and be called, the chief!"*

* With Von Gerlach: Those who think to rule, who imagine that they have right of dominion—we should not regard this however as precisely the first and sole meaning. Lange, on the other hand, sharply hits our interpretation in the expression, "the acknowledged phenomenal powers, those that seem to be, the princes in the world of appearance."

† Comp. again 1 Cor. xi. 16, where it is somewhat differently applied, viz., when any one fancies that he must now indeed quarrel.

‡ So, for example, Crusius: Christ Jesus will not suffer such a state of things; since he indeed rules, while mortal rulers only seem to rule.

* But how and wherein serve? As if this were not self-evident! "Does any one ask, How must the living man express his life, the strong his strength, the compassionate his compassion? If thou art but truly humble and willing to serve—thou shalt never be perplexed about the expression of thy humility and readiness to serve, any more than thine eye about the objects of seeing, or thine heart about room for beating" (Hafeli).

How, then, does the matter stand as regards priority of rank in the kingdom of God? In the first place—apart from those outward honors and offices which must exist in state and church for the sake of the order of this present state of things—all are now equal as brethren (Matt. xxiii. 8); equal in the humility which teaches every one to esteem every other better than himself (Phil. ii. 3). Thus, but only thus, does every one who is less participate notwithstanding in the general greatness and dignity which the full grace of the New Testament confers (Matt. xi. 11); he who will be this greater one, let him willingly be in his own eyes the lesser one! And then there is held out to all of us in the future the one common hope of our calling (Eph. iv. 4), and the Scripture speaks constantly of equal blessedness and glory. Peter is partaker with Christ, even as all are whom he calls his disciples (John xiii. 8; xvii. 10, 20, 24); all the children are also heirs (Rom. viii. 17); and all saints judge the world (1 Cor. vi. 2; Psa. cxlix. 9): there is only one universal kingly and priestly nobility belonging to all citizens of the kingdom (1 Pet. ii. 9; Rev. i. 5, 6). Such passages point to a future of final consummation, when God will be all in all (1 Cor. xv. 28); and, in view of this, even now a Paul, or Cephas, is not to be accounted of, for all is yours (1 Cor. iii. 21). On the other hand, differences, degrees, thrones, are elsewhere spoken of. The twelve shall sit upon their twelve thrones, and judge or govern—of course so long as there is any thing to judge or govern; and in this lies the solution of the question, how that equality is to be reconciled with these distinctions. In a preliminary period of the kingdom of glory upon earth—ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ—there will be the thrones, and the cities (Luke xix. 17, 19), and for a time yet first and last. To be first rather than last—to attain to the first resurrection (Phil. iii. 11), etc.—after this we ought all to strive with the holy zeal of serving; and we shall receive what is due, that for which the Father according to the measure of his gifts would prepare and has prepared us. No preference of any kind whatever comes from the arbitrary gift and favor of the King in this kingdom; but the Father's decree and our faithfulness in our own special calling prepare, for each one, his future place. There will, indeed, remain in eternity also the members of the one body appointed by God (1 Cor. xii. 18), heads and eyes, as also hands and feet; a difference in the end to be reached corresponds with the different ways that lead to that end, and in so far there will be a pre-eminence of some above others. Still in the final fulfillment there will be no actual precedence; all will be the entire body, the fulness of him who filleth all in all (Eph. i. 23). What remains for us to strive and pray for? Seek not to become an eye if thou art called and prepared to be a hand, but do not remain a foot if something higher is ordained for thee. Be faithful in thy grace and gift, so shalt thou become what thou canst and art to become; at the last thou shalt certainly be blessed in thy portion, and glorious in common with all. As some one has said: "To be willing to know nothing but Christ crucified, makes us capable of attaining to all knowledge"—so say we also: To be willing to become nothing but the least servant of all, makes us capable and worthy to become great and exalted. And this is what our Lord has here said, and what he forthwith seals with his own example as the Head and King.

Verse 28. The "come" points always to the first advent and appearance of the Son of Man in the flesh. The "not to be ministered unto" does not, of course, refer to an outward renouncing of every act of service offered to him in love, nay even demanded by his undeniable dignity (chap. xxvii. 55; Luke x. 40; John xiii. 13); so that neither is it forbidden to us to have men-servants and maid-servants, as helpers to serve in the earthly work. But it is all the more deeply to be understood in its innermost truth, according to which the Son of God, who is come as the Son of Man, sought not his own honor, used not his power as King in the manner of men (ver. 25), so as to cast all things in adoration at his feet, which alone had been the true service due to him, but—as it is written in Isa. xliii. 24, 25, of God the Lord. He has served us sinners in order to wash us from our sin, has become the servant and burden-bearer of us all; and this he sometimes represented outwardly in himself for a testimony (see Luke xxii. 27). He has given his life for us, or laid it down in self-sacrificing love (John x. 12, 18; xv. 13); and in so far this is also set before us as a pattern which we are to follow (1 John iii. 16). But while he at first speaks thus humbly, he must at the same time, for the truth's sake, add a word concerning the great and sole virtue and significance of his sacrificial death—which goes far beyond a mere example, by which rather the power and liberty to follow him have been procured for us all.* This high and comprehensive testimony is yet extorted from him here in the deepest humility, so that he may not deny himself. Λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom for many—this is as well the germ of all the apostolic doctrine concerning the vicarious sacrificial death, as also a mere declaration, with retrospective reference to the prophecies and types of the Old Testament: "I am he who is come, who also should and must come to that end!" It would be necessary here to enter into the dogmatics of the subject,

* Also the liberty of the Church, thus ransomed by him, to refuse to be enslaved by any hierarchy, always allied to despotism; the liberty to acknowledge only that authority which, as the diaconate of love, ever goes on renewing itself through the Spirit of Christ. See in Lange ii. 1154, this profound connection of the words with all that precedes (formerly overlooked by me); at the same time the most striking confirmation of the principle of office in the Reformed Church, in its proper truth as confuting many Lutherans.

and into the Old Testament as a whole, in order to bring out the full meaning of this simply expressive term λύτρον, "ransom" (which is afterwards carried out in the New Testament in many compounds); but what belongs to the commentator is only to point out the sense and idea of the saying in order to deeper inquiry. We find in Exod. xxi. 30 כֹּפֶר and פִּדְיוֹן נַפְשׁ (Sept. λύτρα) used for the ransom and equivalent of *forfeited life in the proper sense; and in Lev. xxv. 24, 51 the purchase-price to be paid for a possession in land, according to just valuation, גְּאֻלָּה, is rendered by τὰ λύτρα in the Sept. When in this passage, with evident allusion for the rest to Isa. liii. 10, 12, the Holy Spirit in recording the saying of Christ uses the word λύτρον, for אָשָׁם (and לְכַפֵּר, כֹּפֶר, Lev. xvii. 11), where Christ himself of course did not use it, the expression points at all events to a substitutionary, therefore redeeming, and thus releasing, saving, sacrificial death of Christ—although much may still remain to be said from the entire Scripture, and much to be inferred from the internal nature of the thing, respecting the true sense in which this substitution is to be understood. The expression here, however definite on one side, yet determines nothing more special; and admits of every doctrine which is reconcilable with the rest of Scripture, and with the simple letter of the λύτρον ἀντί, "a ransom for" (as also the ἀντίλυτρον, 1 Tim. ii. 6, which occurs only there). Even should we attach the strict sense to this solitary ἀντί (for which in every other place we find ὑπέρ, περί, διά), as is right, it would still be going beyond what is proper to raise from it the difficult question, which can only give rise to endless disputation, namely, to whom properly the ransom and the purchase price of the one life for all lives is paid. The meaning of the expression—which remains always at the same time figurative—does not, as appears to us, reach so far; and the δοῦναι τὴν ψυχήν, "to give his life," which is always put as it is here, without a dative, is by no means in this sense to be pressed. It signifies to yield up, to give up to death, to offer, to stake for something else in general, as the Heb. נתן, and particularly Isa. liii. 10, 12, תָּשִׂים נַפְשׁוֹ——הֶעֱרָה לַמָּוֶת. Christ has thereby rendered satisfaction in every sense, and on all sides; he has given what corresponds to, and is necessary for, our redemption; chiefly, and in the last and most proper intention, however, he has given his life only in order to take it again as a life for us, consequently thereby to pay to us, so as to cover our deficit and bankruptcy. Finally, as regards the πολλῶν, "many," here and Matt. xxvi. 28 (comp. besides Heb. ix. 28), it is clear, from numerous parallel passages of Scripture (at the head of which is 1 Tim. ii. 6, ἀντίλυτρον ὑπέρ πάντων), that the universal application of the death of Christ (which, as Richter remarks, already lies in the ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the universal man, the one for all) is certainly not to be denied on the ground of this expression; and consequently that the πολλοί here might well enough denote the πάντας, or all who stand in contrast with the one, as at Rom. v. 15, 18, 19. If, however, the want of the article here is specially noticed, then it only remains to understand it of the many among the all, in whom, as actually redeemed, the power of redemption becomes a reality. This will at least appear as the most probable sense at chap. xxvi. 28, on the occasion of the last supper (as also Heb. ix. 28); and it seems most exactly to correspond to the רַבִּים, Isa. liii. 11, 12 (comp. liii. 14, 15) together with the כֻּלָּנוּ, ver. 6.

* Not merely "the ransoming from the condition of slaves," as Lange here mistakes it.

THE TWO BLIND MEN AT JERICHO.

(Matt. xx. 32; Mark x. 51, 52; Luke xviii. 41, 42.)

Although the question whether Christ here spoke to two blind men or only to one, whether on departing from, or entering into Jericho, is beside our object, which is to hear him speak, it would yet be affectation not to express our opinion, at least in a brief note, respecting this difficulty—a difficulty so welcome to the disputatious, and certainly remarkable even to the peaceable and simple student of the Harmony.† In other respects, there is little to be said on the words of Christ which occur in this narrative. The first, in which he called to him the blind men, who so † We have already found frequently that Matthew does not record outward events with strict precision, but that he is always intent upon grasping the kernel of the sayings, and upon seizing what is essential and significant in the history; it is therefore natural to expect that, here also, he should deviate from the actual facts. For Mark mentions the one blind man, who was healed as Christ was departing from Jericho, so decidedly by name, and describes the entire scene so particularly even to the throwing away of the garments, as to make us unwilling to admit that there was another blind man cured along with this Bartimeus. Luke again seems to narrate, quite as distinctly, a similar (although not quite the same) incident as having taken place when they were entering into Jericho importunately cried to him (Matt. ver. 32), or bade them be called (Mark ver. 49; Luke ver. 40), is not expressed, but (kindly checking the people) may have run thus: "Hinder them not, let them come!" The second is given by the three Evangelists in harmony with each other, differing only as to the singular or plural: What will ye that I shall do unto you? It seems indeed a strange question. But it is partly a challenge to them to testify their faith (as at Matt. ix. 28); partly a protest against the self-constituted masters of ceremonies with their courtly ideas, who will not suffer the procession of the King to be interrupted by the prayer of the beggars*—an expression of his readiness to serve (beautifully corresponding with what precedes, Matt. ver. 28, comp. ver. 21), in which he, in a truly royal manner, condescends to the will of beggars, so that all misery may disappear before him; partly, in fine, a significant intimation for us (according to the unconsciously symbolical character of all the particular sayings and doings of Christ), that he will do to us only according to what our faith and our prayer desire of him. The third word (only in Mark and Luke) which accompanies the cure, Go! as one who is whole, who can see, with thy sight! thy faith hath helped thee—is the well-known, familiar expression of the gracious, humble love and wisdom of the Saviour, pointing, in what is outward, to the inward thing which is of principal importance. Ἀναβλέπειν means here simply to look up—by no means to see again, to become seeing. The blind man prayed: Lord, that I may see! Christ gives immediately hearing and answer: See! for thou canst!

CHRIST SENDS FOR THE ASSES.

(Matt. xxi. 2, 3; Mark xi. 2, 3; Luke xix. 30, 31.)

We do not know whether the two disciples whom Christ here sends were Peter and John, as on a former occasion, Mark xiv. 13, comp. Luke xxii. 8; but there must needs be two, not merely in order to bring the two asses, but in order formally to represent the entire body of his disciples, and to remove from their mission the appearance of individual caprice. The village lying in sight of them was certainly Bethphage itself, which Matthew therefore alone has named. It can hardly at least have been Bethany, as, from the exact knowledge which Christ had of this village, the indefinite nature of the message, nay, even the indefinite designation of the place, would have had somewhat of affectation in it.† In no case are we to understand a previous agreement with the owner of the asses; for then the indefinite words given by the three Evangelists, "If any man hath aught to say against it," would contain a slight semblance of dissimulation. All that he says rather produces the impression of a miraculous foreseeing and foretelling of the particular circumstances: the εὑρήσετε, ye shall find (to which therefore John, in a statement that concisely pre-sup-

(chap. xix. 1); so that one is tempted to suppose that Matthew, in this case, blends together the narratives of the two Evangelists, who were not apostles, on account of the similarity of the occurrences. (Rather this, at least, than the old solution which has been re-produced with more acuteness than evidence in Richter's Hausbibel; viz. that there was an intervening space between old and new Jericho, and that according to their position the inhabitants of Palestine might speak of departing from, and the Greek of entering into Jericho.) But, against this, is to be considered, what Matthew and Mark represent as very probable, that the great multitude had collected first of all in the town, with which Luke xix. also agrees; again that the people should twice, and chiefly the second time, rebuke the blind man, when one had been healed immediately before, is almost inconceivable, and not at all so simple as Ebrard thinks; finally, as regards only one blind man being noticed, namely, Bartimeus, who was the better known of the two, we have a perfect parallel to this in the account of the Gadarene miracle. Luke does not intend to be so strictly observant of chronological order; in order that he may significantly connect vers. 34 and 35 (as preachers from the earliest times have taken it, and have discoursed of our blindness with respect to the understanding of the passion of our Lord), he puts this incident first, and then lets that concerning Zaccheus follow. We are not, therefore, warranted in having recourse to the artificial expedient of Grotius, that ἐγγίζειν εἰς, Luke xviii. 35, as also xix. 2, indicates only the being near in general, but must leave its proper force to καὶ εἰσελθὼν, chap. xix. 1. Luke starts from the fact, that the one blind man actually sat already on the way, at the entrance into Jericho; but then he himself explains, by διαπορευομένου, ver. 35 (to which chap. xix. 1 διήρχετο in the Pluperf. recurs), that, in his account, he anticipates and combines what was further done afterwards on leaving Jericho (after a second blind man had come to be there). Thus we agree in the main with what Bengel's correct tact already discovered, and Meyer's note on Luke's account holds to be probable. Lange's supposition, of an entrance and departure by the same gate, we think forced and unnatural, as the road to Jerusalem by Jericho could hardly lead to and from that town as a cul-de-sac.

* Compare on this Lange, iii. 194, 347.

† According to Mark and Luke, in traveling to Jerusalem Bethphage came before Bethany, perhaps was immediately contiguous to it poses this transaction, chap. xii. 14, gives prominence in a εὑρών which excludes all previous concert) is nearly the same as εὑρήσεις, thou shalt find, Matt. xvii. 27. The εὐθέως, straightway, occurring twice (the first, according to Mark, equivalent to εἰσπορευομένοι εἰς τὴν κώμην), together with the circumstance that the ass would be found tied, i. e., as it were already prepared, and waiting in the public way, confirms this interpretation of the words, which is still further confirmed afterwards on occasion of the second sending for the preparation of the paschal lamb. Here it is said, "A man will meet you bearing a pitcher of water, he will show you the way to the right house," like what Samuel the seer says to Saul, 1 Sam. x. 2–7; a manner of prophecy in its most ancient form, pointing immediately and specially to the nearest future (before that typical kind which points to more remote periods begins in 2 Sam. vii.), which must also be represented in Christ. If the disciples should at first be almost suspected of the intention to steal the animals, a single word is to satisfy the owner (and whoever else might belong to him, Mark, ver. 5; Luke, ver. 33), viz., The Lord hath need of them! Here at all events more is meant than merely our Master (ὁ διδάσκαλος, chap. xxvi. 18); in the sense in which Christ here uses this name, it borders on the designation the King Messiah.* It is therefore implied in this, that these people belonged to the number of those who believed on him, that they at once understood who "the Lord" was, and without hesitation willingly served him.† Christ could not call himself the "Son of Man" here where in his humiliation he will yet represent his kingly dignity; but, precisely on this account, the need of the Lord, who has not even an ass of his own for his festal procession, presents a significant contrast which the preachers on the Advent from the earliest times have not failed to notice.

Whether Jesus during the whole period of his public life ever before rode, is no where written; and, from his walking being mentioned so often and without an exception, it is very improbable. Wherefore then now? He who can believe that our Lord was too tired at this particular time to ascend the Mount of Olives, may do so; his words, and the narrative in its harmony with the prediction, show something else. If Christ wanted as usual to enter the town unobserved, he would not have acted thus; but he will consciously and on purpose enter in a thoroughly public manner, raised above the accompanying crowd (so that it might not happen as at Luke xix. 3); he will go to meet the multitudes that are eagerly waiting for him, and who afterwards fetch him; and thus make the accepted honor on his part more expressive of humility, and more significant than it would have been without this provision. More significant; for what Matthew adds, vers. 4, 5, includes in the τοῦτο δὲ ὅλον, "but all this," (which points beforehand to the result), the remarkable sending just narrated; and is meant therefore precisely to disclose the thoughts and design of Christ in all this, as if it were said: Thus did Christ speak and act, that the word of the prophet might be fulfilled. He knew that his hour was nearly come; once more, before his crucifixion, he will enter Jerusalem with a first and last outward demonstration of honor, such as is proper to him as her King, with a last public offer of himself for a testimony. (Tell ye the daughter of Zion!) We do not agree with Lange, who regards this Hosanna—which from the earliest times in Advent sermons has been taken as a figure of empty honor without understanding and earnestness—in the better sense, as an expression of "obscure beginnings of the higher Christological knowledge," of the "better hopes of the people;" and supposes that Christ could not any longer refuse the "enthusiasm, the homage of his people." No! it appears very evident from Luke xix. 41, etc., that Christ regarded the whole matter in quite a different light; his entry was rather a sacrificial procession, in which he yielded himself up to this people, who cried now Hosanna! and then Crucify! Yet so that, at least in the symbolical sense, such a homage was for once admitted by him, at the last offer of himself as King. Therefore, although even his disciples misunderstand it, he regards the whole event in its true light. Any insurrection on the part of those whose enmity has ripened, is now no longer to be regarded; the license attending the festival, which brought with it the entrance of many a procession into Jerusalem, permits what is unusual, so that even Pilate finds nothing offensive in this mere spectacle.* Only the enemies (who indeed could not possibly put these thousands under ban) murmur at it. The whole scene, as already said, becomes for him a sacrificial procession, to which he yields himself. To the people of Israel it is the last official declaration—Who he is; while for the entire future Church of his true people (the daughter of Zion in the prophetical sense) it is a permanent advent word and advent figure, ever reproduced in preaching, in which there is a wondrous union of majesty and lowliness: Behold, thy King cometh, meek!—a preparatory type of the as yet future acknowledgment and glory of Christ (Matt. xxiii. 39).* All this is no strange product of a myth-framing Church, of the self-consciousness dreaming that the idea is history; it took place, γέγονεν, as recorded there in its consistent totality—the empty Hosanna before the Crucify! the tears over Jerusalem, the cleansing of the temple, the blind and lame, the children crying in the temple, the curse on the fig-tree. What a picture, intelligible only when viewed as actual history in the life of the Son of God! And how does the pencil of the Evangelist portray by a few strokes—how simply and artlessly, without a trace of imagination—what, if not history, would be the sublimest fiction!

* For it is impossible (with Alford) to understand here Jehovah, the God of Israel, for whose service the animals were needed. If it were so, this would be the third example of such an expression in the mouth of Christ; see Mark v. 19, and xiii. 20 (compare my remark, p. 147); here, however, it would surely be against all decorum to say, God the Lord hath need of two asses!

† Indeed the communist Weitling, in his book on Freedom, finds here maintained the right of those who are in want to the possessions of their rich neighbors; and laments that, now-a-days, when we have become so much more refined, the Lord and his messengers who should act in this manner would be seized by the neck and accused of theft.

* Consequently nothing really punishable. Bahrdt very perversely found in this entry the design on the part of Jesus to stir up his enemies, and furnish them even with the right to accuse him—because he had now resolved to die (a false death!).

It is evident that the fulfilled prophecy of Zechariah described generally the Messiah, as the humble Prince of Peace, procuring deliverance for himself and us only through sufferings. But it is also evident that, as often, so here, the fulfilling Providence, for the sake of abundant clearness, literally embodies the general idea; and in like manner that this literal realization in fact of the general prediction was already foreseen and provided for by the Spirit in the word of the prophet. The sum of the prophecies of Zechariah is the re-establishment of the kingdom of Israel in its entire preparation, accomplishment, and connection; and with this such special historical notices are interspersed as were never before given, in order that the whole prophecy, as it draws near its fulfillment, may become concentrated. In the first section (chaps. i.—viii.) we have the whole history of the return from Babylon, with its principal agents and actors, as the type of the future return of Israel from its dispersion; and the view becomes ever clearer until it ends in a complete picture of the new Jerusalem (chap. viii.). The second section (chaps. ix.—xiv.) now entirely separates this great result from its type, and speaks plainly of the new Jerusalem seen in the remote future; instead of direct reference to the typical restoration the Spirit gives general surveys, and retrospective glances towards the time of preparation. If at last (chaps. xii.—xiv.) the retrospective views from the attained goal predominate, there lie on the other hand in chaps. ix.—xi. intimations of the entire history of Israel, until chap. xii. 10 is fulfilled.† Chap. ix. gives beforehand the most general view. The Lord governs all men and nations according to the plan of his counsel with respect to Israe (ver. 1). Purifying judgments upon the nations of the world run parallel and in harmony with the special protection which he affords to his house and people chosen before and out of the nations (ver. 8). In a first coming, marked by lowliness and peacefulness (which is plainly and significantly looked back to here), the King appears—he first (because Israel rejects him) builds up his promised kingdom among all the heathen (ver. 10)—he then returns again also to Israel (vers. 11–17). That ver. 9 speaks of the Messiah is so evident from ver. 10, that even Maurer could only render it: "veniet rex optimus maximus, Messias pacem daturus orbi terrarum, dominaturus longe lateque." But that this King appears here in lowliness is the principal idea (to which the learned commentators have scarcely given its due weight) of this prophetical passage. As such it stands alone in its kind; and its expressions must, for this reason, embody themselves in some visible symbol before the eyes of Israel.* The נוֹשָׁע,† saved ("having salvation"), which by the Sept. and Chald. was not understood, and therefore ungrammatically changed into the Active, is not equivalent to victorious—at least with reference to earthly weapons of victory, for the ass is intended exactly to contradict this—but is to be closely connected with the decisive עָנִי, "lowly." Let it be allowed, which we do not with many deny, that עָנִי and עָנָו to a certain extent run into each other, and that the πραΰς, "meek," of the Sept., retained by Matthew, is at least half warranted, there still remains for the Old Testament usage (especially that of the Psalms) the basis of "humility and meekness" (if עָנִי is made to include the latter), a condition of distress and suffering, a being humbled and brought low.‡ The righteous King is therefore first a meek sufferer, to whom deliverance comes first of all from his own sufferings, that he may thereby procure salvation and deliverance, in order to righteousness and peace, for all his people—thus, and no otherwise, does he come the first time. In order to furnish a complete and graphic picture of this, the prophet portrays him riding—not upon the war horse (Rev. xix. 11), but upon an ass's colt, as in olden time the judges (Judges x. 4; xii. 14; v. 10); and again because this ass, to which, by a redundancy of words, such strong prominence is

* Of this, the only true view of the matter, Hase gives a caricature when he says that, among Christ's reasons for this demonstration, there was perhaps the pleasure of showing to his enemies their weakness, and letting that which at one time he had positively meant, according to Old Testament prophecy, come to pass in him as a dream of its fulfillment! It is rather a new typical prophecy, that he yet remains the King.

† We are prepared with an interpretation of chap. xi. which will rescue it from Hofmann's confusion; and shall give it on Matt. xxvi. 31.

* Of which the Jewish interpretation could make no use; so that it explains thus: When Israel believingly receives the Messiah, then he comes in the clouds of heaven; but when they are not worthy of this, on an ass. See the citations in Sepp, iii. 183.

† Luther incorrectly, ein helfer, bringing help; instead of which the corrected Bible has dem geholfen ist, one who is holpen. The citation of Matthew goes beyond the δίκαιος καὶ σώζων.

given, forms, so to speak, the point of the prophecy, therefore does Christ determine, according to the plan of the Spirit, to realize this prophetic figure. Thus must we understand Zechariah, in order to interpret the words of Jesus here (vers. 2, 3). John (chap. xii. 14–16) even mentions only the riding upon the ass, as the most concentrated fulfillment Matthew, in the saying of Christ, as afterwards in the narrative (ver. 7), specifies exactly the two animals which the prophetic word mentions. Mark and Luke have only the colt. That the prophet adds the וְעַל עַיִר, and upon a colt, epexegetically, is indeed true; as also that בֶּן־אֲתֹנוֹת* "the foal of an ass," is intended to strengthen the עַיִר, or colt, which in other places is often equivalent to חֲמוֹר or ass, in general—in the most proper sense a foal, which is still dependent on its mother (πῶλος νέος). Wherefore this, and what is the prophetical idea implied in it; what is then the significance of this particular which was foreseen only as a symbol? We find the plain answer in Mark and Luke, where Christ says further: A foal on which never yet man sat. This, as Maurer again observes, is actually indicated in the prophecy; and even in the citation in Matthew (which half changes, half accepts the text of the Sept.) it is remarkably caught up in the slight antithesis υἱὸν ὑποζυγίου (lit. "the son of a beast of burden"). Only an animal hitherto unridden is proper to the sacred dignity of the rider; comp. Num. xix. 2–5; Deut. xxi. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 7; 2 Sam. vi. 3, and many passages from profane authors, rightly adduced here by the learned. Observe now how the Holy Spirit—without regarding the objections of those sneering persons who will not allow that such things are proper to him—yet above and behind the consciousness of the prophet, points, in the expressions which he suggests, to a literal proper fulfillment; inasmuch as he brings in this subordinate idea, which was not otherwise of importance to the principal subject. Observe also why Christ, penetrating into the meaning of the Scripture better than the critics, gives directions for both animals, which the Father has made ready for him, to be brought: why the disciples, without thinking of Zechariah (John xii. 16), were unwittingly led to spread the garments over both (Matt. ἐπάνω αὐτῶν), and thus to take with them also the she-ass as belonging to the other, and to be used along with it.* All this was done, not merely in order that the not yet broken foal, when its mother was beside it, might behave more quietly, but that the whole prophetic passage might appear before the eyes of the daughter of Zion in a realized picture. He who will call this trifling, let him indulge his sneer against Christ. We rather perceive and reverently honor the holy earnestness of the King, who humbly offers himself, in this most literal fulfillment of a prophecy which testifies of him—in that he paints and sets evidently forth before their eyes (Gal. iii. 1; Luke xix. 42), how he cometh to them.

THE DEN OF ROBBERS, AND THE CHILDREN'S PRAISE.

(Matt. xxi. 13–16; Mark xi. 17; Luke xix. 46.)

Another יָבֹא (he shall come) stood at the close of prophecy in Malachi: The Lord shall come to his temple to purify and to cleanse the sons of Levi. Once already, at the beginning of his course, had Christ held this up before them in act and symbol; they, however, had persisted more determinedly in not abiding the day of his coming, they had not put away the offence, perhaps even had precisely at this time restored it by way of defiance. Here he declares and proves by his act, that he is at the end no other than he was at the beginning. He still works while it is day; he is not weary of testifying by word and deed in the still standing sanctuary—"once more he goes the way which he had loved as a child, up to the temple."† Nay, once more, his zeal breaks forth against the desecration of the temple; the place of worship still, though

* The Plur. for the Sing. by way of generalizing. Only such interpreters as Jahn and Michaelis could suppose blood asses with pedigrees to be meant!

† In August Thieme's Ilmenaur Sermons, p. 35.

* We prefer to let alone the typological significance which commentators, from the earliest times, have found in the two asses (Von Meyer: The she-ass is the Old Testament, the law; the foal is the new Church, the Gospel). That the she-ass was led along with the other not merely causa pompae, but was intended to embody the prophetic figure, is remarked also by Hengstenberg (Christol. ii. 135); as also that in the prophet there is a gradation in the expression. But we do not agree in this, that the climax (an animal upon which no man had ever yet ridden!) is intended to indicate merely greater lowliness, poverty. For the rest, it is well known what needless trouble many commentators have given themselves to account for there being two animals, and what subject for mockery this has afforded to Strauss. Schleiermacher also gives the reins to his fancy: "The she-ass no longer runs beside a πῶλος that is fit for riding—although it has not yet been used for that purpose—but has long since left it to itself." Neander is so bold as to make John xii. 14 (only one ὀνάριον) valid soon to be destroyed.* Matthew represents the order of the events as if this cleansing of the temple followed on the day of the entrance into Jerusalem. According to Mark our Lord began to look round about upon all things with rebuking glance at the eventide; but "on this day of grace and joy delayed the complete execution of his righteous anger till the morrow." This notice of Bengel as to the harmony is quite sufficient [?]. More severe than on that former occasion (as we remarked there), he now speaks out plainly, and without softening the prophetical word, of the den of robbers; and with heightened emotion he combines with it another prophetical passage in most rebuking contrast. This word respecting the house of prayer, pointing back, properly speaking, to the consecration, 1 Kings viii. 29, is written in Isa. lvi. 7; Christ cites it as it is written, so that it is wrong to refer "My house" here to himself. Be called in truth—i. e., really be; hence, in Luke, ἐστίν, is, is put for this. Mark, in order to complete the saying, forgets not to add, among all nations; and this also was very appropriate, as it was in the fore-court of the Gentiles that the money-changers and traders were.† In Jer. vii. 11, מְעָרַת פָּרִצִים, den of robbers, corresponds also by ironical antithesis to the house of the Lord, for the den of robbers is their dwelling. If we adhere to the most direct meaning of λῃσταί, thieves, then the profane trafficking in the temple would be compared to the division of the spoil of robbers in their den. But the corresponding פָּרִצִים in the original text means in itself more than this—viz., violent ones (as ravenous beasts, Isa. xxxv. 9), and passes over to the accompanying idea of murderers (as also the expression Räuber in German), see Ezek. xviii. 10; Hos. iv. 2; Psa. xvii. 4. Moreover, in the context in Jeremiah the shedding of innocent blood in this place is expressly spoken of, ver. 6, and רֶצַח, murder, at ver. 9 (comp. again Hos. iv. 2). Consequently Luther's "den of murderers" is quite right; and our Lord, by applying this word on this occasion, not merely chastises the murderous disposition and conduct of the dwellers in the temple in general, but now hints in the deepest sense, and more plainly than the first time (Destroy this temple!), at the now almost matured counsel of murder against his own most sacred person, which he well knew of. And this therefore Mark, ver. 18, and Luke, ver. 47, make immediately to follow.

The angry and rebuking zeal for his Father's house is at the same time accompanied by so much kindness, that the blind and lame, the wretched who need help, now as usual come to him, and he heals them.* It is the one unvarying love, the one unvarying testimony: "I am he who should come!" The miserable, and the little children, are not afraid of his anger; but malignant enemies are again angry even at his kindness. The miracles of healing—and the thanksgivings which probably followed them—the praises of those that were healed and others with them, waken in the children the echo of yesterday's homage, whose Hosanna, with the palm branches and all the accompanying pomp, so pleased them that doubtless they heartily joined in the cry yesterday, and are quite ready to begin it anew to-day.† Christ, with a sad kindness, lets it be done again; but the innocent cry of the children excites a blind fury in the high priests and scribes, because their conscience hears in it the truth which they would stifle. As several of the Pharisees yesterday expected that Christ would rebuke his disciples, and received for answer a proverb from the Scripture indirectly applied (Luke xix. 39, 40)—so the rulers of the temple venture to-day to put the bold question, Hearest thou not what these say? As if it were evident of itself that he must check this impropriety! Christ, however, is not weary of answering. With another question, Have ye never read? he puts to shame the adversaries, and recompenses their malice with a piece of instruction, profoundly pointing to Scripture, to their hearts, and the counsel of God respecting his kingdom—a lesson by which they might yet have become wise. He has the Scripture, especially since Luke xviii. 13, continually in his mind; at every step he directs his course by the light of its prophecy.

As he afterwards, Matt. xxi. 42, refers to an undoubtedly Messianic psalm, so now, with the same formula of interrogation, he refers not merely to a general truth respecting the against the truth of Matthew's account; who, he says, has invented the two animals from a misapprehension of the passage in Zechariah (also the αὐτῶν and αὐτούς, verse 3, in the mouth of Christ!). These theologians have not understood the ἵνα πληρωθῇ.

* That Sepp, who is so often confused and arbitrary (and who has no right to sum up "a catalogue of the sins of Protestant theologians"), should suppose only one purifying of the temple, because "the second is in itself out of place, and takes away the significance of the first"—does not astonish us. But that Lange, following modern criticism, should in like manner hold that the occurrence, which might "easily be by degrees shifted from its place in the tradition," took place only once according to John—did surprise us; but he has since retracted it.

† Lange even finds here, that now in the second purifying Christ openly maintains the right of the Gentiles to the temple.

* Neander, indeed, does not altogether believe this account on Matthew's word alone, as it narrates "in an indefinite manner" and evidently "unhistorically;" what is true in it to him is only that the like did once take place in Jerusalem. Ah, if the sainted Neander could only now speak, and, for our sakes, retract these his follies!

† This alone and nothing further is contained in the simple account. Sepp in his usual manner (in which one must always prudently distinguish respectable learning from confused mythology) brings forward Jewish fables of holy temple-boys who, moved by the Holy Ghost, had received Jesus.

praise of God proceeding from the mouth of children, but to a psalm which, in the most proper sense, prophesies of him and his kingdom. In order not to repeat myself, I beg the reader to look into my interpretation of the eighth psalm,* where it is shown from the entire connection of the psalm that the ordained praise, according to the Sept., or rather the settled power, according to the original text, refers to the kingdom of restoring grace in the humbled and exalted Son of Man, to the destroying and putting to shame of the enemies, nay, of the enemy of God, in the most proper sense; and that the babes and sucklings, while not to be dissociated from the natural figure, are already in the psalm to be certainly understood spiritually of the same μικροί and νηπιοί, "little ones" and "babes," who are meant in Matthew xi. 25. "The outward fulfillment of the prophecy is, as oftentimes" (for example in the riding upon the ass just before), "only itself again a figurative representation of its inner sense." Neither Umbreit nor Hengstenberg nor De Wette can make me waver in this view of the whole psalm, and of this citation from it in particular; which is too firmly settled in the childlike understanding of the entire Church of the faithful from the earliest times, and too closely agrees with the prevailing application of it in preaching, not to be found true when a true exegesis is applied to it. De Wette, who is the master of shallow criticism, first, in complete contradiction to the light in which Scripture was understood by Christ and his apostles†, invents a "hebraism" which exists no where but in the fancy of a false theology, and then goes on to say that the Messianic sense of the eighth psalm vanishes and is lost. It is not however an isolated Von Meyer, or R. Stier, who understands this psalm in the sense we have assigned to it; but the simplicity of the faithful, which no learning can overthrow, has with one voice always so taken it. So Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 27; Heb. ii. 6; Eph. i. 22; and before him the Lord Christ in his supreme authority. What otherwise would be the intermediate link between the citation and the words with which it is introduced—Have ye never known!—which he ordinarily uses only when they are very definitely appropriate? And is it not theological in the genuine sense to receive such an interpretation as agrees with the apostolical testimony, seeing that Christ himself refers us to the Scripture interpretation of his apostles, which they had learned in his own school?

We cannot help, therefore, plainly seeing (as is declared in the Epistle to the Hebrews), that the Son of Man in Psalm viii. is Jesus; and therefore also, in the fact of Christ's citing from this psalm and from no other, a Messianic meaning in the cited words. Nay more, we are so bold as to affirm that the Hosanna to the Lord out of the mouth of children, which, in the outward special fulfillment, is again figuratively prophetic, is not indeed precisely meant by the words of the psalm. It was the truth thus symbolized which was meant; and this special literal fulfillment by the children themselves was seen beforehand by the Spirit, not otherwise than the riding upon the ass in Zechariah. There is a style of vague interpretation in which the prophesying word evaporates in the mist of ideal presentment; and it consistently maintains that no where in the consciousness of the prophets or in the intention of the Spirit is Christ seen and characterized as a historical person, and in his historical reality. But we ever assert, in opposition to this, that it is precisely the figure of the person of him who is to come in which all prophetic lines meet, in ever-growing accomplishment. Because every thing is really included in the person of Christ, the God-Man, the Spirit must prophesy of his person; and in the consciousness of the Spirit of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11) every thing of course is definite, concrete, special; the indefinite lies only in the human understanding. For what could be purely accidental, and not significant, not fraught with eternal truth, in the life of him who is God-Man, and in the relations of that life to the world? Where then the prophetic word surprisingly coincides with apparently accidental details and outward particulars of the fulfillment, in such places there is rather disclosed to our dull sight the profound congruence between prophecy and fulfillment which was absolutely inherent in the eternal decree of God. Thus does Christ look into the entire Scripture, which testifies of him; thus has he at hand, at every turn and step of his history, the fulfillment of some prophecy. He knows, and testifies, that those things were written of John the Baptist which they did to this Elias (Mark ix. 13)—how much more the things that were written of his own person! In the sacred farewell hour of the last supper he cites the 41st psalm with reference to Judas; in the intercessory prayer (John xvii. 12) he recurs again to the same prophecy; the being reckoned among transgressors in Isaiah he refers (Luke xxii. 37) most concretely to his then impending seizure and execution as a criminal, just as he refers a saying of Zechariah (Matt. xxvi. 31), if possible still more specially isolated, to his being forsaken by his disciples on this night. All these details carry indeed their significance in themselves; just as here Christ sees, in the Hosanna of the children, the power and honor which all his enemies cannot overcome, and which the Father will prepare for him out of the mouth of his babes. But for this very reason does he apply to this the corresponding word of prophecy; and to the end that this should happen to him was the word written.

THE FIG-TREE—THE POWER OF FAITH AND PRAYER.

(Matt. xxi. 19–22; Mark xi. 14, 22, 26.)

The weeping over the city at his entry; the anger at the desecration of the house of God; the cursing of the barren fig-tree—these three things are connected together in the relation of a climax. The eye of Christ already indeed sees beforehand the judgment of Jerusalem and Israel, when, first of all, he sheds tears of divinely-human emotion over its blinded inhabitants. Then, to speak humanly of the God-Man, he girds himself to renew by word and deed the testimony which is not yet to be abandoned, and which is yet to awaken and terrify some. In this, however, his holy judicial anger at last breaks out; that anger which will send forth his armies to destroy these murderers (chap. xxii. 7), must even curse those who would not receive the blessing. This so entirely fills his soul, that every where he has before his eyes only Israel, the barren ground that is nigh unto cursing (Heb. vi. 8). He sees it and prophetically curses it in the fig-tree which presented to him on the way leaves, indeed, but no fruit. The cleansing of the temple, and the cursing of the fig-tree—the former still an act reserved for the last day of visitation, the latter a warning figure for the coming that was to follow it—are parallel with and supplementary to each other; as also the accepting of the Hosanna and the tears over Jerusalem, the tears and the anger in the temple, the anger and the healing of the diseased, the saving love and the avenging wrath in the same divinely-human heart.

Mark has so exactly determined the chronology of this event from the most certain sources (vers. 11, 12, 19, 20), that we may adopt it in our interpretation of the account of Matthew, who here groups together in large proportion, and is careless of chronology in details. As he has already by anticipation made the cleansing of the temple, which belongs to the second day, to follow immediately upon the entry into the city (for the two days were as one day), so he records further (vers. 17, 18), only with general indefiniteness, that Jesus at that time passed the night (once and again) in Bethany, and that the cursing of the fig-tree took place πρωΐας, i. e., "on the morning," or a morning, upon his return to the city. In like manner, at vers. 19, 20, disregarding the time in the thing, he connects together without interval the immediate withering of the tree and the words of Jesus to the disciples who observed it; although we learn from Mark, that not till the third day (Tuesday), was the withering which followed upon the curse observed, and that thereupon the words of Christ were spoken. The comparison of the two, however, ought to teach us what is most essential for our reading and hearing aright the doings and sayings of Christ, and that the first Evangelist has written his history not without freedom in the Spirit.

Jesus saw a fig-tree* in the way (at a distance); a single tree, probably belonging to no one in particular (μίαν again not merely equivalent to τινά), which, from the place where it stood, and still more by its adornment of leaves, attracted attention, and promised fruit. Christ, who, on his royal day of honor, had fasted in the sadness of his soul, and who also, on this morning, went with eagerness immediately again to the city,† felt hunger, and went up to the tree if haply he might find any thing thereon, as the leaves at a distance promised. For, in fig-trees, it is well known that the fruit ripens before the leaves appear: and although Christ might not look for fruit of the previous year, which had survived the winter, or late fruit (which could hardly have been allowed to lie on the way), he might yet expect to find early, unusually early,‡ figs: At all events the tree, as having leaves, which Mark specially notices, gave promise of having fruit also. Our Lord, however, found nothing but leaves only. The tree therefore was a barren one, which went all to foliage; it promised something extraordinary, and yet—had nothing, just like the rest of the fig-trees at that time.§ Upon this he said:

* Bethphage, indeed, derived its name from there being many figs there.

† This is more probable than, as Lange thinks, "a truly childlike longing" after his people, which led him to forget his morning meal.

‡ In the Heb. בִּכּוּרוֹת or בְּכוּרוֹת Hos. ix. 10; Isa. xxviii. 4; Jer. xxiv. 2, such as are particularly sought after.

§ This last might be the simple meaning of the much disputed οὐ γὰρ ἦν καιρὸς σύκων—even were we to translate, It was not yet the season of figs. "The vintage was not yet; the figs, therefore, were not yet gathered"—is not so suitable, for early ripe figs might certainly be plucked. But it may also signify, as Hammond first understood it, and many after him (so that in the Stud. u. Krit. 1843, i 131, it should not be spoken of as a new interpretation): It was then no good season or favorable weather for figs, no fig-year. At all events the statement of Mark is not "somewhat inappropriate," but explains with an entirely correct γάρ why there were then no figs; this however is meant, Therefore the tree covered with leaves was a hypocrite, which promised something uncommon, and yet—was like the rest. This and nothing else is the symbolical fault of this tree, respecting which even Spener must needs express a theological difficulty (see the complete third edition, Part i. p. 13), and acknowledge that Christ had on this occasion divested himself of his omniscience when he expected fruit. A curiosity of more recent time is the observation of Fritzsche: ἦλθεν ἐπ' αὐτήν. conscendit arborem, non enim nisi conscensa ficu

Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward—or, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα! He spoke it in the consciousness, and with the will that the tree he addressed must and would obey his word; the stern word of might and miracle broke forth like a lightning flash of judgment from the depth of his thoughts, which, in every object, found only the one thing, the inevitably impending judgment upon the people of God. Thus does he work the only miracle of punishment that is recorded of him (for in that of the devils in the swine there was no punishment, but only a permission); it is done symbolically, however, to the tree, as a testimony for men.* All sorts of reasons to account for this action of Christ, well-meaning, though very mistaken, have been forced upon it; as, for example, that it was in order to strengthen the weak faith of the disciples for the Passion-week, as indeed he immediately afterwards speaks of faith; or, to remove, by a manifestation of his divine power, the offence occasioned by the exhibition of his human weakness in the hunger which unconsciously sought food, etc. What is true in these conjectures is true only because of that manifold significance of all the words and works of the Redeemer, which must, from their very nature, belong to them; but of any conscious aim at such subordinate effects it would be wrong to speak in connection with this word, which was spoken only with one view, and sprang only from one thought, viz., This tree is Israel! Already, at Luke xiii. 6–9, had he uttered the parable prepared in the prophets (Hos. ix. 10; Joel i. 7), and his present action recalls this to mind.† There were leaves enough —words and hypocritical works; as if it were really the Israel which it was called to be, the people of God wonderfully ripened earlier than all other nations—but no fruit! We feel the depth of this symbol. It corresponds to the fact in this also (as Neander has well observed), that, notwithstanding the show of leaves, the internal unsoundness which must be assumed in the tree, was only hastened to a crisis that must have come in the course of nature. If in the parable just mentioned our Lord speaks, with the Baptist's word, concerning the last judgment as a cutting down, there meets us here, on the other hand, the curse of permanent unfruitfulness as a first judgment. May it not be said that Christ can at first punish obstinate sinners only by giving them up and leaving them to their sin, by rejecting and forsaking them? A striking prophetic word speaks also of this: "I the Lord have dried up the green tree, and made the dry tree to flourish" (Ezek. xvii. 24). Perhaps this passage also was particularly present to the mind of our Lord, for we may almost suppose that he on every occasion remembered every Scripture that was exactly appropriate to what he did. Enough that he himself tells us once more in Matt. xxiv. 32, what the fig-tree is; nay, shows to us (as will there appear) in the remote background the removal of the curse, the "for ever" of which—εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα—is therefore to be taken only with the Old Testament limitation.*

And the fig-tree withered away παραχρῆμα, on the spot, directly upon the word—so says Matthew, and hastens, passing over a day and a night, to the astonished exclamation of the disciples when they saw it (ver. 20); for the πῶς, how, denotes only such an exclamation, not expressly a question. We know that it cannot be the design of an Evangelist thus artificially to produce the appearance of a greater miracle (as we in our folly speak), while certainly the παραχρῆμα, immediately, here repeated to the disciples sounds as if the withering had taken place suddenly, in a moment. So should we understand it without Mark, whose account leaves us at liberty to suppose that the tree withered away ἐκ ῥιζῶν gradually, till the following day.† But yet we are only permitted to suppose this, for the disciples paid no further attention to the tree on the day before, they did not look for its withering away, which, indeed, did not expressly lie in the curse. How, then, if the παραχρῆμα of Matthew were literally true? If the tree not merely forthwith or momentarily faded or began to wither—but was withered at the very moment? We ought to learn, that it is all one here whether we suppose it to have followed in one minute, or in four and twenty hours; we should lay aside the foolish conception of greater or lesser miracles, nay, an idea of miracles in general, which is foreign to the entire Scripture, and to the Gospels in particular; and should think not so much of the registering of outward events and more of perceiving and understanding their spiritual import. This Matthew brings prominently out, he specifies the withering away of which the word of Christ had not spoken, but which was added for the more abundant fulfillment of that word, and as an outwardly corresponding proof of the certain curse that had been pronounced: "No fruit henceforward!" See how effectual thy curse eam fructibus destitutum esse cognoscere potuit. To which again Hase says: "Then might the explainers of the miracle show beautifully how the tender tree came to be destroyed."

* Therefore neither did he "sin against nature" (for which reason Hase will not accept the account); nor did he show a "want of culture" (according to Strauss); nor an unbecoming revenge (according to Woolston); nor even inflict any injustice upon the owner of the tree. He performed a work of sublime power, prophesying in highest dignity.

† Without our being under the necessity (with Hengstenberg) of supposing the somewhat far-fetched reference, namely, that the figure, Micah vii. 1, was to be embodied.

* Luke xxiii. 31 has also a certain connection with Israel's withering, although, as being generally proverbial, it reaches further and deeper, and finds its nearer parallels in Ezek. xx. 47; xxi. 3.

† From the roots upward—this is more than if it were said, Even to the root—as it is very inaccurately rendered.

has been! the disciples say within themselves, and continue in this astonishment. They do not ask, Why hast thou done this, and what is it to signify? Christ therefore gives them no information on these points. In their exclamation lies concealed only the question, How can such a thing happen to a tree at a word of the Lord? and to this his answer corresponds.

He repeats to them (as we now know that he was always ready to do) that word, spoken at chap. xvii. 20, concerning the power of faith over nature and the creature, the omnipotence of perfect undoubting faith, which can command so that every thing must yield that lies in the way of its will.* Every opinion which dogmatically protests against the clearly confirmed analogy between the miracle-working of Jesus and that of his disciples, and which affirms that our Lord did not perform his miracles by faith, is to be rejected. How could he perform them otherwise, if he performed them as man? The faith of the Son of God, as the alone perfect faith, is rather set before us, in the Forerunner and Beginner, as a pattern of perfection (Eph. iv. 13). The connection here in the words, Not only this which is done to the fig-tree, is quite the same as at John xiv. 12, where the grand idea in its universality and depth will demand our interpretation. The ἐὰν ἔχητε in Matt. is again, as at chap. xvii. 20, to be taken emphatically—If ye have always your usual faith at hand, and ready for exercise, without disturbing and weakening doubt—this we learn from the imperative ἔχετε in Mark, which is to be understood only in this sense—Have, hold fast, keep, exercise and use only (your ordinary) faith in God! (Πίστιν Θεοῦ, is of course the Genit. objecti, as Acts iii. 16; Gal. ii. 20.) Faith in God stands, with strong emphasis, in opposition to trust in the creature, to that doubtful looking to the powers of nature and the creature which forgets or doubts the free power of God—as if those powers of the creature were any thing in themselves, as if it were not self-evident that they obey every believing human will that is in harmony with the will of God, just in the same way as they obey their Creator in general. Such faith in God is the innermost root and the living subsistence of all faith; faith in Christ also develops itself only from it, and rests upon it as its foundation. This our Lord declares also to his disciples (John xiv. 1) for their comfort and encouragement, presupposing the faith which they already have in God; just as here, Mark xi. 22, the πίστις Θεοῦ is first the faith in God's power, which was certainly not wanting to the disciples, but then the ἔχειν is to make it thoroughly living and perfect. We say, indeed, many or all of us, not without truth, "I believe in God!" but Christ says to us here, if that is really and entirely true, then are ye lords over the creature. As, at John xiv. 13, 14, prayer follows immediately upon the working of miracles, so here. For, in the first place, "prayer is the utterance of faith, and faith the soul of prayer" (as Rambach says); there can then be no saying with effect to the mountain, Be thou removed! without a laying hold on the power of God by prayer, in that command. Even when the Son, in his humanity, said, "Lazarus, come forth!" this was accompanied by the words, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me!" Even those words of boldest faith which break forth from us with sudden vehemence, and in which we too bid mountains or trees (Luke xvii. 6) be removed, are only prayers at once expressed in act, expressions of faith suddenly seizing its object, not doubting that God at all times hears; and they are therefore a coincidence of the praying and receiving in undivided certainty. But because we, with our weak faith, seldom and with difficulty rise so high; because for us, sinners, is ordained the slower learning and exercising of faith in the way of prayer in particular; therefore does our Lord go on to speak of praying, immediately after having spoken of commanding. This, in so far as it concerns us, is as much as to say—And if you do not yet succeed with the former, give yourselves all the more earnestly to the latter. Every thing must yield to your faith, every thing must fall to your prayer of faith, so that ye shall receive it. Yea truly all things, πάντα ὅσα ἄν, as both Evangelists agree in expressing it; and as all the promises of Scripture and all the experience of believing suppliants have proved—since that most ancient promise of Job xxii. 27. God assuredly gives what we have prayed for, but in his own time, and often in a different manner and form from what we thought in our prayer; for his hearing is a true hearing, and on this very account, far above and beyond what we ask or think (Eph. iii. 20). But we, alas! often overlook and neglect the true receiving; we had faith for asking, but have not or do not hold fast the faith for receiving, as may be seen in the remarkable narrative, Acts xii. 15.

Finally, Mark alone (vers. 25, 26) adds a repetition from the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. vi. 14, 15); and we credit the exactness of his entire narrative, and hold that Christ actually said this here. But why precisely here? Why does he call to mind this principal point in what he there taught concerning believing prayer? (as it is not to be supposed that, on every occasion, every thing that belonged to this subject was repeated). Just because there is a secret doubting in the heart which breaks and hinders the power of prayer, when the heart is not perfectly ready, conscious of its own guilt, to exercise forgiveness, when there is any ban of enmity and implacableness. This is what the apostle means in 1 Tim. ii. 8, Without wrath and doubting. This profound truth in general seems to us a quite sufficient reason for what is here added and we must regard it as too artificial to understand it in still closer connection with what was done to the fig-tree, as if it meant—Be not ye angry unduly at the sin of Israel, or of any one! Curse not the sinner as I have done the fig-tree! For the disciples could hardly yet have thought of the symbolical significance of this curse, as Christ also has not noticed it in his whole answer to them. But that he here graciously speaks again of forgiving, immediately after having cursed in holy anger, is a circumstance which always retains its important significance for our consideration of the whole transaction.

* Whether, therefore, "this mountain" here spoken of was that on which the Temple stood, seems a very useless question in the case of a designedly literal repetition.

CHRIST'S ANSWER RESPECTING HIS AUTHORITY TO THE WILFULLY IGNORANT—THE BAPTISM OF JOHN—THE TWO SONS—THE WICKED HUSBANDMEN—THE CORNER-STONE.

Although our Lord, after the first encounter with his adversaries (who, while he continues the same, also continue the same in their enmity to him, Matt. ver. 17), no longer passes the night in Jerusalem, he yet resorts to the temple daily, as long as they leave him life—this the three Evangelists record only in a participial construction, as evident of itself. He walks and teaches in his accustomed manner: patiently as if he were beginning anew, calmly as if no danger threatened him; he preaches the Gospel, for which he is sent, as Luke once more expresses the general import of his teaching. Thereupon these poor priests and elders, who are not at all poor for his Gospel, repeat—shall we say impudently or timorously, ludicrously or pitifully?—that old question (John ii. 18) respecting the authority and attestation of what he did as a prophet. The more complete expressions, especially in Mark (comp. also Luke xix. 47, and Matt. xxvi. 3), leave us to understand a more or less official, formal inquisition, coming upon him with a sudden surprise. But their proud words are very remarkable. They persist in asking down to the last, even after a thousand-fold answer has been given; and yet they themselves know not how or what they shall ask. Ταῦτα ποιεῖς, "thou doest these things." What things, then? Was it the teaching, which was certainly not forbidden in the temple? or the healing of the blind and lame, so that they asked for signs in proof of signs? Had he not already shown many signs since the first Passover at Jerusalem, and in all the land, even to the raising again of Lazarus; many signs, as they themselves confess? Therefore, indeed, they dare not now put the question in the same form as at John ii. 18. Therefore they can only comprise all the three years of his powerful teaching and working in a foolish ταῦτα, these things (just like the τοῦτο, Acts iv. 7, where they again begin anew with the disciples), in which must be included, also, the manifest sign, ver. 17. They now again ask for proof in the face of a three years' exhibition of proof, after three years' telling and testifying he is now again to tell them! The double question is probably to be understood thus—What sort of power, right, and authority dost thou lay claim to (divine or human), whom dost thou give thyself out to be? And then, Who has given thee authority, who has commissioned and qualified thee to do these things, or who authenticates thee therein? But understand it as we will, it has scarcely a rational meaning. In their question they say, We know not! while they know it well. Therefore, Christ cannot answer them otherwise than by driving them to this confession, by convicting them ever more sharply, from this time onwards, of the charge, Ye would not (chap. xxiii. 37). This is the import of all he says to them in these last days; the last grace being also received in vain, and issuing, through their own fault, in their condemnation, so that they are compelled to judge themselves. This is the fundamental idea that pervades the whole of Christ's answers down to Matt. ver. 45.

He answers them by rebuke and threatening, inasmuch as he appeals to their own consciousness and their own judgment. He discloses to them, first of all, rebukingly, the ground of their hypocritical unbelief, with an appeal to their own consciousness (vers. 24–32); and then, threateningly, the consequences of this unbelief, which knows not, and refuses to know, the doom which their own verdict must pronounce (vers. 33–44). These are the two principal parts of the entire passage, which, when thus viewed, becomes an integral whole.

In the first half, the counter question of Christ respecting the testimony of John discloses to them the already incontrovertible ground and beginning of all the testimonies hitherto given; it detects in them the ground of their sin, that they knew but would not say, i. e., acknowledge it: and thus ver. 27 contains already the first answer to their question, an answer appropriate to them and sufficient. Upon this—after they, by their "we know not," have acknowledged that they do know, and in order to hold up before them that they would not—Christ, patiently going back and really beginning again anew, appeals to the testimony, not of John himself merely, but in addition, of those sinners who had believed on him—and thus keenly convicts the hypocrites who have yet not believed on him. First comes the parable representing their conduct as individuals, showing how each one for himself does not do what he says; and, here again, they must themselves decide (ver. 31). Pressing inexorably closer upon them there follows, to complete their confusion, the plain and direct Fabula docet: Ye have judged yourselves; ye are the impenitent ones, in comparison with penitent publicans and harlots!

Still not enough—Hear another parable! And they must stand still; held fast by a divine force, they cannot go away, they cannot interrupt him. The second parable depicts clearly to their view the consequence of this unbelief, which knows and yet will not know—the last capital crime against the Son of God, the guilt of which had already been incurred in their counsel of murder—and the sentence against them for this. As, in the similitude of the two sons, their conduct as individuals, as private persons so to speak, is described, so now our Lord sets before them, quite as much historically as prophetically, their official conduct as a whole. He tells them what their predecessors in office did to the messengers of God; and in like manner what they will do to the Son, who has been sent last. Thus they have the answer to the question—Who art thou, and who sends thee? Not only, however, does he in the parable put the confession into their own mouth (ver. 38), but they must pronounce the sentence themselves which he now emphatically confirms! The parable, which is likewise founded upon Scripture texts, is followed again by a figurative passage of Scripture (ver. 42); and then there is the direct and proper expression for this (ver. 43), with a return to the metaphor of the passage, and a reference to other kindred passages (ver. 44). Their present offence at him whom they rejected, their future sentence from the exalted one—is the end of the first discourse and answer; but it is at the same time only the beginning of an entire series of parables, answers, and threatenings, by which they are now (chap. xxii. 23) completely convicted, condemned, and dismissed.

Verses 24, 25. The three Evangelists agree in the designative ἕνα λόγον; but by this is to be understood not so much "one short word,"* as rather "one thing," a very simple something—as the continuation shows, which, if ye tell me. Luke, bringing out the sense more concisely, puts it in the form of a challenge: Tell me! Mark, still more strongly, has an emphatically repeated Answer me! before and after the question. Matthew adheres without change to the original form—If ye tell me this, then I will also tell you. Ye hypocrites! Ye are not in earnest with your asking and telling; ye asked this question three years before, as of me, so of one before me, and yet have not accepted the answer! Had ye believed him, ye would have had no need of further questioning. Who does not perceive, without many words, how properly and significantly our Lord here goes back to John the Baptist? He was not merely the last and latest prophet, who, although he did no miracle, was yet acknowledged by the people, and, on account of the people, by the rulers;* but, in addition to this, the testimony of this predicted forerunner was the plainly acknowledged beginning of the day of Christ: we have only to look back on the whole train of thought in chap. xi. Our Lord names the baptism of John, and certainly means by this (as Acts i. 22, x. 37, xviii. 25), the entire office of the Baptist, his whole commission and appearance, including his preaching of repentance and his testimony concerning Christ, see ver. 32. But, according to John i. 25, it was precisely the baptism with which he sought to baptize the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, the righteous as well as sinners, that was the principal thing which had the appearance of an assumption, and in which the authority from above was to be recognized. In the πόθεν, whence, Christ answers the question, By what authority; and in the ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, from heaven (which transcends all ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, of men, and is on purpose thus reverently expressed), he has, at the same time, given the first indirect answer to the question, Who art thou? (John xix. 9; iii. 31).

Verse 27. Thus had he caught them in their own net. There remains for them only one of two things: either to acknowledge the divine authority of the Baptist, from which all the rest then follows; or "to come into collision with the unanimous consciousness of the people," with a boldness for which, as Christ knew, they were unprepared—not, however, from the fear of God, but from the fear of men. The three Evangelists very strikingly represent the thoughts of their hearts—which were here certainly not uttered in words—as if they had been outwardly expressed; the hypocrites think only of what they might say, and what he would then say; not of what is right and true in conscience before God. And yet their conscience already pronounces their own sentence, anticipating the question, Why do ye not then believe him? This is a question from his lips which they would, at any cost, avoid; but our Lord gives the poor hypocrites afterwards a gratuitous answer to this so much dreaded question, seeing that they have already asked it themselves. For the rest, it is here pre-supposed, on the one hand, that the majority of the πρῶτοι τοῦ λαοῦ or "chiefs of the people" did not actually allow themselves to be baptized (Luke vii. 30)—although Christ (ver. 22), by the "believe him," does not mean so much this outward reception of the Baptist, as the repenting and coming to the Messiah; and then that the great majority of the people, although quite as impenitent, yet obstinately held John to be a prophet, especially since his death.* How, then, are they to escape from this dilemma, since it is equally hard for them to confess or to deny the truth? Taking hasty counsel of their cunning wisdom they find a third middle course, in which, however, their wisdom becomes mere folly. They, the great knowers, who in ordinary cases have their "We know!" always at hand, are, after their arrogant question, reduced to the shift and the shame of saying for once, in presence of the surrounding people, and in answer to a question which closely concerned their office—We know not!† This was indeed before Christ as much as to say, We know it well, but will not say it—in which many a so-called "honest doubter" resembles them, when he will not receive conviction. And to all such the same simple answer properly belongs: Neither do I tell you what ye wilfully ask, and what ye only thus "know not."

* Certainly not, Only one word in reply to your two; for Christ's reply actually proposes also two questions, and besides, is calmly introduced by a preface, in striking contrast with their angry brevity.

* So to speak, an altogether new example of a prophetic extraordinaria vocatio, as Anton (Harmon. Erklärung der Evang.) expresses himself.

Verses 28–31. This first parable, with its interpretation, coming before the second, serves exactly the purpose of a transitional and intermediate saying, although only Matthew has preserved this also so completely. What think ye? Thereby Christ grafts immediately upon their confession, which they in vain try to conceal, the question, But do ye wicked ones know perhaps this which I am going to say to you, instead of an answer? This very simple parable, in which these supreme knowers having declared themselves ignorant are catechised like school-children, points back to the two sons (Luke xv. 11), as also to the saying on the Mount (Matt. vii. 21), (on account of which latter reference, the son says to the father, κυριε, "sir," comp. Gen. xxxi. 35). But the similitude of the "vineyard" prepares the way for the following parable; only that, in the first, the "working in the vineyard," which is afterwards to be taken in an official sense, still appears as the equal and general obligation of every one—of the publican as of the ruler in Israel (a circumstance which is, at the same time, not to be overlooked as a hint for the more extended application of chap. xx. 1). To do the will of the Father here signifies, in sincere faith and obedience to yield compliance to every message which God sends, to repent, to believe, to come to Christ. Keeping the commandments and fulfilling the law is here spoken of only as a point of contact in so far as this is the first expression of the "saying and not doing" on the part of the Pharisees (chap. xxiii. 3). Strictly speaking, our Lord means by the command of the Father, as he himself immediately after indicates, the preaching of the Baptist; viewed, however, as the conclusion and sum of all the calls collectively that had come to the Jews. The circumstance that in the parable one son is called after the other, is by no means to be understood as signifying a succession of time, for the ὡσαύτως, likewise, on which the emphasis rests,* could only thus be represented; on the other hand, the son who was at first refractory, and afterwards bethought himself, takes the first place as πρῶτος, because, according to ver. 31, this precedence (the προαγειν) properly belongs to him. Although it is sons who are spoken of (ὁ δέ), and grown up sons such as were fit for working in a vineyard, yet the name children, τέκνα, τέκνον is given to them, in order that the Father's right and love may appear all the more strongly. Was there not really, for the heart and conscience, such an affectionate tone of the Father's voice, even in the Baptist's rough, rebuking call to repentance? Although the first son answers so wilfully to his father's face, I will not! (without "sir" or "father," without any pretext such as "I cannot," Luke xiv. 20)—yet this first one is, at least, honest, both in his refusal, and in his subsequent change of mind; and in this remains his superiority as compared with the hypocrite. (Μεταμελεῖσθαι is the parabolic expression for μετανοεῖν.) The other answers with his ἐγὼ κυριε, "I go, sir," (=הִנֵּנִי, Behold I am ready, Acts ix. 10); not that he only afterwards resolved on following a worse course, but he speaks already with a falseness which is more hateful than any οὐ θέλω, "I will not." Even if it had been said in the same spirit as a foolish child hastily promises every thing in order to get away from his father, it would have been less culpable; Christ, however, does not mean here even those empty promises in which there is yet some truth, but the boldness of the hypocrite whose heart from the very first says, I will not! while the lips say, I go! The concluding question, severely as it shames them, contains, at the same time, in the background, a gracious invitation even to these hypocrites still to repent; inasmuch as the obedience, which was afterwards resolved upon, is en-

* Compare Matt. xiv. 5 and Luke xx. 6, πεπεισμένος; the people showed so determined an adherence to this conviction, that the leaders were afraid of being stoned if they contradicted it.

† As they also do not directly deny it, Hamann is, strictly speaking, somewhat inaccurate when he says—"The nearer they are to the truth, the more obstinately they deny it," and finds in their conduct "something of the miracles which Satan is able to bring to pass in our hearts, when we give place to him there." At bottom, however, he is quite right, as is said above.

* And with which the reading ἑτέρῳ is at all events to be preferred, since δευτέρῳ would press too strongly the succession of time. Of an older and younger son there is nothing said here (as some have thought, and have explained the elder of heathenism as being before Judaism). Such a reference would destroy the force of the simple representation of the two sons together.

couragingly accepted and acknowledged. We have no great objection to the reading ὁ ὕστερος, which is received by Lachmann, and defended and interpreted by Schweizer (Stud. u. Krit. 1839, 4); for it appears reasonable enough that these hypocrites, struck with shame at having such simple questions put to them, would not answer directly ὁ πρῶτος, but would say, half hesitatingly and abruptly, ὁ ὕστερος scil. ἀπελθών—that is, the after one, he who afterwards went and did the Father's will. Certainly this is quite admissible, and becomes even a striking confession extorted from them, that to do what is required, although it should be afterwards, is yet accepted;* but we still think, in opposition to Schweizer, that this reading and interpretation is not necessary, and that πρῶτος is not so very perplexing as he represents it. For if they did say this latter, we might then find in it, on the other hand, the unconscious acknowledgment that the ὕστερος justly stands in the parable already as the πρῶτος; and our Lord, taking up this, might go on to say, Yes! so it is, those who at least afterwards bethink themselves go before you as first!

Verses 31, 32. The popular turn which Luther gives to the words in his translation, "they may sooner enter into the kingdom of heaven"—does not deviate from the general truth, which however is only to be derived and inferred from the text, namely, that gross, daring sinners, at least honest in their open acts of sin, may sooner be saved than the wicked hypocrites, who are long hardened against the impression of the truth; of whose "good works" what Amsdorf says is perfectly true, that they are detrimental to salvation. But it has happened to Luther here, as often, that by a well-meant popularizing of the sense he has lost the proper idea of the text, that direct thought which he ought first to have rendered. Future eternal salvation is indeed spoken of here, in so far as the comprehensive expression "enter into the kingdom of heaven," and the entire parable, point back to chap. vii. 21; still, in this εἰσέρχεσθαι, or entering in, as in the Sermon on the Mount (see our interpretation of chap. vii. 13, 14), is already included the whole way of righteousness, repenting, believing, being converted, obeying—and not only so, but it is this that is chiefly spoken of. The προάγειν or preceding corresponds to the ὑπάγειν καὶ ἐργάζεσθαι, "go and work," in the parable, and to the πιστεύειν αὐτῷ, believing on him, in the explanation of it that follows. It expresses something already past: inasmuch as they have done the will of the Father, they have come and entered into the kingdom of heaven. Our Lord uses naturally only the present tense, προάγουσιν ὑμᾶς, in order to intimate a general truth which is here exemplified, and which goes beyond the most immediate application of ver. 32—viz.: So is it now and always; such people as the publicans and harlots go before such as you! This means, then, first of all (an interpretation of the πρῶτος and ὕστερον, which hinted at the same truth beforehand in the parable, whether we understand the one or the other to have been named in the answer), They go before you, they take your place, so to speak. But it also plainly signifies—They show you the way, they are your patterns and teachers, who should even now incite you to follow them; for thus is it afterwards in ver. 32 (ὑμεῖς δὲ ἰδόντες). If, in the Sermon on the Mount, the Pharisees were put on a level with the publicans, they are now placed far behind the penitent publicans, with allusion to the parable at Luke xviii. 10, 14; but, in order that this may be expressed with all emphasis and completeness, harlots are mentioned along with them—those gross "sinners" (Luke vii. 39), who were held in perfect contempt by the Pharisees; and both of these are mentioned, not without reference to the fact that among the apostles there were publicans, and among the zealous adherents and followers of Christ there were converted harlots. At the same time we know that avarice and sensuality, the service of mammon and adultery, were the secret sins of the Pharisees, corresponding with the two poles of all creature-love. The case is here again similar as regards Luther's translation, to what we noticed before—"John taught you the right way; neither of these two words is properly in the text, but a more significant expression, viz., He came to you ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης. The way of righteousness, or the way of God (Matt. xxii. 16), is the right way of true wisdom in the commandment and will of God (אֹרַח צְדָקָה, Prov. viii. 20, xii. 28, and דֶּרֶךְ צְדָקָה, xvi. 31, Sept. ὁδοὶ δικαιοσύνης, also דֶּרֶךְ הַשֵּׂכֶל xxi. 16, where Sept. ὁδὸς δικαιοσύνης; see again in Peter, who makes diligent use of the Proverbs, 2 Pet. ii. 21, where what is spoken of in the most proper sense is the way of conversion to God, the ἀποφυγεῖν τὰ μιάσματα τοῦ κόσμου ἐν ἐπιγνώσει τοῦ κυρίου).* John came in, or on, or with the way of righteousness; i. e., not merely did he teach and announce it to you in the preaching of repentance, but he showed it to you in like manner as a προάγων, as one who himself walked therein, and, moreover, in the way of Old Testament legal piety, which ye understand and which is so agreeable to you. For here, as we said above in the general survey of the passage, the testimony of John is combined with the testimony of those who believed on him (ver. 32, three times, precisely as at ver. 25, in the thoughts of the Pharisees). Now he says plainly: "Ye were not believingly obedient to the will of God in the preaching of John; ye did not even repent afterwards, when the believing sinners and sinful women

* Which the Lord God had long before graciously declared and certified to his people; for example Ezek. xviii. 21–23; xxxiii. 12–16.

* Pfenninger, therefore, is altogether wrong in saying: John came with the most righteous cause showed you the way, and your repentance would even yet have been accepted.* Ye are that other son!" In order to the effect of this application, it matters not that, strictly speaking, the rulers and Pharisees did not answer, "I go, sir," to the preaching of the Baptist (in that case, the first coming of many, Matt. iii. 7, must be so explained). The parable has a freer range in its import, and means: Thus is it with you in general in your hypocrisy (chap. xxiii. 3), and therefore did ye say also, by your conduct toward John, "We have long since repented, we need no new repentance!" Therefore ye received not his testimony concerning me, the Messiah, that by coming to me ye might enter into the kingdom of God—which is, in conclusion, meant by the πιστεύειν αὐτῷ, or believing on him, according to their own thoughts, ver. 25.

Verse 33. The ἤρξατο ἐν παραβολαῖς, began in parables, of Mark denotes a second beginning of instruction mainly parabolic: our Lord speaks, as before to the people in Galilee, so now to the rulers in Jerusalem (Matt. xxii. 1), in parables, of which the Evangelists probably give but one or two principal specimens. The πρὸς τὸν λαόν, to the people, of Luke is somewhat less exact, and will only say before the people, so that they also heard them. Matthew is again the most exact in what immediately follows: "Hear, ye self-willed questioners, who know not, and yet know well enough; hear as a further answer, and for your further conviction, another parable—I have not yet done with you, leave me not till ye have heard it!" The foregoing parable was for them as sinners in common with others; this is for them in their office as leaders of the people, according to which they should have been only προάγοντες ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης, preachers of righteousness, while, on the contrary, they have, from their fathers even until now, shamefully rejected the messengers of God. Christ discloses to them their sin, announcing to them their judgment, and that of the whole people; but at first he lets them again convict themselves in the milder form of the parable. The figure of the vineyard, as the particulars in which it is carried out show, goes back to the well-known text of prophetic rebuke, Isa. v. 1–7 (comp. already iii. 14). There the first ל in לִידִידִי ver. 1, is equivalent to for—Instead of, in the name of my friend will I sing a song. Hence it is called שִׁירַת דּוֹדִי, a song of my beloved, which he himself is to sing, and in which he is to make a lament over his vineyard; for at ver. 3 the discourse passes into the first person (which the Sept. expresses from the beginning). Let it be granted that the עָזַק, ver. 2, means properly hewing and digging around (as the סָקַל beside it certainly means elapidare, to clear of stones; see chap. lxii. 10), still the words of Christ, as given by Matt. and Mark, allow all the more value to the φραγμὸν περιέθηκα, hedged about, of the Sept., as this is actually found in Isaiah, ver. 5, primo loco. Hedging round is the first thing which the idea of a כֶּרֶם, or vineyard, pre-supposes, hence taking away the hedge again is the first thing when it is destroyed and abandoned. Hedge, tower, and wine-press,* belong, in Isaiah, only to the development of the metaphor, and probably intimate nothing more there than in general, The Lord of the vineyard entirely performed his part towards it, see ver. 4. We can therefore abide by this here also (which seems to be recommended by the transposition of the expressions); for though the hedge plainly points to the law which separates the Jews from the Gentiles (Eph. ii. 14),† it is yet difficult to assign a distinct and separate meaning to the tower and the wine-press, which in the commentators run very much into each other. Melancthon comes nearest to the distinction, when he compares the apparatus for pressing out and obtaining the produce to the ministerium doctrinæ, and the prominent watch-tower which affords protection and ornament, to the regnum et templum.‡ A considerable alteration and extension of the basis given by the prophet consists further in this, that in Isaiah the vineyard itself is represented as unfruitful, bringing forth only בְּאֻשִׁים, poisonous berries ("wild grapes"), instead of grapes, while here prominence is given to an offence on the part of the keepers of the vineyard, who withheld the produce from the proprietors. Whether in the metaphor the ἐξέδοτο, "let out," which is the same in all the three Evangelists, means to let out for rent in money (Cantic. viii. 11; Isa. vii. 23), or for a return in fruit (like the Roman partiarii), matters little; yet the allusions to the fruit in ὁ καιρὸς τῶν

* "Must (i. e., should, might) they not perceive the sanctifying power of God in John? That must be of God which leads the ungodly to God" (Braune).

* As spoken by Christ, who always pays due respect indeed to the word of Scripture, and yet claims an equal and not a merely subordinate authority for his own, the second and third are freely transposed. Πύργος is a watch-tower or watchman's house; ὑπολήνιον, in Mark (as Isa. xvi. 10; Joel iii. 13, Sept.), the vat or trough into which the pressed wine runs; ληνός, in Matt, the wine-press as a whole (Isa. 5 προλήνιον) which was dug deep in the ground with an outlet, through which the expressed juice flowed.

† The explanation given by some of the fathers, for example Irenaeus, is far too much of a merely outward kind, according to which the hedge signifies the boundaries of the Jewish land, the tower, Jerusalem—the wine-press as "receptaculum prophetici spiritus" would but ill correspond to this, being a transition to a different sphere of thought.

καρπῶν and τοὺς καρποὺς (Matt. ver. 34), seems to prove that ἀπὸ του καρπου (Mark and Luke) is to be understood not merely of the former (καρπός, produce); besides, we think the delivery of the fruit in natura to be much more proper for the interpretation.* Only the three following propositions are properly of main importance for the sense of the whole: that God first of all performed his part in every respect by a manifold and complete preparation: that he committed the vineyard to certain officials in Israel, not, however, as their property, but that they might see to its bringing forth fruit; that when this also was done, he went into a far country. Observe, in the second of these, the acknowledgment of the office in respect of right and duty, which Christ here expresses just that he may rebuke their official sins; and in the last (as at Matt. xxv. 15; Mark xiii. 34; Luke xix. 12, the same thing recurs), the significant reference to a return of God after the first manifestation, for the purpose of trial and in expectation of finding fruit. Luke adds χρόνους ἱκανούς, which, according to his usage (chap. viii. 27; Acts viii. 11; xiv. 3), signifies a good, proportionably long, due time, as we say. It is the intermediate period from the first planting of Israel until the time when by right it could and should have ripened into fruit, from Moses and Joshua on to the first prophets, as is plain from what immediately follows. That these prophets came partly also before the time of David and Solomon, shows further that Melancthon's explanation of the tower by regnum et templum is not precisely to be referred to the kingdom and temple properly so called; but, if a special interpretation is to be given to it, rather to the setting up of rulers in general, and the first tabernacle of the sanctuary (Exod. xv. 17).

Verses 34—36. That there was also a time of fruit already under the old covenant, is evident; the Lord had done enough for his people to warrant his demanding of all, as the fruit of his sowing and planting, that piety which, in manifold degrees and forms, was actually found in a small company of saints. That the law might produce legal righteousness, the innermost principle of which, with all diligence in works, should yet be sincere humility and constant repentance—that the promise before and together with the law might find faith, and an expecting people be prepared for the Lord, such as the Baptist last of all would prepare, and as are represented in Zacharias and Simeon—this was what the keepers of the vineyard were to see to from the first, for this they were responsible, and this was justly required of them. It was especially required at that period when, after the time of blossom under David and Solomon, the season of fruit had now come by right in the fullest sense; although the application also to the former time may not be quite excluded. Those extraordinary servants, the prophets, who were more immediate messengers of God, and who are very plainly to be understood here by the servants, hold however a different position from those who were appointed to the regular office. It is a very remarkable circumstance, the attentive consideration of which suggests thoughts extending much further, that the maltreatment and killing of almost all the prophets (for only thus on the whole is it of course meant) is quite as decidedly affirmed in the New Testament as it is not recorded in the Old Testament, which is quite silent in regard to this in those very places where it should properly have been mentioned. For although, in the history of Elijah and Jeremiah, for example, there occur enmity and persecution even to the danger of death, yet in such passages as 2 Kings xvii. 13, 14; Jer. vii. 25, 26, xi. 7, 8, xxv. 4–7, xliv. 4, 5, we do not read of ill usage, but only of disobedience and contempt. Only in Neh. ix. 26 is it expressly said, "they slew the prophets." But what is recorded in the tradition of the Jews themselves along with the canonical word of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos and others, is generally confirmed by the Lord Jesus, not merely here in the parable, but in plain words, Matt. xxiii. 31–37, which Stephen afterwards quite as strongly repeats, Acts vii. 52; comp. also Heb. xi. 36–38.* The representation in the parable is of course not to be explained as specially historical, and when Matt. ver. 35 mentions three servants, of whom even the one who came off best was at least scourged, this number is only intended to indicate that there was no want of messengers (that the patience of the Lord was not satisfied with one messenger), just as the gradation in the ill-treatment from beating to stoning indicates what was done as the general rule. Mark and Luke, perhaps more exactly according to the original expressions of Christ, dilate what Matthew has compressed into one verse; the three servants are, however, mentioned also in their account. In other respects, which are not of essential importance, the representation is somewhat different: Mark gives prominence first of all to the "sending away empty" as the principal idea;† and he makes only the third to have been killed, while the second was mocked and shamefully handled.‡ Luke begins also with

* Zeller: They have cleared away the produce of the vineyard in natura, to deliver it into the storehouse of the Master.

* What, then, has made them so cruel? asks Anton here, going beyond the parable indeed, yet with justice, and he answers: The vacuum, the want of fruit; they would not let the deficit be made manifest. It vexes them when visitatores come who will have fruit! They must let such go away empty, therefore they become cruel.

† In connection with which it is to be observed that, in the parable, the fruits were kept back by the presumption of the servants; in the explanation, however (which was not to be presented here also), there are no fruits to be had when asked for.

‡ That κεφαλαιουν, Mark xii. 4, in no case signifies to behead or kill, is evident from the the beating (in which all the three agree), but in the gradation of ill-treatment passes from that to the ἀτιμάζειν, or shameful treatment, and thence to the τραυματίζειν, or wounding; and he entirely omits the second sending mentioned in Matt. ver. 36, which Mark, at least, adds in the "and many others." We see here, as always, the same relative characteristics of the Evangelists: Luke least of all exact; Mark, in his graphic style, often making a near approximation to the original words of Christ, often again giving only a free representation; Matthew alone, although with condensed brevity, preserving entire the most important fundamental ideas. Thus, in this place, he alone has distinctively marked the two different periods of sending, which, at all events, must correspond with a historical view of the facts upon the whole. But we do not venture absolutely to determine when the second period, at which more than the first were sent, is to be understood as commencing; since the Old Testament history of the labors and testimonies of the prophets, before and after Samuel, only indicates much that is passed over. In general we might find the ἄλλους πλείονας, "many others," among the kings after the time of Elijah and Elisha, and the πρώτους, or first, with whom also it fared ill, in the entire period preceding that; see for example Judges vi. 8. If, however, we adhere exactly to the season of fruits before indicated, then a second sending must be explained as beginning after the Assyrian captivity with Isaiah and Jeremiah.

Verses 37–39. Here follows the answer — seemingly veiled by the parable, but at the same time quite plain and literal—to that question which was put at ver. 23: I am the Son, as ye know! At first, however, Christ does not represent himself to them as the promised Saviour and Redeemer; but as the last witness for the truth, the last preacher of repentance and grace, according to his prophetical office. This is quite in accordance with the facts of the case, in so far as the rejection of the Son, the last Prophet, and the Prophet in the most proper sense, was only a continuation and consummation of the rejection of all former messengers of God. Indeed, the Son, too, begins with Μετανοεῖτε, Repent! and so far is God from remitting or relaxing his claim to receive fruit, that Christ rather seals its legitimacy (as he afterwards himself produces new fruit in a new sowing of grace by the shedding of his blood, which, in this parable, lies as yet in the background). But herein is displayed the goodness and faithfulness, the patience and long-suffering of God, that "he sends even the first servants to the keepers without weapons, and now sends the Son himself, the witness of his entire readiness to be reconciled and to forgive, without terror and coercion"*—not yet to inflict the deserved punishment, but as a last experiment of goodness. What should he do more to his vineyard and its husbandmen? He had, besides the servants, only his one beloved Son; so he sends him also as the last, the same as if he himself had come to entreat the rebels! This is the very striking and affecting expansion of the idea in Mark; Luke represents the culminating point somewhat differently, and yet the same in so far as relates to the fundamental idea, inasmuch as he has a τί ποιήσω, "what shall I do?" before, in which God takes counsel with himself. The three Evangelists agree in their expression of the friendly pre-supposition on the part of God: They will reverence my Son! Thus condescendingly in the manner of men does Christ speak of his heavenly Father (in Luke with an ἴσως, "surely"); comp. Isa. lxiii. 8, where there is a similar expression. He will thereby teach that God makes trial of all goodness in men, just as if he knew not beforehand in what cases it will prove in vain; he thus portrays to the wicked ones what, instead of their wickedness, ought to have been their conduct, and thereby holds up their criminality all the more strikingly before their eyes.

For alas! the sad history proceeds further: They saw the Son and did not reverence him! Christ connects the events of the future that were now at hand, and only not yet accomplished in outward act, into one history with the past. For, in the murderous decree of the high priests against Jesus, which had now been in existence for a considerable time, in particular since John xi. 53, the awful deed was already as good as done: ver. 38 is really as much history as what goes before; ver. 39 views prophetically beforehand as present what happened a few days afterwards; while ver. 40 first points to the future consequences. That these wilfully ignorant "knowers," although they did not understand the sufferings and sacrificial death of the Messiah (1 Cor. ii. 8) in prophecy, yet, in other respects, knew enough concerning him to make their conscience respond to the testimony of the Baptist with a Οὗτός ἐστιν, "This is he!"—this Christ knew without their telling him; and he now begins, already before they have crucified him, to exercise upon them, as the Searcher of hearts, his office as Judge. They knew how to find at once from Scripture the newly-born Saviour, although they had no de-ἀπέστειλαν. It is used here in the entirely new and special signification in capite vulnerare (Vulg.); Casaubon has directed attention to the fact that the verbs in ὁω and ίζω correspond to each other, and κατατρίζειν in Aristoph. and Laert. is only εἰς τὴν κατάρα τύπτειν. Lange quite correctly: "They handled him roughly on the head." On the other hand, Lightfoot and Usher would apply here the only other warranted signification of κεφαλαιοῦν (to reckon, sum up): They threw as a mockery of a "reckoning" stones at his head (instead of fruit)—but this interpretation is unsuitably artificial; if that signification is assigned to κεφαλαιοῦν, we must, at all events, explain it with Dupont and Lud. de Dieu: "They made short work and reckoning with him."

* Nitzsch's Sermons, third selection, p. 102.

sire from the first to go to him with the wise men; what Nicodemus afterwards, on his first coming to Christ, John iii. 2, says in his "We know," he says actually in the name of his colleagues, and as what they in conscience believe; how much more must they have been convinced after three years full of testimonies and signs! As our Lord then referred Nicodemus to the typical serpent in the wilderness, so now, even before he plainly speaks of the rejected corner-stone, there lies in his word an almost unconscious side-glance, in that Spirit who views all as a connected whole, to the typical history of Joseph, which, in its prophetical import, extending even to the final restoration of Israel, has long since been recognized by the simplicity of faith, but very little as yet by orthodox science. Come, let us kill him—so it stands in Gen. xxxvii. 20, literally according to the Sept. The coming forth of Joseph from the pit (brought about by God in opposition to the murderous counsel of his brethren), predicted as a mystical resurrection the inevitable fulfillment of those dreams which the envious also believed, inasmuch as they tried to frustrate them; just as now the murderers of Jesus know that he is Christ, even while they seek to destroy him. We are therefore to understand the apostolic words in Acts iii. 17, xiii. 27, with that limitation which the word of Christ here gives to them in the parable: they know not indeed the mystery of the atoning death, and in so far they did not yet know entirely "what they did," yet, on the other hand, they knew enough to make it a grievous sin in them to kill the Prince of Life, to reject him who proved himself to be the Messiah, the Son of God. Thus wonderfully is the counsel of God fulfilled by the hands of men; and that Christ here discloses and foretells all to them in this manner, belongs further to the testimony which it behooved him to make respecting his voluntary surrender of himself. Let us kill the heir, that his inheritance may be ours—is to be understood from John xi. 48: that we may not have to yield up our assumed power to him (as King Herod also after his manner had thought and done). To this counsel of the men belongs the great folly, the wicked delusion, of supposing that this was possible, that the Lord of the vineyard, and Father of this Son, would be without the power to justify the heir, and make good his right; it is the deceit of Satan, whose thought it is properly that is therein expressed. It is, at the same time, a fearfully foolish obstinate perseverance in evil which the parable here, almost plainly coinciding with the history, discloses—the great connecting chain of sinning and resisting, which extends from the fathers to the children (chap. xxiii. 31, 32), according to which Christ was already rejected in the prophets, and now from their rejection his rejection also follows by an unconcerted, yet deeply-grounded oneness of enmity against God, in the history of Israel, and of the whole world. What has happened from of old to the prophets in Israel, as also to all the wise men and witnesses for the truth among the heathen, now finds its fulfillment and consummation in the cross of Christ; the rejection of the Son of God is only the culminating point in the general sin of the world, which specially manifested itself in the obstinacy of the Jews. The casting him out of the vineyard* represents the delivering him up to the Gentiles, as also the putting forth of the crucified One out of the city and camp of God; the remarkably foreseen significance of which is further spoken of in Heb. xiii. 12. By this, in its deepest import, the vineyard was made desolate, the sanctuary laid waste, Israel's title forfeited, and a new society, regarded by them as alien and unclean, founded upon the rejected corner-stone.

Verses 40, 41. The Lord of the vineyard comes himself after they have killed the heir; he has done all for his vineyard that goodness and patience could do, and now he will and must also judge it. The very abrupt question, What shall he do? points back again to the passage in the prophet (Isa. v. 3–6), and summons them to judge themselves. In this connection with Isaiah, as also in the entire tendency of Christ's words to appeal to the consciousness and judgment of the hearers themselves (as we saw above), lies the proof of the fact, that Matthew alone is quite right in making the question of Christ to be answered by them in their confusion. (The two other Evangelists omit this by abridging, and represent Christ as also declaring the sentence which was confirmed by him. It is at the same time quite consistent with this that, according to Luke, several of the people who were listening (see ver. 9) may have interposed their μὴ γένοιτο, God forbid.) The convicted and thoroughly arrested hypocrites† must needs pronounce their own sentence; and they do it with fair pretence, carrying their hypocrisy to the full height, inasmuch as they affect an impartiality just as if they knew not at all that he was speaking to them! This answer is the most complete justification of the judgment of the Jews coming from their own lips, and already an anticipation of that fearful word, chap. xxvii. 25. We might regard it, too, at the same time, as the last, the only remaining form of divine warning addressed

† For certainly these persons themselves, according to the context, and not others of the surrounding hearers, are the speakers in ver. 41. Schleiermacher would regard this as either a very awkward change, or even explain it with Eichhorn as an incorrect understanding of the Aramaic; we, however, have found, from the very beginning of the chapter, the fundamental idea in this, that these persons thus rebuked and put to shame are compelled to pass sentence against themselves. By breaking up the connection as a whole, the interpretation often loses the most important, most decisive means of vindicating the text.

to men—"when they are warned of the deeds which they will do, when they are threatened with what they purpose doing, when they are brought to the point of pronouncing sentence themselves upon the works which they are just about to perpetrate."* But this view of it as an ineffectual warning (once more, so to speak, "they will yet take warning"!) entirely disappears before the judgment which it predicts. Only so much is certain here, "that they were not under any necessity of doing what they did, because he declared it to them beforehand"—it rather remains the sharpest conviction of their own guilt, that it might be said to them, Behold, I have told you before, and yet ye have done it! Thus do God's decree and man's freedom mysteriously coincide in the whole history of the world, and in its centre-point, the cross of Christ: God knew beforehand the free actions as free, and their result, contrary to their design, is only what God had already before determined (Gen. l. 20). For the rest, the κακοὺς κακῶς ἀπολέσει, miserably destroy the wicked (according to genuine Greek proverbial usage, which is very remarkable in Matthew), denotes strongly the just recompense. Erasmus well renders, "Mali cum sint, male perdet illos"—miserable they are, and he will miserably destroy them. Even the letting out of the vineyard to others must now be declared by themselves; thus must they depose themselves, and prepare the way for the immediately following words of Christ. Only Matthew again has the additional clause, pointing to the future—a prophecy also extorted by the Spirit from these reprobates, viz., Who will render him the fruits ἐν τοῖς καιροῖς αὐτῶν, duly in future every year—still spoken parabolically.

Verse 42. Our Lord has reached the point at which he aimed in the parable; he now suddenly leaves it, and in the following words the stone of judgment already falls directly upon their heads. He repeats to the last his old familiar word, which has so often shamed and judged them—Have ye never read in the Scriptures? (Mark has also this Scripture—in addition, namely, to Isa. v., and many others which prophesy of the great guilt of Israel, and the great triumph of their rejected and yet exalted, their killed and yet living, Messiah.) The great enigma, now solved, of the corner-stone, which, from the resurrection onwards, finds an ever-growing fulfillment, and which pervades the entire New Testament from Acts iv. 11—Christ takes from the Hosanna-psalm, which was universally known among the people, and the echoes of which, as it was sounded forth on the occasion of his royal entry, were still in their ears. He then, at ver. 44, brings it again into connection with other passages from the same Isaiah, from whom he had just taken the text about the vineyard; for the connection of the γραφαί, Scriptures, which we even at this day are so slow to learn, is wonderful in our eyes when, in the cross and victory of Christ, we begin to view every thing as done by the Lord—as foreseen by the Lord. He does not at first explain the passage of Scripture, which was clearly evident to the eyes even of the blind; but, assuming for the moment that they understood it, he immediately adds ver. 43.

Must we, however, in opposition to the perverted and obstinate exegesis even of believing commentators,* begin to prove that the 118th psalm is Messianic, that the corner-stone of which it speaks is a real prophecy of the Spirit respecting Christ? We frankly confess ourselves to be often so vexed by such contentions with brethren who do not understand the Scripture that we lose patience; and, however unscientifically, are inclined rather to rebuke them with Christ, Luke xxiv. 25, until their hearts burn, and their burning hearts begin to read in the light of the pentecostal fire what is written. Already do the words added by the people to the Hosanna, Matt. xxi. 9; Mark xi. 10; Luke xix. 38, prove a Messianic interpretation as being then generally received, and which Christ could not employ as taken for granted if it were false. True, this wondrously profound song embraces, in the design of the prophetic Spirit, whose sublime sounds breathe upon us from it as surely as from any part of the ancient Scripture, the entire history of the triumph of the just, combining in one view the "not dying but living" of the true Israel and the triumph of their Lord and Head (as is done also elsewhere in the prophets); still, the fulfillment in the person of Christ is and remains the fundamental meaning, upon which the further application is built. He who will acknowledge in the Old Testament no foreseeing design of the Spirit transcending the human consciousness of the prophets, moving above the typical histories and relations in independent miraculous power, finds the just recompense of this false inspiration-theory—this denial of that very quality which characteristically belongs to the inspired writer, as rightly understood, especially in such passages as that now before us—in a most unworthy degradation of the words of Christ and his apostles to a mere play upon Old Testament phrases in moments of most exalted and holy earnestness. We acknowledge and testify, on the contrary, that our "Christian consciousness"—a more exactly defined one than that of Schleiermacher—resists throughout every interpretation in which the use of the words here cited does not coincide with their true meaning. This, and nothing else, was what the holy Evangelist Luke thought, when he wrote the question of Christ which, if not literally correct, must yet be so in the spirit: Τί οὖν ἐστι τὸ γεγραμμένον τοῦτο; "What then is this that is written ?" what else but a prophecy of me and my kingdom ?

The Lord of the vineyard cometh; but he cometh only in the same Son and heir who rises again from death. Other prophecies have manifoldly spoken of a rejection and subsequent glorification of the coming Messiah ; already at Luke ix. 22, xvii. 25, has Christ referred his disciples to these. The builders who reject him (בּוֹנִים, οἰκοδομοῦντες, i. e., here the master-builders who select and arrange the stones), are partly the elders, high-priests, and scribe, who are there named by Christ, partly Israel as a whole, represented and led by them—this generation and people, Luke xvii. 25. Peter, in Acts iv. 11, gives prominence to the first and narrower sense by the pronoun ὑμῶν, you. The corner-stone is the foundation and chief stone of a new building;* for, in Psa. cxviii., viewed as a mystically prophetic festal song for entrance into the temple, it is a building that is spoken of, which, at the same time, is the true house, people, and kingdom of God (so that it is unnecessary to compare with this the remotely related phraseology in which princes are represented as corners and corner-stones of the people, Zech. x. 4; Isa. xix. 13; Judges xx. 2; 1 Sam. xiv. 38). The same thing which in the psalm is called רֹאשׁ פִּנָּה, κεφαλὴ γωνίας, "head of the corner," is, in Isa. xxviii. 16, אֶבֶן פִּנָּה, λίθος ἀκρογωνιαῖος, "corner-stone," as Paul and Peter in like manner retain the expression of the Sept. The three Evangelists preserve also precisely the old rendering (with the attraction at the beginning, λίθον ὅν), according to which αὕτη, this, the Hebraistic expression for זֹאת, stands as neuter: This is done by the Lord; this is wonderful in our eyes (not, as many wrongly infer from 1 Pet. ii. 7: This stone is, notwithstanding, a precious stone of wonder in the eyes of believers). In our eyes: this the enemies also must say, see the fulfillment in Acts iv. 13. Yes, in the eyes of the whole world, the Church built on the crucified Jew (see Ullmann's Apologetik), the glorifying of the rejected One, which was the doing of the Lord, is the great enigma, miracle, and sign, of the world's history. They had marked this stone with contempt and cast it away, so that no man ventured to lift it up ; but God has raised him up, and made him the foundation of the building against which even the gates of hell do not prevail. God sends his only-begotten in the flesh to sinners—his highest grace! The sinners crucify him—their horrible sin. And yet grace triumphs over sin, nay, out of it prepares the salvation of the world !

Verse 43. First of all, indeed, they who have rejected him must in their turn be rejected; and salvation passes from the Jews to the Gentiles. The word which now follows takes up the expression "become the head of the corner" from what goes before, and returns at the same time to the parable of the vineyard with a plain interpretation of it. This interpretation, in the free expansion of the figure, deviates from the prophetic basis ; for. in Isaiah, the vineyard is Israel, therefore laid waste and abandoned ; here, however, it is the institution and planting, which has hitherto been in Israel, but is now given over to others—the kingdom of God. It is taken from you builders or husbandmen, and therewith, from the entire people; for the former building without this corner-stone must certainly fall. The ἔθνει, nation, which stands opposed to Israel, denotes not the Gentiles in common (as Luther has it); but a new people of God gathered from all nations, the true people of God which does not reject the offered grace, the Church which does not again pervert grace through self-will (Acts xv. 14). For it is said of this people, ποιοῦντι καρποὺς αὐτῆς, bringing forth the fruits thereof; in which expression the ποιεῖν καρπούς, "bring forth fruits" (instead of ἀποδιδόναι, "render," ver. 41), now leads back to Isaiah, and αὐτῆς, "thereof," referred to βασιλεία, or kingdom, speaks of the fruits of the kingdom of heaven, i. e., such as are worthy of this kingdom, such as are proper to it.

Verse 44. Mark makes the discourse of Christ break off with Psa. cxviii. ; Luke, contrary to his wonted peculiarity, says nothing in this place of the transference of the kingdom to another people. But he does not omit the concluding word respecting the stone, he rather brings this into close connection with the passage from the psalm. Christ also proves the Messianic significance of the psalm by bringing into connection with it other passages in Isaiah, and last of all, a decisive prophecy concerning the kingdom from Daniel, and that too (as is particularly to be observed) with an expression, ἐπὶ τὸν λίθον τοῦτον, "upon this stone," which pre-supposes and affirms the identity of all these stones that are spoken of here and there in the Scriptures. Can you believe, orthodox theologians, and Christian commentators, that the Son of God has here trifled with an arbitrary combination of Old Testament phrases ? Was he one who could do this ? Was the tone of his feeling on this occasion such as could have done this ? Or, if not, what then remains but that all these Scriptures cited by him, with such holy judicial earnestness, belong to that which is written by the prophets concerning the Son of Man ? The transition or the return from Psa. cxviii. to Isaiah is immediately effected by the allusion to Isa. xxviii. 16, where also mention is made of a precious corner-stone of the sure foundation of all believers. If, in this passage, the idea as yet only embraces in general the proffered refuge and security in God, although of course not without a glance at the Messianic salvation in the background, there is a nearer and more direct reference to the coming Messiah in the other saying, Isa. viii. 14, 15, which the Lord distinctly cites here. In this latter passage Emmanuel is promised to the people, and such a promise is already given beforehand that in faith they could and should triumph with Emmanuel; but Jehovah of Hosts becomes, as Emmanuel, a sanctuary and asylum only to the few disciples, the multitude falls through unbelief into darkness, and there happened then typically what was afterwards to be the designation of the true Emmanuel at his birth (Luke ii. 34), viz.: The Lord and God of Israel becomes to them a stone of stumbling and rock of offence (Isaiah נִשְׁבָּרוּ, Sept. συντριβήσονται, here συνθλασθήσεται, which indeed is the same thing). Finally, however, in order to speak quite plainly, Christ, by the association of direct contrariety, connects with this citation that prophecy of the kingdom in Daniel, Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44, concerning the stone that comes without human hands, that becomes a mountain filling the world, and bruises all hostile kingdoms and powers (Dan. הֵדֵק, Sept. ver. 44, λεπτυνεῖ καὶ λικμήσει, as here). In Daniel, just as in the psalm, ὁ λίθος οὗτος, this stone, is not merely the person of the Messiah, but, along with him, his people and kingdom; only however, in so far as, and because, it is founded upon him, does every stone of the entire building participate in the nature and quality of the foundation-stone. And does not our Lord interpret precisely thus here, when in τὸν λίθον τοῦτον, "this stone," he connects his words as well with ver. 42 as with the βασιλεία, or kingdom, ver. 43? By his impressive conclusion, therefore, he will say neither more nor less than what corresponds to the true inmost sense of the passages of Scripture, manifoldly combined by him into one: As it begins in the rejection of my person, so will it continue to be with my kingdom upon earth, in which I continue to live and conquer; always new offence on the part of those who reject to their own hurt, but at last a certain and complete judgment upon all who are obstinate in resisting. For this stone is, as רֹאשׁ פִּנָּה, "head of the corner," at once the under foundation and upper cope-stone of the building, whoever (of Jews or Gentiles) henceforth stumbles on the firmly-laid foundation, and falls upon it as a stone of offence,* he shall indeed fall and be broken, instead of being built and established upon it; but he upon whom the full weight of this foundation of God, which also remains as the one key-stone (2 Tim. ii. 19), falls, shall be crushed, broken, and shivered to pieces. First, then, there is the self-condemnation through unbelief in the Saviour in his low estate (who in his kingdom of the cross is still the crucified and rejected One before the world); afterwards the judgment of God through the victorious might of the exalted One, in his perfected kingdom. The first breaking is still of a warning and salutary kind; for he who falls upon the stone may yet become wise, so as in repentance and faith to set himself up on the same stone on which he fell. The grinding into powder is irretrievable ruin. "In the first punishment the corner-stone appears at rest, and, as it were, passive; in the second, it is active and in motion. The corner-stone at rest is Jesus as he now reveals himself to us in the Word and Gospel, where he does not judge, but waits for all to come to repentance. The corner-stone grinding the wicked offenders to powder is Jesus as he will reveal himself in the judgment of the world, in his power and glory."† Take heed thou who hearest and readest this! Art thou called a Christian, then the rejected corner-stone lies every where in thy way, and thou must either in faith build upon it, or in unbelief fall upon it. But woe to thee, if it should ever fall on thy hostile head!

* And so this answer of Christ at the end is substantially parallel to that first one at the beginning, John ii. 19. Break down—I build up again! Reject —the rejected becomes a new foundation.

* As here Schleiermacher admits that Christ has "worked up" a former parable.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE KING'S SON.

(Matt. xxii. 2–14.)

This is a more expanded repetition of a parable spoken already at an earlier period (at an entertainment on a Sabbath day in the house of a Pharisee, (Luke xiv. 16–24), and one of the most striking examples of the fact, that the wisdom and love of Christ condescended to such repetitions.* The connection in which these two kindred parables occur is, in both cases, one of the very exact kind, such as show it to be historical: in Luke the whole is a manifestly progressive development, from ver. 7 onwards; while Matthew here by the πάλιν ἐν παραβολαῖς, again in parables (ver. 1), and the formula of continuation (ver. 15), closely connects this parable with these last sayings of Christ to his enemies, which are all to be conceived of as more or less public. In Luke, as before (vers. 7–14), the pride of the guests and the self-interest of the host are humbled and rebuked; and now, in the parable that follows, he proceeds to check the false claim to a participation in the supper of the kingdom of heaven (ver. 15), artlessly interposed by one who seemed to think that the matter was settled by an edifying exclamation! In answer to this the Lord says: "Ye are not yet sure of this! Ye are invited indeed to this supper, but unless ye come in the right way, by renouncing the world, ye shall not taste of the supper, but others shall do so in your stead!" This is in that passage of Luke the simple principal point of view; and, only after the introduction of the "publicans and sinners" in the place of the Pharisees (ver. 21), does Christ, in a short word, ver. 23, prophetically anticipate the calling of the Gentiles, while he immediately breaks off again at verse 24, and returns to the beginning and the occasion of his discourse. Here, on the contrary, it is the main design further to announce and confirm the transference of the kingdom of God to the Gentiles, mentioned at chap. xxi. 42, 43; and, viewing this generally in its historical progress, to show after the former parable what will then further take place, when the Son nevertheless receives and retains the kingdom. From this will appear the pervading points of difference between the two parables. In Luke it is as yet with general indefiniteness only the great supper of a man; in Matthew it is the marriage or inauguration feast of the king's son. There it is only one servant who calls, and who represents the general idea of invitation; here there are servants repeatedly sent, as in the foregoing parable. There the guests merely excuse themselves and stay away; here (with a brief allusion to what was there said, ver. 5) they again maltreat and murder the servants. There it is the poor and the infirm in the city, and then all that are without, who are called in place of those first invited; here the invitation goes forth at once to all the world. There the abrupt conclusion is that those who were invited shall not taste the supper; here there is a sentence of punishment upon the murderers and their city. There the house is filled with the new guests; here the view extends further so as to show how, even among those who are called, there are many who will not be chosen.

* Artificial, and contrary to the fundamental idea in Isaiah and Peter, is the sense in which some have understood it, viz.: Whosoever would move it away as it were—with the whole force of his bent body—so that fall upon it would be here the Hebr. נפל, equivalent to set upon it with hostile intent, to attack it (Roos).

Verse 2. The householder of the preceding parable appears now as King; and this of itself marks an advance and transition to the New Testament period which the commentators, in tracing the connection of these two parables, have, for the most part, mistaken. For, although the kingdom of God, the theocracy, was already with the Jews, it was yet only in a preparatory and typical form over the one family, and the setting up of the great kingdom took place, properly speaking, only in the Messiah, when he came: The βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ, "kingdom of God," was, at the same time, nay predominantly, matter of prophecy and expectation. Now, however the rejected stone becomes, notwithstanding, the corner-stone; the Son who was slain lives and ascends the throne. For this accession to the government, this inauguration solemnity is certainly meant by the ποιεῖν γάμους, making a marriage. Γάμοι (as nuptiae = γάμος, afterwards ver. 8) often, indeed, in other places, signifies simply (like the German Hochzeit, originally a hohe Zeit) a feast or banquet in general, as Luke xiv. 8; and regard is had to this signification in the τὸ ἄριστόν μου, my supper, ver. 4. (The Sept. puts γάμος for מִשְׁתֶּה, Gen. xxix, 22, and Esth. i. 5, comp. δοχή Esth. i. 3; but, at Esth, ii. 18, the rendering of the same מִשְׁתֶּה by τοὺς γάμους Ἐσθήρ is intended to denote more definitely the marriage-feast of her who was raised to the rank of queen). Here at least, in the parable of Christ, it is quite as wrong to adhere exclusively to the idea of the feast (as Syr. משתותא) as it is to develop the strict idea of the marriage or nuptials, after the manner of many commentators and preachers, often with an excess of improper trifling. The marriage of the King's Son, solemnized by a feast of joy, is his accession to the throne, since, according to oriental and Old Testament conceptions, the people are united with their ruler as by marriage. The King, and the King's Son to whom the kingdom is given, are the same of whom Psa. lxxii. 1, and Psa. ii. prophesy; his marriage is to be understood from Psa. xlv., where also the people who are brought to him are represented as the bride, comp. 1 Chron. xxix. 22. Still, on the other hand (as more recent commentators in avoiding one mistake have fallen into the other), the figure of the marriage is not entirely to be set aside, as a mere figure for the inauguration; it retains at the same time its truth, as indeed Christ in other places frequently speaks of marriage, and even the Baptist spoke of the bridegroom and the bride. For something must correspond to this figure, and where would be the bride, if she were not the invited guests and subjects themselves? Only, indeed—and this is of importance in opposition to the improper conceits in which many here indulge—no single guest by himself is called the bride or a bride, so that it might be proper to speak of brides; but the people as a whole, the Church, is the bride of Christ, and every guest so, in a certain sense, really only as an invited guest, and one who takes part in the marriage.* This great marriage, with all its preparation, extends through a long period, from the coming and presentation of the Bridegroom down to the last marriage-feast properly so called; from the beginning of the kingdom to its consummation. Hence afterwards in Matt. xxv. 1–12 the end is represented as the proper marriage (as Rev. xix. 6, 7), and here also, at the close of the parable, the coming of the King to his guests stretches thus far forward.*

Verses 3, 4. The view which we have taken of the beginning of this parable—in so far as, further prophesying, it connects itself with the conclusion of the preceding one and continues the history of the rejected Son—shows the impropriety of the interpretation generally adopted, according to which the servants here are again the Old Testament prophets. Olshausen understands both sendings thus; Grotius finds, at least in the second, the apostles and Evangelists; but even the first servants invite to a marriage already prepared, and an inauguration of the King's Son just about to begin. This Son, who, in the former parable, was as yet himself only a servant who invited others—the last and greatest prophet—is now the exalted Lord, to whose presence the servants with kindness and long-suffering invite those to whom they are sent. Did not this take place in the apostle's sermon concerning the crucified One to his crucifiers, as chap. xxiii. 34 presently foretells? Observe the important difference between the two parables! Formerly fruits were demanded; now an invitation is given to the supper. There was also an invitation to come in faith, a holding forth of promised grace, contained as a New Testament in the bosom of the Old, together with the demand for righteousness, i. e., sincere and earnest penitence in reference to the law—but this is not meant by Christ in his second parable, in which he advances further. For here, as at chap. xxiii. 34, all that he means to say is: God will begin again to preach to you after my exaltation, but ye will do to my prophets and messengers precisely as ye did to those that went before, and to myself! In the expression καλέσαι τοὺς κεκλημένους, "to call those that were bidden," at the very outset, the entire Old Testament, with all the calls that had been addressed to the Jews as the pre-elected guests of the kingdom of God, is pre-supposed (comp. Luke xiv. 16, 17, where, after a first ἐκάλεσε, there follows at the hour of supper the same εἰπεῖν τοῖς κεκλημένοις). The custom at that time, and yet prevalent in eastern countries (in the west existing here and there as a popular custom), of inviting twice—first as it were nominating the guests, and then calling them again to the feast when it is ready*—affords a simple and suitable figure for the relation between the Old and New Testament invitation addressed to Israel.† The first gracious and covenant word, viz., "Ye are my people, the called of the present and future kingdom!" they had complacently received, and they imagined themselves to be the guests who could not fail to sit down at the table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But the coming, the true coming according to God's method of salvation—they failed in that! This was already evident from the preparatory demand of the prophets for the true readiness; and it is now at last fully evident when, after God has made all things ready, they obstinately persevere in not willing and not coming. It is clear, then, that the guests here marked out beforehand are the Jews collectively, as vers. 7–9 also proves; on the other hand, in Luke xiv., the idea of certain persons invited before others is that which is more prominent, so that there, at ver. 21, the publicans and sinners stand in contrast with the Scribes and Pharisees, who, according to their own opinion, were, without more ado, entitled to the resurrection of the just. But why is there here also in the New Testament sending, as in the foregoing parable, a twofold call, a πάλιν ἄλλους δούλους, "yet other servants?" This cannot be without its significance here, any more than there. We think the first servants in this parable are John the Baptist, with his call to come to the Messiah and Bridegroom; and joined with him the Twelve and Seventy, who continued his preaching concerning the kingdom of heaven being at hand, in their first mission to the cities of Israel. This is the interpretation lately given by Helferich ;‡ and, in fact, we should have felt some surprise had the Saviour no where expressed a special condemnation of the unbelief in this first and evangelical preaching of his forerunner, and of those whom he sent before himself. He does this here, and at this point the two parables, which are connected by the link of continuation, run into each other; as was actually the case in the transition from the Old to the New Testament. The former parable has represented the Baptist, and even the Son himself, as the finishers of the Old

* The distinction made by some, recently also by Meyer, between ἄριστον and δεῖπνον, the morning meal and the cœna properly so called, seems artificial. For, although certainly the δεῖπνον, Luke xiv., plainly points forward to the future "eating of bread in the kingdom of God" (ver. 24, φάγεται), yet the ἄριστον also in Matt. ver. 4, comprehends the entire meal with the final perfect enjoyment, even on to the decision of the judgment, and afterwards; for when the unworthy are cast out, then properly the supper begins. We are certainly not to understand festivities of the same day following each other (at the beginning, and as a foretaste, the morning meal, then the principal entertainment). Christ himself contradicts such a distinction of the words used by him, when at Luke xiv. 12, 13, he speaks of ἄριστον ἢ δεῖπνον as a δοχή in general.

* In particular was this a custom among the upper classes at Jerusalem. Sepp cites Echa rabbathi, 4. 2: "Quaenam fuit gloria Hierosolymitanorum? Nemo eorum venit ad convivium, nisi bis vocatus."

† Not in accordance with the text therefore is the idea, otherwise true, which some find here: According to eternal love and election those called were already held as guests before the calling. Or again: "I have prepared a marriage-feast; a marriage feast needs guests, call 'the guests' hither, for whom I have prepared it."

‡ Namely, F. J. M. Helferich of Dolgesheim. See his original Sermons (Frankfort, 1841), which, in spite of their many faults, we yet strongly recommend on account of their fresh life, and their quaint originality.

Testament message, which required something of those to whom it was addressed, and this was the one side of the truth; to supplement it, however, the other side must now follow, according to which the Baptist, and the apostles and Evangelists who were analogous to him in their first mission, invite to the kingdom which has just begun, to the marriage which is just about to be celebrated. (Christ's own call, "Come unto me!" remains here properly in the background, as the plan of the parable requires. In Luke, chap. xiv, on the other hand, the one servant was actually the Son in disguise; his invitation, with its result, however, was certainly also that which is there represented—consequently the same as Matt. ver. 5.) This interpretation is not confuted, but rather confirmed, when we see how the first invitation is called only a καλέσαι εἰς τοὺς γάμους, or "call to the marriage;" on the contrary, at the second, properly the apostolic invitation, not only is the hour of the banquet near at hand, but now all things are, properly speaking, ready. But that this last preparation of the feast consists in the atoning, sacrificial death of him who was slain—this mysterious and innermost truth, Christ, of course, as yet conceals, and has only hinted at it in the preceding parable.

The first result, They would not come! by no means denotes a first stage of rejecting unbelief, the "lowest degree" as exemplified in the indifferent who have only no inclination to come and nothing further—as most preachers say, and even Dräseke in his excellent three sermons on this parable. But it is the disclosure, as yet in a general style, of the state of things which the unbelieving resistance of the people, from their fathers downwards, had brought about, such as must become manifest in the days of Jesus the Son of Man; it is the same which, after having led them ever nearer to it, he leaves with them at last, Matt. xxiii. 37, but which he had also frequently said to them since John v. 40. They would not, i. e., simply, they did not come, and that through the fault of their own not willing; because the promised kingdom pleased them indeed, but not the divinely appointed way of coming into it, because they desired a Messiah, but not the actual Messiah as he now appears to them. Afterwards, vers. 5, 6, this οὐκ ἤθελον, "they would not," is by no means intensified; but the persons spoken of are now first more exactly distinguished according to the two classes of the merely negatively indifferent, and the positively hostile.

The guests, who had already made their unwillingness so manifest, continue nevertheless, in the eye of God's long-suffering, to be, and are again called, the guests; and as if he cannot suppose or give credit to so horrible a thing, he sends the apostles in a last season of grace before the judgment to say, Will men then show such contempt to their God and Lord, as they would be ashamed of were it done to a man; namely, that he should have prepared a banquet, and that the guests should not come to it? Therefore, "Tell them which are bidden; tell them once more in true and faithful words; perhaps all that has gone before has not been rightly done, or not rightly heard and considered, perhaps the poor people may yet bethink themselves, may yet become willing and come." Oh, how love constrains the King to dispose of his banquet, to win and keep his rebellious subjects! All former unwillingness is to be forgiven, a new Behold! displays the gifts of grace, prepared through the atonement of Christ, in all their entire sufficiency and glory. All that is needed is to come, and that every one should bring nothing with him but his poverty and sin, only even yet to kiss and to acknowledge the King's Son; all things are yet open, now (Luke xiv. 17, ἤδη) for the first time all things are perfectly ready. This now is certainly the apostolic, and no longer the prophetic invitation. The carrying out of the metaphor of a banquet by the slaughter of oxen and fatlings, points back to Prov. ix. 2, 3, as our Lord ever delights in throwing the light of fulfillment upon Old Testament words—τεθυμένα, "killed," however, does not necessarily indicate a sacrificial meal (for θύειν has the same signification with σφάζειν, as, in the New Testament, John x. 10 proves, and Prov. ix. 2, Sept. ἔσφαξε τὰ ἑαυτῆς θύματα for טִבְחָה טִבְחָהּ). When God furnishes and prepares for his only begotten Son the feast of the kingdom, the pleasure and honor of bestowing salvation upon sinners, what a fulness of glory must there be in the enjoyment of it! But those who will not have the Son do not come, and if they remain in this state of mind they must certainly be judged as obstinate rebels. The grace of God in Christ is a grace which overtakes the sinner, which is all-sufficient, which repeatedly invites and urges, but it does not compel; for those who resist it there remains the condemnation, Ye would not, although I would with all earnestness and long-suffering zeal!

Verses 5, 6. The ἀμελήσαντες or careless—which is a milder expression than to make light of or scorn—are those indifferent ones who are sunk in earthliness, and with whom "the remnant" are contrasted as making a hostile resistance. Already have the first class of guests their own farm and merchandise, which stand over against the "my supper" in the invitation immediately before; indicating the sinful cleaving to the things of the world that characterizes them, and consequently the root and germ of the same feeling of pride in which afterwards the false guest despises the wedding-garment of the King. "I myself have my garment; I make ready my own feast; I have even to celebrate my own wedding"—for Christ here briefly calls to mind the excuses of Luke xiv. 18–20 (I must go elsewhere, I go elsewhere, I can not, i. e., I will not come). The one has already his property and land; the other is still eager on making gain by his trade and merchandise

Tell those who are thus indifferent to the call of God, that all which they call their own profits them nothing, and as a vain thing cannot save them; follow them upon their earthly ways with this testimony, and with the entreaty that they will accept the gracious gifts of the King—and they will in the end show themselves to be also positively hostile, and all the more angry and insolent the more kindly grace has been offered to them.*

Verse 7. What, in the figure of the ἄνθρωπος βασιλεύς or king, is an exhaustion of long patience and a sudden outbreak of just anger, is in the Lord God one and the same with his holy love; nay, the burning anger itself testifies to the fervent love of the all-sufficient Creator towards the creature who obstinately refuses all his grace and goodness.† If thou wilt see a most special testimony to the true wrath of God, which broke forth after the times of long-suffering, and in due time, then look at the destruction of Jerusalem,‡ and see how the wrath of God is come upon these Jews "to the uttermost," εἰς τέλος, (1 Thess. ii. 16, i. e., עַד־כָּלָה, ἕως τέλους, Dan. ix. 26, 27). The Lord refers precisely to this prophecy of Daniel, in which he already properly breaks through the parable with the prophetically present explanation. As at chap. xxiv. 15, he mentions the abomination of desolation, so now he says, πέμψας τὰ στρατεύματα αὐτοῦ, "he sent forth his armies," which corresponds to the עַם נָגִיד הַבָּא, "people of the prince that should come," of Daniel. We, therefore (in opposition to Hengstenberg's and Hävernick's not unanswerable reasons), abide by Luther's rendering: And a people of the Prince—the וְעַם נָגִיד יָשִׁיחַ—(if not, shall come, or be sent by him, yet) who comes to judgment through the people sent by him. Just when the Messiah the Prince appears as the Messiah cut off, he comes again as the Prince to destroy the city and the sanctuary. The Romans, as hostile hosts, serve the judging Lord and God of Israel, at the same time, as angels of judgment;* it is these alone (with their eagles, Matt. xxiv. 28, comp. Luke xix. 43), and not higher hosts of God or angels, that we are in the first place to understand as meant here. Their city, no longer the city of the king: this is said by way of rejecting them, as afterwards (chap. xxiii. 38), your house!

Verses 8–10. But now, that grace which will not have the feast made ready in vain begins anew to call other guests and subjects to the most gracious King. Oh how tenderly, and with what gracious sorrow, does the angry King immediately say, The guests were not worthy—as if sinners would have been worthy and deserving had they accepted the first invitation! This is his strongest expression of anger and complaint; he "chides them on the score of honor," because they have robbed him of the prerogative of being gracious to them and bestowing salvation upon them. I wished to bestow upon them honor as my invited guests, but this had no value for them! (See the fulfillment, Acts xiii. 46, and compare the earlier expression, Matt. x. 13.) The servants also who were killed still live; they arise ever anew, for the great King can furnish for himself, even out of his few faithful ones, servants enough for continued sendings. And now first is fully introduced the great and wide kingdom; the new mission goes forth εἰς τὸν κόσμον ἅπαντα, "into all the world" (Mark xvi. 15), beyond the city, and the circle of those first invited, far off to the "ways of the Gentiles" (comp. Luke xiv. 21, 23). This we take to be the right sense of the διεξόδους τῶν ὁδῶν, which occurs only here in the New Testament. Others understand it of cross-ways, as being special places of concourse; but it appears to us more suitable simply to understand it of the roads, going out in all directions from and beyond that which had been hitherto the circle of invitation. (In Ezek. xlviii. 30, תּוֹצָאוֹת הָעִיר is by Aquila, Symmach. and Theodot. rendered by διέξοδοι.) Good and bad we understand simply from the foregoing, Whomsoever ye find, whomsoever they found—therefore equivalent to "without distinction and respect of persons," invite all who will come. This is not already "a going beyond the parable to the application" (Von Gerlach), if it is only suitably understood and explained. Although Pfenninger, with apparent point, observes that both words are always used of men only in a moral sense, yet it would be a very unsuitable anticipation to define the good here already in the invitation. For it is not as good that they are all invited; and those who are at last the ἐκλεκτοί or "chosen" have first become so as κλητοί or "called" (by the garment they have received). So, in chap. xiii. 48 (which is wrongly cited as parallel to the present), the good and bad are not discovered till the

* Does the Gospel, then, throw people thus into anger? Yes, if a man wants to be angry with another, nothing may irritate him more than to seek to overcome and gain him with love. It is even more tolerable to people to be reproved on the score of all the ten commandments. They perceive well what they must rid themselves of if they are to make earnest work of this call (C. H. Rieger).

† If I were to give one an invitation, out of mere civility, to dine with me, while I was not in earnest, I should not be angry if he refused. And, O man, if thy God merely spoke a word of courtesy, if it did not proceed from the deepest depths of his heart when he thus calls thee to blessedness, he would then certainly not be so angry at thee for despising his supper (G. K. Rieger).

‡ Of which the burning city here is not merely "a dark hint" (as Lange thinks). For the rest it is not denied, that this first and foremost type repeats itself in destructions and judgments of all kinds until the final burning of the world.

* Only this is meant here, not any hint already at the circumstance that now the Gentiles are called to the service of Christ.

separation; before this only ἐκ παντὸς γένους, of every kind, ver. 47, was said. By a proverbial expression, therefore, good and bad are sinners and the so-called righteous, the godless and the respectable together—this, indeed, is a moral sense which may be represented in the parable by eminent and obscure, respectable and vulgar, etc. If we look back to chap. xxi. 31, it will be evident that we must seek the guest who is detected as having despised the wedding-garment, only among the "good." Thus the wedding-chamber (for which ὁ γάμος itself is significantly put, for the principal idea is that of the prepared joys and pleasures) does not remain empty; but has become full of ἀνακειμένους, of guests actually come and waiting for the banquet. All these enjoy already somewhat of the royal favor and honor, the gathering meanwhile goes on until all are assembled, there is yet room for every one who has sat down; this is the wide intermediate period in which Christendom, called from among the heathen, now stands. At last, however, the King himself appears, of course with, and in his Son, on whose account the feast is made, and the festivities are now to begin. And now the King must again discriminate, for unworthy guests may not stand before his presence—whether it be that from the first they would not come; or that they have come in a wrong way, having hypocritically intruded themselves into the company, while in heart they are proud despisers.

Verses 11, 12. To the second act of the parable, which is now added, corresponds a similar Jewish proverb about such as venture to enter the palace of the King in a dirty and loathsome state. Our Lord, however, takes his similitude directly from the Scripture, Zeph. i. 8, where, indeed, the קְרוּאַי, "guests," ver. 7, who are sanctified for the great sacrifice, do not correspond to the guests of our parable, but are the executioners of the Lord's anger on the day of judgment; those, however, who are clothed with strange apparel (an expression that is singular in the Old Testament, and remarkable), are the same as the unworthy guest here. There it is especially princes and kings' sons who, in their pride, make a display of their own splendor, or, in their apostasy from Jehovah, let themselves be honored and dressed in purple by strange rulers; while Jehovah will see his own people only in the apparel of his kingdom, decorated only with the favors and honors which he has dealt out. The custom which still exists in the East, and is mentioned from the earliest times in the Old Testament, of presenting festival garments, is well known (Gen. xlv. 22; Judg. xiv. 12; 2 Kings v. 22). These passages contain a sufficient answer to "the objection, that the existence of such a usage in ancient times cannot be proved"—an objection, moreover, which, although it were better grounded, is declared, even by Neander, to be insufficient, inasmuch as we may infer from later customs that similar ones prevailed in the earliest ages. Neander suggests it as a difficulty that Christ did not expressly note this circumstance, and reprimand the guest for his contempt of the offered garment; but we are of opinion that this is very evidently pre-supposed. That the missed wedding-garment can only be such a caftan, offered by the rich king to all the guests, is self-evident; for where otherwise could such as were brought in from the streets obtain their worthy garment?* As the king clothes his guests, the bridegroom his bride (Psa. xlv. 10), so does God himself clothe us with the robe of righteousness and the garment of salvation (Isa. lxi. 10). We may and we must, when he calls, come just as we are—but we may not, if we would see his face and enjoy his last feast, remain as we are. In the way, or rather in the fore-court and anteroom, something takes place beforehand which no one can refuse with impunity, and from which no one can withdraw himself without being found out. This parable, which is designed prophetically to announce the entire counsel and way of God with Jews and Gentiles, becomes complete only when carried out to this decisive point. Olshausen's doubt whether the second part of the parable applies to the Pharisees is easily disposed of. For, in the first place, Christ speaks not merely for them, but for all people and all disciples also in all future time; and then the thought could not but force itself on the conscience of the Pharisees—Such people as you, with your own honor and righteousness, will yourselves never be tolerated by God in his kingdom!

The King comes to view the guests, i. e., now already ἀνακειμένους, or reclining at table, therefore κλητούς, "called," and not merely κεκλημένους, "bidden;" and this entrance and inspection takes place on account of those confident ones who sit and imagine that they will participate in the feast because they have come! Yes, they have come, but not as loyal subjects—they sit at the table, but it is as despisers of the grace of the one Lord and host. Scarcely has the King entered when such a one falls under his eye, who is therefore named as a first specimen of the many, ver. 14. It was indeed told to him, as to all the rest, that every one must put on the wedding-garment offered to him; but his own dress appeared to him sufficient, and in this he has intruded himself, thinking that he may offer this to the most gracious King. He has not indeed despised the feast, but will enjoy it along with the others; however "he wants to belong to the number of the happy, while he will know nothing of terms or conditions" (Dräseke), at least of the one principal condition, namely, that he renounce what belongs to self. What belongs to self, however, is before

* Lange says very truly: "This striking feature of the parable would create no difficulty even if there existed no trace of the recorded custom. The poorest man gets his festival garment if he is called as a favorite to the court." Even in the west this custom quite generally obtains.

God sin; the wilfully hypocritical pride of goodness is in his sight the worst shame and nakedness. That Christ, by the man who has not on the wedding-garment, means in the first place a despiser on such grounds is clear, although we may suppose at the same time a further reference to all to whom in any way the wedding-garment is wanting; for the parable is not meant to say every thing, but only brings forward a principal feature and breaks off. What now is the garment? One might say, The course of life, the works—if that is understood aright, as it is meant in Rev. xix. 8. But quite as well may we say, with Luther's marginal gloss, This is faith—but faith that is genuine, loving, sanctifying; as Wesley very well expresses it, "the righteousness of Christ, first imputed then implanted." To have put on Christ, as the apostle says: If so be that being clothed we shall not be found naked (2 Cor. v. 3)—this is, and must ever be, however, a matter of the inner man; in the last instance only known to ourselves, and manifest to the Judge of hearts. Therefore we do not find here the servants exercising this discrimination; they merely offered the garments according to their commission, and turned away from the door such as were evidently for coming in beggar's rags without any change of raiment; many others, however, passed before them in the crowd whom they could not discern. The King's eyes of flame see differently, and as he sees the unworthy guest, so he judges him. The still half-friendly ἑταῖρε, "friend," just as at chap. xx. 13, is certainly not meant either here or there in a bitter and derisive sense (see chap. xxvi. 50). Even in the mouth of the Judge there is still the condescending, convicting question; and a sufficient answer and excuse would still be accepted, if such were possible. "How camest thou in hither, how hast thou dared even to enter, not to speak of sitting down, without having on a wedding-garment? Thou knowest well that this was prepared for thee according to the right and favor of this feast, and that thou hast despised it."* This is the sin which alone is judged; not the first sin with which we come, but the not receiving the grace that covers and cancels it.

Verses 13, 14 The διάκονοι, ministers, different from the foregoing δούλοις, servants, are here the angels, as in chap. xiii. 39, 49. The man bound by these strong ones can make no resistance; just as when struck dumb before the countenance and word of the King he could not justify himself. The outer darkness, with the weeping and gnashing of teeth, was already spoken of, chap. viii. 12; it recurs again at chap. xxv. 30 (xxiv. 51). Thus far the King in the parable; the concluding saying is added by the Lord Jesus in his own person, taking the place of this King;* just as in Luke xiv. 24 he himself spoke the concluding word. We are already acquainted with this saying concerning the few who are chosen; as in chap. xx. 16, addressed to the disciples, and here to the Pharisees in the presence of all the people. After this parable there is no need for a word being said against the gratia irresistibilis of an absolute decree, which is only put by violence into the words. In like manner the πολλοὶ κλητοί or κεκλημένοι, "many called" or "bidden," are certainly in the first place only in antithesis to the ὀλίγοι, or few; and what is meant to be said is, It will happen to many as to this one here described! That our Lord, according to the original decree and its final execution, calls all, is also in the parable at least provided for in the wide commission, Call whomsoever ye meet! Say to no one, Thou art not meant and invited! but if any one asks, I also? let your answer be, Yes, certainly, all, all, whosoever will come! But as the Gospel is preached gradually to all in due time (1 Tim. ii. 6), as the calling of many is not manifest on earth, we cannot therefore speak historically of a calling of all. This, at all events—with the reserve which the Scripture generally maintains regarding the state of those who are not called upon earth—the πολλοί, "many," here might indicate; for the narrative of the prophetic parable hardly reaches to the last end of the ways of God—the general and last judgment properly speaking.

CHRIST'S ANSWER RESPECTING THE TRIBUTE TO CÆSAR.

(Matt. xxii. 18–21; Mark xii. 15–17; Luke xx. 23–25.)

The preceding formally official question of the unbelieving Jews, with which after three years full of rejected testimonies and signs they would begin anew, had issued ill for those who put it; the Respondent had shamed them, arrested and caught them in their own judgment. Notwithstanding, part of them, here called the Pharisees, acting always with the same unity of compact and determined resistance, lay a plot, in the incorrigible folly of their evil hearts, for entrapping him by words which they would craftily tempt him to utter! He has not yet said enough to them; they are bent upon bringing yet greater shame upon themselves. Such questioning in order to entangle and take him in an answer had indeed been an accustomed device of theirs (Luke xi. 53, 54). But now, in these last days, the evil one especially tempts them to this scheme; not knowing that all the yet remaining testimony for the truth was only thus to be obtained for the world from the mouth of Christ. What is said in Psa. xli. 6–10 must go on fulfilling itself.

* The negation μὴ ἔχων indicates this knowledge, as Winer rightly observes in his Grammar.

* Thus we see that the King (ver. 11) is the Son who ascends the throne, whose oneness with the Father is thus indicated.

On this occasion, it is properly speaking the Pharisaic party, as such, which in a formally deliberative assembly, συμβούλιον, contrives the new artifice. The rulers keep themselves for all issues wisely in the background, they only send their disciples as ἐγκαθέτους, or suborned listeners; these, however, are in cunningly-contrived fellowship with the people (in other respects hated by them) belonging to the party of Herod, who had just come to the feast at Jerusalem. (Of these Herodians we have already spoken, Matt. xvi. 6.) Ecclesiastics and politicians, orthodox and liberals, pietists and free-thinkers—all who, in ordinary circumstances, go separate ways, are here found in friendly combination against Christ. The knaves address the Master (the Pharisees, of course, being spokesmen, for this they will not allow to be taken from them), as if they would learn from him, and as if they would submit themselves to an utterance of his authority. The second word is again their "we know"—not indeed "that thou art come from God, the Messiah"—but "that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth."* Twice do these hypocrites and liars compel themselves to take into their mouths without shame the word which judges them; but this only aggravated their wicked falsehood, just as the devil speaks the worst lies even when he utters truth. "Thou judgest not according to men; and accommodatest thyself to no man"—as they indeed had often enough experienced! "When it concerns teaching the way of God, thou regardest not the person of men"—all this taken together is indeed the highest praise of a teacher, perfectly applicable only to the faithful Witness (Rev. i. 5). And it is here accorded to him by his enemies, who lie when they speak the truth, and who, on the other hand, must needs speak the truth when they think they lie. The wretches think they can cozen Christ with praise as if he were one of themselves; they imagine thus to be able to gain his confidence—as if he stood in this relation to them! As if he—seeing that the truth is in him—must not also know what is in false man! As if he would give his confidence to these men whom he has so long known, when they now all at once strike this new note! No poet could portray united falsehood and folly with more psychological depth and striking effect, than these miserable men depict them in themselves, by a word or two from their own lips, in the simple narrative of the Evangelists.

And now what will they learn from him; what is the question which follows this fine preface? It is in truth, in the then existing circumstances, a very puzzling question respecting the giving of tribute to the Roman emperor. "Tell us now, with thy well-known frankness, which we doubt not thou wilt show on this occasion also, here in the temple before all the people—tell us ὀρθῶς and ἐπ' ἀληθείας (correctly and in truth), What thinkest thou, what is thy doctrine on this point? Thou carest nothing for Cæsar; and nothing for these Herodians, if thou knowest them. Thou knowest that we Pharisees are not at one with them on this subject—judge now between us a true judgment. It is with us an important matter of conscience whether it be lawful or not; nay, rather, it appears to us Pharisees actually a sin to give tribute to Cæsar, to pay a poll-tax,* seeing that we already give our δίδραχμα (didrachm) to the temple of God, and that the people of Jehovah ought to be subjected to no heathen government."† After the first question, ἔξεστι δοῦναι ἢ οὔ; "Is it lawful to give or not?" in which the case is proposed, there follows in Mark the urgent repetition of the question, δῶμεν ἢ μὴ δῶμεν; "Shall we give or not?" "We want a clear and categorial answer, Yes or No! to this 'burning question' about paying and giving, which is of so much consequence to all the people." With such ludicrous boldness do they expose themselves to the Holy One, who has already so often judged them and put them to flight; in the vain imagination that he cannot escape from this cunningly-twisted snare. Displease one party he certainly must, they think. For, should he say No (which was the answer they expected, and wished for), then the Herodians, who were favorably disposed to the dominion of the Romans, would be witnesses to the accusation against him; while the Pharisees would be ready, as "impartial, honest" people, to be joint witnesses with them in such a case; and the cry would go forth, he has decided that we should not give (comp. Luke xx. 20 with xxiii. 2). Should he say, Yes—then he would compromise himself with the people, who were expecting emancipation from the yoke of Rome. And if he should not answer at all, that would be equally little to the purpose. This is their plot, and they fail because their wickedness has blinded them.

Verses 18, 19. They do not need to wait, their answer comes immediately, but very contrary to what they expected. With one glance, and in majestic calmness, he tears in pieces their net, repels with becoming dignity the flattery of their lips; while he accepts

* In Luke it is somewhat a circumlocution: ὅτι ὀρθῶς λέγεις καὶ διδάσκεις, i. e., Thou speakest privately and in particular every word, and publicly and in general all thy teaching—according to truth.

* In Luke φόρος, which, as distinguished from τέλος, indicates always personal taxes.

the truth that lay in their words, and gives them forthwith to their face the desired proof of the fact that he truly speaks without regarding the person of men. "Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Ye represent yourselves as tenderly conscientious people (Luke, δίκαιοι), and yet hide beneath this pretence the most perfect malice!" This first word, accompanied with the majestic glance of holy judicial anger, would have been quite sufficient to send them away speechless. But the Lord will not merely triumph over these enemies by such a direct demonstration of power; he will condescendingly teach them to the last, even when it is malice that bids him; he will yet obediently do the will of him who sent him to testify for the truth (John xviii. 37). Thus does his victory become a manifold and complete one; thus does his love beat down their malice, his humility their impudence, his wisdom their folly; thus does he bless his enemies with a salutary rebuke, if they would only receive it, and utter a great and most momentous word for Israel and for the whole world. That word he will utter in a thoroughly convictive and memorable way, placing it in concrete connection with something palpable, so that it may be no mere word. He will damp the warm and passionate eagerness of his interrogators—as was becoming to himself, and beneficial to them—before the utterance that requires hearing ears comes from his mouth. He will, finally, make the tempters themselves, taken in their own snare, produce the symbolical and real decision of their own question! Thus does he, in one moment of simple wisdom, discover more reflection than they have done by their long deliberation. "Show or bring me the coin with which ye (in spite of your scruples) pay the tribute!" Mark and Luke say at once δηνάριον, "a penny," which is the same thing. The former makes Christ use the word φέρετε, because they would actually have first to fetch and produce a Roman denarius; which Christ indeed foresaw, but yet in his word will not pre-suppose (as this would somewhat impair its dignity).* Meanwhile the expectation of the people is on the stretch; there is a solemn stillness which admonishes all who can and will give heed, to open their ears and their hearts.

Verses 20, 21. And he does not yet answer with the first word, does not say Yes or No, as they had asked of him; but puts another question in return—What money is this? whose is this image and superscription? We see how he catechises the hypocrites again, as simply as in that other place (chap. xxi. 31). They shall and they must continue to testify against themselves; and by the extorted answer, "Cæsar's," lay the ground upon which he suddenly takes his stand with the judicial word which, without Yes or No, more than sufficiently settles the whole question: Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's.

If there be any one who feels, or will acknowledge, no fulness and depth of meaning in this wondrous word of Christ—we pity his feeling, his understanding, or his exegetical caprice. When Dr. Justus Jonas calls this Gospel (the 23d of Trinity) "the tronblesome Gospel which has bitten so many preachers"—we can understand this only of a pitiful anxiety on the part of poor preachers to find a definite and sharply pointed sensus simplex in the pregnant words for a short and plain sermon. But when the Wandsbecker Bote says—"Andrew,* what a fulness of meaning in all that comes from his mouth! It reminds me of those boxes, in which every one is found to inclose another"—we heartily agree with the observation. But we shall not be satisfied with merely remarking this; we shall venture to open the boxes one after the other, and to look into them; in other words, to consider and develop the fulness of the meaning in due order.

The first and most direct sense, then, in answer to the question (seeing that the imperial coin had been shown, and that this was what was spoken of), is certainly, Render to every one his tribute! This connects itself immediately with the proof given by their hand into Christ's hand that they have two kinds of coin; the Roman, with Cæsar's image and title, and the holy temple-money with another stamp. This proves two things: the right of Cæsar to his money; and the freedom of the temple and the temple tax, which indeed Cæsar had not yet taken from them. Olshausen speaks from exegetical caprice, which cannot reconcile itself to words being taken typically in many senses, when he boldly affirms that "every reference of the τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ τῷ θεῷ, 'unto God the things that are God's,' to the temple tax of half a shekel disturbs the point of view of the entire narrative." For if τὰ Καίσαρος, "the things that are Cæsar's," means at all events first the coin, and then figuratively much more (which, in opposition to the universal preaching on this text in Christendom, he cannot and will not deny), the same must surely hold good of the antithesis in the other member. The jejune Michaelis is also right when he demonstrates this first sense. According to him,† there lay in this question something of the caustic, genuine Pharisaic scruple: "the yearly poll-tax belongs to God, who has imposed it upon us in his law, and we have conscientious scruples against giving to Cæsar what is God's." But the emperor at that time did not yet require, as Vespasian did afterwards, the half-shekel to be given to the capitol instead of the temple. Our Lord first of all indicates this: "Such money is not even received in the temple, it is in fact the coin of the emperor current among you; ye may with good conscience, nay ye ought, to give to each of your two masters his own tax and coin." A rabbinical rule says, "The coin of the country shows the master"—i. e., actual subjection follows from the currency of the accepted coin. Accordingly Christ says to them in effect: Ye do not in other respects despise the emperor's money, ye acknowledge his dominion by your making use of it; if your conscience were so tender, then the difficulty must have occurred to you sooner, and such money should not at all have been used by you. This, then, is the first meaning, and that which lies most evidently on the surface; but is it, as Michaelis thinks, the sole, the entire meaning, "only more concisely and elegantly expressed," without τὸ νόμισμα or the coin? We protest strongly against this, and proceed still further to open the boxes.

* Bengel infers from what Mark further adds: ἵνα ἴδω—that I may see it—that Christ till this time had never had such money before his eyes; but this seems far-fetched and open to easy confutation. The expression simply means: We will see how the matter stands; give me the corpus delicti that I may examine and give judgment upon it.

* The above quotation is from a dialogue in the works of Claudius. Andrew is the name of one of the speakers.

A Dr. Am Ende preached from these words in the Krenz-Kirche at Dresden, 1756, before Frederick the Great, and drew from them as his theme the Prussian motto, Suum cuique. Quite justly; for in the τὰ Καίσαρος—τὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the things that are Cæsar's—the things that are God's," with its widening circle of meaning, Christ really intends further to say this, and to mark the true distinction between God and Cæsar. He will show that the two services are quite compatible the one with the other, leaving no room for any scruple of conscience; as Solomon, Eccles. viii. 2, has said of the king of Israel (which indeed was not quite the same) and the God of Israel. The questioners have in a manner set God and men in opposition to each other; so that the answer, from this point of view, should allow nothing to Cæsar, because his dominion was contrary to the way of God with Israel. It is not so, however; and our Lord connects together the service of God and men, although in other respects he will know nothing of two masters. What a comprehensively general proposition is this! Even if, as he does not say exactly τὰ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, the things that are men's, we should understand no more than all human ordinance and authority (1. Pet. ii. 13); for so much our Lord will certainly include in what he says as applicable to all nations—those also which are not Israel, and whose rulers are not precisely called Cæsar. But of course he separates by a just suum cuique, even while he connects: to give to Cæsar what is God's, or vice versa, he will certainly not permit. And how so? This is just what the hypocrites do, even when they suppose they do it not, and Christ rebukes them for this first of all. Make the true distinction between the things which pertain to Cæsar and those which pertain to God! Make not the kingdom and government of God over you to consist in outward things, such as paying or refusing a tax; do not confound politics and religion by the unseasonable application of theocratic ideas, seeing that, as ye know, the dealings of God with his Israel have often enough been by foreign dominion. Only we must here guard against a misunderstanding of this saying, which was formerly more frequent than it is now, namely, that what is outward and earthly should be, as it were, thrown over to the state, as being of no importance. Thus our Lord would be made to say: "Ye have enough to do with God, ye who, as true δίκαιοι or 'just persons,' would act according to my advice. What matters to you the tax of Cæsar, and such other things? Only surrender without concern every thing earthly and outward, money and land, body and life, to your king, whoever he may be, how much soever of these he will have, and keep the soul for God!" No! far be it from our Lord thus to degrade government, thus falsely to sever the outward from the inward!* He teaches quite as decidedly on the other side: "Seek and maintain the true unity in your duty and obligation toward God and man! Serve Cæsar for God's sake, who has placed him over you, as once he did Nebuchadnezzar over your fathers." Thus does it harmonize with Jer. xxvii. 6–11, xxix. 7, and Rom. xiii.; 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14, as also John xix. 11. To be a dutiful subject of Cæsar, and to be an obedient servant of God, are quite compatible the one with the other, so far as, and because, God has given dominion to Cæsar; consequently, to give Cæsar his own for God's sake, means properly, only to obey God. Thus does Christ decide—in cases of collision arising from hypocrisy, self-will, or fanaticism—against all carnal zealots or falsely spiritual Quakers; while it is evident that the very same words decide upon every genuine case of collision in which the obeying of God rather than man must take effect.† The second clause, in which he gives the confirmation of the first, continues indeed at the same time the limitation, expressing the true limits of obedience. This inner connection of the two clauses thus apprehended leads, however, again a step further into the depth of the meaning.

The distribution of the clauses by Wesley is not altogether wrong: Ye Pharisees, render to Cæsar his due! Ye Herodians, especially render to God his due! This, however, is only the application that lies on the surface, for

* Rud. Matthäi calls the Lord's saying "a command which indeed suppresses the subordination of Cæsar to God, but not the separation of God from Cæsar."

† Mendelssohn (in his Jerusalem), however, was very wrong when he thought, this utterance of Christ exhibits an evident case of opposition and collision of duties! No, the counsel which Christ here gives is truly no Pharisaic advice to serve two masters, to halt between two opinions, to carry the tree on both shoulders—as Mendelssohn received answer from Hamann (Golgotha and Shelhimini, in Roth, vii. 63).

Christ will certainly say also to the Pharisees, nay to all men, Give to God what is God's! If now we consider this word first in its own depth of meaning, and bring it into its own analogous relation to the question respecting the image and superscription in the first parallel clauses, new and important thoughts will result, which, indeed, Christians even from early times have not overlooked. The striking question asked by our Lord respecting the image cannot have been without special purpose and significance; it was by no means intended merely to bring out the proof of this particular coin being Cæsar's, for we know the manner in which Christ is wont to connect spiritual truths with outward and sensible objects. He who will not go beyond the coin, must also, for example, limit Luke x. 41, 42 to the meat. But there Martha understood better what was the one thing needful; and here the Pharisees are astonished at the way in which Christ, in every answer, baffles and rebukes them. Therefore, "That which bears Cæsar's image is, as belonging to Cæsar, to be given to him; but that which bears God's image belongs to God!" At first, indeed, it might appear as if the answer of Christ really said nothing, and as if now the controversy properly begins, as to what is God's and what is Cæsar's. But why did the hypocrites not proceed to ask this? Because they had still a conscience! The Lord speaks for and to the conscience—therefore he can and must be understood! This is, in general, his manner. Here, with all its depth, nothing was simpler or more natural than this sudden advance which he makes; for it is the capital doctrine of Moses, at the very beginning, that man was created after the image of God. The usual dogmatic account of the entire loss of this image, however, is not found precisely either in Moses or elsewhere in the Scripture; but rather the opposite (see Gen. ix. 6; James iii. 9; Acts xvii. 29). The comparison of the entire man to a stamped coin is one which came from the lips of Christ once before, Luke xv. 8, 9 (which will be explained subsequently). Here, however, he speaks not in the first place of a restoration of the image (as Clemens, Strom. vi. 644, ὁ δίκαιος νόμισμα κυρίου γενόμενος καὶ χάραγμα βασιλικὸν ἀναδεξάμενος, "the righteous man, who is the Lord's coin and has received a royal stamp"), but of the stamp as being still there, and on account of which the rendering to God is required. Cæsar is satisfied with money and goods, obedience and honor rendered in the outward act; but God requires the whole man, the entire heart in every act. Ye men, give yourselves to God!—thus does Christ teach the whole way of God for all in truth. Chiefly, ye men of Israel (who, as belonging to God, would refuse yourselves to Cæsar), who, in addition to the image, bear in yourselves a special superscription, which holds forth that image and makes it known.* They desired that he would show them the way of God; he willingly does so, even in answer to such a request, and it is the same way of righteousness which the Baptist had already preached to them. Yet not as if, with Ebrard, we were to take the word too superficially as meaning —Give repentance to God, that is his tribute and due! No, in repentance, in faith, in obedience, give yourselves entirely to God. "Thou must give thy money indeed to Cæsar, but thyself to God; for what will remain over for God, if every thing belongs to Cæsar?" (Tertullian, Idol. c. 15.) Ye belong to yourselves just as little as does the tribute money which is due from you. What a significant answer to these hypocritical zealots, who (to speak again with the Wandsbecker) have something to ask regarding the silver image of Cæsar, but nothing about the image of God! Herein, finally, the last idea opens itself up as the innermost kernel of the complete, altogether sufficient answer; namely, the explanation why this seeming contradiction to their dignity as the people of God is imposed upon them, why what is relatively not right has come to be right, why Israel should and must pay tribute to the Roman emperor. If ye had done the second, then the first would not have been required of you: If ye had given to God what is God's, then ye might have been quite free to serve only this your King! "That ye have two masters is the penalty of your sin" (Von Meyer). Is not this again the clear doctrine of Moses and the prophets; is it not the way of God with Israel, ever and anon since the period of the Judges, that the departure from Jehovah has been punished by subjection to a foreign power? Here again Claudius speaks with surpassing excellence: "In general, the question as a whole was a very awkward question; and just the same as if an adulterer were to ask whether it is right to pay the penalty affixed to the crime of adultery." This principle of God, this rebuking demonstration of that principle, stretches back to the setting up of the Israelitish kingdom with Saul, which was originally not according to the will of God. They had even then rejected the Lord their God, that he should not be King over them; God gave them a king in his anger, and made this the occasion of a new display of grace and glory, in the abundant vouchsafement of his gracious guidance under David and Solomon. But this people never accommodated themselves to the way of their God. Already, in the wilderness, when God said, Go up that ye may possess the land! they would not; but when he said, Go not up! then they went and were smitten (Num. xiv. 40–45). When God was their King they rejected him; when he gave them over to the hands of strangers that they might know what is the service of God and what the service of the kingdoms of the countries (2 Chron. xii.

* Although image and superscription may also be understood severally of the feeling of God remaining in every man, and the knowledge corresponding thereto, now indeed very indistinct.

8)—then they rebelliously resisted, instead of seeking deliverance from the Lord in repentance. In particular, the questioners on this occasion were, properly speaking, such as were inclined to submit to the authority neither of God nor Cæsar; and yet the dominion of Cæsar had been imposed upon them on account of sin, to bring them back from sin to God. Verily this answer of Christ's was truly scriptural, conformable to the law and the prophets, theocratic, orthodox, and to be received without contradiction.*

See, now, in this type immediately referring to Israel, but of general application, how the wise and faithful Master, as Teacher of the whole world, here actually in one or two plain words, which merely take up the matter as it lies before him and lay open its inner significance, gives the true answer to the ever-recurring question of proud, obstinate man, who seeks a false freedom in what is outward: Shall we pay tribute, obey, be subject to, emperors and kings? In this answer every thing on every side is duly proportioned, and the inexhaustible text developes itself ever anew and ever richly as an answer, according as the question is put. The question of right is turned into a question of history: How came we under such dominion? Again, grasping this still more deeply, it becomes a question of conscience, running thus: But wherefore? And an oppressed people must begin answering the last, to which "neither historical nor juridical knowledge is requisite."† All revolutionary spirits have here their answer, which teaches them that reform must begin from within and work out, begin with the one thing needful; condemnation is pronounced equally upon so-called passive resistance refusing to pay tribute, and upon active insurrection, from which it in fact does not essentially differ. All who lust for a republic (in the period of the new covenant, when the theocracy, plainly shown to be an impracticable attempt so long as sin remains, has given place to the kingdom of Christ) are referred not only to the image upon the coin, but at the same time (which is also implied in this) to the image of God in the earthly majesties, to the necessity that εἷς κοίρανος ἔστω (let there be one sovereign) of there being, in general, one safeguard and security for order and unity in lawful intercourse, as every one cannot stamp the coin. All Papists, who, with their church as a self-constituted unwarranted theocracy, would swallow up the state, and all Hegelians, who would let what is called the church be absorbed in the state, receive their answer here respecting the true relation determined by Christ between the two; the same doctrine which the reformers, and before them the apostles, taught, according to the mind of Christ, concerning the right and distinction of worldly authority. But all servile Herodians, and flatterers of princes, together with hypocrites before God, receive the admonition to be subject only in so far as it is right in the sight of God; and for conscience sake to pay to Cæsar also the tribute of testimony to the truth, by reminding him that power has been given to him from above, only for righteousness. In short, "the ultras on all sides are justly repelled by this short answer."* Oh that they would not merely let themselves be repelled, as was the case with these tempters: They were astonished, left him (as he had left them, chap. xxi. 17), and went away! Here, again, they received the one, first and last word of the Son who came to seek the fruits! Give yourselves to God! But this they will not hear, they will not go this way of God, they will not know and learn this truth; therefore they go away, instead of becoming the honest disciples of this Master.

ANSWER CONCERNING THE RESURRECTION.

(Matt. xxii. 29–32; Mark xii. 24–27; Luke xx. 34–38.)

The Sadducees were certainly not present on this occasion to hear how he had stopped the mouth of the Pharisees; therefore their mouth is still open, as if inviting him to deal in like manner with themselves. On the same day—i. e., still in these last days, when all these things happened, and during which no one would be behind in attacking him—they brought their question for his discomfiture; and thus drew from him for the world a great word, the profound answer to all unbelief in the living God of the living. These were those who, with error equally bold and foolish, said that there was no resurrection of the body; and, thence, according to all the ideas entertained among the Jews (and according to the truth of God's word, which does not separate the two), that there was, in general, no immortality, no continued existence of man after death as πνεῦμα, or spirit; see Acts xxiii. 8.† They bring before him as actual

* As Lex expresses himself on this point in Otto's Denkschrift des Herborner Seminars for 1849.

† See Zeller, Monatsbl. 1840, No. 12.

* The Friedensbote von Hamburg (in Hoffman and Campe, 1822, p. 68.)

history a curious case, which was at least possible, in order to put their question in the keenest form—a case which was probably not then for the first time imagined, but which was already a common and hackneyed jest against the resurrection, as indeed the like are current enough among the Sadducees of this day. Moses has said: thus they begin their incontrovertible demonstration (although cunningly, scarce suppressing a smile, they afterwards only put a question), that Moses, in this as in all his laws, could not possibly have pre-supposed a "resurrection." Seven brothers had all married one wife successively, without issue: all those who followed married in order to raise up seed to the first; i. e., according to Moses' meaning, to raise up, so to speak, his after-growth out of his grave*—beneath which, however, according to the design of the wilful inquirers, there lies a half-restrained sensual sneer at the whole Mosaic ordinance. They all died, however, without effecting their object, for the woman was barren; last of all the woman died also, as, indeed, all men die. And now, if with this dying all is not over, as we say, then in the so-called "resurrection" (Mark, ὅταν ἀναστῶσι, ironically for εἰ—on the so-called last day, in which we would so willingly believe, if thou wouldst solve our doubts in regard to it), how strange will be the claim of seven men to one woman; whose then will she be? The same question might be asked in the case of every second marriage of a widow or a widower; but they take their stand here upon the commandment of Moses, and therein lies the emphasis of their question: Did Moses, then, when he made such ordinances for this life, take for granted another life after this, and prepare such confusion for that life? We may well admire the patience, gentleness, and wisdom of the Lord Jesus towards this folly, when we hear his answer!

Verse 29. The same thing which he here at first answers to these fools, who honestly made a show of their folly, he might, in a deeper sense, say also to the Pharisees; indeed he said it to them in a certain sense as often as he referred them to the Scripture, which was read, but not known or understood by them. Yet there is a well-founded difference to be observed in the expression. With keener rebuke he concedes to the Pharisees a certain knowledge of the Scriptures (possessing the key of knowledge, Luke xi. 52), although, indeed, not the true searching into them which is first of all required (John v. 39); at all events, their error is more manifestly shown to be a culpable error, a not-willing. In the case of the Sadducees, on the other hand, although with them also the more deeply underlying ground of their ignorance and error is only to be found in the evil will, he yet alleges against them, first of all, the milder charge of neglecting all, even the least searching of the Scriptures, an inconsiderate passing over them without the thought that there is the Scripture, consequently also the power of God. Wherefore it is that he says so often to those Pharisees—Have ye readers and knowers of Scripture never read or known this or that? While to these Sadducees he says only—Ye read the Scripture not at all with understanding as ye ought! To those he says beforehand Ye hypocrites—to these, as parallel with that, Ye err. Thus does he give to every one his own; to the "enlightened," with their pride of better knowledge, he ascribes precisely the worse error.

This erring which, in a spirit equally gracious and severe, he ascribes to them, was not merely the special error as to the resurrection,* which they had frankly brought before him (with a sincere conviction, and in so far better than those hypocrites), but the fundamental erring as regards the knowledge of the living God in general, of which, as he soon shows them, their saying that there is no resurrection was only the natural result. Not to know and acknowledge God in his eternal power and godhead—this is pre-eminently and, properly speaking, the innermost error of the unbeliever. From that proceeds all further folly of unbelief; all ignorance of every doctrine which stretches beyond the life of the senses; all despising and transgressing of the divine commandment, which has power and meaning only for immortal men; all theoretical rejection of doctrine, and practical violation of morality, as these go necessarily hand in hand, not merely in the consistently developed Sadducees of the time of Christ, but in all who are like them in every age. Now it is true that the voice of the living God ever speaks in reason and conscience, even to the natural man who has corrupted himself through the lusts of error (Eph. iv. 22), and goes on corrupting himself, seeking death in the error of his life (Wis. i. 12)—and in so far it might be said also to the heathen, Ye err because ye know not the truth which is yet in yourselves. But our Lord speaks here to the Sadducees who live in Israel, and can talk of that which Moses has said; therefore he at once calls the superadded revelation of the truth by the true God, Scripture. Where this Scripture is, with the outward knowledge of its existence, there the sole and essential reason of every error in divine things is nothing else than the not knowing this Scripture: this has been proved in a thousand ways down to our own day.† In this first word (omitted by Luke) of

* As Lange rightly explains it.

* Or after all even (according to Hase, himself not knowing the ancient Scripture)—the Sadducean, probably old Mosaic (therefore truly orthodox!) supposition of a kingdom of shadows, which Christ refuted here, not with Scripture, but only with dialectical adroitness!

† Καὶ γὰρ ἐντεῦθεν τὰ μυρία ἔφυ κακά, ἀπὸ τῆς τῶν γραφῶν ἀγνοίας· ἐντεῦθεν ἡ πολλὴ τῶν αἱρέσεων ἐβλάστησε λύμη, ἐντεῦθεν οἱ ἠμελημένοι βίοι, ἐντεῦθεν οἱ ἀκερδεῖς πόνοι (Chrysostom).

the answer, the μὴ εἰδότες, "not knowing," in Matthew is designed at all events to indicate the reason of the erring; as Mark gives prominence to this in the form of the question, οὐ διὰ τοῦτο πλανᾶσθε; "Do ye not therefore err?"

The revealed word of God then takes away all error by its truth; and in particular this word, as being written by the Holy Ghost, and summed up in the Scripture—let this axiom, here unconditionally expressed and taken for granted, in the mouth of the true and faithful Witness, be well considered! All philosophy and all so-called theology which has no Holy Scripture—which is not built upon this foundation, and does not learn what it knows from this source—is, when it opposes the existing Scripture with λέγειν μὴ εἶναι, with saying what is and what is not, a foolish not-knowing, a great error. When Christ puts the Scripture, rightly known, in opposition to all error, he thereby declares it to be itself free from error and infallible; namely, in its unity and totality as ἡ γραφή which cannot be broken (John x. 35). He says here indeed *τὰς γραφάς in the plural; but this is partly to bring to the recollection of the Sadducees the other Scriptures, besides those of Moses, which were still more misunderstood by them, and partly to point to the necessity of connecting one Scripture with another—as is done by himself in this very instance—whereby alone their complete truth can be ascertained.† Already in the article τὰς the unity is sufficiently expressed. This unity, however, distributes itself over the entire multiplicity of the canon: this entire canon, then, existing and accredited among the Jews, Christ here confirms, in all its separate books, when he says αἱ γραφαί—speaking of course of the same writings which were so called at that time. Let this, too, be well considered! All that is true of the one saying of God in Moses, which he here interprets as indeed ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ, according to the power of God, is therefore true of every saying and verse of the Jewish canon, which he has beforehand comprised in τὰς γραφάς.

Ye err! This he, in whom there is no error or sin, testifies against the erring ones, sadly accusing them, loftily judging them! This is more than if one professor should now say to another, "You are mistaken, doctor, as it appears to me." Against his "Ye err," there is no appeal; whoever, then, declines his authority, in order first to inquire whether the Lord Christ may not himself err—let him see whither he will carry things, and where he will stop by so doing! Ye err because ye know not the Scriptures! The second word in this utterance, spoken by him who has, from his youth upwards, learned all truth from these Scriptures by the Spirit—not acquiring it indeed in the regular course of the students of that day from the teachers, whom as a youth he had perplexed by his questions, but yet all the more truly learning it, so that he is now more learned than the learned (John vii. 15). He speaks thus, all whose thinking and speaking, from the first to the last word of his mouth, moved upon the deep basis of Scripture and amid its unlocked treasures; to whom the Scripture had been his rudiments, and would be his prayer-book on the cross. When he puts the unerring Scripture in opposition to all error, when he declares these books to be true in the same word which says to the people who preserved them, Ye do err—more is thereby affirmed and decided than by all the well or ill meant locis de Scriptura, and theories of inspiration propounded by dogmatists and reformers and apologists, or their opponents. But the third word comes in addition to the second, and belongs essentially to it, as giving ground and emphasis for us to the decisive affirmation, so that we may understand wherefore and how the Scripture is to be learned and known—ye know not the Scripture nor the power of God! All commentators who, hastily passing over this, find here only a reference to the ἀνάστασις or resurrection that was denied, are themselves deeply in error, overlooking the fact that Scripture and power are here in the first place correlates, as letter and spirit. Our Lord certainly means to say: These are indeed books written by men, in the language of men; but yet, unlike other books, in them the power of God witnesses and attests itself, in this word and letter lives and speaks the Spirit, in the γράμμα is the πνεῦμα. This, then, is the order and connection of the ideas: The power of God, in which the Scripture is written; of which, therefore, it testifies; and according to which it is also to be understood and interpreted (2 Pet. i. 20, 21). (See shortly after, Matt. xxii. 43, ἐν πνεύματι.) If the Jewish Scribes, following the expression of Josephus, called it alone true wisdom to be able τὴν τῶν ἱερῶν γραμμάτων δύναμιν ἑρμηνεῦσαι (to interpret the force of the Holy Scriptures)—so thinks also the Master in Israel; but he in the true spirit and the true power, and they, the erring ones, in slavish adherence to the letter. One can become a τὴν δύναμιν τῶν γραμμάτων ἑρμηνεῦσαι δυνάμενος (one able to interpret the force of the Holy Scriptures) only by yielding up his heart to God: in proportion as thou renderest to God what is God's, will he show and give to thee what is his, and what is to become thine, even himself as thy God! "Our eye must be directed to God and his mind; this gives to the Scripture the power which it always has in itself" (Berlenb. Bible). "Beneath all the letters of the Scripture lies the Spirit: he who takes all together with upright heart will not

* Not τὰ ἀληθῆ τῶν γραφῶν, according to the apocryphal understanding of the words, as if it were intended "to distinguish what is false in the Scripture from what is true." Indeed Hilgenfeld makes out precisely this to be the genuine form, altered in Mark!

† Οὐδεμία γραφὴ τῇ ἑτέρᾳ ἐναντία ἐστι (Justin Martyr).

miss the Spirit. But they miss it who separate what stands connected, namely, the Scripture and the power of God" (Oetinger). Therefore, more particularly, because every word of the Scripture proceeds from the Spirit and mind of the ever-living God, so also, in its innermost sense, does it return to this, that we should live before and in God, otherwise the Scripture, as the word of God, would be in contradiction with itself. According to the sense of the Spirit the entire Scripture aims and points at eternal life—certifies the denied resurrection. Hence the word of Christ here declares the same thing which Augustine has otherwise expressed: "Oculi in tantum vident (in Scriptura) in quantum moriuntur huic sæculo; in quantum autem huic vivunt, non vident (the eyes see in Scripture in proportion as they die to this world; but in proportion as they live to this world, they do not see).* Unbelief knows not the eternal power and godhead of the living personal God out of and above nature, therefore, also, it knows not the supernatural power and meaning of the Scripture, in which the I of this God speaks to us, reveals and imparts itself to us. But the power of God is an omnipotence which quickens what is dead (Rom. iv. 17; Acts xxvi. 8), and the raising again also of the flesh is performed by the same Spirit who speaks to us and dwells in us (Rom. viii. 11). It is by the power and in the power of God (1 Cor. vi. 14; xv. 43). Certainly, "the resurrection is no process of nature, but a miracle of omnipotence." It is not metaphysical reasons drawn from the simple and indestructible nature of the human soul, it is not proudly speculative dreamings which make the spirit of man to be God, or such like, that Christ here lays down as a basis from which to confute the Sadducees of all times; but the will expressed in the word, the power attested by the word of him who is the ὁ μόνος ἔχων ἀθανασίαν, "who alone hath immortality" (1 Tim. vi. 16), but who hath said to man, "I am thy God," and therefore man also lives. "Man should see the possibility of the resurrection in the power of God, and the reality or truth of the fulfillment in the Spirit of the entire Scripture, in which it has been promised as the aim and end of the Divine decree" (Kleuker).

Oh how severely does this interpretation of Christ (not at all like Dopke's Hermeneutics of the New Testament "writers") rebuke the pitiful error of all those blind critics who can hardly find an immortality in the Old Testament from the beginning, nothing more at best than a notion about a resurrection which found its way into the Old Testament from heathen sources! The Law of Moses, as such, if we look in the first place at the isolated letter of it, knew only of cursing and blessing within the limits of the earthly life, and a very proper point of view from which to regard this has already been plainly shown by Warburton: it was the most striking legitimation of this law for the carnal people that its threatening and promising were to come into operation directly upon earth. But inasmuch as the living God, the Eternal, by this immediate distribution of reward and punishment, placed himself in most direct intercourse with his son Israel, this temporal rewarding and punishing could appear only as the pledge and type of an eternal. For that which God gives or does, in blessing or cursing, cannot be confined within a span of time. Can we suppose that the Lord, who visits the sins of the fathers upon the children, should have prepared no judgment for the fathers themselves who are spared upon earth, or, on the other hand, that the piety of his faithful ones should have its entire reward in—long life and prosperity on the earth? The letter of the law, which raised this question, thereby already indicated in the spirit the answer. The "life" promised by God through Moses must already have been life eternal; as Christ acknowledges and confirms (Matt. xix. 16, 17), not as an after-interpretation, but as the opening up of the sense belonging to every word spoken by God according to the power of God. So Calvin, in his two excellent chapters "de similitudine V. et N. T. and de differentia unius testamenti ab altero" (Institt. lib. 2, cap. 10, 11), with penetrating clearness, lays down as the first of the three principal reasons for the "similitudo vel potius unitas:" "Non carnalem opulentiam ac felicitatem metam fuisse Judæis propositam ad quam demum adspirarent, sed in spem immortalitatis fuisse cooptatos; atque hujus adoptionis fidem illis fuisse tum oraculis, tum lege, tum prophetis certo factam." Likewise Pascal says: "In the promises of the Old Testament every one finds what lies at the bottom of his own heart, temporal blessings or blessings of the Spirit; the first, however, with, the second without, contradiction." The key to the enigma of Job's history, which Moses had already in the wilderness known and written for Israel, is to be found in Job xix. 25–27, where Vaihinger, again erring, finds an immortality without a resurrection, which is inconceivable not merely in the entire Word of God, but even in true philosophy.*

But if any one will begin from below and inquire concerning the "Hebraism," rather than concerning what God says to this people from above, let such a one hear a man whose writings still wait for their proper disciples, the profound thinker Molitor. "The supposition that the ancient people of God lived only in the outward, and had no idea of immortality, is in every case extremely inconsistent. Granted that Moses had borrowed the idea of his law from the Egyptians, and that the whole Mosaic legislation was merely the project of a great national leader, it would, in fact, be incomprehensible why, even as a politician, he did not introduce into his legislation rewards and punishments after death, especially as faith in these had been taught not merely in the Egyptian mysteries, but had even been a common popular idea in Egypt. To a people, however, who, in the midst of heathen nations, could be inspired with the sublime idea of rising to the one only invisible God (without form and likeness)—to such a people the faith in immortality cannot have been so high and remote a thing, but must have been quite congenial to their inmost nature. This faith is even so natural to mankind generally, that there never was a people altogether without the idea of a future life, otherwise they must have been sunk to a level with the brute creation." Far beyond what is implied in the phrase, "gathered to their fathers," which is said even of those who were not buried with their fathers—far beyond the popular conception of the dark realm of shadows parallel to that of the heathen—far beyond this reaches the view of an Abraham, whose God the Lord was, and who spoke with him as with a friend from whom he can conceal nothing. Resting in his God as a child on its mother's bosom, he knew most assuredly by simple faith, without much γνῶσις, or scientific knowledge, that the mother will not readily destroy her child. In the offering up of Isaac he even rose in thought to the requickening of the body by the power of God. But Abraham's God could set before the seed of his chosen servant, as the end of their faith, nothing less than the eternal recompense, instead of the enjoyment of sin for a season. All concealing, and thereby removing of the limits between the present and the future life in the promises and threatenings of the law and the prophets, was not so much a withdrawing as rather a bringing near of the future life to the present, a certain embodied descent of the eternal recompense into the sphere of time. The hope of life in God after death "rested on the inward feeling of trust in that God who is love, and on the conviction of its being impossible that all the glorious manifestations of his grace towards those who honor and love him could be wasted only on vanishing shadows. It was the Spirit of God, then, which assured them also of eternal life."* They said, "Thy mercy, O Lord, endureth for ever;" and to the sigh of the soul, "Forsake not the work of thine own hands," the answer was given, "I cannot and will not forsake it!" Quæ divinitus injuncta illis fuit vivendi conditio, assiduum erat exercitium quo admonerentur, se omnium esse miserrimos si in hac modo vita felices essent (Calvin). And this inner spiritual† experience of the faithful, strengthened and exalted from time to time by addresses and monitions from God, was the secret tradition of the δύναμις θεοῦ in the γραφή or Scripture. With all this, however, we will not deny the difference expressed 2 Tim. i. 10 between the Old and New Testament, between the struggling, misgiving faith of the fathers, and the clear, firm footing which we have in the resurrection of our Saviour from the dust. "It was quite the reverse with the Israelites" (from what it was with the heathen who believed in an existence after death in general, yet not in a coming to God), "inasmuch as with the former, faith in a living God takes the first place; and the faith in a future life, necessarily included in this, very seldom appears, and not at all as a doctrine, but, as it were, grows and increases with the ever more clearly manifested promise of the Sun of Righteousness, and in the fulness of time shines forth with full splendor."* The reader will pardon this excursus against the Sadducean error, as concerned with Old Testament exegesis; we do not think that we have thereby disgressed, but have merely referred the emphatic "Ye do err," which Christ here speaks, to those to whom it properly applies at this day; and at the same time supplied all the fundamental ideas necessary to the understanding of his subsequent exegetical inference—viz., God is not a God of the dead!

*[Molitor] Philosophie der Geschichte oder über die Tradition, 1. 202. Frankfort-on-the-Main. 1827

Verse 30. Ye Sadducees then do err: since, in the power of God, the Scripture holds forth an eternal life, there is, then, also a resurrection of the body; for, without the body, there is as yet no life of the entire man.† After his introductory words, with which every thing was already said, Christ now, in the first place with unoffending calmness, speaks of the certain resurrection, in opposition to their ἐν τῇ ἀναστάσει, spoken in mockery, and accepts the word from their sneering lips in simple earnestness. (Mark has also ὅταν ἀναστῶσι, precisely as the mockers had before spoken.) After this comes a still more special proof from Scripture: ὅτι ἐγείρονται, that the dead rise again. But while Christ here annihilates at one blow the ridiculous difficulty of the Sadducees, he at the same time refutes the carnal conceptions of the Pharisees; for the Talmud sometimes speaks of those who are raised, with as much grossness as the Koran.‡

† As the reflection in 2 Macc. xii. 43 fol., knows as yet of no other continuance after death, than what consists in waiting for the resurrection. When Judas cares for the dead as still alive, he has precisely the resurrection in his mind. [The passage in the Book of the Maccabees speaks of Judas as "collecting two thousand drachms of silver, and sending them to Jerusalem, that a sin-offering might be made: and this was a praiseworthy act, since he had in mind the resurrection."]

‡ For example, Sohar: A woman who has two husbands in this world, is, in the other world, given to the first.

The resurrection taught by Christ and the Scripture certainly does not restore the present flesh and blood, which cannot inherit the kingdom of God. Whatever hath sprung from the fall,* and exists in consequence of death and in connection with death—such as the present union of the sexes in order to the generation of new mortals—that is done away with!† Here Luke has a more exact and noteworthy exposition of the saying which is simply abridged in Matthew and Mark. The children of this world: that is, as the antithesis shows, not in the same sense as Luke xvi. 8 and elsewhere; it does not mean that those who are in other respects worthy of attaining to the other world, i. e., the children of God, should not marry on earth,‡ but that the saints in the flesh marry and are given in marriage, so long as they have not yet become partakers of that life in the spiritual body. Where there is no more "dying" (as in the case of the seven men and the woman), there is no more need of a propagation of the race, no more quickening the seed of a mortal life from the work of the flesh and of death. (On this analogy between generation and corruption, information may be obtained from physiologists, as Schubert.) Children of God—this means here the completed υἱοθεσία, or adoption, including also the body (Rom. viii. 23; 1 John iii. 1, 2), and is parallel with children or heirs, partners of the resurrection, to whom the children of death stand opposed (children of God and of the resurrection—in other respects there are no longer children and parents). At the same time, according to the usage of בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים, Sons of God, the expression reaches beyond this so as to comprehend the likeness to the angels, the assurance of which the first two Evangelists alone have preserved. They are not ἰσόθεοι, equal to God, but υἱοὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, "Sons of God;" nor have they, as the saying now runs, become angels, and yet as glorified men they are certainly ἰσάγγελοι, equal to the angels. As the angels—those powers of God that streamed forth in personal form in the first creation, of whom, although they are mentioned in Scripture (even by Moses), you Sadducees affirm also a foolish μὴ εἶναι, or non-existence. Is this too an accommodation to current fictions, on the part of him who rebuked every error?§ He speaks, indeed, of angels as being quite as truly personal, as the actual persons of men who married in this world. But it is self-evident that he can, and does, understand this likeness to the angels only of those who are raised to blessedness. There is certainly, as Paul afterwards teaches, agreeing with the Pharisees, a future resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust (Acts xxiv. 15); or as Christ, agreeing with the prophets, expresses it, "a resurrection of life and a resurrection of condemnation" (John v. 29; Dan. xii. 2). The everlasting shame and contempt, however, does not deserve to be called a resurrection in the higher sense; but the condition of the body of the damned is a fearful mystery. Therefore also does the Scripture conceal it, and the New Testament speaks chiefly of the resurrection of the just (Luke xiv. 14). When the resurrection is spoken of in general it is called ἀνάστασις νεκρῶν, a "resurrection of the dead (Acts xxiv. 15–21, xvii. 32; I Cor. xv. 12, 13, 21; Heb. vi. 2); the superiority, however, of those who inherit life is denoted by ἀνάστασις ἐκ νεκρῶν, "resurrection from the dead," here in Mark and Luke (as in Phil. iii. 11, ἡ ἐξανάστασις τῶν νεκρῶν). That this resurrection properly speaking, of the just out of death, to the true, eternal life, takes place partly also in time as a first resurrection, is elsewhere taught; but whether all who are not condemned have already part in this first resurrection, must, on a careful consideration of such passages as 1 Cor. xv. 23, 24; Rev. xx. 4–6, 12–15, still remain a question. Consequently the ἐκ νεκρῶν, from the dead, is not, with Olshausen and others, necessarily to be explained of the priority of time—(from the collective mass of the νεκροί some are raised first)—it is already founded on the essential distinction, that the just are no longer νεκροί; while the unjust become in the complete sense of the term νεκροί, when they are raised to eternal death. If (with Nitzsch in his System) we reckon Luke xx. 35 as one of the passages which prove a first resurrection, it is yet in the letter one of the least distinct; and the καταξιωθῆναι, "accounted worthy" (just as at Luke xxi. 36), can also, in the first place, be understood only of the resurrection of the blessed. So much, however, our Lord plainly says, that those who are raised to blessedness in that glorious new world shall be as the angels of God in the heaven or in the heavens, i. e., as the unfallen angels in their original and preserved glory before God. Hereby is at least assuredly affirmed, that the angels also are not (according to that unscripturally strange conception which corresponds to the equally inconceivable naked immortality of souls) mere "spirits," but have a heavenly corporeity; for how, otherwise, could those who are raised in the body be compared with them exactly in reference to this? Nay more, it can hardly be denied that the form of their bodies must be analogous to the heavenly form of man, although

* A new proof here of this truth indicated in Moses; for what is conformable to the original image of God in man, cannot be destroyed in eternity.

† As may certainly be found taught also in Jewish writings, differently from that adduced before; see the passages in Sepp, iii. 268.

‡ As the heretic Marcion perverted the passage, educing from it even a Deus illius ævi, who prescribes to his people jam hic non nubere, quia non sunt filii hujus ævi.

§ Somewhat as Bahrdt interpreted: "They shall then become such beings as you represent to yourselves in the angels," forgetting that the words were addressed to Sadducees.

not absolutely the same; see, in proof of this, Rev. xxi. 17. The first point of similarity lies certainly in this, that they neither marry nor are given in marriage: what is animal and θανατῶδες (mortal) in marriage passes away, only what is spiritual, angelic, remains. But this cessation of marriage is far from being the sole point of comparison; we are not at liberty even to understand that such as are raised shall be without distinction of sex, as the angels certainly are in the full sense; for there is a physical difference of sex entering into the entire being of the human individual, which can hardly cease. Immortal as angels, in a certain measure sexless as angels: this, however, does not yet exhaust the import of the ἰσάγγελοι, "like the angels," thus strongly expressed chiefly in Luke. "That our angel-nature should consist merely in celibacy, is as incredible as that crowns make kings, because all kings wear crowns."* The ὅμοιοι αὐτῷ, "like him," 1 John iii. 2, points even still higher up into the heights of glory, where the words, it doth not appear what we shall be, express all that we know or understand of it. Our Lord cannot as yet disclose the full mystery of the future state of man, from natural reasons of propriety; but it is to be observed, as showing the gracious gentleness of the Redeemer, that he here attractively holds up, even before these Sadducees, the resurrection which they denied, first of all, in its glorious side.

Verses 31, 32. And now first he turns to the universal and certain reality of the resurrection of the dead—ὅτι ἐγείρονται οἱ νεκροί, "that the dead are raised up," in general. He has already borne witness to this in his own exalted absolute authority; he now condescends, so to speak, to the special proof from a γραφή or Scripture; have ye not read? How many an enormous error might be removed by the right reading of a single passage of Scripture, if it were understood according to the power of God! Here it is essential that no word be overlooked, or superficially read, for God's words are indeed deep. It might be said that on this account our Lord does not here cite a passage from the prophets, who also plainly testify to the resurrection even in the letter, as Isa. xxvi. 19; Ezek. xxxvii.; Dan. xii. 2; but a word of God in the writings of Moses which announces the resurrection in the spirit of the letter. In the book of Moses—as Mark specifies; and with still more emphasis Luke, "even Moses hath showed!" That the Sadducees, although their sect first arose after the closing of the canon, actually rejected all the sacred books, excepting the Pentateuch, was a statement of several fathers who confounded them with the Samaritans; this opinion after having been long received, has been recently refuted on good grounds. Josephus says only that they rejected the παράδοσις τῶν πατέρων or "tradition of the fathers," in opposition to the γεγραμμένα (or γραφαί), the written text.* But from their position and character it may still be conjectured that they held chiefly by Moses, and slighted the prophets, who were unintelligible, nay adverse, to their system and practice. This middle view, already propounded by Corrodi,† Paulus,‡ and others, rests on good ground, although it has not strict historical testimony. Even Neander thinks it very probable that the Sadducees at least subordinated the prophetical writings to the Pentateuch, and accepted proof only from the latter;§ Lange has adopted the same view; while Sepp, quite uncritically, determines to abide by the "ancient opinion." This passage, it is true, contains no proof of the rejection of the prophets by the Sadducees; but it hints at the neglect of them exhibited by the persons addressed. For our Lord, all other reasons also being admitted, appears to have special reason for confining himself to the book of Moses in dealing with these Sadducees, and for proving to them from it, in a manner entirely corresponding to their question, that even the lawgiver whose law respecting Levirate marriage they found to be incompatible with a resurrection, yet knew and testified of a resurrection. He could have directly rebuked the manifest and bold contradiction to prophetic testimonies respecting the resurrection, if there had not stood in his way the erroneous theory of the gainsayers, namely, that whatever does not agree with Moses is of no authority in the prophets. Moses has said—thus did their objection begin; in opposition to this, Christ puts before them a ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ, or saying of God, which the same Moses had received and recorded. Moses has not merely given laws; God also has said many things which Moses says and writes. The Rabbinical formula of quotation, designating the section, ἐπὶ τοῦ or τῆς βάτου, "at the bush" (Mark and Luke), as Rom. xi. 2, ἐν Ἠλίᾳ (in Elijah) is not to no purpose; but it points, at the same time, to that bush as itself a significant emblem of miraculous preservation in the midst of destruction, given on that occasion when the God of the fathers appeared and spoke.‖ Moses calls the Lord by the same name as he tells us the Lord had called himself. Moses is acknowledged to be the author of the writings that bear his name. But what we read in his writings God has said; it had been actually spoken by God, and that not to Moses merely, but ῥηθὲν ὑμῖν, spoken to you—the Lord speaks it to the Sadducees, and even now to us. The inference, finally, which our Lord draws from the simple declaration of God—which they certainly had often read, and yet never thus understood—is by no means merely an inference supplementarily drawn from it, but rather the inmost meaning and kernel of the divine word which Moses also certainly understood. It is no mere hint, no mere intimation lying deeper beneath the surface, as the ἐμηνυσεν, "signified," in Luke is wont to be understood (with Luther*); but an open declaration and exposition of what this word was designed emphatically to say (comp. John xi. 57; Acts xxiii. 30; 1 Cor. x. 28). Moses, when he wrote down this word of God which he had heard, could evidently understand it of nothing else, and could mean to testify nothing else by it, than that before the God of the living even the dead, whose God he calls himself, must live.

This exegesis of Christ has been much slandered by ignorance, much censured by impudence, but, even by intelligent and believing readers, oftener admired than clearly understood. So much must be clear to every one on the surface: If Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob no longer lived, i. e., if they were annihilated, as the Sadducees fancied, then the appeal to the promise which had been given to them also, far from being confirmatory of the faith of Moses and Israel, was rather a bitter irony on the part of God against himself: "I who have not delivered even those from death!" If this ῥηθὲν ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ or divine utterance is to be understood in any way worthy of God, then must the fathers still exist as persons, as their names indicate, inasmuch as he thus speaks of them. The ever-living One must otherwise be truly ashamed to be called a God of beings who existed only for a short span of time—as, already during the period of their lives, he was not ashamed of this, only because they desired an eternal salvation, and because he had prepared an eternal salvation for them (Heb. xi. 16). For, although the present tense which many lay stress upon, "I am their God"—not merely I was—is not found in the letter of the original text, it yet lies in its spirit: God fulfills even to the fathers his promise given to them, inasmuch as he redeems their seed, blesses them, leads them into the goodly land—and this is precisely what he means to say. But this very circumstance, that the fathers were already dead when God nevertheless called himself their God, is by no means, properly speaking, the nerve of the interpretation. It merely strengthens the argument; but, independently of it, the same inference must be drawn even from the word of God to the living Abraham, "I am thy God!" This is the deepest ground of the inference. I am in the habit of thus simply explaining it to my catechumens: If the king of Prussia were to say to a protege and favorite, "I am thy king!" this person might reckon on the king's entire power and favor, with all that he has, so long as he is king of Prussia. Therefore thy God—with all that I, as God, am and can do, so long as I am and continue to be God. In order to receive and experience this, the sum and substance of the divine promise, nothing less than eternity is necessary; for what the Lord blesses is blessed for ever (1 Chron. xviii. 27), he to whom God gives himself has therewith given to him an eternal life, so that he lives to God, as God is God to him.* Now from this there seems indeed to follow, in the first place, only a continuation of existence, and not a resurrection; but it only seems so until, in addition to the word "God," we rightly read the names Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The living God gives, by his power, life to his own; but Abraham's soul is not the entire Abraham, and without body Abraham is not entirely living.† So long as the body lies dead in the earth, the entire man is still reckoned among the dead. "In this condition, the expression, I am thy God! cannot be entirely fulfilled in the man; for God is not a God of the dead, but of the living" (Roos).

Again, on the other side, God's promise is, from the first beginning till the consummation, gradually fulfilled. It always has already a certain truth; and as Abraham still lived in the body of death before God (Gen. xvii. 18), so does he yet live also in the intervening period without body, because he is not without his God. This word testifies against a sleep of the soul, as Lavater rightly remarked; and in like manner against an "inactive repose" of the dead, as J. G. Müller says in reference to certain false representations of the "rest in God." But not this alone: the word applies in the first place indeed truly to the elect, and to believers; but it further includes all men whose God the Lord on his part offers to become; hence our Lord takes it as a proof of the resurrection of the dead in general—ὅτι ἐγείρονται οἱ νεκροί, "that the dead are raised up." "God is not a God of the dead, but of the living," means finally: As surely as all men whom God has created as persons, and whom also as persons he wills to save, are God's, so surely are they not his as dead—even those who are relatively dead are not properly dead before him; hence Luke rightly concludes the idea with the words, "for all live to him." They should live to him, as all Israel, according to its calling (and—which indeed remains as yet in the background—all mankind), would if what belongs to God were given to him. They must and shall live to him, at least for the judgment; and every one, in the whole man, διὰ τοῦ σώματος (2 Cor.

v. 10), must give account of this, that God has said to him: I will be thy God!

Our Lord, by thus naming the covenant-God —a designation which still continued in daily use among the Jews, and which God had given to himself—would chiefly remind the heretics in Israel, who had apostatized from the living God, of that first great covenant-word before and at the giving of the law, "I, the Lord, am thy God!" When a superficial unbelief would extort from him the wretched inference that the law of Moses has no regard to a living on, and living again, of the dead through the power of God—he in holy earnestness leads the erring ones by one stroke into the very central point of the matter, where the answer lies open as day to every one who still acknowledges a "God." Yes, the resurrection stands in connection with the giving of the law, in so far as precisely in the law the personal God makes men to be the ever-living covenant-children of the eternal God (see Lange, iii. 207). Thus does Christ teach them to understand the ancient Scripture—law and promise ever with and in each other—as on Sinai, according to the power of God; and he refers these miserable men, to whom the word "God" can certainly be only an empty name so long as they do not suppose they shall live beyond the short span of time, to the power of this single name for men, a name which includes every thing, not excepting the resurrection. Because the giving of the law by the first word upon Sinai, and the accomplished redemption of the seed out of Egypt, stand in closest connection with the promise to the fathers, Christ evidently places in the foreground the fundamental idea of the covenant, in which law and promise again become one—namely, that God calls himself the God of a man, and therefore in reality is so. If the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob is the one true living God —and this his only begotten Son here again solemnly testifies (comp. John viii. 54–56; Acts iii. 13)—then does the vindication of the honor of his name, that he is not a God of the dead, extend to the place where all to whom he hath revealed himself are represented as again alive before him; some, indeed, for the angel-like glory of eternal life, and the rest—? The Lord preserve us from having to experience the consuming fire of the living God, as the dead who cannot die!

In Mark we find still a conclusion which returns to the beginning: Therefore do ye Sadducees (ὑμεῖς as ῥηθὲν ὑμῖν) err greatly (properly πολύ); as in the article of the resurrection, so in many ways in all your other errors, and all for this one reason. But what would Christ say now to these who, more consistently, indeed, than the Sadducees, will acknowledge no living, personal, revealed God, and who substitute for the power of the manifest God, who graciously wills to give himself to man in order to eternal life, "the hidden essence of the universe which has no power in itself to offer resistance to the boldness of science, but must disclose itself at its summons"*—only however for a moment, so long as this individual I lives thus boldly. We cannot see that the highest courage of science consists in knowing human personalities without the original Person, by whom they are and live; for, Are living men but the changing soap-bubbles of a dead God? Is the universe no *uni*verse? We do not presume entirely to know and to judge of the hidden meaning of the Master; but to the scholars who deny the personality of God as distinct from the world, and the individual existence of men after death, so frankly that one can understand them—to the λέγοντες μὴ εἶναι πνεῦμα, those who say that there is no spirit, with all their noise about spirit, we say in the name of the Lord, This is no longer error, but—either a frenzy in which you have lost yourselves, no longer to know that we live and move and have our being in him—or there remains nothing else but Satan's conscious lie against his Creator, "Thou art not my God! shalt not be my God!" notwithstanding which lies, however, he, too, cannot and will not die throughout eternity, for even Satan as Satan must live to the judging God.

ANSWER TO THE QUESTION WHICH IS THE GREAT COMMANDMENT?

(Matt. xxii. 37–45; Mark xii. 29–37; Luke xx. 41–44.)

Although the Pharisees would be quite willing to see the Sadducees put to silence, they are yet not satisfied that this should be done by Jesus; his piercing answer provokes them anew to deliberate whether there be then no way at all in which they can get at him! One of their number, who had taken part in this deliberation (for so must we understand Matthew), brings forward a new question. He is a Pharisee by sect, a νομικός or νομοδιδάσκαλος (Luke v. 17; Acts v. 34), i. e., one who knows and is a teacher of the law, by office (Tit. iii. 13); though, as this was only an inferior class of γραμματεῖς, or scribes, Mark terms him εἷς τῶν γραμματέων. At the same time, however—and it is quite consistent with this, and was observed by Mark immediately before—the man asks his question not with a bad but a good intention, from an interest peculiar to himself, and with a satisfaction at Christ's former answer: this is precisely what qualifies him for being the ἐγκάθετος, or "spy," to the others who have thus pushed him forward. There is no necessity, therefore, of giving a different interpretation to the "tempting" in Matthew (as Olshansen says, "from a well-meaning spirit of inquiry"), but the expression must here certainly retain its bad sense. Matthew views the incident as a whole, and regards this question, apart from the disposition of the questioner, as belonging to all the πειράζειν, tempting, now set on foot against Jesus. The interrogator himself seeks instruction; the others however are ready in every case to dispute upon the answer, because they actually hold the question to be a disputed puzzle not to be solved.

Like a genuine νομικός, or lawyer, in disposition as well as in office, who would zealously carry out only the law (comp. this force of the title, Luke vii. 30, x. 25) and knew nothing higher, he brings forward as μάχη νομική (Tit. iii. 9) a question which was at that time much disputed—one of the highest importance indeed, when taken in connection with the true answer to it, but proposed by the present questioner only in foolish misunderstanding. Already, in the Sermon on the Mount, had Christ rebuked the distinguishing between small and great commandments, in so far as it was foolish; the fools, however, at the last begin anew with this, and give him occasion to say something else in opposition to it. Instead of being humbled by the spiritual requirement of heart-obedience towards the one God, in which the entire law is a unity, they had endless quarrels about the question: "If Moses has enjoined upon us 365 prohibitions, and 248 commands, making in all 613 different precepts and ordinances*—surely all these cannot be equally important, nor every transgression equally grievous! Which then are the important, and which the insignificant?" It was only indeed because they were conscious of transgressions that they asked such a question; they would gladly throw away at least some of these as trifling, and in their perversity they dealt thus precisely with the weightier matters of the law (chap. xxiii. 23). This inquirer, in order to test the wisdom of Christ, presents his question in the most keen and difficult form; for as he will have a single commandment specified to which Christ concedes pre-eminence over the rest—μεγάλη ἐν τῷ νόμῳ, i. e., the absolutely great, the greatest ἐντολή above all the rest (Mark, πρωτη πάντων, the latter to be taken as neuter, the chiefest of all and of every sort; for παόῶν and παόῶν τῶν ἐντολῶν are only corrections which have arisen from not understanding this). These νομικοί do not even understand the unity of the law in the spiritual meaning and ground of all its single commandments; therefore, of course, they much less understand its insufficiency to make the sinful man righteous. Christ, however, again bears witness to both these truths, as he had already done in the Sermon on the Mount. In particular, he here again brings into clear prominence that fundamental law of perfect love which judges us; the fundamental requirement of the whole heart for God and our neighbor which cannot be fulfilled by us who are evil; and then he intimates whence alone the grace that is necessary in order to the fulfillment of the law can come, viz., from the Christ who has come in him. He teaches, in the first place, nothing new concerning the commandments; for when any one asks him about the law he never fails to refer back only to Moses. But what is overlooked and misunderstood he brings forth into its true light. Christ has no other answer to give than that which was rightly given by the scribe (Luke x. 27). But this answer was unfortunately very much disputed; there did not exist (as Lange thinks) as yet "a harmonious view respecting it in the Rabbinical theology."

Verses 37, 38. From Deuteronomy—from the authentic interpretation of the letter of the Sinaitic law already contained therein, which afterwards takes the form of an exhortation to repentance, and ends with the promise of circumcision of the heart—from this book does Christ adduce the one greatest, all-embracing commandment. Moses had already expressed it so plainly that all questioning about it appears as blindness, in that place where, with the emphatic "Hear, O Israel," he announced at once the fundamental doctrine of the unity of God, and the one requirement of this God from his people. Thus (following chap. v.) the interpretation of the first commandment begins with and is founded upon the covenant-word, which is placed in the forefront: "I am the Lord thy God." Mark, giving the citation in full, has the "Hear, O Israel," before it, which lays the foundation of what follows, and indeed belongs to it: even if our Lord had not here expressed it, he would yet bring it to mind, pre-supposing it in the citation of this well-known passage. As and because God is one, his law also, though consisting of manifold commandments, must have a unity flowing from his being and will; just as from the same ground the unity of the law and the promise is further deduced in Gal. iii. 20. The one God requires the whole heart united in itself (Psa. lxxxvi. 11, יַחֵד לְבָבִי) in one love, corresponding to his love and his unique loveliness. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, thou—the entire man, inwardly and outwardly, with spirit, soul, and body: that is the meaning of the Hebrew original, where

* So R. Simlai in the tractate Makkoth: The prohibitions correspond to the number of the days of the year, the commandments to the number of the members of the human body, the sum corresponds to the word תּוֹרָה (which, however, make only 611). See the specification in Beer's Geschichte d. Juden, 1, 246, 255 fol.

לֵבָב, heart (as in such references is frequently the case in the Old Testament), corresponds to the innermost part of the man or the kernel of his being (which is then more exactly called mind); נֶפֶשׁ, soul, corresponds to the unity of all changing moods or states, therefore to the disposition of the ψυχή (proceeding from the will); מְאֹד, might, to sum up all, corresponds again to all the powers and capacities, of the life both of the soul and the body, carried into outward action. The Evangelists deviate here from the (also not quite suitable) rendering of the Sept. with which Luke x. 27 is to be compared. Καρδία, "heart," is the correct rendering for the first; for the third, however, ἰσχύς, "strength," is not merely not quite so correct, but (dividing the original word into two) there is besides the explanatory διάνοια, "mind," which alone remains in Matthew. Since heart and soul have already been named, διάνοια can only signify what we found before in מְאֹד (hence we regard as profound and striking the too much overlooked remark of Grotius: διανοίας hic is est sensus, qui apud Thucydidem, διάνοιαν ἔχω πρὸς τὸ καλὸν τῆς πράξεως: id est, in id intentus sum. Idem autem valet, sive dicas pro viribus, sive omni studio atque contentione). Beck's interpretation amounts to the same thing, when he understands διάνοια of "the inner movement that impels toward outward objects, and works through them, the impulse of thought, and will, in its intercourse with, and relation to the outer world."* Luther means the same by his Gemuth according to the old usage, that is, my mind, all my heart and mind is in it, and after it. With all thy heart—this is for the rest clear enough, in whatever way we interpret the following expositions, and this first thing is, therefore, constantly repeated by Moses and all the prophets; only at 2 Kings xxiii. 25, is the original passage of Moses found complete with the מְאֹד. And the principal word, properly speaking, which embraces all commandments in its unity—viz., Thou shalt love!—This God himself spake at first from Sinai: To those that love me and keep my commandments (Exod. xx. 6). Consequently in 1 John v. 3, there is in thesi nothing peculiar to the New Testament, but there is certainly in praxi as regards the βαρεῖαι οὐκ εἰσίν, "they are not grievous." —This is the chief and greatest commandment; thus with simple majesty, in his decisive and instructive answer, does Christ testify, literally—the first and great. To the μεγάλη, "great," which was all that was in the question, he adds the confirmatory πρώτη, "first," which of course cannot mean the same thing, but rather furnishes the exegetical proof of the μεγάλη drawn from the place which that commandment occupies. For, this commandment lies already in the first word from Mount Sinai, as afterwards in the first commandment (according to the explanation of it given by Moses, and confirmed by Christ, that all things which the heart loves besides God and out of him are אֱלֹהִים אֲחֵרִים, other gods); it in like manner stands again at the head of the Decalogue, repeated by Moses in an admonitory form in Deuteronomy. It is the first in order of rank, because the first in the nature of the thing, and, indeed, should be seen to be the first previous to all questioning and inquiring about the commandments! If Mark's version of the question, πρώτη πάντων, "first of all," were to be taken as literally genuine (which, however, we are inclined to doubt), then Christ gives a different sense to the expression in the answer, which would then in substance say: Canst thou then as a νομικός be only asking this; hast thou not read what the word of God and of Moses has put in the first place? Now what is there called the πρώτη is the πρώτη, the primum praeceptum is the primarium—"the commandment put according to God's arrangement, in the first place, is also the most excellent of all" (Olshausen). Nay, more, as we shall immediately see, it is the only commandment, the comprehensive sum of all existing or conceivable commands and prohibitions.

Verses 39, 40. And now can there be in addition to this a δευτέρα ἐντολή, a second commandment? Certainly; for although the first and sole fundamental commandment were sufficient to say and to enjoin every thing, it is yet not enough for the deaf ears and hard heart of man. If any man saith, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; but because we might all be such liars, therefore we have further his commandment from him, that he who loves God loves his brother also. The explanation of the enigma by which this commandment, at first represented as subordinate, as second, is then made equally valid with the first, and one with it, was a new answer on the part of Christ; furnishing more than the question required, but yet only thoroughly exhausting the point in question. The Pharisee presents himself with burnt-offerings and sacrifices, his fasting twice in the week, his tithe of mint, anise and cummin; and utters the most fearfully frank lie of all human lies: Do not I then love my God with all my heart, with all that I have and owe to him, and rather beyond what is required than too little? In opposition to this stands the other commandment respecting the love of our neighbor, from the transgression of which the Saviour elsewhere seeks to bring conviction home to them (Matt. xix. 18; Luke x. 30). God indeed can say, Behold I, even I, am he, and besides me there is no God! (Deut. xxxii. 39), but man must confess before God, There are others beside me! There are men like me before God who has created them also, and, in holy right, loves them all alike, men who are to be esteemed equally with me. Therefore, before God, and for God's sake, ought I to give up idolatrous selfishness; and as I should and dare love myself only as God's creature, a vessel and instrument of his grace and honor, in like manner must I love my neighbor precisely thus, not more and not less, and also not otherwise. Therefore Moses had, in an earlier book and chapter, where, in the most proper sense, the instructive tracing back of the manifold commandments to their unity predominates, uttered the other great word which Christ now adduces and places beside the first: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, for I am the Lord! (Lev. xix. 18). If here, and in other places, the unity of the two tables of the law, the point of unity of all obligations and all conduct towards God and man, was distinctly indicated—yet this unity was first brought forward and made to shine in the full light of the New Testament by Christ. Already in the Sermon on the Mount, after adducing special commandments, He declares this word concerning the love of our neighbor in opposition to the Pharisaic addition which nullified it. Now, as a proper conclusion to all his teaching he says with the most perfect clearness—in opposition to the foolish manner of isolating and separating the enumerated ἐντολαί pursued by the scribes and lawyers: The second not merely follows the first, and is placed after it, but is like unto it! Properly ὁμοία, ejusdem indolis, of the same nature and origin, quite as fundamental and comprehensive; thus it is also a πρώτη, although again only a δευτέρα which is comprehended in the unity of the first. The law is not an aggregate of all sorts of requirements: "Thou shalt do this and that, and not do this and that!" as is the false conception of many people even at this day, but a living organism; as a whole (ὅλος ὁ νόμος) it is one in these two commandments, which are themselves again one through the one love of the whole heart towards God and our neighbor, towards our neighbor for God's sake. As thyself is not merely a limitation of the pre-supposed and existing natural self-love, as those think who again outwardly measure the words; but a complete removal and transformation of this natural selfishness, in which the slighting and hating of our neighbor was an essential element, so that a new love in God arises, which knows only the equality of all before God's holy right, in God's blessing love. Then (but not before) it is the loving thy neighbor as truly, and altogether as thyself; so that every thing which thou desirest for thyself from God and thy fellow-creatures, be also given and shown to them. God by no means requires and commands thee "to love thy neighbor more than thyself," for this goes beyond what is right;* nay it must be said, properly speaking, that all in this way which a spontaneously overflowing love can do, cannot be called more, inasmuch as I only benefit and satisfy myself and my innermost impulse of love in his sacrifice, just as God himself does in his most condescending love. Or, in giving thyself up for thy neighbor, dost thou actually offend thy true self? Then this would not be the reality of what is required; such love would not be the pure and proper love.

What Mark (probably following his own development of the thought, as similarly elsewhere) merely in repetition expresses thus, "There is none other greater commandment than these"—Matthew gives in what we must regard as the original expression of Christ, ver. 40. In these two commandments he has set forth the Decalogue as the permanent kernel of the law for all men, and designated it according to its two tables. The old controversy of the churches respecting the distribution of the particular commandments in the tables finds here its incontrovertibly clear decision, if men only could and would read it. Wherefore, then, two tables of the one law for the expression of these two fundamental commandments? The law is so entirely one, that not even its two tables are of two kinds, but the love of our neighbor also is required even by the first אֲנִי יְהוָה, "I am the Lord." Yet the second table is a second, because all true love of our neighbor springs from and consists in the love of God; and the saying of the moral Pharisees, "I love my brother!" is, so long as they hate God, the God who reveals himself, only the same inverted lie. The five commandments of the second table which are summed up in the second word we find written in Rom. xiii. 8–10: there remain for the first the five which speak of the one God; his true revelation without, and in opposition to, every likeness of him made and contrived by man; then of his name; his day; and his human representatives and images. On these two commandments hangs the whole law, κρέμαται* —this may be, as is generally supposed, a Latina locutio, as Fritzsche says: "In hoc utroque praecepto omnium, quæ in V. T. leguntur, legum cardo vertitur;" so that if we loose this one double band, the whole has nothing more to hold it together, and it falls to the ground.† It may have been a proverbially Rabbinical phrase, as Hartmann‡ cites from the Mishna, vi. 53, an analogous תלה. Christ, however, as also without doubt the Rabbinical saying, appears to us to point by the metaphorical expression to those symbolical tassels worn by the Pharisees on their garments, and enjoined by Moses as a memorial of the commandments: two as the two

* Therefore not as Sartorius expresses it: "One's neighbor in the place of oneself," which can only be understood of the wrong "self." But as Jul. Müller (Lehre v. d. Sunde, i. 147, note) rightly acknowledges: "There remains also a valid self-love."

* Vulg. pendet—hence Bengel prefers κρέμαται to the κρέμανται, certainly as regards the sense rightly.

† The Greek usage also offers something similar, as in Plato (de Legg. viii.) ἐξ ὧν κρεμαμένη πᾶσα ψυχὴ πολίτου.

‡ Die enge Verbindung des A. T. mit dem Neuen, p. 130.

tables, in each many threads, but bound together in one blue string, i. e., "many commandments of one indivisible heavenly law of love."* Finally, all the law and the prophets? Just as is meant in the Sermon on the Mount (chap. vii. 12, and v. 17). And the prophets—who in the Spirit testify further of the fulfillment of the letter, as Moses the first great prophet does in Deuteronomy; at first here, in so far as they demand this fulfillment, insist on it, in order then to point to the fulfilling grace and the future Fulfiller.

For, as soon as the spiritual unity of the law is recognized by the man who no longer occupies himself with single commandments in order to self-justification, its insufficiency can and will also be perceived. Not any insufficiency or imperfection of the law in itself; for, who can conceive, command, or do any thing more perfect, any thing reaching higher and deeper than what these two fundamental commandments express? But for us the commandment is not sufficient to give us what we have lost in the fall—the love of God, and therewith the love of our neighbor. We are rebellious children and disobedient servants from our birth; as is declared by our trespass against that commandment which is the connecting link of the two tables, and which in another sense is called the first commandment (Eph. vi. 2). Not even the slavish fear, much less the childlike fear which is the beginning of wisdom, and which leads to love, is naturally present in us (Mal. i. 6), until at least a πνεῦμα δουλείας, or "spirit of bondage," is received (Rom. viii. 15); but only the evil, rebellious, continually sinning fear of Adam after the fall. And yet it is, Thou shalt—love! This, although right and true as regards God's inviolable claim, is yet, as regards the fulfillment, a complete contradiction; for love is a free matter of the heart, to be produced and forced by no shall. Precisely this unnatural "shall" is the handwriting which attests our debt, our bankruptcy; if there were love, then there would be no need of this, and still less of its being carried out into mere details—Thou shalt do so, thou shalt not do so—of which, properly speaking, as the manifold legislation of Moses in Israel is designed to show, there is no end to be found, and yet all in vain. Oh that they had such a heart! (Deut. v. 29; xxix. 4). Let this book of the law be a witness against thee! (chap. xxxi. 26). But the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart (chap. xxx. 6). This alone remains—as already Moses says as a prophet. "Moses gave you the law, and none of you keepeth the law; for ye seek to kill me (John vii. 19), with hatred against God and the Son of Man, in one and the same manifestation of your sin:" this alone remained in Israel when Christ came (comp. Acts vii. 52, 53). With all thy heart, with all thy strength—this does Christ require of us; but the whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint, there is no soundness in it (Isa. i. 5, 6). And if thou wert to treat thy heart as a garment, and to cleanse it outwardly in the mere performance of nothing but commandments; wert thou to carry the "categorical imperative" so far in thy virtue (which is to have all the more value the more it is extorted from an unwilling heart—Oh the perversity!) as to give up to the gracious God not merely ten pieces of the mantle out of the twelve, as Ahijah gave to Jeroboam, but 999 out of 1000, etc., yet would the Lord answer, I cannot take it, it is not the whole! And, properly speaking, the whole heart with all its disobedience would be withheld with the tenth or hundred thousandth part that was kept back. For בְּכָל מְאֹדֶךָ, with all thy might, means not "as much as possible"—namely for us weak, sinful men.

The Scribe frankly acknowledged that the Lord was right; repeated with all the delight of a new discovery the great truth long since known to him from the letter of the Scripture; and added, of his own accord, as a proof that he understood it, the words, "This is more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices; love and inclination is what is required, not service and work; all that is outwardly brought as an offering to the Lord is ordained and accepted only on account of the heart." In this he answered νουνεχῶς or νουνεχόντως, "discreetly;" and therefore does Christ praise him, although (as Braune remarks) only with measured praise, which acknowledges the clear insight as good, and now exhorts to practical progress, to entering in: Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, thou standest with this knowledge at the door; set thy foot on the threshold of repentance, and come within to faith! (Si non procul es, intra: alias præstiterit procul fuisse.) "I alone am what thou yet wantest!" (Von Meyer). Mark x. 21.*

Do we now understand, without going further, how profoundly the question concerning the Christ, which the Lord Jesus propounds in the following verses, is connected with the answer respecting the law? The Lord now lives and moves with all his thoughts in the profound unity of his final and conclusive testimony to Israel and the world; whatever presses upon him from without he immediately weaves into this, and makes every thing a link of connection always leading back to the one thing. First: Give to God what is God's,

* Which interpretation given by Meyer we are inclined to prefer to that other in Lange, according to which the threads fastened together would be "the varying play of the feelings and thoughts." For, in Num. xv. 39, it is expressly said beforehand, "that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord."

* Irenaeus gives an apocryphal addition (Haeres. i. 17), according to which Christ is represented as having said: "I have long since had the desire to hear such words, and have not yet found the speaker."

yourselves also with your whole heart—this was the requirement of the law. Then, secondly: This God, who entered into a covenant with us already in the law, is a God of the love; he has already said to the fathers, as also to Israel, I will yet be your—the sinner's—God, and give to you what is mine, what you have not, even to the extent of glorification in an endless life—this was the promise, the Gospel, in and before the Law. The third question, foolish as it may have been in its setting out from the external conception of great and small commandments, his wisdom so directs in the answer that he now at the conclusion combines the two, the Law and the Gospel.* He has announced the law in its two fundamental commandments, as, at the conclusion of the Old Testament, Malachi declares the same, chap. i. 6 and ii. 10 (comp. chap. iv. 4). He has testified that God is love, in the highest commandment which can only require the same love; forthwith he shows how the same love gives itself to sinners in the highest gift, in the only begotten Son. They durst not ask him any more questions (Mark, ver. 34), for he who will not repent in presence of the law does not ask willingly or earnestly about Christ; he, however, does not leave them, but asks the question himself, in order yet to allure them to grace.† "Here the great Prophet at parting represents the great sum of the Law and the Gospel"—we say with Bengel and all intelligent preachers on this passage.

Verses 41, 42. You have in your Old Testament something else than law and commandments. The Law and the Prophets—have I said? this, however, reaches further. The end of all prophecy, the centre-point of all the prophets, from which the proto-gospel in Moses begins, with which Malachi ends, is the Christ whom ye look for, and will not recognize in me. How think ye of this Christ? i. e., not precisely, What think ye of the Son of Man, of me? although after all the foregoing testimony of our Lord, and, according to the consciousness of the Pharisees, it is almost the same. "How think ye? i. e., For what, according to your conception and opinion, is a Christ to come to you, and am I come?" Ah! this they knew not indeed, because they knew not the law and their sin. "Whose son is he?" Thus asks the Lord, because he already knows what they will say to this, and what he will then say—thus does he at once open up the way to his theanthropic personality, in which alone the grace and gift of God that redeems from sin and establishes the law, could be given.* David's son—the name denotes their Messiah, according to all their notions, besides whom they know or at least are willing to know of none other. "For although the super-terrestrial nature of the Messiah was not entirely unknown to the learned (chap. xxvi. 63; John vii. 27; xii. 34), yet the principal thing to them was the visible world-monarch of the lineage of David" (Von Meyer).

Verses 43–45. What David said ἐν πνεύματι, "in the Spirit" (of which we shall speak afterwards), our Lord here interprets in a literally grammatico-historical way; and this was the only possible way, for in this plain and direct utterance no spiritual interpretation is needed—the words and letters speak clearly of themselves. There is certainly a typical connection for this 110th Psalm in David's history (for that was still, generally speaking, the period of the type); and we long ago in another place thus traced it: "David restores in the conquered Zion the Salem of Melchisedek, as the successor of whom he may now be regarded; after all his sufferings and conflicts he fetches the ark of the covenant, acting as a priest, in order henceforth to dwell in, or beside the house of the Lord; he receives through Nathan that fundamental promise respecting the everlasting throne of the Messiah." But it is far wide of the mark to say (as in Hofmann's system), that the psalm can only in the first place speak of this type, in which alone the prophecy is afterwards to be sought and found. The spirit of prophecy rather makes these typical relations only a point of connection; inasmuch as he here (which is well to be observed) teaches the same king David himself to call his archetype—him who was to come—not his son or descendant, but his Lord. Our Lord does not now go further than the beginning of the profound psalm, though he includes also as a side-glance the threatening allusion to his enemies; that other word concerning the priesthood of Melchisedek the Spirit at a later period interprets in the Epistle to the Hebrews—the last three verses only the last days will bring into clear fulfillment. He does not expressly say that the Holy Spirit uttered by the mouth of David what he here cites (as is true of the unconscious typical references to Judas, Acts i. 16); but that David in the Spirit called him Lord, just as before Moses called the Lord a God of Abraham. Therefore he intimates that David himself meant to point to something by this—that he had plainly in his mind the thought of a divine dignity as belonging to a man (2 Sam. vii. 19; 1 Chron. xviii. 17). This appears still more strongly in Mark: αὐτὸς γὰρ Δαυὶδ εἶπεν, David himself calls the promised son

* When Braune designates these three questions as belonging to politics, philosophy, and morals, it is only the opinion of the questioners that is thereby denoted—and then it would be better to say dogmatics instead of philosophy.

† Luke has lost this entire connection; therefore he puts the testimony concerning Christ only as a continuation of a discourse of Christ without the intermediate answer.

* How lamentably is this signification of the fundamental and conclusive question, here appearing in the right place, evaded, when, for example, Hase can think that, "he proved to them his dialectical embarrassment by proposing a sophistical question on the Messianic signification of the 110th Psalm!"

his Lord. It is true that Christ says according to all the three Evangelists merely κύριον καλεῖ or λέγει, "he calls him Lord," and not expressly κύριον αὐτοῦ, "his Lord." This would have perfectly corresponded to the κυρίῳ μου, "my Lord," in the citation, and the υἱὸς αὐτοῦ, "his son," afterwards; and he might at the same time have pointed to ver. 5 in the psalm, where the אֲדֹנָי, "my Lord," actually recurs as אֲדֹנָי, "Lord." Still, this remains uncertain; and at all events the main force of the demonstrative question lies in this, that even David ascribes, in reference to himself, the name Lord to him who, in other respects, is his son.* The proof of the divine dignity lies, first of all, simply in the κυρίῳ μου, "my Lord;" then, as doubling its force, in the sitting at the right hand of Jehovah.† Jesus might certainly have adduced many other "prophetic passages which declare the divinity of the Messiah:" such as Micah v. 1, "the goings forth from everlasting" (which the high priests themselves testified of to Herod); Psa. xlv. 7, 8 (אֱלֹהִים together with אֱלֹהִים, similar to what we have here); Mal. iii. 1 (the אָדוֹן who comes to his temple); Isa. vii. 14, ix. 5 (the עִמָּנוּ אֵל and אֵל גִּבּוֹר); Jer. xxiii. 6 (even יְהוָה צִדְקֵנוּ). But he takes as being most suitable the passage which comprehends David's Son and David's Lord in one divine-human person; and Sir. li. 10, in the very remarkable words ἐπεκαλεσάμην κύριον πατέρα κυρίου μου, "I called the Lord the father of my Lord," so corresponds to that passage, that it is plain believers under the Old Testament well understood it, and appropriated it to themselves, nay even by diligent search without the prophetic spirit correctly carried it further out. The interpretation of this passage as a whole is not called for here, but belongs to a commentary on the Psalms; we have given it in our own, and now only observe how the concluding question of Christ, πῶς υἱὸς αὐτοῦ ἐστι, "How is he his son?" is intended to draw forth precisely that πατέρα, "father," of Sirach. "Am I then a blasphemer when I call God my Father and myself his Son (John v. 18)? David testifies the same of me as him who was to come; he who sits at the right hand is certainly the Son, to whom Jehovah as Father gives up the kingdom (Matt. xxii. 2), to whom the same divine dignity and honor are due, since only on this supposition can David already call him his Lord (comp. John viii. 56)." The question implies by a plain deduction both these things: "Can he therefore be only David's Son? And how is this Lord of David yet at the same time his son, as was *before affirmed? Is he not then truly the Son of the living God who has come in the flesh; and is not the throne of David promised to him something different from what you would understand it, a spiritual kingdom of heaven which he will set up and govern from above (when ye shall have exalted him)? Is he not man and God? And (which in the final sense and aim of all this is meant to be indicated) must not the promised Redeemer be this in order to redeem you from the curse of the law?" (Rom. viii. 3, 4). Thus, in this last answer, does our Lord reach far beyond into future developments and fulfillments, while he here already lays down at least the same testimony concerning his person which he afterwards declared upon adjuration before Caiaphas.†

In truth, only the faith which, in the same Spirit by which David prophesied, calls Jesus Lord, and recognizes the God-man in him, can solve the enigma of the being of this Son of Man, and find the salvation and the righteousness which the law cannot give. What think ye of Christ? This has ever been since then "the vital question of the ages;" he who does not ask it has it ever anew proposed to him by him who is himself the answer. This is the heart-question, the life-question that decides all; avoid this question and deny the answer, if thou wouldst one day become a footstool with the enemies! "Yes, if it could

* With great injustice, therefore, does Neander maintain that "the argument of Christ remains valid, even although it could be proved that David was not the author of the psalm" (which on historical and exegetical grounds must be denied). Our "Rabbinical theology of the letter" against which he bids us be on our guard is, as we hope, also in accordance with the Spirit of Christ; our interpretation, it is hoped, refutes all such strange caprice as can take its rise and subsist only in the want of proper understanding of the word to be interpreted.

† Whereupon Bengel, with perfect propriety, mentions the just inference as regards the state of humiliation; "Ergo Dominus Davidis erat, antequam ei diceret Dominus: Sede."

* For thus far indeed Hofmann (who, in other respects, perverts the psalm and Christ's question founded upon it) sees the truth which lies clearly on the surface, and needlessly appeals in support of this to what Gerhard says: "These words treat not (merely absolutely) of the divinity of Christ, but of the taking of his human nature into fellowship with the divine subsistence" (Weiss. u. Erf. ii. 195).

† With a folly to us almost incomprehensible, or comprehensible only when viewed as the punishment of the rejection of the Scripture, the acute Schleiermacher passes by this dogmatical point, and so wrests the words as to make our Lord mean simply that he could furnish them with something to answer that would be embarrassing for the Romans. "As they interpreted the psalm Messianically, they could not answer otherwise than: David might call the Messiah at the same time his Lord, because this was to be a far mightier king than he himself was." Apart from the notorious accommodation to the exegesis of that time, as well as its being unworthy of Christ "that he should have proposed any question only in order to embarrass" as even Neander here says)—is there sense and understanding in the idea, that any one should call a future greater king than himself, on this account his Lord?

be said, pointing to Moses, Here is a greater than Christ! and pointing to the law, The office of the letter which kills and condemns has greater clearness than the office of the New Testament in Christ, which gives the spirit and preaches righteousness—if it could be said, The law has given Christ, the law is the end of Christ, the fulfillment of the Gospel, by the works of the law is man made just before God—then might one give the first place to the question, Which is the principal commandment in the law?"* But, because Christ alone by the Spirit makes truly alive those who are dead, and pours his love wherewith he has loved us, the love of God, into the heart, in order to the fulfillment of the commandments which have become new in him—therefore it remains that he, as the Son of God, who as man has redeemed us and as God sits at God's right hand, now and at the last day should make the great separation and decision between his right hand and his left. "If ye hate me—there is sure condemnation for all my enemies. If ye love me—then keep my commandments!" (John xiv. 15, where Christ takes the place of Jehovah, Exod. xx. 6; comp. John xvi. 23).

Thus has our Lord left to us the fundamental article of the simplest catechism in Law and Gospel, as his last doctrine according to the Scripture; thus has he confirmed and repeated the two fundamental ideas of the Sermon on the Mount, namely, the requirement of a better righteousness than that of the Pharisees in the spiritual fulfilling of the law, and the promise that he is come as the alone Fulfiller. The Pharisees contradict both, do not repent in presence of the law, and do not believe on Christ; therefore follow the now thoroughly prepared woes denounced against them, chap. xxiii.

But before proceeding to this we must be allowed a short and unavoidable digression, suggested by the ἐν πνευματι, "in the Spirit," which we have reserved till now against the γραμματεῖς, or Scribes, of the present day. Our Lord pre-supposes, as at that time generally acknowledged by the Scribes, and confirmed by his own recognition, that David, in Psalm cx., speaks of his Son, the future Christ; in like manner he takes for granted as a thing acknowledged the divine inspiration of the psalm, so that he can build the proof-question upon it. His ἐν πνεύματι (or, as Mark has it, ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ), is none other than the בְּרוּחַ הַקֹּדֶשׁ, "in the Holy Spirit," in the Jewish theory of inspiration; this is solemnly acknowledged by him, and taken for granted as a common truth between him and his enemies, and it therefore (although by ignorance reproached as Jewish) must remain also as the thoroughly Christian idea of inspiration. For it is that of Christ himself. He does not here declare it as something new that David speaks and prophesies in the Spirit only in this psalm; but he pre-supposes, with his opponents, the same prophesying by the Spirit throughout the entire βίβλος ψαλμῶν, or Book of Psalms (Luke xx. 42, comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2)—nay, as shortly before, throughout all the γραφαῖς, or Scriptures. Here then is the sedes doctrinae de inspiratione according to the Teacher, whose authority exceeds that of all the Rabbins of that day, and all the doctors of this: what he here calls πνεῦμα, Spirit, is the δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ, "power of God," before ascribed to the Jewish Scriptures And can we, his disciples, call ourselves Christians, and Christian theologians, if we treat the Old Testament humanly, if we shun the offence of the prophecies in him now, as the Jews did that of the cross? We are called Christians, and so long as in this the name Christ and Christianity yet lives, it points us ever back again to the Old Testament. The dogmatical question, What think ye of Jesus? becomes, when it enters into the true "Christian consciousness," one with the exegetical question which stands here, What think ye of Christ? For Jesus has said, I am this Christ! The apostles preached that he is the Christ. Only on the corner-stone of the apostles and prophets is "the Church," together with its true consciousness, built. A Schleiermacherian theology without the Old Testament wants the ground-stone and cope-stone, so long as it does not advance beyond itself.

The idea of inspiration, in its strictness and purity as attesting itself by the Scripture (the one Scripture of the Old and New Testaments in common), is a fundamental idea of theology; and not until theology has again completely recovered this idea, now unhappily almost lost, can it again be a truly Christian and Biblical theology, both these being one. Not until the improper admissions and concessions even of believers on this decisive question come to an end, will their position, as opposed to the negative theologians, assume a fixed and decided form. It is, indeed, not agreeable to the present writer, "properly speaking to stand alone in an age"—as long ago Umbreit said of me, and recently Dr. Tholuck to the same effect—though it is even now almost true; yet, on the other hand, it is consolation enough to stand with Christ and his apostles. It may be that my Scriptural writings are for a while longer "to have the fate of being more rejected than examined."* But this cannot possibly last long; for the fearfully consistent opposition of those who are entire unbelievers will drive the orthodox, even for the sake of a like consistency, into the true stronghold, into

* Friedensbote, 1822, p. 1830.

* As yet, I am sorry to say, almost as much as possible ignored by the theologians of the chair; so that many pass through their studies and yet hear very little of me (or besides of J. F. Von Meyer, the great master of exegesis). A different class of readers, however, who are not ungrateful to me, is happily on the increase.

the Scripture and power of God, which alone is impregnable to the Sadducees.

The inspiration, in the more limited sense, belonging to the Scripture, which is to be distinguished from the Spirit in the thinking and life of the apostles and prophets in general—this inspiration, properly so-called, we steadfastly maintain, and without it we know and acknowledge no Scripture. The theory of the orthodox school, which has appeared since Calovius and Quenstedt, may on one side be very defective, inasmuch as, contrary to the evidence which science has now discovered, it sets aside human co-operation by the supposition of human passivity; but, on the other side, in as far as it sets up a specific difference between revelatio and inspiratio, it is most incontrovertibly right.* He who denies this has to do neither with Calovius and Quenstedt, nor with Von Meyer and Stier, but with the Lord Christ and all his apostles, not to say all the fathers and teachers of the Church from the beginning. Of Dr. Hahn's 24th paragraph in his Lehrbuch des christlichen Glaubens (text-book of the Christian faith), for example, an exact refutation may be found in Justin, Irenaeus, Origen, Augustine, etc., etc.;† apart from the fact that the proposition there laid down, to the effect that revelation and inspiration are according to the Scripture in substance not at all different, declares what is entirely false. The revelation and institution of the old covenant is not merely to be regarded as what generally speaking obtained and subsisted in Israel, not a spurious "Hebraism," which in a merely natural way accommodated itself to the historical development of the people; but it was specifically given and ordained by God through his servants for this people. More particularly, the ground of the canonical authority and supernatural import of their Scriptures is not what the Spirit of God wrought in general in these men, but what the Spirit in particular gave to them to write. David was not always "in Spirit" in the same sense as when he sang prophetic psalms. That their exalted activity, their being in the Spirit while composing these testimonies, stands connected with their whole general life in the Spirit is certain; and it is conformable with the psychological law of the operation of the Spirit of God in the human spirit. The one is as regards the other not a thing of indifference, for indeed they were holy men of God—but this is not yet one and the same with being specially moved by the Holy Ghost, ὑπὸ πνεύματος ἁγίου φερόμενοι (2 Pet. i. 21); this latter belongs specially to the ἐλάλησαν, spake, i. e., according to the clear meaning of the apostle, equivalent to ἔγραψαν, wrote. For to read here, "As the holy men spake so also they wrote"—is certainly an exegesis which thwarts the entire connection with other passages (see James iii. 2). Did, then, those imperfect men who offended in word commit mistakes also in their writings? And who will judge as to these errors? The Spirit in us, which we have in higher measure in order to this? Where, then, remains the idea of the κανών (canon);* which yet Nitzsch, for example, holds fast, although his affirmation, that infallibility belongs only to the whole as such, seems meant by him as going even beyond the truth? So long as I can read and think, nothing will move me from the conviction, that our Lord ascribes an infallibility to the single γέγραπται, "it is written," as such, and that because it is a γέγραπται.† Christ, when he says Δαυὶδ ἐν πνεύματι, does not mean to say that David was always in the Spirit, but he certainly means that his psalms were written in the Spirit; again he means this, not merely of the Psalter as a whole, but, of the most special אֲדֹנִי, "my Lord," and שֵׁב לִימִינִי, "Sit on my right hand," which stands in the 110th Psalm. The true theory of inspiration must, therefore, stand fast in that centre, from which in the New Testament the immovable word ἡ γραφὴ sounds forth; and in the mouth of Christ every γέγραπται receives its own Ἀμήν. And because the New Testament, as the completion of the Scripture, plainly puts itself on the same level of authority with that which it has before ascribed to the old Scripture (this every word breathes and expresses without special dicta, which, moreover, are not wanting)—so also is a special inspiration of that which is written here in like manner the only true conclusion. Although so many believing theologians still reject this, and (as for example Lange) declare the supposed "abstraction, whereby the inspiration of the writing is separated from the inspiration of the life" (but who is for making this separation?) to be "somewhat Talmudistic"—we yet know assuredly, and shall never grow weary of asserting, that all rejection of the specific miracle maintained in the γέγραπται is only to be wise above and against Scripture.

With respect now to prophecy in particular, the substance or matter of all prophecy in the Old Testament is that which God has determined, by the revelation of his Son, to accomplish in the days of the new covenant, in the time of the fulfillment, or אַחֲרִית הַיָּמִים, conclusion of the days ("last days"), and which therefore he announced beforehand in the time of preparation (Acts iii. 24). As the life of faith in the pious had, from the very first, no ground on which to rest without some expectation of eternal life with their God, in like manner all the temporal, provisional leadings and institutions of God, with reference to his people, have no δύναμις (power) and no τέλος (fulfillment) without the all-pervading reference to the coming of Christ. The looking forward to the coming of the seed of the woman, of the seed of Abraham for the blessing of all nations, of the Shiloh unto whom the obedience of the nations is due, of the Son of David who is to build the temple and kingdom for ever, of the Messiah, is, in a certain sense, one with the looking forward to the advent in general, as is rightly denoted by the Jewish theological עוֹלָם הַבָּא, or "world to come" (future, i. e., Messianic, dispensation). This reference and annunciation consists, however, partly in the inner meaning and spirit of all the events and institutions in general, corresponding to the mind and character of the people, partly in special testimonies given from time to time. The latter, which is still to be distinguished, for example, from the true writing of history by the נְבִיאִים רִאשׁוֹנִים, earlier prophets, is prophecy in the more limited sense. And what is the aim of these special vaticinia which announce beforehand, through the succession of ages in regular development, and precede, like their shadows beforehand, all the events of God's hand, but especially, with constant reference to Israel's election, progress, and destiny, the kingdom of Christ, and the history of his person, on which it is founded? In the first place, to strengthen and call forth the expecting faith of that time; to ward off a false resting in what was merely temporary; and graciously to hold forth a pledge of the knowledge of him who was to come. Both those who immediately received these oracles of God (Psa. cx., נְאֻם יְהוָה), and those to whom they were further communicated, were, with anxious longing, to search into their meaning; for prophecy arose to satisfy this longing awakened within them by God, and did not arise in a natural way out of that longing itself (see Dan. ix.). The principal aim of prophecy, however, extended far beyond that imperfect understanding of its meaning which, even with the accompanying private interpretation of the Spirit, alone was possible, to the advent itself. That Israel might certainly know the Messiah when he came, if only they would; that Christ himself, as a man and an Israelite, might have a light for his path, a means of developing and confirming his faith, prepared by the Father;* that the believers of the New Testament might henceforth, in like manner, through the wondrous word of ages, fortify their faith in the unity of all revelations of God, even to the last in his Son, their certainty that he to whom they live is the one that was to come in the fulness of time, according to the eternal counsel; finally, that in the last days the ancient covenant-people, returning from their blindness, might be convinced by its holy letter preserved even till that time—all this is included in the design of prophecy.

† And possibly very different from Tholuck's review in the new "Deutsche Zeitschrift," which makes short work of the subject. How many strong and decisive statements are there, too, against those friends of the truth who will speak sometimes obscurely and with wavering concessions!

* Nullo modo posset Scriptura sacra pro regula vitae ac fidei haberi, si scriptores sacri non alia gavisi fuissent θεοπνευστία, cum homines etiam pii et sancti falli queant variisque erroribus sint obnoxii (Buddæus, Institutt. i. 2, 10).

† Against Hofmann, who, in his "Schriftbeweis" (i. 567 fol.), will only admit the validity of the Scripture as a whole, according to its collective import, there remains this very serious question: What, then, is to be made of the special γέγραται—?

The source, from which the predictions of the prophets in the more limited sense proceeded, is not to be found in the ἰδία ἐπίλυσις ("private interpretation") of a presentiment, conjecture or desire, which, although at first awakened within them by the Spirit of God, was yet further developed in themselves in a natural and human way. But it must be sought in the speaking of God, his word coming always anew into their human consciousness—which, even to the end of the days, when every mystery of God thus spoken is fulfilled and ended (Rev. x. 7), might be and was intended to be partly understood, and partly not understood; and which, precisely on this account, clothed itself partly in literally plain words, in words entirely understood by the prophets, partly, on the other hand, in dark hints, and in an under-sense, which only the Spirit of God himself knew and could interpret. The Spirit of Christ, as Peter says, was in the prophets, so that they must needs search into the words of their own mouth, and, on account of the darkness that hid other things, only abide by what had been revealed to them, namely, that not unto themselves, but unto us, they did minister these things (1 Pet. i. 10–12). But, because the word of the Spirit was yet a word coming through the mouth of men and the thoughts of men, therefore was the knowledge of these holy men themselves the medium of utterance employed by the Spirit; and that in a manner quite as conformable to nature as it was miraculous. Every prophet speaks what is given to him; far as it may reach beyond his time, it yet as a whole bears the peculiar form of his time and person, which the same God, by the course of nature and grace, has wisely prepared with a view to this. The prophet says, indeed, many things which he himself does not altogether understand, but nothing in regard to which he has no thoughts or reflections at all, and which is not in some way connected with his own consciousness. And thus, according to this theory of inspiration, the prophetic writings are truly "organic wholes, and living products of minds affected by the surrounding external and internal relations" (in the words of Bleek), if only we reckon

* And yet there are those who venture openly to impute to him a Jewish, and, on account of his humanity, national sphere of vision, in the belief and the understanding of the Scripture—to him who first brought to Israel and the world the full belief, the entire, true understanding of the Scripture.

among these internal relations the Spirit of inspiration very essentially affecting the mind.

The Christ of prophecy, about whom our Lord in the words περὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, of the Christ, asks, as concerning a person who is the same with his person (Luke xxiv. 26, τὸν Χριστόν, and ver. 44, περὶ ἐμοῦ), is a figure and form which is complete and consistent in its totality.* It is not, therefore, that (one knows not what) "ideal" Christ who is made up of all sorts of presentiments, half agreeing and half disagreeing with each other, such as many at this day speak of. These, indeed, have also a kind of "prophecy;" the idea of which, however, does not at all agree with the idea of this word that obtains elsewhere among heathen, Jews, and Christians, namely, "a foretelling of events, based on divine communication" (see also Acts xi. 28, xxi. 11). Scriptural prophecy in this sense, in so far as it stands in the canon, is a product of a higher degree of inspiration, and its most evident proof; just as that "prophesying," or inspired speaking in another sense, which the Scripture speaks of, indicates a concentrated and stronger working of the Spirit of God on the human spirit. It is nothing to the purpose that, in the original language of the Old Testament, there is no special term for the foretelling of the future. It has the thing itself, and the appeal of the true God to it as coming only from him; and that precisely where this prophesying appears more strikingly than it had ever done before, in Isaiah, for example, chaps. xlii. 8, 9, xlvi. 9, 10, which therefore the present false theory can no longer believe and understand. By right no one should give to a presentiment of the future, developed from the human spirit—præsagium—the name of prophecy or vaticinium, in the theological sense. On the other hand, this name is without doubt rightly applied to a vision given in the first place in the natural horizon of the present, and the sphere of the national life, to which, through the providence of God, a typical character, flowing from the general character, adheres; namely, when this Providence, specially taking care of the canon, has before provided the expression of this intuition in the γραφή or Scripture, and has, precisely by inspiration, given it a co-ordinate place with the more consciously direct prophecies. That the human consciousness of its meaning does not essentially belong to the idea of prophecy according to the more concrete use of the word in the New Testament, but that, all the more on this account, the idea of divine guidance and inspiration belongs to it, is evident from the case of Caiaphas (John xi. 50, 51). But the holy men of God were far from prophesying always unconsciously, and they never did so strictly speaking as Caiaphas did. This leads us into a province where the believing interpretation has been mainly combated and charged with the worst caprice—into the miraculous province of that which the Holy Ghost speaks, while the persons by whom he speaks do not fully understand it. Here "the difference between the immediate and the mediate, between the unconscious and the conscious in the human spirit," as psychology shows what is analogous to it every where, is, at all events in the province of the Scripture, to be well considered and rightly understood. If too great emphasis is laid on the unconsciousness —then, forgetting the Scripture-inspiration, one finds only such "presentiments as the pious writers themselves were not able to master, were not able clearly and entirely to express, scarcely even to stammer out." This, then, is held "from its very nature, to be ever something general, indefinite, floating in the air;" and so the testimony of the prophetic spirit adduced in the New Testament as in the highest degree clear, must be allowed to evaporate into an incomprehensible chiaro-oscuro, the exegesis of which is forbidden to every one. On the contrary, all that the Holy Ghost—so soon as we attach a definite meaning to this great word itself—has given to the sacred writers to say, remains most certain and definite, whether this be simply and plainly in their words, as knowledge destined for the Old Testament times, or whether it be an enigma lying deeper, reserved for the future. In the latter case, what is concealed becomes manifest, and the slight intimation, according to its original divine intention, is exalted into the light of distinct definiteness; i. e., in other words, the Scripture is opened (Acts xvii. 3; Luke xxiv. 45), so soon as the same spirit, who there spoke mysteriously, now becomes the interpreter of his own words. We see, also, that Christ and the apostles cite and make use such h ponoetic testimor , without distinction from the others. "The formula ἵνα πληρωθῇ, that it might be fulfilled, is frequently applied to types the same as if they were prophecies"—says Nitzsch; from this it precisely follows, however, that they are prophecies, and the consciously prophesying subject is properly always in the end the Holy Ghost. As regards the under-sense, also, there is in it no essential token of its having been unknown to the inspired writer; this may certainly have been the case, but it may quite as well have been the contrary.* Only the man who holds no special inspiration will anxiously inquire what, and how much, the writers had in their own thoughts in connection with their words—a question which can now never be settled. We should think that when such a one reads honestly and uprightly the wondrous word of the Old Testament, he must find so much that is uncertain, obscure, and full of prophetic presentiment, so much that is invested and played around by a second sense, as to make him despair of at all interpreting the thoughts in these words. But he who proposes the grand question, What does the Holy Ghost testify here? considers, indeed, the historically personal references and media in the human consciousness, in so far as they present themselves to him; where, however, the word, read in the light of the fundamental intention and special interpretation of the New Testament, begins to loose itself from the natural ground of the time when it was written, he, notwithstanding, continues to read confidently without troubling himself much as to what the prophet may or may not have understood concerning it. We have now to do not merely with "the train of thought of the ancient kings, prophets, and other mere (?) theopneusts"—in which the person, history, and kingdom of Christ were already comprehended in extenso and concreto (Tholuck's Litt. Anz. 1836, p. 181)—but with the train of thought of the Spirit, according to which David speaks in the Spirit, or the Holy Spirit by the mouth of David. We "bring certainly the full coloring into the shadowy sketch"—for, therefore, has the σκιὰ τῶν μελλόντων, "shadow of things to come," been given to us, in its wonderful adaptation to the εἰκὼν or image; he who has the original sees, of course, a true shadow-sketch in the light of this original, and this is precisely now the exegesis of the Old Testament in the light of the New. Moreover, we must not suffer ourselves to be induced to take, as the criterion, whatever a false theology, which does not even understand the Old Testament in a grammatico-historical way, may please to declare as being at any time the stage in the development of Hebraism on the whole, and, therefore, the sphere of vision at the time in the particulars. It is, for example, a mere dogmatical dictum of unbelief which will not acknowledge the "inner relations," when De Wette* says respecting the piercing of the hands and feet in Psa. xxii., attested by the Masora, "If David did not suffer it, then he could not say it of himself, and a presentiment of the particular mode of death which another was to suffer after him could not with these words come into his mind." Wherefore not, if it was revealed to him that not only his life and sufferings bore a typical reference to the great One who was to come; but also, in particular, that the Spirit of the Lord spoke of this One by his tongue? Why must that be called "unpsychological" in the highest and holiest sphere which, in a quite inferior degree, happens to the sons of men—even to many a doctor, in spite of all his exact thinking—namely, that they should often say what reaches beyond their own thought. It would be interesting enough to seek out in many a book of the present day the under-sense here and there put in by God. Göschel's exegesis in reference to Göthe goes, indeed, too far; in general, however, we all apply with justice the same principle of interpretation even to our own classics. And, to return to antiquity—one has only to look without prejudice at the wide natural sphere of the heathen oracles, and the oriental gnome-wisdom, in order to find in abundance even the grammatical double sense (this σκάνδαλον of the γραφή). Now that the wondrous word of the suggesting Spirit, employing and exalting this mode of natural utterance amongst men, comes to have, not, indeed, a "spirit-like" (as the reviewer in Tholuck's Anz. loc. cit. thinks), yet actually a supernatural, miraculous appearance, is at the same time founded so naturally in the fact of the great miracle of inspiration,* that not only in the citations of the New Testament does what is cited acquire for the most part exactly this appearance, but in general to the believingly devout reader every sentence of the Bible is at times thus spiritually transfigured. Thus is that interpretation of the Scripture which completely understands it, properly speaking itself a prophesying and seeing by the Spirit, and not a mere reading and investigating by means of human helps, as in other books written by men. Such interpretation, like all prophecy of the second degree, lets itself indeed be judged by the same Spirit, on account of the error that is mixed with it, but it must certainly decline to vindicate itself against merely human wrangling and disputation.

* "Christ, the promised One, every where explains the Old Testament in the most essential respects of himself, and applies it to his own person, just as a man points to a picture which represents him" (Von Meyer, as editor of De Wette's Psalms, see Krit. Kränze, p. 396). Yet, as may be strictly proved by a genuine exegesis of the prophetical word, what Jul. Müller maintains is wrong, viz., "The Messianic prophecy of the old covenant respecting the incarnate Son of God was fulfilled, but at the same time infinitely exceeded." The fulfilled reality indeed exceeds the prophecy in clearness; in other respects, however—let one only read now in this clear light—it has nothing essential, which had not been already indicated beforehand.

What, then, did David in Psa. cx. know of Christ, when, in the Spirit, he called him his Lord? This Lord himself, who also knew well about David, asserts, on the part of the psalmist, a knowledge of the sense of his own words, in the little word "his"—which is, at all events, implied in the expression "to my Lord," as has been said above. As Moses, according to Num. xii. 6–8, had some understanding of the secret and far-reaching import of his typical laws and institutions, so, still more, did David know, since Nathan's prophecy, that he himself, also a prophet, spoke beforehand, for example in Psa. xvi., of the resurrection of this Christ who was promised to him (Acts ii. 30, 31). In like manner, in the 2d Psalm, he speaks of a world-ruler who is "the Son" in an incomparable sense, in whom to trust for salvation as in God is no idolatry. He knew even that the Spirit of God speaks in his psalms in general of him who was to come. Read only 1 Chron. xviii. 17, and 2

* Erbauliche Erklärung der Psalmen, p. 29.

* For the inspiration of the Scripture is, and remains the miracle in the sphere of human thinking, quite as indisputable, and at the same time incomprehensible, as other wonders of a higher nature imparting itself to a lower. In this way it touches upon what is analogous to it in a lower degree, and is yet, toto cœlo, different from it.

Sam. vii. 19, aright as the words stand.* Consequently the ἐν πνεύματι, "in the Spirit," in the allusion to Psa. cx., does not, in any wise, mean a state of ecstasy in which David himself was carried to the right hand of God, and in which, not knowing the import of his own words, he speaks as if he himself had become his own Lord. Nor are the words "to my Lord" to be understood as "an Israelite's intuition of the glorious and efficacious fellowship of the king with Jehovah," i. e., in another person than his own, as Hofmann thinks; for, on the contrary, Christ* here says that David spoke these words in his own person, concerning another, viz., the Christ. Yet it is not thereby affirmed that David knew and understood all that we can read and find in the inexhaustibly profound word of the Spirit by the mouth of David, now after the actual exaltation of the royal Priest to the right hand of God.

WOE TO THE PHARISEES.—ALL BLOOD UPON THIS GENERATION.—FAREWELL TO JERUSALEM.

(Matt. xxiii. 2–39; Mark xii. 38–40; Luke xx. 46, 47; [Luke xi. 39–52; xiii. 34, 35].)

We must once more, and for the last time, protest against the constant hypothesis of Olshausen, who consistently maintains the improbability that an entire discourse, such as Matthew here gives, was actually spoken by our Lord; and, moving in a circle, reminds us, here as every where else, of the usual manner of the apostles "thus to combine the sayings of Christ." We still maintain the same conviction as to the theory that Matthew has "with art and insight arranged into a new whole" the scattered sayings; we hold it to be an art forbidden to the Evangelist, a false insight on the part of the apostle, who must have known that it was not permitted to him to compile for the Church of Christ the formal discourses delivered by his and its Lord on his entering upon his work and taking leave of it, and then simply to say of them: Jesus opened his mouth and spake thus! The τότε, then, of Matthew, therefore, stands firm here also; as much so, at least, as the account of Luke, who informs us that Jesus had already spoken at an earlier period much of what is here said. Nay, Luke himself, as also Mark, at the same place where the discourse of Matthew stands, gives a brief hint about that discourse. When Luke, chap. xi. vers. 38, 45, 53, narrating ex-

* True, even the old translators take the אדני יהוה ("Lord God") in 2 Sam. vii. 19, as a vocative; but, although this certainly occurs at vers. 18, 19, 20, 28, 29, it yet cannot be meant thus here (the second time in the same verse!), because then the remaining clause ותאת תורה האדם ("And is this the manner of men?") would have no proper beginning. When Hävernick, with Schnurrer and others, would read, "that such is a law for men" (as Seb. Schmid, "idque ad legem hominis")—we reasonably ask, in respect of the sense, What? how so? and can find no tolerable idea corresponding to the elevation of this chapter. Equally unsatisfactorily does De Wette dismiss the readers of his Bible, "Such is the way of men"—namely, to speak thus confidentially (as according to Grotius, also Gesenius, Winer, Maurer), or even, Thus to care for their posterity! Zinzendorf, in his ignorance, may be satisfied with such an interpretation as, "Thou speakest with one, as a friend speaks with another"—but we cannot be so satisfied. The question of surprise, Is this the manner of men (namely, an eternal kingdom)? comes indeed nearer, but no such question is indicated in the text. It is enough to abide by that which Luther has hit in his marginal gloss: "Thou speakest with me of an eternal kingdom, in which no man can be king; he must be God and man, because he is to be my son and yet is to be king for ever and ever, which belongs to God alone." This future, as yet distantly future, Ruler of an eternal kingdom, whose Father (ver. 14) thou art to be, is God-man! Thus we have the true parallel to Psa. cx. Let תורה, law ("manner"), be understood of the new law, the new revelation, the new order of the covenant and kingdom; let the האדם which is strikingly brought into prominence, and used personally, contrary to the usage of this word elsewhere, not be overlooked; and then let the passage be read in full (with Schmieder, Zeugniss von Christo in Predigten, p. 291)—Of an Adam, who is Lord Jehovah, a new beginner of humanity and representative of humanity. If any one thinks that this interpretation of 2 Sam. vii. is mystically put into the words, we ask him how he will dispose of the parallel passage 2 Chron. xviii. 17 (original text. xvii. 17), where the sense maintained by us is still less to be evaded; it means evidently, according to the manner, form (the type) of the or a man, who is on high, who is Lord (and) God. The interpretation, "After the manner of an exalted man"—yields still less sense than the evasions before mentioned. Or, "After the manner of men, O thou on high, God Jehovah"—which is already forbidden by the remarkable accentuation.

* To whom Dr. Hofmann will hardly answer "Thou errest, for thou knowest not the Scripture and the weakness of men so well as I!" We are glad to find Delitzsch at one with us in the testimony that the authority of Christ (from which Hofmann tries acutely, but in vain, to release himself) here recognizes a designation of the Messiah as κύριος in the mouth of David. Thereby certainly "the chain of progression, as Hofmann has constructed it, is at once broken in pieces, the exclusively typical principle of his interpretation of the Psalms entirely shaken" (Delitzsch, Biblisch-prophet. Theologie, p. 186).

actly according to the occasion and connection there indicated, inserts the earlier kindred discourse of our Lord against the Pharisees and Scribes, it is to us not merely in the highest degree probable, but certain, that he is quite as right as Matthew, and Matthew quite as right as he—that is, our Lord (and this has a very profound significance, if only we will admit it) publicly repeated and arranged in this, his farewell discourse, what he had already, perhaps often, here and there uttered in private.* At least let tenable reasons be given against this, instead of an indefinite assertion of its improbability. Was not the case entirely similar with the parable of the guests who despised the call? We shall, therefore, interpret the discourse spoken at the entertainment in Luke as belonging properly to that time; yet we shall there, for the most part, have to consider and explain only the different position and connection of the particular sayings in relation to the concluding discourse in Matthew.

But we must not forget that even the formal apostrophe to Jerusalem as the killer of the prophets, and the announcement, "Your house is left unto you desolate! Ye shall see me no more!"—to remove which from its place in Matthew would contradict all sound feeling—is likewise to be found at an earlier period in Luke xiii. 34, 35, in definite connection with words going before, in ver. 33. What shall we say to this? It certainly bears very much the appearance as if Christ had spoken thus only once, and most naturally where Matthew records it; nay, we cannot quite comprehend Olshausen, when, with obstinate consistency, he curtly says of these words, "In Luke they have without doubt their original place!" How natural it is to doubt whether Jesus could there and then from afar have thus addressed Jerusalem; whether he could already have addressed a farewell to those who would not! When we find that Luke has, without regard to chronological order, interwoven with the so-called narrative of the journey (i. e., the particular section chap. ix. 51, to chap. xviii. 14) much that was spoken elsewhere—for example as we found at chap. xi. 14–36 (yet only so that ver. 37 retains its truth in so far as something similar was then said), and perhaps chap. xiii. 18–21, as also other places—it is surely natural to suppose that in connecting also chap. xiii. 34, 35 with ver. 33, he might have anticipated. More than this, however, it does not become us to say; as even Schleiermacher, in his lectures on Luke (as my notes inform me), "could not do otherwise than let it stand as doubtful."† It is at least much more certain that Matthew is right in giving this as Christ's farewell word; and our feeling, sound and true as we think, rebels against the idea that he has presumed, on his own authority, to remove the earlier saying to this place where Christ would have spoken it beyond comparison more suitably and effectually. When again, however, we find that in Luke xiii. the words may well be understood (even ver. 35) in another, and at that time quite suitable, sense (of which later on Luke), if we only cancel the already critically suspicious ἔρημος, "desolate"—we can make up our minds to suppose, with Bengel, that our Lord had already, at an earlier period in Galilee, addressed Jerusalem in precisely similar terms, as the murderer of the prophets, when speaking of his death which was soon to be accomplished there; and, finally, that at a later period he purposely repeated, with reference to a more remote future, a word that was there meant for his triumphal entry which was soon to take place.

But to proceed with Matthew. According to his account, our Lord spoke here to the people and to his disciples, notwithstanding the address to the Pharisees and Scribes and the entire evil generation, which begins at ver. 13 and continues to the end of the chapter. This implies, first of all, that he began as we see by addressing the people (ver. 3), and his disciples (vers. 8–11); but it likewise denotes, that in fact the woes denounced against the Pharisees were meant less for them than as a warning to the people and to the disciples. Mark xii. 38 brings into prominence the still listening and unsusceptible people; Luke xx. 45, in addition to these, the disciples. Both Evangelists, moreover, not less concisely than profoundly, intimate this as the proper and innermost point of the entire discourse, when they begin it with a Βλέπετε, προσέχετε ἀπὸ τῶν γραμματέων, "Beware of the Scribes!" This connects itself (besides Matt. xvi. 6, and Luke xii. 1) exactly with the conclusion of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. vii. 15)—that Sermon on the Mount which (as we have seen) foreshadows in general, in its progress and conclusion, the progress and conclusion of all the teaching of Christ; to which, in particular (as we shall see), the woes here denounced significantly correspond, as contrasted with the blessings there promised. The sentence of condemnation which the Pharisees, in the hearing of all the people, must needs take away with them—so that by this publicity it already foreshadows to them the great judgment of that day—is meant to exhibit a most solemn warning example for all future times in the eyes of all the people, and especially the disciples of Christ (i. e., as in the Sermon on the Mount, such as are so already, and such as on hearing it will become so): this is the main design and fundamental import of the entire

* Even Hase acknowledges this discourse as authentic, and thinks it to be "so conformable to time and place that it by no means has the appearance of being a compilation of Matthew." Schleiermacher, on the contrary, thinks that on this day there was no longer time enough for such a discourse.

† In his published work on Luke, however, he inclines more strongly to the opinion, that Luke has only inserted the discourse here.

discourse, Let it not be so with you! This must be said even here to the disciples of Christ; therefore, it is not merely, Beware of these and such hypocrites wherever you may meet them; but even, Take heed that ye become not as they! For, according to 1 Cor. ix. 27, there remains even to a Paul the threatening danger of continuing to preach outwardly to others whilst inwardly he is himself rejected, of holding forth the prize to which he himself does not attain.

As, at Isa. v. 8–30, there followed upon the parable of the vineyard a sixfold woe against sinful Israel, so now, in exact contrast with the Sermon on the Mount (to which we shall find besides many particular allusions), Christ utters seven woes, with a superadded eighth, against the hypocrites and blind guides at the head of this generation upon which judgment is about to fall This has not been arranged, here any more than there, by the "art and insight of the Evangelist." It would be folly, indeed, in us, as in Matthew, to trouble ourselves with the question whether Christ spoke every immaterial particular, and every thing literally as it stands here; e. g., whether he mentioned the φυλακτήρια or "phylacteries" first, and not the κράσπεδα or "hems." We may certainly rely on this, that the whole, in its essential meaning, connection, and progress, corresponds through the Spirit of inspiration with the original discourse of our Lord.

It divides itself not less evidently than significantly into three parts. The first gives, by way of introduction and warning, the description of the Scribes and Pharisees, and that in contrast with the disciples of Christ (vers. 2–12). The second, as the kernel, properly speaking, comprehends the seven woes upon the hypocrites and wilfully blind, which are introduced by a sudden change of the address (vers. 13–28). The concluding part passes—in the eighth woe, which combines all the seven in one—from the persons hitherto addressed to the entire generation of Pharisaic Israel, upon which judgment is about to fall; and ends in the terrible farewell to Jerusalem and the temple, the city and habitation of God! (vers. 29–39). In harmony with chap. v. 20, in the Sermon on the Mount, the "righteousness" of the Pharisees—as it is there ironically called and rejected, that is, their unrighteousness and hypocrisy—is first of all depicted. "Those I mean, who are so"—says Christ, and thereby meets the question, which was yet a groundless question, viz., whether and how he can thus condemn the whole class and the whole sect. Those who are not so—he does not mean, and therefore does not condemn. He begins with the quite general mention of those who sit in Moses' seat (still, at the same time acknowledging the right and truth of the office), according to whose words in so far as conformable to that seat, the people are to act, notwithstanding they themselves do not thus act (vers. 2, 3). In this way is at once exhibited a more special delineation of their character as it appears outwardly in their works, and this in warning contrast with the disciples of Christ. They do not what they (more or less rightly) say; what they do however (their righteousness) is hypocrisy before the people (vers. 3–5). Examples which make this manifest are to be found in their affected holy garments, their sitting in the upper seats, and their love of titles (vers. 5–7). Now comes the strongly convictive, specially corresponding antithesis, applied from what is outward to the internal character: Be not ye so! (vers. 8–10). But ye know what I have said to you (ver. 11), as also to them and you together (ver. 12). The last sentence, that namely of ver. 12, comprehends both the Pharisees and the disciples at the close of the direct warning, and already prepares the way for the sentence of degradation upon those who sit on high, the woe that now breaks in.

The sevenfold woe divides itself into two parts; in the first of which there are four, and in the second three woes. The first four have respect to the pernicious effects, the last three to the evil nature of their hypocrisy.* They rob men of eternal salvation in the kingdom of heaven, under the pretext of being placed in charge of it—nay even of their earthly goods under the pretext of making prayers for their souls† (vers. 13, 14). They give to men for this the destruction of hell, or a character which deserves this (ver. 15)—and that by false doctrine, which (in every case as in these examples) puts what is unessential and outward in the place of what is essential (vers. 16–22). Blind guides: this sums up the pernicious outward expression of their hypocrisy, and stands therefore along with the "hypocrites" (vers. 23–25). Now first, pressing closely home, their evil disposition is denoted in a threefold woe: They neglect, in the most trifling outward observances, the principal thing (vers. 23, 24)—and that with conscious hypocrisy; as they cleanse the outside instead of the inside (vers. 25, 26), so they are themselves whited sepulchres (vers. 27, 28). The death in them which is now exposed forms the connecting link to the third and concluding part. This part, of course, again, begins in the first place with the Scribes and Pharisees, the guides of the whole people, in order to extend the eighth woe over their heads into a judgment upon the entire generation. They fill up with all their false holiness only the measure of the sins of their fathers; they pretend indeed to renounce the guilt of their fathers (vers. 29, 30), but yet are like them (ver. 31), nay fill up their measure in order to condemnation (vers. 32, 33). And thus does the entire generation fall with them into judgment: they will also reject the last messengers of Christ (sent to them only to afford a proof of their incorrigibleness), and thus draw down the final judgment upon all former crimes of bloodshed (vers. 34–36); Jerusalem especially would not receive the grace, which sought in vain to allure them, even to the last, and this grace now withdraws itself from them, until there shall be a penitent return of Israel to its Messiah, which lies in the remote future (vers. 37–39). Thus does the rejected Messiah turn away from them; thus does he declare the judgment beforehand; yet not without something conciliatory at the close, in the gracious look which he casts upon the children of these condemned parents, who shall one day be restored—every thing in one comprehensive view of this people and generation, as one whole under the leading of God.

* By a similar division the promising blessings (Matt. v.) proceeded from the inward disposition to the outward expression; the rebuking woe, on the contrary, sets out from the outward expression, and proceeds to the inward character. The parallel, as specially carried out by Lange, between the blessings promised and the woes denounced, appears to us strained, and in some instances artificial. We think that such exact references would not accord with the solemnity of our Lord's holy wrath at the time.

† Ver. 14 is not to be put before ver. 13, for Bengel very aptly observes here, that the discourse must begin with the kingdom of heaven with reference to chaps. iv. 17, v. 3; we observe, in addition to this, that ver. 14 brings up a higher degree of turpitude in order to the greater condemnation. Still less is ver. 14 to be rejected as having been inserted from Luke, as Grotius thought, for Mark and Luke have here retained this περισσότερον κρίμα, as the principal saying.

Verses 2, 3. We are not to conceive of a magisterial power and dignity as belonging to the persons here rebuked; for our Lord uniformly showed an exalted humility towards all to whom he was lawfully subject, and, on special grounds did not even make use of his own royal dignity, nor even the rights of prophet to rebuke and inveigh against the holders of power. He reprimands them not in so far as they had still in any way to judge and rule; therefore it is not the "High Priests and Scribes," so that it is necessary to understand the Sanhedrim, but the "Scribes and Pharisees" —the words being purposely in this order. Of "an organized political influence," which he would prevent the people from opposing in a revolutionary way, he does not here speak; he does not in the remotest way denote the school and sect, which indeed was then the dominant one, as the holders of the "collective theocratical power," not even in order to acknowledge that power. For καθέδρα, ("seat") is neither a θρόνος (throne) nor a βῆμα (tribunal); but generally, the place which any one fills, and here the pulpit or lesk in school and church, as we now say. To sit in the seat of any one is to occupy his place with its rights and prerogatives (see Sir. xii. 12 in the Greek); then to become his successor in office in so far as an office is spoken of; for a transference of a transferable office is certainly pre-supposed therein. But there was at this time in Israel no seat of the prophets, no outwardly constituted right of succession; for, Samuel's schools of the prophets existed for a time only by the Spirit, and even Elisha was not called by Elijah, but by the Lord through Elijah, just as Amos the herdsman was (Amos vii. 14, 15). There was, however, a seat of Moses, i. e., an office with the right and duty belonging to it of declaring the law to the people, of enforcing it, and applying it to particular cases: this Moses did first of all in person (Exod. xviii. 13, 20), and transferred this power (which was then also a power to judge in cases where the law declared punishment) not only to the rulers (ver. 21) who acted with him, but also for the future to the Priests, and Levites, and Judges (Deut. xvii. 9–12). But our Lord cannot mean here even this priestly or judicial office proceeding from Moses (Mal. ii. 7; Deut. xxxiii. 10) as such, for times and things were changed since then; after the return from the captivity, since the time of Ezra, the first scribe or סֹפֵר, another seat had been set up for declaring and interpreting the law (Neh. viii. 4–9), namely, the pulpit in the synagogues, and the right of the learned in general to teach the people. This Christ calls quite properly the present seat of Moses, which the school, as we now say, had occupied; more particularly, however, the specific sect of the Pharisees, which had obtained the upper hand in the school, so that no Sadducæan Scribes were acknowledged, although Sadducees also sat in the high council. It matters nothing to the point, whether the Rabbis and teachers in the temple and synagogues sate or stood (Luke iv. 20); the ἐκάθισαν, "sit," denotes the occupying of this place in general. As Christ at the beginning acknowledged the masters in Israel (Luke ii. 46; John iii. 10), so now, at the close, he lets their authority pass undisputed for the little while it has yet to last (till the judgment, ver. 12); he will not himself thrust them down before the time, but let them sit as now they sit. Whether, moreover, the form ἐκάθισαν is intended to denote "that they were self-elected to their office"—that they have assumpted the seat, and sit as a matter of fact—is still a question; there is certainly something of this in the background, as afterwards ver. 12 comes into prominence. But at first our Lord seems to speak only in the way of acknowledgment, just as at chap. xxi. he acknowledged the keepers of the vineyard in order to rebuke them. For the order of the development from Moses down to the present time, notwithstanding all offence in the individuals, was yet, on the whole, true and legitimate: if there was a seat of Moses in Israel at all, who sate in it but the Pharisees? Although they may have arrogantly seated themselves and now sit (for example, they called the ignorant rabble, John vii. 49, as עַם־הָאָרֶץ, or people of the earth, their "footstool"), yet they were the real, and fundamentally, still orthodox representatives of legal Judaism; hence Paul afterwards connecting himself with them could appeal to their influence. Inasmuch, therefore, as our Lord leaving out of view the Sadducees and Essenes, speaks thus here of the Pharisees, he honors them (as in all his former controversy with them) at the same time that he rebukes them. "Notwithstanding his decided renunciation of what was dead and ungodly in Pharisaism, he yet had grafted his teaching only on their and on no other Jewish sect."

From this will be rightly understood the following confirmation by Christ of what these Pharisees say for the people, which from a want of clearness has been much misunderstood. That in the πάντα ὅσα ἄν, "all whatsoever," their false human statutes, which make void the commandment of God, are by no means to be included, is evident enough afterwards from vers. 16–22; and no one should so understand it after statements such as chap. xv. 3–20. What, in that case, would be meant by the προσέχετε, "beware," addressed to the people as well as to the disciples? "Christ commended the sheep because they listened not to the murderers and hirelings"—and can it be that he should now unconditionally direct them to these shepherds? Certainly, our Lord had, since the Sermon on the Mount, "placed the mass of the people above their representatives," and this is no "incongruous and revolutionary perversion of relations." It was the true reformatory relation, which Christ will assuredly never suffer to be abolished among the people of God, so as, after the genuine Romish fashion, to surrender the ignorant multitude blindly to human authorities. We cannot understand, again, how Olshausen, with the contents of this and the 15th chap. before him, can yet say here: "Their statutes contained in themselves nothing sinful; they were only very burdensome, but whoever entered into them faithfully and earnestly could receive no harm from them!" There lies, therefore, in the important οὖν, "therefore," between vers. 2 and 3 the already self-evident limitation, viz.: All that they say to you as in Moses' name from this seat, conformably to this seat, as true readers and interpreters of the law*—"lest the people might think that the Pharisaic traditions were of equal validity with the precepts of Moses." Luther's marginal gloss runs: "If any one teaches otherwise and more than Moses, he sits not in Moses' seat; therefore Christ rejects afterwards their works and doctrine of men." This discriminating recognition furnished the true complement to all his controversy with them hitherto; and our Lord therefore now expresses it to prevent all misunderstanding of his words (as in Matt. xv. 17). The people needed, and need at all times, in so far as the legal economy of God extends into the New Testament, such readers and interpreters of the word that has been given by God. Our Lord, therefore, at the same time, confirms by anticipation the similar office in Christendom; and declares it as his will that, in all times, the occupiers of any seat of Moses (not certainly a seat of Christ, who knows no representatives) should be honored on account of the office, notwithstanding all personal unworthiness, just as parents and magistrates are to be honored. Even although something human, unprophetical, pertaining to the letter in human fashion, should cleave to it (as Moses himself, at the same time, in the prophetic spirit bore the office of the letter), yet so long as it does not go directly against the word and commandment of God, it is to be tolerated—but not further. What they tell you to keep, already with the gentle irony rightly expressed by Luther, "that ye should keep"—as preparing the way for ver. 4. Yea, that observe and do ye, faithfully on your part, in order that it may not remain undone (see the like expressions, Exod. xviii. 20; Deut. xvii. 10, 11), although they do it not themselves; but ye must not do according to their works! Here the τηρεῖν, "observe," passes significantly to the inward disposition, which is different from the outward ποιεῖν, "do," and first of all required—also testified to by them against their knowledge and will in the word of the law, for it corresponds to the Heb. שָׁמַר, to keep.

Verses 3, 4. They themselves continually say what the law says, but they do it not: this is the first all-embracing designation of their hypocrisy, a hypocrisy which is developed and intensified, according to a psychological law, precisely by this saying and not doing. With this ver. 4 is immediately connected epexegetically; though by an almost universal mistake and in opposition to the plain word, these imposed burdens have been understood of their human statutes. It is only a figurative carrying out of ver. 3, according to the usage of the term (see on chap. xi. 29), and means nothing else than the saying and not doing spoken of immediately before: They proudly and with pleasure give forth the law in all its strictness, they delight to thunder it out severely, as from Sinai—Thou shalt! thou shalt not! without ever thinking of their own obedience (Rom. ii. 21–23). Just so the moral Pharisees of the present day preach endlessly of duties and evermore of duties! They lay upon the shoulders of the poor people burdens which they themselves will not touch with one finger (Luke xi. 46), or move from the spot; not to speak of taking them in their hand and laying them on their own shoulders in order to carry them.* Does this, then, correspond to their statutes, which even Bengel would understand as meant here? No, in their self-chosen works, ver. 5 (now first comes the transition to these), they indeed go zealously before the people. We should in that case have to understand Christ as going on to say in ver. 5: "I have said to you that they do not; verily, they do indeed outwardly, on account of the people, but that is not the right doing." But this sense, however true as respects the divine law, yet has respect to this law only as requiring a spiritual obedience; and not to those statutes which actually require only an outward observance, and for the overscrupulous doing of which, not proceeding from the heart, ver 4 would be a very unsuitable expression. The true explanation of the whole is found afterwards in ver. 23, where the real βαρύτερα τοῦ νόμου, "weightier matters of the law," certainly correspond to the φορτία βαρέα, "heavy burdens," here; in like manner, Rom. ii. 21, 23, rightly understood, Thou stealest, committest adultery, and robbest God in heart, although not in act before the people. In their own hearts the commandment of God is to them an intolerable yoke; not merely in the deep sense of the truth which an honestly striving Paul finds (Acts xv. 10), but with a contemptuous putting aside of the commandment, so that they do not even lay a finger upon it in order to the true keeping of it before God: still they find their pleasure in the δεσμεύειν, binding, and ἐπιτιθέναι, imposing, on account of the office. Of an actual adding of their own commandments Christ does not yet speak here; else he would certainly have expressed himself more distinctly upon this important point, so as to distinguish between vers. 3 and 4. This, however, is already at all events implied in the idea; viz., that the Pharisees, with self-seeking pleasure, make the commandment of Moses a matter of conscience as their commandment; that in their binding and imposing, they already make something else out of it; instead of being a call to repentance in order to the knowledge of sin, they rather make it a laying on of all sorts of burdens. In this way they indeed falsify the law; and they bind its commandments thickly together without mercy, ver. 23, so as to be an intolerable burden as coming from their hands (chap. xii. 7). Here the Jurist Grotius is for once a better interpreter than most theologians; he refers to the benignior interpretatio, every where conceded by Moses, but neglected by his interpreters.† who on the contrary only "omnem operam impendebant ritibus urgendis et ampliandis." Now, in so far as this ampliare had more or less a real foundation, at least in the Mosaic letter, Jesus will not all at once do away with it before the time, God having permitted the letter to become thus sharp and unbending in the hand of his stewards. With an admirably wise moderation, he finds fault with the rigor of the interpreters, yet he stirs up no one of the people to offer resistance to the received interpretation. According to Luke xi. 45, 46, Christ said the same thing expressly to the νομικοῖς, or lawyers, who, as a distinct class (it is there expressly attested), applied themselves to the written law in preference to tradition (compare, finally, Jer. viii. 8, in the original text, in order to understand the entire relation of the סוֹפְרִים to the תּוֹרַת יְהוָה, as our Lord here views it).

* This alone is what we find in it; namely, the acknowledgment of the office, and of all the teaching which was actually in accordance therewith. Roos, as if he had in his mind the pastors of his time, yet hardly according to historical truth, would understand a great deal too much. "From the desk these people say nothing wrong. Their human statutes, perverted interpretations, bad counsels, they spread abroad only in their decisions and conversations or they bring them before their students in a learned shape. In the desk (in the pulpit) all is as yet well enough. There they are afraid. There God still keeps his hand over them!" We doubt very much whether it was so.

Verses 5—7. Of the inward doing before God, such as the law requires even as declared by them, they will know nothing at all; but what they do as their works, i. e., now reaching further, what they do according to God's command and their own invention, they do only for display before the people. We have here a direct resumption of the Sermon on the Mount, chap. vi. 1 (πρὸς τὸ θεαθῆναι, to be seen, literally as there); and it is to us a confirmation of the reading δικαιοσύνη, "righteousness," in that place. Look at them, and you will at once see this; for they make it grossly palpable to all! Most appropriately and with no slight scorn, resting upon pure truth, Christ mentions first of all the most outward and trifling observances, because it was precisely these that they made a display of; only read and observe the description and delineation of Pharisaism as a whole in its pomp and parade, to be found in Buxtorf, Lightfoot, Schöttgen, Lundius. Mark and Luke mention only the περιπατεῖν ἐν στολαῖς, "going in long clothing," which is wanting here, and is to be understood chiefly of the wide טַלִּית, or mantle, reaching even to the soles of the feet. The φυλακτήρια, or תְּפִלִּין, "phylacteries," still in use, were bits of parchment upon which passages from Moses were written, Deut. vi. 4–9 (and therefore that spiritual fundamental commandment held before them by Christ), xi. 13–21, Exod. xiii. 2–10, 11–16, not however to remind them of these, but for mere outward show. They were enclosed in two cases, bound round the forehead and the arm; and originated in a literal interpretation of Exod. xiii. 9.* They are called in Greek φυλακτήρια not because they were preservatives or amulets, as, according to ordinary Greek usage, it might be taken (Justin, for example, so misunderstanding it, found fault with these phylacteries on this

* "In what an entirely different light does the Saviour appear, who himself sought to bear the heaviest burdens, and by his love to make every thing easy for his people" (Stein on Luke).

† For example, in regard to the tithes, it was not agreeable to the intention of the law to extend them to the smallest herb; because these would hardly yield an emolument to the Levites, while they entailed the most grievous vexation on the tithe-payers.

* The Jews give it a more sacred observance than it receives on the plate worn by the high priest on his forehead; for, the name יְהוָה is there only once, but here it stands 23 times!

ground, and indeed such a superstition may at that time have connected itself with them); but, originally, they were only means of remembrance or memorandum-papers. Schöttgen, therefore, is more correct than Wahl, for the former explains: quia observatoria quædam erant et hodieque esse debent, ut legis divinæ memores sint. The κράσπεδα, "borders," are the צִיצִית or tassels, which were spoken of before in chap. xxii. 40. There could be no more striking example, and at the same time symbol, of the triflingly outward manner in which they handled the divine commandment than the fancied fulfillment of the earnest admonition of Moses, by the wearing of memorandum-papers and all such frippery. That they make these broad and large is also symbolical of all their life and action: in the one (which was actually literally enjoined), at least broader and larger than Moses meant, only for show before others, instead of reminding themselves; the other, moreover, was only an exaggerated interpretation of the proverbial saying, Exod. xiii. 9; Deut. vi. 8, 9, comp. Prov. iii. 3; vi. 21; vii. 3.* The two together delineate completely their relation to the Torah or law. See the capouches, tonsures, cowls, rosaries, crucifixes in monkery, with all that is similar to these in heathen Bonzes and Brahmins; ever the same folly of the human heart, betraying itself in these things, such as Christ must needs ridicule and rebuke in these Pharisees in Israel! Decorating the body with all sorts of ornamental appendages is the symbolically significant expression of the Pharisaism of the human heart in its lowest stage, often practiced childishly by the heathen; and thus now do even the priests and masters in Israel act in their own fashion! In like manner there is every where the same petty desire of honor and place, to which the chief seats, with names and titles, are all-important. It was necessary even to rebuke the immoderate ambition which led them to seek and hold fast the chief seat in the synagogue, although that was assigned according to office and right; but the same ambition betrayed itself doubly in this, that they transferred the place in the synagogue also to common life, and even at entertainments contended with each other for the uppermost seats, as in Luke xiv. 7. And now comes the pitiful desire for those titles which have existed from the earliest times, and exist to this day, in the world and the worldly church, with their "Excellencies" and "Eminences," but which the servants of God and interpreters of his word should leave to the world; or, if such titles must exist, should at least not love them, but should know better what a mere being called of men signifies! Our Lord only begins here to delineate this with the first and most general title Rabbi (the repetition of which was especially formal, as is to be seen from Mark xiv. 45), in order to carry it out further in the prohibitory warning addressed to his disciples

Verses 8—10 That our Lord does not forbid the outward use of the words and names, but only the disposition expressed in the φιλεῖν τοὺς ἀσπασμοὺς τούτους, "loving these salutations," and all that is further connected therewith, is so evident that only a Quakerism, which is itself Pharisaic, could misunderstand it. Will Christ, then, forbid children to call their fathers by the name of Father, as would be the case were we to understand the words literally? Even the spiritual children he will not forbid to call their spiritual fathers by the name which properly expresses this relationship (see 1 Cor. iv. 15). He must, in that case, have forbidden many more names such as Lord and King, and whatever, "upon earth" among men, is merely a reflection of divine honor and dignity. The words are spoken in the first place of the office of teacher; and as surely as Christ afterwards appointed manifold offices in his Church, must these offices also bear their corresponding names (Acts xiii. 1; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11). This, therefore, he does not forbid, but he says: Ye are not even to let yourselves be named Rabbi in such a manner, with such fondness for and pretension to personal authority, as the Pharisees.* Between the twice-occurring μὴ κληθῆτε, "be ye not called," he puts the equally valid μὴ καλέσητε, "ye shall not be called;" therefore that they are not to acknowledge and yield to the like assumption in others.† The three titles are a graduated exemplification of what was then in use: Father (a natural expression of reverence for superiors occurring from the earliest times, both among Jews and Gentiles) was then in particular a higher title given to the heads of sects; and καθηγητής denotes (although, perhaps, the then existing practice did not exactly correspond to it) a leader, to whom others are to be unconditionally subject in matters of knowledge and religion (see Rom. ii. 19, ὁδηγὸς τυφλῶν, "a guide of the blind"). There lies, however, in the threefold title, and what is connected with it, something more for the disciples of Christ: in the first clause, διδάσκαλος, teacher ("master" as the invariable rendering of Rabbi) is certainly the true reading, and ὁ Χριστός, "even Christ," to be cancelled, for Christ cannot have needlessly repeated himself. One is your Teacher, because ye shall all be inwardly taught of God (John vi. 45, xiv. 26); that is therefore the Holy Ghost in the heart (comp. Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, with Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27).

* Hence the טוֹטָפוֹת in the Sept. are not yet called φυλακτήρια; but in the Targum on Deut. are already called תְּפִלִּין.

* "Only this is his righteous will, that we desire not the higher place on its own account, and the names Teacher and Father merely on account of these names" (Rud. Matthäi).

† Lange finds in this change of the expression actually the fore-knowledge, on the part of Christ, that not many would claim the name "Father," but that many might wish in a wrong way to ascribe it to others.

Therefore there follows then the Father in heaven, and Christ, the one Leader or Forerunner; hence, as Richter perfectly well observes, "a hint at the threefold I in God, before which every proud I must disappear."* It is, however, not enough that only One, as the Triune, is to us the true Teacher, Father, and Leader; Christ adds directly, as the inference from this and as the test of it, But ye are all brethren! The great and little, the high and low in place, the masters and beginners are, with respect to their call and immediate relation to God, placed upon a level; therefore, "teachers and learners have the same holy inward Teacher,"† all being as yet only learners, children of the one Father, followers of the one Leader. The spirit of this commandment of Christ for his people is not merely that it does away with all those barriers that fence round schools and learned castes in his Church—which stands not in such things, whose servants and members are to derive their authority and dignity which the gift of God alone imparts, as little from any faculty whatsoever, as at that time from the Synagogue—but, moreover, all respect for men which, with assumed authority, would force itself between God and us, is done away with. And this is in reality the main thing: Whoever assumes this to himself sins, and even so whoever concedes it to others. "No one is at liberty to take the place of Christ in the Church, and to let himself be called so and so in this sense. The Spirit himself whom he hath given to the Church must take it of his own, and show it to us. We know of no teacher in the Church besides and beyond him, and no philosopher in the school to whom we could entrust ourselves."‡ Observe now again how our Lord, abolishing all Old Testament tutelage, brings in a new state of things in the true liberty and equality which is founded on humility before God, now fully revealed and accessible to all; and how he himself thus exaltedly makes himself equal with the Father in heaven. What becomes, then, of the primacy of Peter, what of the most Holy Father in Rome, what of the father confessors and generals of the orders, who give themselves out for guides of souls with the demand for unconditional obedience? Every dominion in one's own name falls before Christ; every misuse of the name of God and Christ in order to one's own dominion cometh of evil, proceeds from the same evil heart as all Pharisaism did once, even though it should again creep in as plausibly as, for example, Zinzendorf's title "Papa" in the Moravian fraternity. Christ will have in the New Testament§ a directly free and near relation of all to himself, without human interposition and tutorship. "All, even the weakest, are to be directed to this one true Master, who casts out no one. The point of view from which the teacher is to be regarded must ever be that according to which his hearers shall learn to say, with the inhabitants of Sychar: "We believe now, not on account of thy saying; we have ourselves heard and known that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world."*

Verses 11, 12. This one Master, however, has often and long since told you what alone avails in his kingdom, and says it to you once more as the true Forerunner (see chap. xx. 26–28, xviii. 4; Luke xiv. 11, xviii. 14). This is not accomplished by the title "servus servorum;" rather is this holy fundamental commandment of Christ thereby quite as shamefully and foolishly perverted as at that time the Hear O Israel was by the phylacteries. No saying stands in these and other words so often in the Old and New Testament as that concerning humbling and exalting; in this place the first clause has a special significance for those who were arrogantly sitting in Moses' seat, and predicts for them the being cast down, and the coming of others into their place, just as Ezek. xxi. 26, 27 already testified. Christ goes before as Leader in humbling himself so as to be exalted—Satan was the first who exalted himself so as to be humbled.

Verses 13, 14. They come not into the kingdom of heaven, or rather of their own will do not enter into it: this stands before, and is itself the first Woe (as antithetical to the first Blessed, chapter v. 3); the immediately following fulfillment of what had just been said, viz., that whosoever will not humble himself in spiritual poverty can also not be exalted. But, in the case of these occupiers of Moses' seat, it is immediately added to this, that they prevent others from entering; nay, the aggravated hypocrisy, consisting in the false pretence of promising help to the people into a kingdom of heaven, in order to plunder them of their earthly goods, brings with it forthwith a περισσότερον κρίμα, "greater condemnation," as a second Woe. Observe here, again, the true order of these two verses; as well as the proof that the Οὐαί or "Woes" are not phrases and interjections of passion, but the deliberate announcement of the condemnation (ver. 33) upon those who will not go into the kingdom of heaven How they shut the kingdom of heaven against men had already been remotely indicated in chap. v. 19; then, in chap. xi. 12, the further development of the enmity against Jesus. In Luke xi. 52, Christ had thus expressed it: Ye have arrogantly appropriated to yourselves the key of knowledge, and taken it away from others (ἤρατε); i. e., not a special key in order to γνῶσις or knowledge but rather the key of the kingdom of heaven, as the following words show. The knowledge is precisely this key; and while the Scribes had usurped to themselves a monopoly of knowledge they misused it for shutting instead of for opening. In general, the true interpretation and application of the law, that is, consequently, the knowledge of the true way of salvation by repentance and faith (Luke i. 77), is the open door into the kingdom of heaven; and they had stolen and falsified both of these before Christ came. With obstinate consistency they completed this robbery in the days of John and of the Son of Man; snatched away from the poor people by their authority the acknowledgment of the Messiah; and said to those who wished to believe on him, and who rarely defended themselves with such bold independence as that blind man, We know that this man is a sinner, that must be enough for thee! (John ix. 24). They shut the door ἔμπροσθεν τῶν ἀνθρώπων, "against men" (lit. in their face); they do not let in the already quite near εἰσερχομένους (Present: who are actually on the point of willingly entering)—as they afterwards continued even till the judgment to hinder the preaching of the Gospel for the salvation of the heathen (I Thess. ii. 16). That they should say, We have the key of the kingdom of heaven! and yet prevent others from entering, inasmuch as and because they will not enter in themselves—such conduct, on the part of the false teachers and guides, deserves the Woe, deserves the true title of hypocrites, blind guides, fools, and blind, which now come instead of those before mentioned. And withal they are the holy ones with their many and long prayers; which cost them so much time that it is but reasonable to give them entertainments and gifts in return, all the more because they, as "devout intercessors," wish to let others have the benefit of their sanctity! We must thus understand something of intercession in these prayers, in order that the ἐν προφάσει, or εἰς πρόφασιν, in or for a pretence, may correspond to what goes before. Christ has in his mind perhaps such prophetic rebukes as Hosea iv. 8; Ezek. xxii. 25; more particularly Isa. x. 1, 2; Micah ii. 9. They hypocritically cozen poor credulous women so as to get their property and goods (somewhat in the same way as, Luke viii. 3, love to the Lord Jesus led the woman to do; or even worse): the wide maw of their avarice swallows whole houses, i. e., all the property and possessions of the widows thus defrauded, whom they ought to have protected! Is it not as if Christ had intended to prophesy, at the same time, of the gifts to the clergy in the middle ages, of the profitable traffic in masses for souls (also for the dead husbands of widows) even at this day? But those who thus gather treasures have thereby heaped up for themselves another treasure, the condemnation meted out to them all, the more fully because of the shameful pretence!

Verse 15. As if these persons who are thus accumulating judgment were themselves altogether perfect patterns of holiness; nay more, as if they who thus robbed the people instead of leading them into the kingdom of heaven had already fulfilled their pastoral office in Israel, and had nothing more to do at home, they compass land and sea (a proverbial expression) to make proselytes; again an opus supererogationis proceeding from bare hypocrisy, as if an ardent zeal impelled them thus to draw people into the kingdom of heaven. "The Jews, before Christ, were not permitted to act as missionaries; their desire to make proselytes was contrary to the will of God; even Jonah durst not preach Mosaism, the Jewish religion of shadows, to the Ninevites, but only the wrath of God, in order to repentance" (Richter). The σεβόμενοι or φοβούμενοι τὸν θεον, יִרְאֵי יְהוָה, those who feared God, who, actuated by an inward impulse of truth joined themselves to the Jews, and who, in the New Testament and in other history, are represented as a most praiseworthy class of men, through whom the transition of the Gospel to the heathen was instrumentally effected, but who were hardly acknowledged by the Pharisees, regarded by them only with envy and contempt—these were not the complete "proselytes of righteousness made by the Pharisees whom Christ here means.. These latter were rare because a heathen would hardly be induced to take upon him the entire yoke of the Jewish law. Therefore: "If ye have made one such proselyte, ye think ye have made a conquest of which ye may ever after be proud; therefore all your concern has been just to effect this, ye give yourselves no further trouble. And when (as in a rare case) ye have succeeded in your object, when one has entirely surrendered himself to you as his patterns, what do ye make further of this proselyte whom you have gained? Twofold more a son of hell, i. e., one deserving of, and doomed to condemnation than ye yourselves are!" A sharp word, but, startling as it may sound, nothing but the truth, as confirmed again by history in all times. Let it not be objected that surely the seduced were less guilty than the seducers that it is at least enough if both fall together into the same pit; what Christ here means reaches farther, and justly so. He who could yield himself up from heathenism, to such Pharisees, must have done so from the first with an evil conscience; and if he remained in this school, what must become of him! The Pharisees for their own knowledge and conscience had the true word of God still near to them; but the Judaism planted by them at second hand had of course no longer any thing of the true kernel, but, on the contrary, only the assumed mask, so that the poor heathen was better before as a simple heathen. They taught him systematically to act the hypocrite; therefore was he, "by being indoctrinated into hypocrisy," twofold a child of hell. Here also our Lord condemns, by anticipation, all that false proselyte-making of the pseudo-church which strives only after the outward increase of its body; all appliance of power without persuasion (instead of the apostolic πείθειν, 2 Cor. v. 11); and all perplexing of the conscience, so as to catch people without being able or willing to convert them.* For, every change of religion, without a felt necessity and conviction of the heart, is only a hurt and a loss; as may be seen not alone in the Christians made by the missions of the Jesuits, or even in renegades. Thus do moral corruption, false doctrine, and corrupt practice, become worse and worse when delivered from hand to hand, and every where we find the disciples and adherents worse than their masters!

Verses 16—22. Now comes, in the true order, the false doctrine, which these blind guides implant in the people at home and in the proselytes over land and sea; so that they come not into the kingdom of heaven but into hell. If, on the one hand, the Pharisees are severe in binding and imposing the law, they know, on the other hand, when to loose and to dispense with it; this, however, results in a still worse caprice. Christ, as we know, prefers to speak, not in abstract generalities, but in concrete examples; therefore he gives here, first of all, two designative examples with their refutation (vers. 16, 17, and 18, 19), then a further refuting counter-affirmation with reference to the same two examples (vers. 20, 21)—wherewith, finally, in connection with the last instance of their outward manner of dealing with the law, viz., "Whoso sweareth by heaven," he points to him with whom alone we have to do in everything, the living God, to whom the Pharisees do not give what is due (vers. 21, 22). The Lord purposely selects examples such as those of which he had already spoken in the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. v. 34, and again afterward, chap. xv. 5; for he will here, chiefly pointing backwards, draw the final inference and pronounce the decisive sentence. He selects them, also, as affording a striking specimen of the way in which the holy name of God is hid beneath formulas and webs of lies, and as a most suitable preparation for the conclusion of the entire discourse. These guides in Israel are, alas! mere servants of the temple and altar, not of God, whom they forget in their regard for these; therefore that which alone they wanted to have is at last after much long-suffering left to them, viz., the temple—but as their house, without the indwelling of God, consequently desolate! (ver. 38). And what now is this their house? Nothing else than what they have made of it, an abode of murderers, which must fall to pieces upon their blood-guilty heads! Ye blind guides! This, too, had already been said before, chap. xv. 14, and Luke vi. 39; here it is further intensified into fools and blind, i. e., wilfully not seeing. Every where do Pharisaism and Jesuitism express themselves especially in the wresting and misconstruing of the oath; and even now it is difficult to obtain from the Jews a binding oath; they have always in store many an οὐδέν ἐστιν, "it is nothing."* The gold of the temple is not the gold which adorned its walls, but the rich temple-treasure, which yet, according to their principle, must "ever be accounted poor," so that never enough could be made over to it—the Corban set apart for sacred uses; for, from motives of self-interest, these knaves gave the preference to the gold and the altar-gifts even in oaths. And how perverse! Is it not through the temple that the gold becomes the gold of the temple; is it not through the altar that the gift becomes an offering? The altar is most holy, Exod. xxix. 37.† Whosoever, therefore, swears by the altar, includes, of course, all that belongs to the destination of the altar, all that is upon it or that belongs to it; the altar is the greater in which the less is comprehended. And now ver. 21 is not merely parallel with the preceding, in which case Christ would have said "by the temple and—the gold that is in it and on it"—but he here advances further, and suddenly rises higher, disclosing the ground of the whole in the words, "And by him that dwelleth therein." This leads further still: the temple, which is itself sacred only through God's presence in it, is the dwelling place of this God only as a figure of heaven (1 Kings viii. 27, 30). Therefore here also, as in the Sermon on the Mount, oaths by heaven are the same as by the throne of God. Finally, for these fools and blind it must even yet be added, "And by him who sitteth on the throne;" so that they, as in Moses' seat they forget Moses himself, in the end would forget in the seat of God the living God himself, and make empty oaths by the mere "seat of God." He who sits there will certainly one day thrust down those who sit on their seat; and he who sits above at his right hand will one day make his enemies his footstool. By this simple word, He that sitteth thereon, every thing has been said to them. For the rest, we already know that Christ does not approve of oaths by the altar, temple, or heaven; he only brings them forward because they are in use, and, tracing them back, shows that they are all in reality oaths by God. Whoso swears by the temple means the temple as rendered sacred by God; swears, therefore, as by the temple, so in that very oath by him who dwells therein. So also by the heaven—for all oaths by created things are otherwise contradiction and unreason—he can mean only the heaven where God is; therefore, in reality, only the living God who hears his vain oath. What patience on the part of Christ, thus again in this discourse, to enter so fully into the refutation of their folly! He thus condescends in order to say and show before all the people, by the one differently applied example: This and such like are your ordinances, which cannot bear the test of reason, and which have already been sufficiently refuted by me! How great and how bad must have been the wilful neglect of what is of main importance in those miserably trifling pickings and choosings; the forgetting of God in the temple and the heaven; consequently, the transgressing of his commandment which requires the heart, in people who believe such doctrine!*

Verses 23, 24. The first four woes are past; the three others follow in rapid succession, ever heavier on the head, ever deeper into the heart. Now comes first, properly speaking, the personal conduct of these blind guides, their own inward character and true state before God, when the bottom of their heart is disclosed to them. It was (Lev. xxvii. 30) doubtful as to the interpretation, and as to practice disputable, whether tithe was to be paid of all garden-herbs, even the least. The Pharisees, in such things, did rather too much than too little; but the weightier part of the law—more difficult, indeed, even to touch than all outward obligation was to bear—they had consciously long since entirely given up or left behind! Thus the βαρύτερα does not certainly all at once mean only "what is more important, the main thing," but refers back to ver. 4; still, the expression of course passes over to this signification, for what is weighty and difficult is certainly what is important, and essential above other things. The form ἀφήκατε, "Ye have omitted," contrasts quite correctly with ἀποδεκατοῦτε, "ye pay tithe;" the one ye do ever diligently, the other ye have already let slip, put aside; as in many things ye have put aside the commandment of God, for the sake of your statutes (chapter xv.), so in those others, in which ye appear before the people as the scrupulous fulfillers of the Mosaic commandments, ye have neglected the inward, the essential part of the law properly so called. Whosoever has put this away from him, actually retains only time and inclination for zeal in tithes of cummin. The καί, and, that follows, explains their wonderfully faithful conscientiousness, and discloses the evil ground of it. Again, with unconscious irony, speaking to them as it were in their own language, Christ sets in opposition to the threefold tithes three things to be given to God; as, but for this antithesis, he would, according to chap. xxii. 40, have specified only the love of God and our neighbor. In Luke, chap. xi. 40, the saying followed that about cleansing the outside of the vessels which it here precedes; the connection, however, is in both places the same, for our Lord mentions here that to which these Pharisees attached greater importance than to inward cleansing before God. There two kinds of herbs were specially named (and then in addition πᾶν λάχανον); therefore also, in opposition to these, only a twofold inward character (and conduct proceeding from such character): judgment and the love of God; i. e., in addition to the righteousness that judges true judgment (which always remains the first and foremost thing in the law), the love that proceeds from God and is well-pleasing to God, exactly in the sense of Matt. ix. 13, xii. 7. Here, connecting still more closely with that word, the idea in its trichotomy takes a different turn. It is not, however, judgment upon yourselves, mercy towards others, faith in God; for in this sense πίστις or faith, is no βαρύτερον τοῦ νόμου, "weightier matter of the law;" if this third is understood of the disposition of mind from which both proceed, then is the order of the antithesis broken. We apprehend the meaning of the words rather as follows. First of all, the κρίσις or "judgment" as that which at all events goes before, עֲשׂוֹת מִשְׁפָּט וּצְדָקָה, "doing judgment and righteousness" (since Gen. xviii. 19, occurring so often in the law and prophets), viz., the righteousness that discharges all the debt of the law; but in so far as it rests on a true judgment which is just, and that again upon a thorough self-judgment applied first of all within, Luke xii. 57.* Then, further, the mercy or love which God teaches, requires, and gives as the spirit of the law rather than strict justice. Finally, with these there is joined a third and perfect thing, the πίστις as אֱמוּנָה, "faith;" the reality and perfection of justice as of love, the sincerity and truth which stand opposed to the seeming faithfulness in trifling observance (Bengel. sinceritas, quae opponitur hypocrisi, nam qui, c. xxiv. 51, dicuntur hypocritae, Luke xii. 46, dicuntur ἄπιστοι—we compare in addition to this, πιστός, Mat. xxiv. 45). Thus the whole becomes parallel at the same time with that prophetical word, Micah vi. 8—the third not excepted with respect to its inner sense; for he who walks humbly before God is sincere and entire. The same contrast of outward trifles with what is truly essential, is again presented by Christ in connection with another of the minutiæ to which the Pharisees attached so much importance. It was the custom to strain wine, vinegar, and all sorts of drink, carefully through linen cloth; so that not the smallest unclean animalcule, not even a יְבַחוּשׁ (which, in the writings of the Rabbins, is the special name for a sort of insect in wine) might be drunk with it, and thus Lev. xi. 20, 23, 41, 42, be transgressed; as the Buddhists in Ceylon and Hindostan do with drinking water at this day. Now Christ himself for once makes a proverb out of this: "Who strain out the gnats, even the smallest single gnat, and yet, without seeing it,

* Zeller (Beugg. Monatsbl. 1843, 5) finds in the hypocritical casuistry of these lax directors of conscience a fourfold hypocrisy; approving of unspiritual abuses—releasing from obligations—inverting religious ideas and divine ordinances—making self-interest a rule of conduct.

* He who judges himself in his own conscience, and he alone, exercises justice and righteousness towards others (Von Meyer, Blätter für höhere Wahrh. vi. 145).

drink down, swallow the camel!" He puts in opposition another unclean animal, and that an enormous one (chap. xix. 24); so as, at the same time, to denote the monstrousness of their hypocrisy which tolerated this, as before their greedy avarice was denoted by the devouring of houses. The sense of the passage in itself, after the foregoing verse, needs no explanation; but that there might be no misunderstanding, as if he meant to say that faithfulness in little things is not necessary, our Lord put between these sayings the words, These ought ye to have done and not to leave the other undone (ἀφιέναι as ἀφῆκατε). Justice, love, and faithfulness—these are the principal things done; while the outward trifling observances are just on account of the faithfulness which certainly imparts value to them, the things *not to be omitted. When the philologist begins with trifling minutiæ, and does not go beyond these, the reason certainly is that he has no sense for the spirit and meaning of the writer; this latter, however, being pre-supposed, he should then not neglect even a single iota. Thus Christ here means that the tithe of mint, anise, and cummin is also to be paid, if the conscience finds these in the letter and sense of the law: I am in that case not even to swallow the gnats, and think the trifle may thus be disposed of. But he will have conscientiousness in what is least, only to proceed from inward faithfulness upon the whole.

Verses 25—28 The Pharisees had already heard of the washing of vessels (Mark vii. 4); here it forms the transition from such things as still rest on the Mosaic commandments when pressed in the letter, to such as were self-chosen. Speaking generally, the advance which our Lord here makes from what goes before, is manifold: while, by a slight connection, he passes from the strained drink to the drinking and eating vessels, he now makes use of this figure only more exactly to denote what is outward, and what inward (according to Mark vii. 15, 18–23); he then proceeds to apply the figure of the vessels to represent the men themselves, points them to their own consciousness of inward uncleanness in their hypocrisy. "Ye knaves know well what is in your so cleanly-washed cups and platters, how you have gotten it; and how used it; for both these, the sinful getting and sinful enjoyment,† are plainly meant by the ἁρπαγῆς καὶ ἀκρασίας, "extortion and excess" (this and not ἀδικίας, "injustice," is the true reading).‡ If now, first of all, the inside of the cups and platters is to be cleansed (and that not hastily by giving a few alms therefrom, as is said mockingly, Luke xi. 41; but as it follows there in ver. 42), it thus appears that the inner side and contents of the vessel also belong to the outside, as regards the man himself and his heart; therefore quite naturally the vessel becomes a figure of the Pharisee, as was plainly said in Luke xi. 39 by τὸ ἔσωθεν ὑμῶν, "your inward part," and is indicated here also on ver. 26. In every sense—even in the outward vessel, how much more in the doing and inner being of the man—it is true that he alone who has cleansed the inward part, has also made the outward truly and actually clean; while he who only cares for the outward, is far from having therefore done all for the inward (Luke xi. 40; Tit. i. 15). Therefore look now at your inward part—there is death! A new and profoundly terrible figure, derived from the worst form of Levitical uncleanness, now follows, viz.: whitewashed sepulchres—which, at the same time, already, as it were, prepares the way for what is further said, ver. 29. A human heart can be a temple of the living God, or a grave—a heaven, or a hell. The prophet, Ezek. xiii. 10, spoke of plastering the wall with slacked lime, which in Acts xxiii. 3 appears as a proverb, and Christ has here intensified the expression to the utmost degree; we know of no more horrible, and, at the same time, more appropriate figure whereby to express the lying contrast between the outside and the inside in those hypocrites; it is also the last woe, the seventh, whereby they are completely portrayed and condemned. The tombs were spread over with lime,* less for ornament (although this also comes in at ver. 29) than as a necessary mark of distinction, that pollution might be avoided (for the Jews extended to the sepulchre what was true only of the corpse); Christ, therefore, will here say, Whosoever rightly considers and rightly regards your whitewashed sanctity ought to beware of you, for he that touches you pollutes himself, touches death!† Your whitewash looks, indeed, quite seemly, ὡραῖοι, and gives no distinct portraiture of the dead bones within; yet the ὀστέα νεκρά, "dead men's bones," and all the filth of corruption are within. Such are ye—is again declared with abundant plainness in ver. 28: Your δίκαιοι, "righteous," is nothing else than an ἔξωθεν φαίνειν or "appearing outwardly." "Your religion is the whitewash," exclaims Wurster to the Pietists of the present day. Your morality, virtue, etc., is the whitewash—must we say to the hypocrites of all sorts.

Verses 29—33. The eighth woe plainly comprises all the seven in the κρίσις τῆς γεέννης,

* Such things must also be done on account of the commandment—says Sirach, chap xxxv. 7 (in Meyer, ver. 4, comp. the original text).

† Which twofold idea Lange even finds to be indicated in the cups and platters.

‡ Not however with Grotius πάσης ἀκαθαρσίας, which follows at the end. ver, 27.

* A practice which was even repeated yearly on the fifteenth of Adar.

"damnation of hell," connecting itself with the beginning, ver. 13; and, includes the wicked seed with their wicked fathers in one collective sin, guilt and punishment. The hypocrites (this continues to be their title now for the seventh time) protest, indeed, against this in word and deed; but before God their protestation is held for what it is worth, and is rather turned against them as their own confession. They repaired, adorned, even built anew the sepulchres of the prophets and pious men of old; just like our own time with its rage for monuments and jubilees. When the people are so busily occupied with such work, it is an evil sign for the present. Men are fond of praising the dead witnesses for truth, whom, if alive, they would thrust from them; they are glad, so to speak, that they have only to build sepulchres and monuments for them. Thus does Christ view their conduct here, because he sees through the hypocrisy: Ye yourselves, even when ye protest against "your fathers," confess against your will that ye are the children of those who murdered the prophets. In Luke xi. 47, 48 the idea comes still more sharply out; not in the form of the protesting word, but of the confessing deed: Yea, the fathers were the murderers of the dead, and ye willingly come after to build the sepulchres of the dead; yet how glad ye are in your hearts that the prophets—the rejected enemies of all hypocrisy and trifling with the law, the messengers of God, witnesses for the truth and preachers of repentance—give you no more trouble! Sit licet divus, dummodo non vivus (let him be a god, if you please, so long as he is not alive). Their writings ye read not as they ought to be read; their example you follow not, but set up fine sepulchres for them. Those were true men of God, against whom our fathers sinned—so you say—but the present are false ones whom we now justly persecute and stone. "Ask in Moses' times, Who are the good people? they will be Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but not Moses—he should be stoned. Ask in Samuel's times, Who are the good people? they will be Moses and Joshua; but not Samuel. Ask in the times of Christ, and they will be all the former prophets with Samuel; but not Christ and his apostles" (Berlenb. Bibel). Instead of the penitent confession so frequently put into the mouths of the people by the prophets, We have sinned we and our fathers! the last and worst generation now protests in vain against its fellowship with the guilt of the fathers, which it rather carries out to its worst extreme, completes, and thus fills up the measure (Acts vii. 52). Be it so, do this; i. e., ye shall do it, through God's permitting long-suffering, which afterwards has an end, and is turned into wrath. Thus does Christ speak to them as to Judas (John xiii. 27). A profound significance for the unity of the entire Scripture and the recorded dealings between God and men lies in this, that Israel's end is here denoted by the same which in the beginning was said of the Amorites, who were driven out before them; viz., by the filling up of the measure of their sins, Gen. xv. 16. "The mills of the gods grind late, but they grind clean:" this the heathen also knew, because history teaches it; so should we also, without false refinement, recognize in God's doings both of these things, the long-suffering which waits, and the wrath which at length breaks out. The divine principle, according to which generations and nations are included in the reckoning of a collective guilt, and at length the collective punishment is made to fall upon the last, runs through all history; we shall not now deviate too far from the exposition by entering into the depths of this principle. The key lies already in the hypocritical words, ver. 30, which becomes true only when inverted, viz.: If they had been in the times of their fathers they would also have shed all that blood. "He whose inward wickedness has risen to a high pitch, is regarded as if he too had done all that others have done from like wickedness" (Roos). "A murderer comes into fellowship with all murderers, a licentious person into fellowship with all the licentious and adulterers. They all stand as branches upon one root, they all work to one end, they all approve of one another's works" (Rieger). The fellowship of sin and punishment before God's judgment actually extends thus far, even to the descending connection of growing corruption; as is seen in a people when the children, not warned by the guilt of their fathers, continue it and carry it to its consummation. Therefore, afterwards, even all the blood shed upon the earth (Luke, "since the foundation of the world"), from the murder of Abel downwards, is reckoned to the last evil generation of the Jews. Upon this a book might be written: we deem it sufficient now only to point out that Christ thus affirms, in all its severity, this reckoning of God's judgment; but that he yet lays the principal emphasis, in order to conviction, upon the long-suffering which waited patiently and exhausted every call of grace before the filling up of the measure of sin. What he says in ver. 33 is almost word for word the first discourse of the Baptist (chap. iii. 7); for to this it returns, because every intervening call and invitation to repentance for the kingdom of heaven had proved in vain. Now, indeed, the πῶς φύγητε, "how can ye escape" (as Alford has well reminded me), instead of the still warning τίς ὑπέδειξεν ὑμῖν, "who hath warned you," sounds stronger and more decisive. A further confirmation of the as yet more figurative γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν, "generation of vipers," which the Baptist uttered, is here added by Christ in the quite unfigurative ὄφεις, "serpents;" and the whole together means not merely sinners born of sinners (with reference to ver 31) but speaks plainly, in the sense of John viii. 44, of him who at Rev. xii. 9 is called ὁ ὄφις ὁ ἀρχαῖος, "that old serpent." Thus does it correspond to the γέεννα, "hell," whose κρίσις ς.: "damnation" the περισσότατον,

"greater," in addition to the περισσότερον ver. 14 expresses; and designates as at ver. 15, the ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς τοῦ διαβόλου ὄντας, "who are of their father the devil," as complete υἱοὺς γεέννας or "children of hell."

Verse 34. What is here meant by the διὰ τοῦτο, "wherefore"? It is only trifling with the simple word to supply as follows, "in order that if possible ye may yet flee from the damnation of hell"—for the impossibility of this has just been affirmed (in the πῶς φύγητε); the filling up of the measure of sin has just been imputed to them, has been already predicated of them as certain; and the τοῦτο can alone refer to this import of the two last propositions. Therefore it must mean, in order that ye may kill them, in order that thereby all blood may come upon you, therefore are they sent. Yet not directly thus; for the decisive ὅπως, in order that, ver. 35, is rather connected with their killing and crucifying, and not precisely with the sending on the part of Christ. The true force of the expression is, that the wisdom and long-suffering of the Lord who foresaw the judgment, therefore offers yet an opportunity of contracting the last guilt; in order that, on the one hand, the measure of grace may be filled up even to the last overflow, and, on the other, that, by the actually perpetrated sin, it might indisputably appear to all the world that the condemned were deserving of their punishment.* This again is a principle of his justice belonging to the unsearchable ways of God (Rom. xi. 33), that he who might already judge every one according to all that he had done or would do, yet lets the sin exhaust and complete itself, before the judgment, in actual deeds. The ἰδού, "behold!" already plainly shows, even before we read the futures which follow, that it is no longer the former prophets that are spoken of, but a new sending that is soon to begin. Observe the majestic I with which he who is still in humiliation, who is himself to be first crucified by them, yet looking beyond this, puts himself in the place of the God who sends the prophets! (Isa. xli. 27). Here there is seen one of the significant differences between this last discourse and the earlier one (Luke xi.), where Christ as yet veils his I under the "wisdom of God." Now, however, he takes for granted what the parable of the vineyard had said of the killing of the Son, who, although rejected, is yet exalted to be the corner-stone; what the following parable of the marriage says of the new sending of him who is yet to ascend the throne; and what finally chap. xxii. 24 says of sitting at the right hand of God—therefore is the crucifying of the Lord himself entirely passed over, and at once comprehended in the emphatic ἐγὼ ἀποστέλλω, "I send."† The offence against those who are sent proceeds, first of all, by an anti-climax, from killing (and even crucifying), to scourging (already signified to the disciples at chap. x. 17), and thence down to persecuting; in like manner the designation of the persons sent is according to three grades, here more concretely carried out than the prophets and apostles in Luke. The special apostolic dignity has its significance only for the new Church; yet all who testify of Christ and preach him are his messengers, which could alone be meant also in Luke.* On the other hand, there is here another difference from that earlier discourse in Luke. The prophetic authority stands first in analogy with those old prophets; then follow those who are not indeed equipped in the same way, but yet are furnished with a specially convincing wisdom of the Spirit; finally, the true "scribes" as opposed to the false ones (chap. xiii. 52), who, condescending more than the others to the manner of men and of the Jews, show to them out of their Scripture that Jesus is the Christ. Stephen was a wise man, Apollos a scribe, the apostles prophets; while Paul at least was certainly all of them together. The seeming anti-climax is now, however, changed into its opposite, when we understand the matter thus: the killing and crucifying of the prophets was as it were a thing to which they were accustomed from of old, was only a continuation of their past doings; but, that in their Synagogues (mark this particular) they should answer the undeniably God-given wisdom also of the wise men with scourging; that they should at least persecute from city to city even the scribes, in order thoroughly to suppress their quiet testimony—in this the guilt of their resistance to the truth rises to a higher pitch. They leave unpersecuted not even the least one, who without preaching with prophetical urgency merely dares, by way of testimony, to interpret the Scripture against them.

Verses 35, 36. Upon you: this comprehends, first of all, the wicked guides and heads of the people—who also in the foregoing verse appeared as the originators of all persecution—with this entire generation, and that for the past and the future; for it is now said, Zacharias whom ye slew! (comp. 1 Thess. ii. 15). The expression αἷμα δίκαιον or ἀθῷον, righteous or innocent blood (chap. xxii. 4), is one of very frequent occurrence in the Old Testament, which comes out with increasing strength, especially before the Babylonian captivity, in reference to the guilt which drew down that judgment; see 2 Kings xxi. 16, xxiv. 4; Jer. xxvi. 15. The principal passage, however,

* Roos: "It depended upon a test. Christ had also prophets and wise men and scribes to send out. Now just as they did to these, so also would they have done to all the prophets."

† For "that the Saviour here includes himself in the number of those sent by God" is impossible. nor does he send himself; we shall soon understand more particularly why he throws a veil over his blood. The fact that messengers of Jesus were crucified also before the destruction of Jerusalem, we learn here, as history does not record every thing.

which Christ has probably in mind, and which the Spirit caused to be written in connection with that first judgment as a typical prophecy of the second, is to be found in Lam. iv. 12, 13. Three times in one verse does the Lord mention blood; and now, from that point of view in which God regards the whole human race, lays to the account of this Jerusalem and Israel all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, just as his Spirit again does to the future Babylon, Rev. xviii. 24. The first righteous person* upon earth murdered through hatred of God and fraternal hatred was Abel; of his murder also is Israel guilty, for they have done worse to Christ than Cain did to his brother. Zacharias, however, is certainly not that righteous Zacharias, the son of Baruch, of whose murder in the temple shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem Josephus gives an account, Antiq. iv. 19—as for example, Hug formerly maintained, while even Richter still admits "a concealed prophecy" pointing to him—but probably that Zacharias of whom we read in 2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22. The distinct expression ἐφονεύσατε, "ye slew," cannot be an anticipating prophecy; for, Christ now uses, in opposition to the expressly marked future in ver. 34, quite as expressly the past in ver. 35, in order then at ver. 36 to comprise both in the ταῦτα πάντα, all these things. A prophecy pointing to an individual by name (not to say that Baruch is not Barachias) seems forced, and highly unsuitable to Christ's present frame of mind; one can see no satisfactory ground for it at all. True, indeed, it cannot be objected to that opinion, that the Zacharias mentioned by Josephus was no messenger of Christ, for only righteous persons are spoken of by Matthew; —still, in Luke, it is certainly the blood of all the prophets. Finally, it is quite decisive to observe that Christ here, according to the Scripture (to which he makes such manifold allusions throughout the discourse), intended to bring together the first and last example which the Scripture records. It is useless to ask whether the Jews did not shed righteous blood, or the blood of prophets, afterwards; the circle of canonical history comprehends typically all that was done in Israel and upon the earth. It is worthy of remark that the designation between the temple and the altar of burnt-offering (not without reference to vers. 17–19 before†) agrees with the express words of 2 Chron. xxiv. 21; and it is further significant that precisely this Zacharias said when dying, The Lord will see it and seek it! (comp. in Luke, ἵνα ἐκζητηθῇ). There is even a Jewish legend which says that his blood bubbled up and flowed, and would not be stayed for 252 years, even till the burning of the temple in the city of the murder, until Nebuzaradan had slaughtered there 940,000 priests, prophets, and chiefs of the people with their children: from which we may infer that this deed of murder in the holy city was regarded by the Jews themselves from ancient times as a proverbially fearful example. Such connection of a name well-known to the Pharisees and Scribes with the universally known name of Abel, is certainly much more natural than any special prophecy.* So much remains certain, that our Lord will here say what he at last seals with Amen: The great collective guilt of all the blood shed on the earth, as it is represented and shadowed forth in the history of the Holy Scripture from Abel to Zacharias, will break forth in vengeance upon this generation in a collective punishment, as well typical as real—this evil and adulterous generation which speaks as in ver. 30, and acts as in ver. 34! which thus fills to overflowing the measure of sin against the long-suffering of God! That is, indeed, first of all the last generation of this people, the wicked and adulterous generation possessed by the return of seven worse devils along with the first, which, in its sins, repeats and sums up all that went before; yet, in so far as the fathers are represented as only meeting their full punishment in their children, the γενεὰν ταύτην, this generation, here includes at the same time the entire people, of whom it is said (ver. 35): Ye have slain. It is a groundless assertion that γενεά, in the New Testament, can never signify "people;" see in chap. xii. 45 the same connection of this generation with their fathers, and then afterwards the remarkable passage (chap. xxiv. 34), according to our interpretation.

It may be asked, finally, Does not the blood also of the crucified Son of God in, and with, all the others, come upon this generation? If this question means, Wherefore does Christ not expressly or chiefly specify this here? the first answer is easy; for, even as regards outward propriety, it would be highly unsuitable openly to say such a thing at this farewell. For, this would be more than the word of Zacharias, The Lord will see and seek it! But the reason lies still deeper: partly, in the Saviour's feeling of love and compassion, which makes it impossible for him to express this threatening of vengeance; partly, in the truth corresponding to this feeling, that in fact the blood of Christ, although his crucifiers call it down upon their heads, yet even to the last

* See the interpretation of Heb. xii. 24 in my Brief an die Hebräer.

† In the most holy place of the fore-court, which also Josephus denotes: μέχρι τοῦ βωμοῦ καὶ τοῦ νεῶ.

* With regard, finally, to the entirely subordinate point respecting the name Barachias instead of Jehoiada (for the apocryphal Gospel of the Nazarenes with its Jehoiada is of as little value here as the apocryphal fable concerning the father of the Baptist)—it is said that both names have the same meaning, as names are frequently thus varied; or it is found to be a later corruption of the evangelical text (only not on account of Josephus, for then it would be Baruch); or even an original error of memory, confounding this person with Zech. i. 1. To us the word of Christ is too solemn to admit of such disputes. For the rest, Theile's treatise in Winer's Journal, vol. ii., speaks very fully of the whole matter.

judgment of the world continues to speak better things than the blood of Abel, viz., grace and not vengeance. So that, in the restored Israel at last, this blood-guiltiness is yet cleansed away (Joel iii. 26); and the vengeance on account of the rejected blood of reconciliation extends to quite another sphere, belongs to quite another judgment, than that which is first of all historically represented in Israel.

Verse 37. Did Christ himself say, Behold here a greater than Jonas—then may also his interpreter say to the generation of this time, Behold here is something incomparably greater than, and different from aught that has ever been uttered in accents breaking from the heart, and penetrating to the heart, in all human poems and histories. Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Thus cries the Messiah, the God and Lord, and Saviour of Israel in the flesh, who sent all the prophets, who is himself come, and will again send apostles, who will soon, by the hands of his enemies, hang upon the cross, by his own and the Father's divine power will rise from the opened grave, and sit upon the throne of heaven—thus cries Jesus over the sinners who will not have him and his grace, but cleave to their sin and their judgment. What a tone and sound for the hearers must this word have had when it came from the mouth of Christ: the measure already filled up of all divine grace and Saviour-love, in opposition to the measure of sin, now soon to be filled up by the children who, centuries long, had been nourished and brought up in vain—that first call of the Creator, "Adam, where art thou, whither wilt thou?" breaking forth inconceivably intensified from the heart of the Son of Man moved with human emotion—the most perfect unity of alluring love and judging wrath in this double lament, Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Hear, ye heavens, and give ear, O earth! for—the Lord speaketh! And are we to take away these words from this place, in his farewell, which alone is their proper place; are we to believe that the Evangelist has presumed to elaborate and improve the divine drama? Rather would we believe that Christ had already uttered three times—ten times before (which would not be so wrong) this word which he now utters for the last time with most striking emphasis.*

The whole word is a prolepsis, of the decisive judgment, stretching beyond the preaching of the apostles, the rejection of which Christ already knew beforehand: the Jerusalem which he means is the entire people, including past times, viewed in its centre. Vers. 34 and 35 are now connected in one, as also already ver. 36; therefore the ἀπεσταλμένοι, or persons sent as opposed to the former prophets, are the new messengers who should yet invite the guests to the marriage in vain, and the first of whom was at once stoned (Acts vii.) as Moses commanded that the false prophets should be stoned.* Between prophets and apostles then comes the exalted I of the incarnate Lord, who is, at the same time above prophets and apostles; for, this Lord it is who has always sent, and now sends, and who himself also came and called in all his messengers. The I of Christ embraces at the same time all the past, even as ver. 34 the future. "He never forgets his part"—to speak foolishly for the sake of the fools; he can never, at any time, deny who he is, and even when he appears most human, the consciousness of his eternal divine dignity shines through with all the more immediate reality. Thy children—that is, at the same time, all the people of this sacrod metropolis scattered in the country or over the earth. It would be a very false narrowing of the discourse as a whole, to explain the words How often! of Christ's frequent visits to the metropolis at the festival; it speaks in a higher and more comprehensive style. How often! includes at the same time all the calls of the former prophets, with all the invitations of those afterwards sent, and known beforehand to be in vain; although it places the calls and invitations of Christ himself in the centre. Our Lord would ever from time to time have gathered them all as his people into his kingdom, to his heart. But not by force; in this way no one is drawn into God's kingdom, to God's heart; even Isreal's Messiah is only a Saviour who at last passively offers himself, who must leave it to the will of men to come or not, and must go away when they will not and do not come. As an eagle stirreth up her nest,† fluttereth over her young, and then beareth them herself on her wings—so did Jehovah at first, Deut. xxxii. 11, and afterwards ever more kindly and lovingly offer his sheltering wing to his people, in the word of the prophets (Psa. xvii. 8, xxxvi. 8, lvii. 2, lxi. 5; Isa. xxxi. 5, 6; Mal. iv. 2)—until, with most familiar tenderness, Jesus, here speaking in the person of Jehovah (which is to be observed, see especially Isa. xxxi. 5), would spread his wings over them as a hen over her chickens, ere the birds of prey, as other eagles of judgment, come.‡ The wings are still spread even for the murderers of the prophets, while Christ now speaks; even for those that stoned Stephen, as

* Dorner says, moreover, correctly: Haec verba a Christo dicta esse non eo loco, quo Lucas vult, sed quo Matthæus, verba ipsa indicant; tunc enim dicta sunt, cum ultima voce Christus discederet e templo numquam eo rediturus.

* In the construction πρὸς αὐτήν, "unto her," which is also according to grammatical usage, there is expressed here, at the same time, a bitterly complaining, unconscious turning away of the countenance from the murderess of the prophets; after which it turns to her again.

† קַנּוֹ, νοσσιὰν αὐτοῦ, comp. Luke xiii. 34, as also both together, τὰ νοσσία and ἡ νοσσιά, Psa. lxxxiv. 4.

‡ Lange expresses the sense of my remark when he calls it the antithesis of actively training and passively saving love; only he does not definitely enough bring out the thought that the eagle also bears its young and keeps them from falling. It is rather a climax than an antithesis.

was shown in the case of Paul, he will still spread them out. But what he himself has experienced will be the result, upon the whole; that, namely, which he expresses in the words, Ye would not! (Isa. xxviii. 12, xxx. 15, and many places in the prophets). The grace that still remains will indeed gather others in their place who will; but they who would not what Christ would, fall into the condemnation. "The power of the Almighty appears as impotence before the obstinacy of the creature; and has only tears (Luke xix. 41) wherewith to overcome them." Whose heart dares here to answer with the dogmatics of the head: "Thy willing and drawing was not in earnest; thy lamentation but a mockery and a sport: for thine irresistible grace was not there to give them the power to will?"

Verses 38, 39. The second Behold! in addition to the first, ver. 34—the text of the prophecy that soon follows for the disciples (chap. xxiv.). The house is, in the first place, the temple (Luke xi. 51, οἶκον); but, together with it, the entire holy city as one habitation, the whole country of which this is the metropolis; people and state, with all their possession and property, in the same wide sense as Acts i. 20; for, it is through the temple that all subsist. Now it is no longer the temple, no longer God's house; but, your house left to you, as ye would have it. As yet in Matt. xxi. 13 it is my house—now, however, it is no longer so. Ἔρημος, "desolate," often elsewhere, and first of all, signifies empty, deprived of its proper contents (which then stand beside it in the Gen.); here, therefore, in the first place, templum sine numine (a temple without a divinity). From this follows, indeed, the desolation and dispersion; because, when God departs, only the punishment of sin remains—as was already said to Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 7–9; see further Jer. xxii. 5, and especially Jer. vii. 6, 11, 13, 14, which prophecy now for the first time finds its second and complete fulfillment. Of course, the seat of Moses is thus thrown down; and the Rabbins of Babylon or Jerusalem are acknowledged no longer. Ἰδοὺ ἀφίεται, "Behold is left"—that begins at this moment: for, I, the Lord of the temple, now go out and away from you! (chap. xxiv. 1). Although they saw Christ afterwards until his crucifixion, it was no longer in the temple, but merely as a suffering sacrifice. They will be compelled to see and to acknowledge him in his judging power (chap. xxvi. 64); but otherwise no longer, the risen Saviour did not show himself to all the people. Ye: that is, again, the entire generation of those who obstinately reject him, including also their posterity, as ver. 35 their forefathers; but not including all who do not persist in this rejection. Finally, however, there is here also a comforting "until" annexed to the long judgment upon the children and the children's children; as, in chap. xxii. 44, there was a threatening until, in connection with the priestly sitting of the King. That he will forsake them, is therefore not the last word of Christ in this farewell! To understand what he says only of a compelled acknowledgment of the coming Judge is rendered impossible by the εὐλογημένος, "blessed," and the entire 118th Psalm; it can only mean—Until ye (the late posterity of this generation) one day acknowledge him who is now rejected, joyfully welcome him as Messiah, and cry Hosannah in truth, not like the empty Hosannah a day or two before. Because it was empty and vain, Christ cannot express himself thus, Until ye again say. He takes leave of them not merely "with the feeling that he can return to the temple only as Messiah or never" (according to Hase); but with the clear-discerning prophecy that, one day, the people of God will honor him. The still future restoration of Israel according to the flesh is announced throughout all the Old Testament, from Deut. iv. 30 on to Zechariah (for Malachi points back to the punishment upon the sinful people); he who has not read this is not yet able rightly to read the prophets (2 Chron. xv. 3, 4; Hos. iii. 4, 5; Zech. xii. 10, xiv. 8–11). But of a "final victory of the Saviour over all his adversaries, whom he so punishes as to gain them to himself"—of this we find nothing in the whole Scripture, neither in Psa. cx., nor in the final close of Christ's discourse (Matt. xxv.), nor at the end of the Scriptures, Rev. xxii. 15, 19, 21 (not μετὰ πάντων, "with all," but πάντων τῶν ἁγίων, "all the saints"). Nor is the restoration of Israel by any means a typical pledge of this; as if there may not remain for many only the sentence, Ye would not!—all the less, since Scripture announces that restoration as contemporaneous with the judgment upon Gentile Christendom.

CHRIST'S PROPHECY OF HIS COMING.

(MATT. XXIV. AND XXV.)

This prophecy appears here, indeed, as an answer to a question of the disciples; but this question was itself called forth by the declaration of Christ—that of this beautiful and solid edifice not one stone should remain upon another. True it is, again, that the disciples drew from Christ this emphatic confirmation of what was said in chap. xxiii. 38, by a question addressed to him (see especially Mark xiii 1); yet all the Lord's words were no other than a natural continuation of the preceding sayings, which denounced judgment upon Israel, Jerusalem, the temple; nay, it was certainly provided for beforehand, that Christ should leave for his disciples, i. e., his Church in all future time, a complete prophecy of the end. As John was directed to record, in harmony with his esoteric design, the last gracious promises of his coming again to comfort in the resurrection and by the Holy Spirit; so, on the other hand, the three other Evangelists must needs preserve the prophecy of Christ concerning his coming again to judge. And this has been done most fully by the apostle Matthew, who alone, in chap. xxv., carries it to the last end.

He alone also also gives us at once. in chap. xxiv. 3, the question of the disciples in its most exact form; thus enabling us to understand in its continuous unity the entire answer of Christ, as it runs on through two chapters. What in Mark xiii. 4, and Luke xxi. 7, is mixed indistinguishably in a general ταῦτα, "these things," and πάντα ταῦτα, "all these things," is in Matthew's account separated into three parts. The disciples ask: When shall this happen, that is, first of all, the destruction of the temple with that judgment upon Israel, of which thou hast assured us? Further: What shall be the sign of thy coming? And finally, What the sign of the end of the world? We must transpose ourselves into their ideas and conceptions, in order to see how much they did or did not understand of this their own question. They knew, in the first place, with a certain measure of distinctness (although not clearly and surely), that the present lowly estate of him who was come, who had so often spoken of his impending sufferings and death, was afterwards to be followed by another coming of the Son of Man, a manifestation and revelation in the coming in of the kingdom, the then alone completed παρουσία τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "coming of Christ;" of this he had spoken more than once, and very expressly in Matt. xvi. 28.* They knew, further, from what they had just heard (for they would scarcely of themselves have thought of Dan. ix. 26, 27, and therefore Christ afterwards reminds them of it), that an affliction and destruction, a judgment upon Jerusalem and Israel, was to break forth as the most immediate consequence of the rejection of Christ. When, accordingly, they put these two things together, it would remain uncertain to them how they stood related to each other; whether the destruction of Jerusalem would at the same time introduce the entire revelation and establishment of the kingdom—or (which was more in accordance with their Jewish conceptions), whether the judgment upon the whole world, with which they were familiar, from the Old Testament, and which was in like manner announced by Jesus, would be coincident with that catastrophe. For this was the third thing which they knew of as future, as to be, to be accomplished. Christ indeed had, on one occasion, Matt. xvi. 27, 28, almost connected the general judgment with the coming of the kingdom; then again, at chap. xix. 28, he had spoken of a παλιγγενεσία, "regeneration," in which there would still be an Israel over which to rule in glory; in like manner, again, chap. x. 15, xi. 22, xii. 36, 41, 42, he referred to a "day of judgment," in such a manner that the judgment of the present Israel and of the whole world seemed to run into each other; finally, he had spoken, John v. 29, vi. 39, of the last general judgment as on a last day, with a general resurrection of the dead, and consequently as at the end of the world properly speaking, or of the present state of things, according to his own words, Matt. xiii. 39, 49. In vain would they endeavor to arrange all these old and new representations upon any definite theory of the When and How. As the Jewish people, in the time of Christ, knew or understood nothing of a twofold coming of the Messiah in lowliness and in glory, so the disclosures made by Jesus respecting his sufferings, and respecting the destruction of Jerusalem, had completely shattered their whole theory concerning the coming of the Messiah, and the end of the world.* Chiefly was "Jesus' announcement of sufferings an element, which threw into confusion all their eschatological conceptions, and, as it were, deranged the plan which they had sketched out."* Now, moreover, came the announcement of the judgment soon to fall upon Jerusalem, in addition to, and between these. How does this stand related to the looked-for advent of Christ, or the manifestation of his kingdom; and further, in what relation do these two stand to the end of the world? If at first they had thought thus: When Jerusalem falls, then will Christ come to build his kingdom, and to manifest himself in his power—they would yet further be doubtful whether the end of the world would coincide with this advent; whether, in general, only one, or two, or three different catastrophes lay in the future? This is the sense of the question, only thus to be understood, which must have been preparing itself in the minds of the disciples for a considerable time before, and which now, when a fit occasion called it into utterance, found this natural expression. We have but little to say as to the ideas which the disciples entertained respecting the connection and course of the threefold coming about which they seem to ask; suffice it that they could have no definite ideas at all respecting the course of the three events which they therefore blend into one question. They perceive that this is their last time and opportunity for putting the question, which had long been pressing upon them: Help us out of our difficulty by a decisive declaration respecting the when of all these things that are to come to pass.

* True, there are those who will not admit this; with them, however, our believing interpretation, which interprets the Scripture from its own resources, has nothing further to do. Thus we find it taken for granted, strangely enough, that the disciples, as Jews, could think only of the destruction of Jerusalem; that the compiler (the so-called Matthew), afterwards interpolated the question concerning the παρουσία, etc. See a (successful!) prize essay by a young beginner of this class (candidate), Rud. Hofmann. Die Wiederkunft Christi und das Zeichen des Menschensohnes am Himmel.

* As Lange (iii. 215) aptly says.

How now does Christ answer? Because in reality the judgment upon Jerusalem and the last coming of Christ are "events that correspond to each other, of which the last is typified in the first" (as even Neander admits), Christ, therefore, separates what will be separated in the fulfillment, but at the same time, as prophesying, he views them together, just as the former prophets viewed even the first and second coming of Christ so together, that only in the light of the fulfillment can they be distinctly separated in the interpretation. For he who here speaks is himself the last prophet, and therefore continues the style of the prophetical words, and within the prophetical conditions of vision. It is only a misunderstanding, when many (as recently Dorner, Lange, and others) very strongly protest against all obscure mixture of future things in the prophesying of Christ, because he, standing high above the prophets, spoke with a clear and calm view of the events, and of the manner in which they should take place. Now, we do not hold that there is any obscurity in this prophecy of Christ; any more than there was in the old prophetical word, which was likewise perfect in its kind, according to the meaning of the Holy Spirit. But with all this, we do not see why Christ, notwithstanding the undisputed higher position that belonged to him, should yet as man have prophesied essentially otherwise than by a contracting perspective view, such as is essential to every prophecy—which does not as yet present history in detail. If any one will call this (with Wilh. Hofmann, Missionsfragen, 1, p. 40, comp. p. 104, 105) the "lower intuition which belonged to him in his state of human abasement," we have nothing to say against it; but we cannot go so far (with the same writer) as to maintain that Christ throughout views the destruction of Jerusalem and his own coming as not at all separate; for he knows and declares the distinction between them. Moreover, we decidedly deny, that he in any way conceived of all this as about to happen within the time of the generation then living. But we are almost anticipating, when all that we would say here is only by way of introduction.

So much is in our view certain, namely, that Christ in this discourse typically connects events together (as is mentioned also by Hofmann in his Weissagung und Erfullung and by Delitzsch, who in other respects differs from him); yet he himself teaches us to see this. He lays it down that the destruction of Jerusalem is already a coming of Christ to judgment and setting up of his kingdom, but he immediately shows behind this yet another coming, nay, last of all with striking distinction, a final coming at the end of the world properly speaking. These three things, all which were rightly specified in the questions, he, in the corresponding answer, not less perspectively joins together (according to the manner of all prophecy hitherto) than distinguishes from each other, and shows them in the order of their succession. Only Matthew has been guided by the Spirit to understand and communicate the entire answer, carried out to its conclusion, while Mark and Luke break off at an earlier point.* Chaps. xxiv. and xxv. at all events remain one whole, although Christ (probably) may not have spoken all in connection, as it is here written, without pauses here and there. We give, on a first survey, our view and arrangement founded upon what has been hitherto said, which we will afterwards explain and confirm in detail.

Let it be observed, however, beforehand, that by this threefold division we do not intend a strictly defining and adjusting chronology of the future (as Lange, iii. 2, 1291, has misunderstood us); but only a progression in the stages here placed in juxtaposition, in which at the same time, the whole is always reflected in each. It is certainly una res of which Christ speaks—this is our answer at present to the beginning of Dorner's treatise (Deorat. Chr. eschatol.); yet it is twofold, inasmuch as Christ combines in one glance two separate future fulfillments. Thus in part was this prophecy read even by the Fathers; thus has it always been understood by the more deep-searching commentators, by all who have been profoundly versed in Scripture. The first principle of all prophetical interpretation, from 2 Sam. vii. downwards, requires it. That Christ did not speak here "promiscuously, now of Jerusalem and the destinies of the Jewish people, and now of the end of the world," but of both these in and with each other, first the one, then the other coming more into prominence—this is not a mere "opinion of some," but the true consensus of all living tradition in the Church of the faithful, which it were very salutary for the doctors of the theological school, to know and consider. By this, too, no "error opticus" is maintained, for it is in accordance with the nature of all prophecy, which can only indicate more or less clearly the distinction of times, the difference between type and antitype, and which in general always comprises in one view what is manifold. With all this, it is true that the intervalla seu incisurae come more strongly into prominence in Christ's prophecy than in any other; but not as definitive epochs, for he, too, does not foretell events historically, and gives no "decursum Christianæ religionis historicum." We wish in accordance with this to be rightly understood.

* As Ebrard, in like manner, can say of the question; although afterwards he knows not how to arrange the answer.

* It is not to be supposed here that (as Neander thinks) the "erroneous mixture"—which does not at all exist—as being unworthy of Christ, is owing to the false understanding and reporting of the hearers.

In the first place Christ speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem; i. e., of course in order to denote the when, and first of all, of the intermediate period which precedes and prepares for it, chap. xxiv. 1–28. This must be the first thing, and is so in reality; every interpretation which overlooks it must fail in arriving at a clear view of the whole. In the second place Christ speaks of his other and proper coming in the manifestation of his kingdom, chap. xxiv, 29–44. Our interpretation will show that, notwithstanding the εὐθέως, immediately, ver. 29, there is here an important point of separation, for which compare meanwhile Luke xxi. 24. The confusion which characterizes the usual interpretation has arisen from overlooking the prophetic manner of viewing the future, i. e., the perspective and typical relation of great catastrophes corresponding to each other. For, the judgment upon Jerusalem is itself a first coming of the Son of Man; only as such has it its prophetical significance, only in this light, therefore, does Christ prophesy of it. Then was there a typical judgment of the world, then appeared typically the kingdom of Christ established among the nations, in opposition to the rejected people; i. e., the two following catastrophes, the more remote as well as the nearer, are to be seen preliminarily in the first, as we have already said on Matthew xvi. 28. Thus does our Lord regard it, and this is the reason why in chap. xxiv. 4–14, and then again vers. 23–28, the expressions selected are so strong as in the fullest sense to apply only to the later coming, although between these, in verses 15–25, he speaks quite plainly of Jerusalem.*

Whilst, then, at ver. 29, the typical first coming passes quite out of view, and a second coming of the Son of Man, the gathering together of his elect into a finally established manifested kingdom, comes into the foreground (Luke xx. 31), it is to be observed beforehand, with a view to the interpretation, that this also is not the last coming, at the end of the world, but an intermediate coming of Christ, the acknowledgment of which alone opens up to us the entire prophetical system in this prophecy.* Here there is as yet nothing said of eternal punishment; but only of being left, of being shut out, or left without. The middle part of Christ's answer, which embraces this intermediate coming, extends onward to chap. xxv. 30; for here at first he gives the prophecy itself (already running out into a sort of parable) as yet in direct continuation of what goes before, chap. xxiv. 29–44. Then, however, he follows this out by three parables which contain warnings to watchfulness and readiness, addressed to his disciples in particular, who wait for the coming kingdom (which is to be delayed much longer than they thought). He first represents in general, in the singular, the faithful and wise servant, in contrast with a bad servant (chap. xxiv. 45–51); the two parables that follow speak separately of the wisdom and faithfulness, and at the same time widen the view, so as to show the manifold variety of those who shall one day stand before him as their Lord, to enter in with him or not; then in chap. xxv. 1–13, the wise virgins; finally, ver. 14, the faithful servants, who, however, are now (more definitely than at chap. xxiv. 45) the stewards of the goods and gifts of their Lord.

From this intermediate coming of the Son of Man which is meant in all the parables belonging to chap. xxiv. 39, there is now plainly distinguished (and this ought never to have been mistaken) the great judgment-day of the King, in full power and glory, for all nations, at the end of the world properly speaking—the last coming of Christ on the last day, when an eternal separation shall be made between misery and blessedness. chap. xxv. 31–46. Only now is the answer complete; and the end of all prophecy is reached in a concluding word of our Lord, beyond which nothing more can or is to take place.†

* Here are formed almost of themselves, for every unbiassed and attentive reader, precisely the three cycles which afterwards Lange (iii. 215), agreeing with me, is obliged to admit. Petersen also arrives at the same conclusion (Lehre von der Kirche, iii. 685).

* Yet this intermediate advent is a secret which is only now opening itself up to some, for the Church is slow to learn the word of prophecy. Certain things are disclosed only when the time comes for them, and it ought then to be the least of all objected to these things that they were unknown to the doctrine of the Church hitherto, nay, that the latter has condemned (without distinguishing and inquiring aright) what, at an earlier period, pointed at these things. Zeller speaks very clearly and truly concerning these three comings of Christ, which perspectively cover each other, of which, according to him, the first was his coming into the world (in the Beugg. Monatsbl. 1847, No. 10).

† We may here name, as agreeing with us, and

THE FIRST COMING; DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM; DISPERSION OF ISRAEL.

(Matt. xxiv. 2, 4–28; Mark xiii. 2, 5–23; Luke xxi. 6, 8–24.)

The disciples, terrified by the word of Christ, chap. xxiii. 38, show to him on leaving the temple in the evening, after a day full of conflict and fatigue, the building materials of the temple, which was still in course of construction (and was finished only a short time before its destruction). Looking up at the spectacle they exclaim in their simplicity: See, what stones and what buildings! There were foundation stones forty yards broad, and forty-five yards in length, of the whitest marble; not merely with λίθοις καλοῖς, goodly stones, was Jehovah's sanctuary adorned, but also with ἀναθήμασι, consecrated gifts of piety and reverence, or even of acknowledgment by kings!* Is all this really to be left desolate? Is nothing to be spared? But the Lord sternly answers as he had already spoken, Luke xix. 44; he charges them only again to look at it aright, as a glory that is doomed to the most complete destruction. † The imaginary difficulty of Matthew's οὐ βλέπετε, "See ye not," it has been sought to remove by all sorts of different constructions; but it is simply the same question which Mark also has: Ye see all this, as ye think? It implies: But ye see it not yet aright, with your ποταποί and ποταπαί, just as if the destruction of such great buildings were scarcely conceivable: I say unto you with my Amen, which nothing can resist, that the days shall come when, of all these which ye now behold (Luke), not one stone shall be left upon another, as it had been laid in the building according to Hag. ii. 15. Compare also, for the proverb, 2 Sam. xvii. 13. After the Jews were conquered, Titus commanded the soldiers to dig up the foundations of the whole city round about, as well as those of the temple; although before this he would willingly have spared the latter, and repeatedly offered to do so.‡ Afterwards Turnus or Terentius Rufus tore up the foundation of the city with ploughshares, whereby certainly Micah iii. 12 was literally fulfilled. Let us, when we look upon the grandeur and decoration of our ecclesiastical and civil edifices, remember this fulfilled word of Jesus; and it will be a preservative against all false admiration of their earthly glory, against all undue æsthetic dependence upon it, and against the Romish tendencies to which it may minister. Let us view the entire edifice of the world in the light of this which has been said of it beforehand: Not one stone upon another! (2 Pet. iii. 10, 11).

A while after this first and unconditionally decisive word, which gave the disciples enough to occupy their thoughts, Christ sat upon the Mount of Olives, from which the principal view of the temple was to be had, even to its interior—on the same Mount of Olives from which the destroying host afterwards poured in upon the devoted city (comp. Zech. xiv. 4, 5, of the more remote future). There the disciples, no longer contradicting the fact, now bring forward their question formerly raised respecting the When of the great catastrophe, in connection with the coming again of Christ (Matt. xxiii. 39), and the end of the world. The three Evangelists do not indeed agree literally in the answer; our Lord's words were copious and free, so that each one might preserve and bring forward something different from the others. Yet the agreement so predominates, that we are warranted in arranging what is given by the others according to the plan of Matthew, and certainly must not entertain the idea of two different discourses.* Christ, we may be sure did not—contrary to the whole nature of the prophetic vision, which advances from the near to the remote—leap backwards and forwards from one thing to another, and speak first of the last end, then of Jerusalem, then again of the last end; but if Matt. vers. 15–22 (parallel with Luke vers. 20–24) refers to the judgment of Jerusalem, then vers. 4–14 and 23–38 in like manner refer, at all events in the first place, to the same event. The disciples summing up all in their indefinite question desired a σημεῖον, one sign. He gives them, at first, various preparatory signs, which will occur similarly, as presages of the first and second coming; until, at ver 30, there appears the one last sign for the visible coming of the Son of Man (analogous with ver. 15, for the that certainly from independent illumination, the beloved father Zeller, a man whose truly prophetic gift ought to be respected by his believing contemporaries. He divides just as we do: (1) the coming of the Lord to judge Judaism; (2) to judge degenerate anti-Christian Christendom; (3) to judge all heathen nations, the final judgment of the world. All these together are the coming again of Christ; and with respect to their similarity and diversity they are most exactly recorded from the lips of our Lord by Matthew: (a) chap. xxiv. 1–28; (b) chap. xxiv. 29, on to xxv. 30, (c) chap. xxv. 31–46.

* They are mentioned before by Luke in contrast with the widow's mite; Josephus gives a glittering catalogue of them. Even Cæsar Augustus had presented precious vessels as a gift of honor; Tacitus speaks of immensæ opulentiæ templum.

† Lange's interpretation of this question: "Do ye actually see all these things? To me they already appear as a vanishing vision!" savors too much of our modern sentimentality.

‡ Κελεύει καταδκάπτειν . . οὕτως ἐξωμάλισαν οἱ καταδκάπτοντες, ὡς μηδὲ πῶποτ' οἰκισθῆναι πίστιν ἂν ἔτι παραδχεῖν τοῖς προσελθοῦσιν (Josephus, Bell. Jud. vii 1, 1).

* We do not with Richter attach any value to the assertion in Brandt's Schullehrerbibel (where there are so many arbitrary assertions), viz.: "In Luke Christ speaks at an earlier period and of Jerusalem; afterwards again similarly, but no longer of Jerusalem." We notice this as a caution against such exegetical caprice, adopted solely to avoid the typical double sense. Although Luther had recourse to a similar expedient, viz.: Matthew and Mark throw together what Luke alone clearly separates in the true order.

preliminary, not yet personal, coming to judgment). Therefore in Matt. vers. 4–15 are given the signs of the destruction of Jerusalem drawing near; but these are portrayed in colors so strong, that this first period must be seen to be only the type of the latter. If, at chap. x. we found in a similar gradation of perspective vision, that all that was spoken literally of that first sending out applies spiritually to the more remote future, so here, this entire portion of the discourse, chap. xxiv. 4–28, has certainly already a real double sense. It is no result of chance (to speak foolishly), that every thing which is here mentioned was somehow actually fulfilled already at that time; but still less is it to be denied, that the fulfillment which entirely corresponds to it lies as yet in the future. Hence, ver. 6, τὸ τέλος, "the end," is parallel with the σύντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, "end of the world," of the question—but at ver. 8, the "sorrows" are again parallel with the great "affliction," ver. 21, and in the οὖν, therefore, ver. 15, there is an undeniably direct connection with the τὸ τέλος, or end, at ver. 14, and again, at ver. 23 a simply continuative τότε, "then." He who will break this continuous connection, must have recourse to artificial interpretation in one place or another; the only true key to the understanding of the whole lies in perceiving, that our Lord speaks prophetically of the earlier as a type of the later. Advancing from the most general to the most concrete, he mentions, vers. 4–15, those signs which, as they must and shall precede the end of the world, shall also precede precisely on that account also the end of the Jewish nation, and in these he comes ever nearer to the event: first in the fallen, desolate, disordered Israel (which even now has become a nation without), there will be false Christs or Saviours—then in the same, and in the Gentile world, ever increasing calamities of wars, with accompanying throes of nature—then, even in the Church of God properly so called, which exists as the kernel to be saved, offence because of persecution, and falling away, likewise false prophets —yet with all this, the continued preaching of the Gospel in all the world! Hereupon Christ specifies the most immediate, nearest sign of the coming end, according to Daniel (ver. 15). The judgment of the destruction itself is, from ver. 16 onwards, so represented that the disciples of Christ are directed to flee (vers. 16–20); then they are again warned against falling away in the great tribulation (vers. 21–26); finally, the sudden unmistakable coming of the Son of Man for the salvation of his people, and judgment on the outcasts, is indicated (vers. 27, 28). The direction to flee runs thus: Flee in haste, without turning back, or looking back, yet not without foresight and prayer! The warning against falling away is repeated, because it is now certainly meant at the same time to apply to the interval from the judgment of Jerusalem on to the second, more proper, coming of the Son of Man; yet the double τότε, then, vers. 21 and 23, evidently connects, in the first place, again with vers. 19 and 16, and can only be separated therefrom by departing from the natural interpretation.* The great tribulation will threaten danger also to you elect—therefore beware, ye elect, of the false Christs, and false prophets (vers. 5 and 11 being now joined together), as on account of the danger that threatens you (vers. 23, 24), so on account of the warning against this which ye have received from me, vers. 25, 26.

Verses 4, 5. Beware! Take heed! Watch over yourselves, that ye may be delivered, may be saved, when I really come. This remains, generally speaking, the ground tone of the whole answer, with which it begins here and closes at vers. 42, 44—to resume and prosecute it then in parables. (Mark, ver. 9, βλέπετε δὲ ὑμεῖς ἑαυτούς, as 2 John, ver. 8.) The disciples inquired respecting the πότε, the when; Christ, however, gives no proper answer to this throughout the entire discourse (in spite of the oft-recurring τότε): see rather vers. 36, 42, 25, 13, and mark the last ὅταν δὲ ἔλθῃ, "when the Son of Man shall come," ch. xxv. 31. He only gives signs for the different analogous periods, which manifoldly fulfill themselves; in order that his people, expecting him in each of these periods, may be on their guard. (This is what Mark means by the ἤρξατο ver. 5, viz.: he began at first with something quite different from the desired answer.) The impulse to our inquiry concerning Christ's second coming should not be curiosity about the time, but the desire to be found to have persevered in fidelity before him. But as, on the one hand, the near expectation of the true coming One is helpful to this, so, on the other, the warning against the false Christs is yet indispensable; hence the assurance which, while it pacifies, urges to still persevering faithfulness, viz.: I come not so very soon!—it will yet be a while ere this, and there lies in the interval much deceiving confusion of falsehood, and violent breaking out of sin, as a necessarily preparatory development (2 Thess. ii). This, therefore is the first fundamental idea of the answer. Many shall come, not merely ἐν, but ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματί μου, personally assuming my name to themselves. The natural, most immediate, punishment of Israel for the rejection of the true Christ, was the being given up to lying saviours and deliverers, as was already foretold, John v. 43. In every period of corruption, and of calamity as its consequence, this symptom of lying consolations and promises repeats itself; hence, at the period of the captivity, false prophets had abounded, Jer. xxix. 8, 9, xiv. 13; Ezek. xiii. As the preliminary and most immediate fulfillment, we are not so much to understand goetæ, such as Simon Magus, and deceitful wonder-workers in general (of whom Josephus is full), as rather those who promised redemption to the people Israel (Luke xxiv. 21), i. e., would become their Messiahs, saviours, and liberators. This is what Christ means, and it matters nothing although no one may have directly said: I am the Christ. Josephus also relates enough about saviours of this class.* But while our Lord so decidedly warns against them, he lays it down (which is not to be overlooked) as a main point, that his true coming will bring no outward salvation even to this Israel; that the judgment over it remains inevitable; and that for his disciples, as he afterwards says, only to flee is appointed. He therewith points at the same time beyond, to a later coming, when the fulfillment, found before only in part and preliminarily, recurs in a fuller and more proper form. Already does the expression and the time draweth near, which Luke adds, point beyond to this farther sense.

* For so must we call it when Ebrard (Kritik. d. ev. Gesch. p. 617) makes the τότε (which is yet, since ver. 16, only one and the same) to denote the time after the shortening of the tribulation, and declares this to be the only true sense.

Verses 6—8. We have here the general signs of the preparation of all great catastrophes; as surely to be found then on the more limited scale, in so far as the Jewish horizon represented the sphere of the world, as afterwards on a greater scale, according to the import of the expressions which typically point to the end properly speaking. War in the immediate neighborhood, ever-growing alarms in the distance, terrifying rumors of war, commotions and tumults of the people against each other—all this is in reality, on the small scale, the picture of the time as described by Josephus, which, with every year, became more exactly applicable. The wars were certainly, at that time, more of the nature of insurrections, tumults here and there (Luke, ἀναταστάσιαι), manifold commotions and massacres, for example between the Syrian and Jewish inhabitants in the cities (ἔθνος ἐπὶ ἔθνος), such as are to be read of in Josephus, Bell. Jud. ii. 17, 10. 18, 1–8, where it is said "every city was divided into two opposing hosts." Besides, in Italy also, Otho and Vitellius strove for the kingdom—βασιλεία ἐπὶ βασιλείαν, if we would interpret quite exactly; the entire discourse, however, rather (as Isa. xix. 2) denotes by expressions which typically point further, the general commotion and convulsion, also the internal distraction of the Jewish people raging among themselves. (For the rest, what Bengel finely observes is pre-supposed: Christiani magis audiunt bella quam gerunt.) Famines and pestilences may be regarded as an expression proverbial† of such times (2 Chron. xx. 9; Jer. xiv. 12, xxi. 7, θάνατος and λιμός together; also as a proverb: μετὰ λιμὸν λοιμός). But there are not wanting historical notices of famines and pestilences in that time. Under Claudius alone there were four several famines in Palestine, Greece, and Rome (in divers places); compare also Acts xi. 18. Tacitus (Annal. xvi. 13) mentions a plague (A. D. 66) in which during a single autumn in Rome 30,000 men were swept off. There were earthquakes, A. D. 60, in Asia Minor, according to Phlegon; A. D. 63, in Campania; under Claudius in Crete according to Philostratus; at Rome, A. D. 51; in Phrygia at Apamea and Laodicea; again in Campania, according to Tacitus and Suetonius; as also in Judea, according to Josephus, iv. 4, 5. All this we merely mention, in opposition to those commentators who would entirely sever the prophecy of Christ from its nearest fulfillment, in which is the pledge of a further fulfillment. Luke (who, ver. 10, indicates by "then said he unto them" a short pause in the discourse calling attention anew) adds fearful sights and great signs from heaven; but while this points indeed to the more completely corresponding future (Luke xxi. 25), such signs were not wanting even before the destruction of Jerusalem. The accounts which Josephus gives of these* obtain from Christ's word a credibility not to be slighted; as further (we hesitate not to say it), from the analogy of the typically corresponding times, a remarkable light falls back from this passage upon those histories in the second book of Maccabees (see chap. ii. 22, iii. 24, v. 2, x. 29, xi. 8; there promising victory, here threatening destruction). Yet all these are only preliminary signs, says Christ, all this is not yet τὸ τέλος, the last and proper end; because the end of Jerusalem is only a sign of the συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, all this will again occur quite differently in the last time. Compare Dan. xi. 27, 35 for this special expression; as also Jer. li. 45, 46, for the entire prophetical description; especially, however, the remarkably corresponding prophecy of Azariah the son of Oded to king Asa, 2 Chron. xv. 5–7, which evidently extends to the distant future.) With profound significance does our Lord

* Of Thendas, Antiq. xx. 5, 1 (remarkable on account of Acts v. 36, 37), who would lead his followers through the Jordan; of another, xx. 8, 10; of those who falsely prophesied of divine help even to the last moment, Bell. Jud. vi. 5, 1. All these appeared, at least before the Gentiles, in Christ's name: Judaei impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes.

† Niger, who was murdered by the Zelots, uttered this curse upon the people at his death: λιμόν τε καὶ λοιμόν (Josephus, B. J. iv. 6, 1).

* He does not leave unnoticed the σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα which happened before the destruction of the city: A comet which hung over it during a whole year; a light in the night around the altar and temple, a sacrificial cow which dropt a lamb in the temple, both at the Passover season; the opening of a door in the temple of itself; chariots and besieging hosts in the clouds; the mighty voice in the temple as of a great multitude: Let us go hence! at the time of the Pentecost; finally, τὸ δὲ τούτων φοβερώτερον, that a certain man from the country, named Jesus, began four years before the breaking out of the war, in the midst of peace and plenty, to cry out, Woe to Jerusalem! and, notwithstanding his being chastised and scourged as a "madman," continued this for seven years and five months—till the end of the siege, when with a last Woe also to me! a stone that was thrown killed him (Bell. Jud. vi. 5, 3). Even Tacitus, Hist. v. mentions similar circumstances.

finally denote all this by the expression ἀρχὴ ὠδίνων, "beginning of pangs," in conformity with the Jewish doctrine concerning the חֲבָלֵי מָשִׁיחַ or throes of the Messiah; for there must be a regeneration before the end can come, and the growing outbreaks of sin are viewed as a necessary development, in order to the ripening of men and nations for judgment and redemption. A death struggle already typically goes before, as the birth pang of the new Jerusalem; just as at last heaven and earth are destroyed ere the new world is born.

Verses 9—13. As Christ, at chap. x., had previously given similar directions to the apostles, to be observed by them until the Son of Man should come; so the manifest repetition of them here is proof that he speaks, at all events in the first place, of the foretokens of this nearer coming. The direct address to the disciples, in the constant ye and you, is unnatural on the supposition of a prophecy at once passing to the remote future; but, on the other hand, it is most appropriate if we suppose that he reminds them of what had been said to them before, and the fulfillment of which is now nearer at hand. As in the sayings of John xv. 26 to xvi. 4 the apostles are first of all meant, so here also, where Mark and Luke repeat in a still more detailed form what was said on the occasion of their first mission—and in particular the direction to rely on the promised Spirit when called to defend themselves, and the citation from Micah. The particulars have already been considered at chap. x. It is evidently indicated by the "before all these" of Luke ver. 12, that this persecuting and hating of the witnesses and confessors of Christ, even to the death, was to begin very soon—before the other greater commotions and terrors should come—as the first principal sign of the course of the kingdom henceforward, through long afflictions, to a late completion of victory. As a testimony unto them to whom ye preach: so also Mark, as in Matthew chap. x. and again xxiv. 14. But Luke gives the other side, viz.: it shall turn for a testimony to you; compare the similar expression, Phil. i. 19. The disciples should know in all their persecution that their Lord was truly with them, giving them mouth and wisdom, so that kings and princes must in their consciences bow before their testimony to the truth, even as Pilate before Christ. So Paul in bonds makes Felix tremble! The θανατώσουσιν ἐξ ὑμῶν, "some of you shall they cause to be put to death," of Luke is the more definite interpretation of the ἀποκτενοῦσιν ὑμᾶς, "they shall kill you," in Matthew; for this limitation was certainly promised also at Matt. xvi. 28. We have only to consider the growing general hatred towards the Christians; and the persecution of Nero, in which, to speak with Tertullian, it had already become a nominis prælium, a war against a name: Matt. of all nations (chap. x. 22, only πάντων) is, exactly as at ver. 14, a strong expression for the first fulfillment, as typical of the future fulfillment. As regards Luke ver. 18, see already on Matthew x. 30: it is meant to be said here, as there, first of all: Nothing shall be done without the will of God; therefore, also, nothing that shall issue in your destruction; all things shall tend to your salvation (Phil. i. 19-21), even although ye should be killed!* And then the word, as it respects those who should remain, passes over to ver. 19; and it was specially fulfilled when, in the destruction of Jerusalem, no Christian, so far as we know, perished.

For the rest, as appears in Matthew (who, instead of more detailed repetitions, preserves what is properly new in the present discourse), the persecution of the name of Christ is here only a basis for the transition to an announcement of that falling away in the Church which should be the result of that persecution. As surely as the words of vers. 10–12 reach further beyond, so surely were they already at that time preliminarily fulfilled; we have only to think of the Demases in the early Church, the strong words in 2 Tim. iv. 10, the entire Epistle to the Hebrews, with its much-needed warning against falling away. Because ver. 10 speaks of the Christians, we must of course look for the false prophets (ver. 11) also in Christendom; ver. 12 adds forthwith the effects of the false doctrine in the bad life. (They are the ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι, analogous to the old ψευδοπροφῆται, 2 Pet. ii. 1; 1 John iv. 1, and the ψευδαπόστολοι, 2 Cor. xi. 13.) In those who are led away the ἀνομία, the iniquity, then increases—that is, in the present fulfillment, the last open outbreak and manifestation of ripened sin and selfishness, the antinomianism, by many at this day (for example Göschel) exposed with all severity in its true light (comp. 2 Tim. iii. 1 fol). The transgressors prevail (Dan. viii. 23); therefore also love in the loving, in whom it ought still to burn ardently, grows cold; the corrupting mass infects also the little band (which is here remarkably denoted by τῶν πολλῶν); brotherly distrust and anxious self-concern predominate; nay at last all the virgins become more or less drowsy and slumbrous. But the Judge and Saviour deals not so sharply with the weak: although a certain waxing cold of the first love is predicated of the many, i. e., actually of all—he shall and will yet find such as endure even to the end. Compare again chap. x. 22, 23; and note that only the end can in the first instance be intended as there: it is the antithesis of the beginning, ver. 8; and as such glances already to the last end, which at ver. 14 is still more definitely viewed, while it means at first the end of the great tribulation of Jerusalem, vers. 21, 22, for those who are preserved till then. For those who are killed or who die earlier, it is certainly death (Rev. ii. 10), according as the end of the assault is appointed to each. Our Lord in Luke xxii. 28, 29, typically acknowledged his disciples' having continued steadfast, so as to receive the appointment to the kingdom; and the same ever goes on in all temptations, which have always again a nearer end. The most distinct explanation stands at Luke ver. 19, where the possessing and preserving of their souls includes the spiritual and bodily salvation in one* (Matt. ver. 22). The end is patience, the armor of the saints (Rev. xiii. 10, xiv. 12), as the beginning is caution, ver. 4.

*"Whatever may outwardly befall you, even death itself, will as little affect your real eternal welfare, as if not even a hair of your head perished" (Von Gerlach).

Verse 14. In spite, however, of all persecution, nay of all offence and growing cold in the Church of Christ itself, the preaching of the Gospel to the world yet goes on unhindered; and this is a wonderfully fulfilled sign and testimony of the grace of the Lord in his kingdom. Here the great similarity of the earlier period with its antitype at the last time was strongest, and therefore the prophesying word almost entirely anticipates; this we by no means deny. Vers. 4–14 is correctly viewed by Dorner as a sort of general exordium (Lange: "A representation of the entire course of the world, even to the end, in its general character"). It is quite true, that here we have only admonitions, without any reference to chronology. But Dorner misapprehends the typical double sense as if τὸ τέλος, "the end," could only be the same with the συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος, "the end of the world." For whilst, in the glance at the last end, this τότε ἥξει τὸ τέλος, "then shall the end come," has almost literally extended thus far, immediately upon this the return is made by the οὖν, "therefore," ver. 15, again to the typical end (Ezek. vii. 2, 3, 6, בָּא הַקֵּץ); and we must even in the former case not overlook the first fulfillment. Matt. xxvi. 13, and xxviii. 19 reach indeed further; yet, in a certain measure, already in the apostolic period, even before the end came upon Jerusalem, all the Gentiles in the then orbis terrarum had heard the testimony of the Gospel. Mark, ver. 10, puts this word (εἰς πάντα τὰ ἔθνη, as it were "into all nations") in strict proximity with the preaching of the apostles, and thereby points us again back to Matt. x. 18. Thus did the apostles themselves regard it, so that by the preaching of the Gospel before Cæsar all the Gentiles heard it (2 Tim. iv. 17); and the Gospel had come unto all the world, to every creature under heaven, (Col. i. 6, 23).† One has only to learn from the history of the Church and of missions the wide spread of the Gospel after a very few years, in order to understand the typical truth of this particular‡ It was indeed only a typical truth; Acts viii. 4 was ever more strongly repeated,* and will be repeated even to the last end. Still, the type shows us, on the limited scale, that we are not to expect, even at the last future, the general conversion of all nations; but only an analogous preaching for a testimony, yet so that every where the message will be heard. Nay, this expression is used in other places generally where the testimony is not received. When the two connected signs in their strangely contradictory coincidence reach their fullest manifestation—viz., the apostacy of Christendom and the spread of missions—then cometh the end. Then will another abomination of desolation in the holy place be seen, of which that at Jerusalem was only the remote type.

Verse 15. From this verse onward to ver 28 Christ certainly speaks chiefly of the signs of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem; he portrays this however "only as the sign and beginning of the judgment of the world." In this we quite agree with Lange; we find in it, however, over and above, a special typical significance, pointing to the last days of the second fulfillment. That our Lord by no means sums up, in the οὖν, therefore, the entire distraction and desolation of Israel (and the Christian Church?) hitherto described—but must mean something singular, special, something that was strikingly perceptible—is clear first of all from the ὅταν δὲ ἴδητε, when ye see. He appeals thereby to a peculiarly remarkable coincidence of what happened, with a long existing, although little understood prophecy; for he will teach us here that, as his own forewarning word (ver. 25), so also the Old Testament prophecy, and in general all that has been given by God to his people, is to be a light and consolation to us in the evil time. He names Daniel the prophet, perhaps not without reference to the place that was assigned to him among the כְּתוּבִים or Hagiographi; he confirms so clearly and earnestly the authenticity of the book existing in the canon under the name of this man, that every other result of a learned criticism is refuted by anticipation; he adds even an emphatic challenge attentively to read and rightly to understand the prophetic word, in order to see that its fulfillment has not been omitted. For, that the parenthetical remark has been inserted by two Evangelists, as an addition of their own, remains so inexplicable and unexampled, that we,

* Not merely according to Thiess: "Wait patiently, it will not cost you your life."

† But not Rom. x. 18, where, according to the sense of the Psalm, the revelation of nature is to be understood in opposition to ver. 19; see my Andeutungen für glaüb. Schriftverst. p. 345.

‡ Where, however, we must not (as Roos, Die Lehre J. Christi, p. 423) press the letter, as if actually at that time, perhaps in the last year before the end of Jerusalem, "the whole of the then known world" had heard the Gospel: all that can be said is that we have no information of such having been the case. This is quite as wrong as on the other hand to reduce the expression "all nations" to a too narrow sense, as for example in a recent essay (Das prophetische Wort, etc, p. 31, 37).

* Again, after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the triumph of Vespasian, the Gospel first broke out with increased force. Rutilius: Atque utinam nunquam Judæa subacta fuisset, Pompeii bellis imperioque Titi! Latius excitæ pestis contagia serpunt, Victoresque suos natio victa premit.

agreeing with Hengstenberg, cannot enough wonder how Bengel could have entertained such a supposition.* The challenge comes from the mouth of Christ, and calls to the right understanding of the dark word (just as in 2 Tim. ii. 6); it refers also very evidently to the passages in Daniel himself (Dan. xii. 4, 10), which speak of the right understanding of his prophecies, only at a later period fully disclosed (as in chap. ix. 23, 25 Daniel himself was summoned to consider and understand).

It is not necessary that we should enter at large upon the exegesis of Daniel as a whole; it would lead us too far to do any thing more than merely state our confirmed opinion. As Daniel in various senses prophesies of Antiochus Epiphanes as the type of Antichrist, so Christ here inserts and demonstrates the intermediate fulfillment when Jerusalem was destroyed; and by way of exact confirmation connects this with the discourse of Daniel in chap. ix. which treats of that event. The prophet had, in chap. viii. 1–9, announced almost historically the nearest fulfillment at that time in its entire development; then however in vers. 10, 11, 17, 19, he received definite hints to the effect that this vision extends, in like manner, to a later time of the end. In chap. ix. he receives, immediately upon his prayer, the very remarkble determination of time which finds its limit in the days of Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem; to this, therefore, first of all Christ here points in the βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως, "abomination of desolation" (Sept. ix. 27, τῶν ἐρημώσεων, comp, however, literally 1 Macc. i. 54). Now, it is true that this rendering and construction is against the original text, in which כְּנַף, wing ("overspreading"), belongs certainly as the stat. constr. to שִׁקּוּצִים, abominations; but in the further extending view of the whole, it retains its truth, as we shall soon see. We are quite agreed with the more recent commentators that the passage in Daniel is to be read "Upon the pinnacle the abomination:" that is, Even unto or upon the temple with its pinnacle (which at the same time may mean the pinnacle of Jerusalem), desecrated by abomination, the desolator comes. Therefore, only an abomination already being fulfilled, affecting the sanctuary, and bringing desolation as its punishment, can here be meant by Christ—quite in analogy with the idea which at ver. 28 is otherwise expressed: When the corruption and the abomination is consummated, even in the innermost sanctuary, then must the dispersion come! The ὅταν ἴδητε, "when ye shall see," of Matthew and Mark, therefore, is really not one and the same with the ὅταν ἴδητε of Luke; and the neglect of this has confused many commentators.* Luke preserves a word of Christ which was certainly also spoken, and which specifies the outward sign of the encompassing besieging army (Luke xix. 43); while Matthew and Mark give another word respecting the inner sign, which already stands in the holy place. This can only mean the temple, even in the circumlocution of Mark: ὅπου οὐ δεῖ, where truly something else than abomination ought to be! It is wrong therefore to seek this abomination in the Roman military badges, eagles, and imperial figures on their standards; and to explain the τόπος ἅγιος "or holy place," of all the country round about Jerusalem (Psa. lxxix. 3; 1 Macc. x. 31), chiefly the Mount of Olives; or even (comp. Psa. lxxiv. 4) to mention the setting up of the imperial statue in the temple, which was only attempted a considerable time before. For, the abomination is, according to Daniel, set up by Israel itself; this alone corresponds as, on the one hand, to the earlier analogy before the captivity (2 Kings xxi. 2–7; Ezek. v. 11, vii, 8, 9, viii. 6–16), so, on the other hand, to the later fulfillment in the antitype, in which both coincide, in which the Antichrist itself proceeds from the midst of Christendom, and sets itself with its idolatry in the temple of God (2 Thess. ii. 4). What, in the faintly preliminary fulfillment of this sense, the abomination in the temple at that time, properly speaking, was, we can no longer know; it must, however, have been an aggravation and consummation of unholy character and conduct in the sanctuary, in the highest degree manifest to the Christians, which they could not but see. The first fulfillment of this particular is concealed by history in order to the second. Von Gerlach, agreeing with us, understands, "Such an abomination as must necessarily draw desolation after it;" but he is wrong when he affirms that this is therefore nothing definite, and only expresses the culminating point of corruption. So little is a striking special fulfillment here, as often times, excluded by the general sense, which is also true, that the latter must rather, according

* Lange unfortunately still sees in this merely "a later note;" his opinion is at last (iii. 217) thus expressed, "The Evangelist remarks this by way of interpolation," without noticing the fact that two Evangelists must have inserted the same remark. In like manner Alford speaks of an "ecclesiastical note," which has come into the text in the same way as the Doxology in the Lord's Prayer. We see no ground for such a supposition, no reason at all against its being taken simply as the word of Christ himself. We think it quite natural, with Braune, that as elsewhere when he wished to awaken and fix attention he said, "Who hath ears to hear, let him hear!" so here also he should say, "Whoso readeth, let him give heed!" Nay, we say further with Braune, "This direction is still always the best introduction to the prophetical word"—namely, as an admonition carefully to read, with attentive observation of the corresponding signs of history.

* Lange also has not yet rid himself of this. Even Delitzch, with Hofmann, sees in Luke xxi. 20 the "authentic interpretation of the words of Christ;" but understands only the idolatrous signs of the heathen army which the Romans brought into the temple (Luther. Zeitschr. 1850, 3, p. 487).

Further, it is not to be overlooked that our Lord does not literally render that passage, Dan. xi. 27; but he retains the βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως, abomination of desolation, so as at the same time (which Hengstenberg and Hävernick overlook or deny) to connect with it one or two later passages where this expression actually occurs. Daniel, chap x.–xii., carries out the prophecy more particularly. After chap. x., which prepares the way for what follows, we find in chap. xi. Antiochus Epiphanes standing evidently as the type of a future destroyer (the Antichrist); and in such a manner that, according to the manner of prophetical discourse, in vers. 31–35 the reference to the first predominates, while in vers. 36–45, where the view extends further to the "other time," the reference to the last predominates. Finally, in chap. xii., the whole closes with the view reaching furthest of all to the final decision and redemption. Here now, in chap. xi. 31, it is said that the arms of the enemy shall pollute the holy place, shall set up (properly give, i. e., render by way of recompense) the desolating abomination; and in chap. xii. 11 there is again the retrospect to this βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως. Only the last passage entirely corresponds to the citation of Christ; and its sense is, that abomination, the desecration of the holy place by Israel necessarily completes itself in vengeance, and represents itself in the desolation of the same by the enemy. Was not this also the innermost sense of the ἀφίεται ἔρημος, "is left desolate," chap. xxiii. 38—is not this alone what fully corresponds to the case? Heathenish violation of the temple is already present, and heathenish violation yet comes; for, vengeance is to manifest the guilt, and only by recompense to complete it. Thus also we fully understand how the two signs, which meet together in Matthew and Luke, belong to each other as one ὅταν ἴδητε; and βδέλ. ἐρημ. is the abomination which brings with it the desolation, because it is already so itself.

Verses 16–18. If what is said here is to receive in the second fulfillment (as may certainly be possible enough) a significance literally coresponding beyond expectation, we must seek it in the circumstances of a Church of Christians assembled again at the last time in Judea; for there the second catastrophe is to concentrate itself. With this agrees that ancient tradition (mentioned by Dorner, p. 7), that the Antichrist shall set up the abomination in the restored temple. Who knows whether this be only a dream of the fancy! It reaches, however, into the uncertainties of prophetic vision, with which we shall not, as many do, too confidently meddle; so much only is certain, that Christ now speaks quite plainly of the first fulfillment.* As already in chap. x. 23 flight was recommended to the apostles, as afterwards in Luke xvii. 31, similar expressions were used in reference to the "coming of the Son of Man," there indefinitely spoken of, so now the faithful are enjoined to flee out of Jerusalem and Judea, in evident antithesis to the subsequent gathering together of the elect, ver. 31. Consequently, this catastrophe is not yet the last gathering and redemption—this is precisely what these words would intimate. The obdurate Jews hoped even to the last for succor and help; the Christians warned beforehand by their Lord, were to flee—not, however, until the end actually comes; previous to this they were to endure in patience. In Luke, ver. 21, the expressions are somewhat differently applied, with the same sense, Delay no longer! The mountains are the neighboring mountainous country from ancient times proverbial as a place of refuge; although Christ prepared for his gathered ones another Zoar in Pella.* So suddenly will the destruction come at last (ver. 27), that he who happens then to be on the flat roof must not descend by the inner staircase to the house, nay, scarcely by the outer stair to the street, but, where possible, at once hasten over the roofs, and so to the city wall; he who has laid aside his garment in order to labor in the fields must not turn again for it in order to take it with him. It matters nothing now whether or not thou hast thy garments, if only thou escapest thyself, and bearest thy life for a prey! (Jer. xlv. 5). This, of course, at the same time typically denotes that earnestness which turns not to look at or seize any thing, but is intent only on saving the soul from the judgment (Luke xvii. 32).†

Verses 19, 20. This haste which leaves all behind, in the last moment of decision when all that remains is flight, does not however exclude a preceding supplication for mitigation of the evil—which was to be expected, indeed, long before it happened—does not exclude a taking heed to and attentively considering the circumstances, with an appeal to God in prayer. As on a later occasion (Luke xxiii. 29) Christ said, with pathetic tenderness, when speaking of the tribulation upon Jerusalem: Blessed then are they who have no children born, no sucklings to save, or, because that will be impossible, to lament—so he says the same here from the other side with a severe Woe. It is

* Proceeding from this hint of ours, Steinmeyer (in the Vortrag vor der Berliner Conferenz, in the Ev. K Z. 1849, No. 70) seeks to open up more exactly the reference of the type to the after-time; yet we think that his prophetical hermeneutics, always fundamentally true, lean too much to idealistic generality. I find in the back ground rather a strictly historical parallel.

* Τὰ ὄρη in all the three Evangelists, so that Steinmeyer only by play of fancy can find here the mountain of solitary prayer.

† Steinmeyer's admonitions to obey Christ, when he enjoins flight, i. e., an entirely inward retirement and withdrawal from outward exertions, which can no longer avail, retain their spiritual truth for the entire period of the approaching end, although they do not exhaust the most special sense of the word.

like all that goes before, spoken partly in the way of proverbial example, partly also literally, of the distress which the faithful share in common with the judged, while they flee from it--pregnant persons and nurses will be much encumbered in their flight! Then he adds another word, which refers to the precautionary prayer against an unseasonable time. This general idea receives a twofold expression, namely, bad weather (χειμῶν as chap. xvi. 3) and the Sabbath; for, the one is an example of the hindrances of nature, the other of hindrance from the environment of human ordinances and customs. It has been quite needlessly asked whether our Lord, contrary to what he elsewhere declares regarding exceptions arising from necessity, here means that flight on the Sabbath day was a thing not permitted even to his people; he has nothing of this in his thoughts. He may perhaps in the slightest degree have referred to the foreseen legal scruples which would cling to the minds of the Jewish Christians: not, however, that he would confirm these; at the utmost it is indicated that he pre-supposes even to the last an abiding friendly relation between his Church and the Jewish ordinance.* All this, however, is not the principal idea, which is meant only to designate various possible forms of hindrances to flight; as the unseasonable weather, so also the time of the Sabbath, in as much as journeying and fleeing would then be rendered difficult, at all events from without by others. He speaks assuredly, not without design, even to this last moment in a thoroughly Israelitish manner; but he means much more by these concrete descriptions, as before in vers. 17, 18, according to the spiritual import of the figurative discourse. So that it would not be against his meaning, but rather entirely corresponding to the strong Woe, were we to understand his words thus: Woe to such as are pregnant with plans and undertakings, when the time shall make it necessary, stript and empty of every thing, to seek only preservation from imminent judgment!†

Verses 21, 22. Christ has further Daniel's prophecy in his thoughts; what was there (chap. xii. 1) evidently said of the great tribulation which is now as yet future, he here applies, with typical truth, already to the tribulation of Jerusalem at its destruction. (Mark, ver. 19, intensifies the expression, so that we may perceive besides that it is not yet to be taken literally in the first fulfillment.) Josephus, indeed, as an eye-witness, expresses himself almost in the same words when he describes the greatness of that calamity; yet that other coming will alone give to these words their entire meaning. Luke, vers. 22, 23, has instead of this, These are the ἡμέραι ἐκδικήσεως (2 Macc. vi. 15); days in which is to be fulfilled all that is written—not merely in Daniel, but in all prophecy—of judgment and anger upon this people, from the curses of Moses onwards to the חֵרֶם with which Malachi ends: therefore the great affliction upon this land, and the (great, complete) wrath upon this people! (1 Macc. i. 64; 1 Thess. ii. 16). So Titus is represented to have said that God was so angry with this people, that he also was afraid of his anger if he should show any mercy to them; and after the calamitous siege he refused to take the honor of it, saying that he had only lent the hands for this to the God who would show his anger against the Jews! Had not a limit been fixed by grace in the midst of wrath to the fearful calamity, no man would have escaped alive from it (for that is what is meant first of all by the words, no flesh should be saved—comp. Jer. xii. 12, the expression אֵין שָׁלוֹם לְכָל-בָּשָׂר); the elect also, i. e., here chiefly those who were the believing ἐκλογή out of Israel, without being able to hold out and then to flee, would perish. But for the sake of those elect, whose gathering together and redemption remain the final aim of all judgments (a glance forward to ver. 31), who were also now to be saved in type, these days of terror shall be shortened; or, as Mark has it, The Lord has already shortened them, in his eternal wise decree, beyond which nothing can happen either great or small (comp. Gen. xix. 22). This κολοβοῦσθαι or "shortening" is again taken from Daniel, who, in chap. ix. 25, 27, uses חרץ (comp. Job xiv. 5; Isa. x. 23), and at ver. 24, חתך in the same sense: the destruction is fixedly determined, exactly measured out, and cut off, so that it cannot last a shorter or a longer time. Many explain this of the sudden interruption of the siege by Cestius Gallus, so that many might flee; although this interruption does not quite correspond to the shortening here meant. In the future fulfillment, however, the gracious cutting short of the time of tribulation, the hastening on of the end brought about by God's hand and decree, on behalf of the elect who are to be saved, will probably be much more strikingly manifest.*

Verses 23—26. In this τότε, then, Dorner (although not precisely as Ebrard understands it) finds a certain transition from the type to the second fulfillment, as if it meant "then also, afterwards." Here then is what, at a

* Thus it is not at all necessary to suppose, with the above-named Rud. Hofmann, that "μηδὲ σαββάτῳ is again added by Matthew de sua mente, perhaps ex eventu, but in contradiction to the spiritual and liberal view of the Sabbath elsewhere expressed by Christ!"

† With Steinmeyer less exactly: "Woe to the life that is in process of formation, to the life that is yet weak." For the Woe applies not to embryos and sucklings. Otherwise his interpretation of the garments as vessels, outward forms, for which one is now no longer to care, as if the garments made the people, is deserving of consideration at least.

* Zeller speaks profoundly (Beugg. Blatt. 1837, No. 6) upon the means of this hastening prepared in the entire development of history, according to which the carcass must ever more rapidly grow putrid for the eagles.

later place, he so strongly contends against, a sort of prophetically shortening εὐθέως, immediately (comp. p. 21). He views the whole of vers. 23–28 only as appendicem admonitionis loco positam, so that ver. 29 is connected with ver. 22. But by this is overlooked the entire close connection of this continuous discourse, as already indicated above, which does not now speak at once of another τότε, but of the same danger for the elect of being involved in the common ruin. In the previous verses, however, prominence is given to the distress; while now it is to the danger of being seduced by false offers of help out of that distress. Both are meant, as well in the first as in the second fulfillment; except that Christ again, as at the beginning, turns the view more strongly from the type to the antitype. Therefore his warning with the utmost propriety applies to us, in reference to powerful errors that are impending. The fundamental idea is: Beware of trusting to the pseudo-Christs or pseudo-prophets when they would entice you away from waiting patiently for the true Christ and his real coming, when they tell you to wait here or there; for it is not in such a manner that your Lord will reveal himself. What Jewish fanatics and Christian seducers did in this way, at that time, with their promised but hardly accomplished signs and wonders, was indeed a faint type of those things of which 2 Thess. ii. 9–12 prophesies, and which Christ with his strong words has here chiefly in mind. At the same time, however, we are not to suppose that only the last days are suddenly to bring such things, hitherto unheard of; for they go on in a gradually progressive development, and the warning of Christ has even now its most serious truth. The signs and wonders (respecting which we learn here, as Israel did already in Deut. xiii. 1–3, that in themselves they do not prove the truth) will appear at last in the most literal reality, but rather in their spiritual form; although accounts of deceiving, tempting wonder-workings in external nature are also not altogether wanting. The intervening εἰ δυνατόν, if possible, teaches us, indeed, that the elect who are foreseen by God cannot be led away. This impossibility, however, lies not in themselves, so as that they might falsely boast of this, before it is revealed whether or not they are of the number of the elect (see 2 Pet. i. 10, iii. 17)—but only in the gracious decree of God who keeps those who are faithful to him.

Oh that we took faithful heed to all that the Lord has so faithfully said to us beforehand! "It would have been better that, in the times of peace, ye had let yourselves be instructed as Christians respecting the end of the world, than in the times of trouble to be terrified thereby like the world;"* or—we add—to let yourselves be deceived by false, fanatical consolations; for Christ means rather a being seduced into false tranquility, than a being terrified. His warning prediction embraces the entire period of waiting for the appearing and setting up of his kingdom; and is, in the general sense, to be understood in the light of the earlier discourse, Luke xvii. 20–23. Behold here or there—this can never be said of the kingdom of Christ, which (rightly understood) actually remains an "invisible Church" until one day the manifestation and revelation of what is now concealed shall appear undeniably to all. The expressions "in the desert or in the chambers"—are intended to specify the here or there under two aspects. They are selected with reference, in part, to the circumstances of the judgment upon Jerusalem; when ψευδόχριστοι or false Christs raised tumults and led out their followers openly into the desert, as Acts xxi. 38, and many instances in Josephus, while the ψευδοπροφῆται or false prophets called to secret consultation or waiting in their chambers. Then, however, they form in general a variously significant antithesis of possible seduction. The one points us widely to the great desolate Church, the other narrowly to manifold sects and schisms; hence the latter, as opposed to the former, stands in the plural.* The invisible presence of Christ is indeed here as well as there; yet not exclusively here or there, so that those who wait for him should confine themselves to any particular place. The deceiving voices would "limit Christianity to this and that system and practice"—"would allure now to strictness, again to laxity, now to separation, again to union"—offer at one time open power and authority, and, at another, secret, false spirituality—and in whatever other ways it might be interpreted. Always there are two main by-paths, in the perplexed times of the Church waiting for its Lord, which in reality correspond to Sadduceeism and Pharisaism. The frivolous seeking of Christ there in the desert, seems good and wide-hearted; but there is in it the leaven of unbelief in the spiritual inner reality of his kingdom. The fanatical seeking of Christ here in the chambers, seems earnest and zealous; but there is in it the leaven of hypocrisy, of impure separatism arising from individual caprice. In truth Christ is already in every place where souls, in full humility, and patience of faith in his words alone, wait for his appearing; but this visible manifestation of his kingdom will not come so long as any one can doubt or deny, so long as a dispute can arise between a here or there.

* Nitzsch, Wittenberger Predigten von 1819, p. 46.

* We do not retract this, in spite of Lange's opposition (ii. 3, p. 1271); and still think that the antithesis of public and private, general and particular, is far more definitely indicated here than the strangely inverting interpretation, according to which the desert would signify the renunciation of the world, the store-room of the enjoyment of earthly goods. Those who find a reference in ἔρημος to the "Eremites" forget that in biblical usage ἔρημος and מִדְבָּר mean only the uncultivated expanse; and so ταμεῖον, with the idea of privacy (Matt. vi. 6; Luke xii. 3), points back only to the Heb. חֶדֶר, which frequently occurs in this sense. The latter point, at the same time, applies by way of refutation to the fault found by Sepp with the Lutheran translation.

Verses 27, 28. Does not our Lord now at last speak of his yet future advent? it might be asked, seeing that the preceding word, with its deep significance, already extends to the later time. To this we answer that he certainly speaks of this; as in the entire prophecy every thing points to the end, and therein alone finds its last truth. But, as surely as the expressions of ver. 26 were not yet completely loosed from the type, so surely does he speak here also in the first place still of the coming of the Son of Man denoted in chaps. x. 23, xvi. 28, for the first preliminary manifestation of his kingdom, the salvation of his people, the punishment of his enemies; as demonstrated when all the Jewish and Gentile world saw his hand and power, and the certain truth of his word, in the judgment upon Jerusalem. Like the lightning, which shoots under the whole heavens (Job xxxvii. 3)—this means, first of all only in contrast with what goes before, So suddenly, so manifestly and indubitably, that no saying and crying Here or There is any longer necessary.* If at that time the whole world did not see or recognize Christ in this gleaming lightning-flash of wrath upon Israel, and the gracious light upon his Church, we mark in that the imperfection of the type; for the rest, however, it is clear that not till ver. 30 is the visible coming of the Son of Man spoken of with yet more definite expressions. Therefore the παρουσία which shows itself only in the manner of lightning is still distinguished from the personal coming. But here we must be on our guard against all ingeniously idealistic generalizing of the idea; as, for example, Lange (after having called [Leben Jesu, i. 38] even the first appearing of the Lord, "a great lightning-flash upon the world") speaks of "the illuminating lightning, the world-purifying storm of the spirit of John, in its power of light and fire" (p. 267)—and the like. Such notions only lead away from the proper interpretation of the text, which here plainly means a convincing, undeniable, suddenly appearing fact. And one, indeed, in which (as must ever be repeated) there is a twofold correspondence between the first and the second fulfillment. Dorner's view, that ver. 27 can only denote the παρουσία κατ' ἐξοχήν, the extremum judicium (pp. 17–27), is without foundation; our Lord, in other places, spoke of the destruction of Jerusalem under the name of his coming, Matt. xvi. 28, x. 23. In the earlier preparatory discourse, Luke xvii., in which naturally the two events are as yet interwoven with each other throughout, the disciples (because he has repelled the Pharisees with their when) inquired at least concerning the where; and Christ gave them for answer the same saying with which he now in Matthew, closes the prophecy respecting Jerusalem in particular. Yet Dorner, with perfect justice, says that the meaning here is, non in civitate et urbe hac vel illa (e. g. Hierosolymis, Pepuzæ) apparebo, sed quousque extensa est mundi generis humani putredo—yet this by no means excludes the fact that the idea takes its start from Israel.

There can, in general, be no doubt* that what is here spoken of under the figure of the eagles gathered around the carcass, is the judicial punishment which connects itself with the advent of Christ (and which, even in the first coming, is what chiefly makes it visible). For our Lord uses this particular figure not as a proverb in general, but as a biblical and still more as a prophetical proverb; and he therefore gives thereby again a sign arising from the coincidence with earlier prophecies. The נֶשֶׁר or "eagle" the Bible as also the Greek ἀετός, includes also the vulture, to which we do not now give the name of eagle, but which as is well known, even Pliny classes with eagles; hence first of all in Job the original proverb, As an eagle flies to the prey (chap ix. 26), where a carcass is, there is he, by a wondrous instinct he can scent and descry it from afar (chap. xxxix. 30). When Moses (Deut. xxviii.), with remote indefiniteness, portrays the variously fulfilled future punitive judgment upon Israel, and speaks of the nation which the Lord will send upon them from afar (first of all the Medes and Chaldeans, comp. ver. 48 with Jer. xxviii. 13; ver. 50 with Lam. v. 12; Isa. xlvii. 6, xxxiii. 19; but afterwards, also the Romans, comp. ver. 52 with Luke xix. 43), he first makes use of the figure of the eagle hasting to his prey (ver. 49). Then Hosea, ch. viii. 1, alludes to the same figure; and afterwards Habakkuk thus designates chiefly the Chaldeans (chap. i. 8). It follows therefore that Christ now points back to that first judgment upon Jerusalem; because all these form one connected series of types which reflect each other, the earlier of which always at the same time prophesies of the later, even to the last. He will thereby say that God's fundamental principle in all judgments remains the same, in so far as a corruption that has grown to maturity draws down punishment, not merely by the rules of perfect justice, but also by a necessity inherent in itself; quite naturally,

* Here the exegesis of the Irvingites says truly: "The lightning comes out of the dark cloud, and before it goes the storm, not the morning twilight."

* Nevertheless, many well-meaning commentators (following the ancients, Theophylact, Euthymius) even to this day hold fast what continued for an unaccountably long period to be the orthodox interpretation, and which even Luther thus expresses: "As the saying runs, Where a carcass is, etc., as the eagles gather together wherever the carcass is—so shall my people gather themselves to me! Where I am there shall my elect also be!" The Irvingite tract already mentioned, Das prophetische Wort, lays emphasis on this, that eagles consumed only animals newly dead, therefore the carcass here signifies the Saviour who died for us, yet saw no corruption; and this passage denotes "the withdrawal of the Church to Christ."

so to speak, just as the eagles are made for and find out the carcass.* That which is dead grows putrid; and what is putrid is consumed and cleared away to make pure air, by those agents which are made and appointed to that end by God. The "putrid carcass of the state" and the dead, corrupting national condition of Israel, was, at that time, the carcass around which the eagles could not but be gathered; even so will it be one day with Christendom, when Christ comes the second time. The putrefaction and corruption of the dead forms a fearfully appropriate figure (chap. xxiii. 27) for all self-dissolution on the part of sinful nations and multitudes of people prepared for the judgment. Still we must not explain this first of all of the Roman eagles; this was only added as one of those providential ironies of so-called chance, such as are often presented in the history of the world when viewed in the light of the prophetic word. The angels of judgment (ver. 31, chap. xiii. 41) will one day completely execute the consuming, desolating Woe upon the great πτῶμα or carcass; and there may be a hint of this when, in Rev. viii. 13. the angel who denounces the Woe is also called a flying eagle. In this respect, as Hofmann† perceives, it is not at all so much amiss (as regards the final sense) to explain the ἀετοί of angels.

If, after all that has been said, we do not yet understand what an advance over a wide intervening space is indicated by the prophetic εὐθέως, immediately, that follows in Matt. ver. 29, Luke, ver. 24, comes to our aid, with a clearly decisive word evidently belonging to this place. The wrath upon this people will not entirely consume and exterminate them from the earth (Deut. vi. 15, ix. 25; Amos ix. 8, 9); but they shall partly fall by the sharpness (or devouring mouth) of the sword, partly be led captive among all nations, according to the prophecy which has been in course of accomplishment since Deut. xxviii. 64, which was by no means fulfilled in the first exile, but is manifestly so now even to this day. Their captivity by the hand and counsel of God mocks all attempts at emancipation, just as the continued existence of the oppressed and homeless people among the nations defied all the cunning and power of Egypt to effect their extinction. And Jerusalem? Destroyed and laid waste, indeed, as it never was before, there will not remain a Jerusalem, but—a sanctuary trodden under foot, a (former and future) city of God given over to the Gentiles. (Ἔσται πατουμένη expresses more than πατηθήσεται.) It is again a prophetic word; for, in this prophecy of Christ all former threads run together, to show us the foreknown unity of the prophesying Spirit. Being trodden down indicates in general a being oppressed, ignominiously treated, brought under subjection by the power of the enemy (for example, Jud. x. 8, at the beginning of the judicial punishment upon Israel); and Daniel afterwards prophesies of the sanctuary being trodden under foot, chap. viii. 10, 13, (of which in 1 Macc. iii. 45, 51, iv. 60, the first fulfillment follows), as Isa. lxiii. 18, lxiv. 10. 11, had already spoken of it (not without recompensing reference to chap. i. 12). Comp. still Rev. xi. 2.* The hand of the Lord rests wonderfully upon this city, and its entire typical history: the Zion and Jerusalem of God, because its inhabitants have become Amorites in the complete measure of sin, because they themselves have polluted and trodden down the sanctuary, must, through the abiding abomination of desolation, itself become a Jebus (יְבוּס, trampled place), ere the original Salem of Melchisedec returns. For the state of being trodden down lasts a long time, but not always. Julian, indeed, will in vain attempt to build, and the Crusades will in vain again sanctify it; but the Lord has appointed the end, "Until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." Luther understood this to mean: "Until the Gentiles are converted to the faith, that is, until the end of the world"—but we now understand the prophetical theology better. The times of the Gentiles can only be the times of calling† appointed, for them as for Israel, by the grace and long-suffering of God; and they are fulfilled or expire—i. e. (in the correlate expression which belongs thereto), the time of the end, the day of judgment is come—when the Gentiles also are ripe for a like judgment to that of Israel. This however is meant every where by the prophetical expressions; see Isa. xiii. 22; Jer. xxvii. 7; Ezek. xxi. 25, xxii. 3, and in particular Ezek. xxx. 3, an allusion to which passage our Lord has doubtless here in his mind. The Gentiles, however, are not merely "the Romans, on whom the Germans fulfilled the judicial punishment" (Braune), but all non-theocratical nations through the whole course of history, chiefly the Christendom proceeding from them. In this entire, long period is accomplished the gathering together of the faithful out of all nations, the coming in of the πλήρωμα or fulness—but then the treading down of Jerusalem ceases, and it is built again; then will Israel be restored out of all nations, all as the prophets have prophesied, and Christ here points to this in the ἄχρι, until, which confirms all. Compare, finally, the very strikingly harmo-

* What Von Gerlach remarks is very striking, that, to a certain extent, every thing in this prophecy arranges itself around ver. 28 as a main and fundamental proposition—judgment upon what is ripe for judgment; therefore the destruction also of the outward false kingdom of God is in the course of nature the necessary end.

† Weissagung und Erfüllung, ii. 278.

* All these passages abundantly refute that trivial rendering by Bolten, "Jerusalem will be inhabited by the Gentiles;" that is, will be trodden, for which signification of πατεῖν Wahl's Clavis, which interprets it in the same way, adduces other passages of the Sept. and Greek writers.

† Therefore, something else than (according to Lange) the time when they shall exist as political powers and rule over Jerusalem.

nious passage of the apocryphal book Tobit, where at chap. xiv. 4, 5, it was already said, according to genuinely prophetical intuition: "Jerusalem shall be desolate, and the house of God in it shall be burned, and shall be desolate for a time; and again God will have mercy on them, and bring them again into the land, where they shall build a temple, but not like the first, until the time of that age be fulfilled" (Ἱεροσόλυμα ἔσται ἔρημος, καὶ ὁ οἶκος τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐν αὐτῇ κατακαήσεται καὶ ἔρημος ἔσται μέχρι χρόνου. Καὶ πάλιν ἐλεήσει αὐτοὺς ὁ Θεός, καὶ ἐπιστρέψει αὐτοὺς εἰς τὴν γῆν, καὶ οἰκοδομήσουσι τὸν οἶκον, οὐχ οἷος ὁ πρότερος, ἕως πληρωθῶσι καιροὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος)—this latter here in quite another sense.

THE MIDDLE ADVENT: APPEARING OF THE KINGDOM: GATHERING TOGETHER OF THE ELECT.

We have, in our interpretation hitherto, studied as much as possible to abide by the literal and clear sense, applied to the nearest fulfillment, that which already lies historically before us. We could not and would not deny, that all that has been said by our Lord at the same time reaches much farther; but, in order not to offend the majority of our readers, who could hardly tolerate such things, we refrained from disclosing the typical reflections lying behind the prophetical word, and from bringing into notice those hints, whether in great things or in small, which are interspersed here and there for the searching eye (as for example, that the lightning of the advent of the Son of Man shines from east to west and vice versa). Now, however, when Christ begins to prophesy exclusively and properly of the future, which is as yet concealed from us, interpretation, in the strict sense of the word, ceases. He who has forgotten and lost sight of the fact (as, alas! many critics at the present day), that, according to the clear declarations of Christ elsewhere, the catastrophe of Jerusalem and Israel was itself a coming of the Son of Man, could of course not agree with what has been said hitherto from this point of view; he who forgets, further, that all prophecy, according to its nature, must, with all clearness on the whole, retain, before its fulfillment, a certain measure of obscurity in the particulars—he who will handle a prophetical text just as he would other historical and didactic texts, will from this point onwards be still less able to reconcile himself to the word of Christ, and our attempts to interpret it. It is impossible, however, for us to pay continued attention to such folly, because that would every where prevent us from saying any thing to those who do understand.

An old and, in this form at least, obsolete exegesis (such as is represented, for example, by the English Newton, in his otherwise valuable work upon the prophecies), understood Matt. xxiv. 29–44, solely of the destruction of Jerusalem; but such an interpretation could be based only on a lamentable torturing of the words, the possibility of which indeed lies in this, that this second section of the discourse contains typical glances backwards to that first, just as the former was spoken in purely typical prospective views. But that with ver. 29 a section actually begins, in which the word quite plainly brings to view another coming of the Son of Man, ought to be an unconditionally settled point with every commentator who reverently takes the three Evangelists together; and it is determined already by the καιροὶ ἐθνῶν, "times of the Gentiles," in Luke, here put between with a far-reaching ἄχρι, "until." Consequently the εὐθέως, "immediately," in Matt., on which the critics still always stumble, ought not to lead us astray, but must be understood in accordance with the prophetical manner of viewing events together. Every other letter of the passage points clearly enough to the true sense of the Spirit in this one little word. Those days: these are the same of which vers. 19 and 22 spoke; therefore also the expression "after the tribulation of those days," is here an evident assurance, that what is now to happen will follow after the shortening of this tribulation; i. e., further, as after the τότε, "then," ver. 23, so after the "coming of the Son of Man" which is meant at vers. 27, 28, namely, when this prepares the way for itself the second time by similar terrors, and then displays itself indubitably now for the first time properly in a visible form. One has only to read Mark, ver. 24, as Bengel rightly, without the comma after ἡμέραις, "days," in order to find every thing in perfect harmony ("Post tribulationem illam erunt dies illi, ergo alio spectat illam, alio illis. Illam respicit totum sermonem præcedentem, sed illis ad novissima prospicit, uti ver. 32"). When our Lord, in the certainly remarkable εὐθέως, "immediately," hastens over the great μετά, "after," through all the καιροὺς ἐθνῶν, "times of the Gentiles," this is neither an ordinarily historical "immediately," as the English Bible renders it, nor a פֶּתַע (already indeed falsely thus rendered in the Greek text), nor "suddenly, unexpectedly"* (see verses 42–44), meant merely of the final end. What then? First of all, the key lies already in the declaration of Christ respecting his own ignorance of the time (ver. 36, Mark ver. 32), according to which he himself, seeing events in close proximity, overlooked the wide intervening space.† Then, however, according to the

* For which Lange also again decides! Comp. Dorner's Note, p. 3, which mentions by name the principal commentators of this class.

† Not merely, as Bengel thinks, "Of that which is to happen after that calamity of the destruction of spirit of all prophecy, this εὐθέως is perfectly correct; it indicates that the fulfillment hastens to the end in a strictly defined and ceaseless development (Hab. ii. 3), and that chiefly its latter stages will transpire abruptly and suddenly. If this εὐθέως cannot be so understood (we ask in opposition to Dorner)—what, then, is meant by the apocalyptic ἐν τάχει and ταχύ, "quickly"? (Rev. i. 1, xxii. 6, 7.) We hold it undisturbed with honest Roos, who here observes: "In truth the waiting of Jesus until all his enemies become his footstool is no tedious waiting! His glorious coming is to him so near, that he represents himself as one who is soon to come." This is what is true and justifiable in the fraus optica, at which Dorner is so horrified, which already in the lowliness of his human vision made the long time appear shortened.*

All that Christ has further to say respecting his middle coming, in order to the manifest appearing of the kingdom for his elect then gathered together (as this was spoken of above), includes both the prophecy itself that speaks of it, and also the three warning parables on to chap. xxv. 30. The prophecy itself mentions first what will happen, and then gives a declaration respecting the When. Here, also, are analogous signs (as in vers. 6–8), only now presented in shorter compass, in a more condensed form (ver. 29); then the directly announcing sign, and the coming of the Son of Man himself—his coming visibly before all the tribes of the earth to judgment, ver. 30, as also for the saving gathering together of his people, ver. 31 (both corresponding to vers. 27, 28). If the first question of the disciples, When will this come to pass? still remained for the final answer, Christ at last replies to it here in a twofold manner; at the same time, carrying back the end to the beginning, but no longer speaking expressly of the destruction of Jerusalem. There is first of all a general asseveration that all shall certainly come to pass at its proper time: all the signs as surely as the fig-tree again puts forth shoots. Israel is indeed destroyed, but still remains spared, vers. 32–34 (for the future conversion, chap. xxiii. 39) —nay, the complete fulfillment of every word even to the last is here certified, as surely as heaven and earth pass away! ver. 35 (On the sense of these asseverations afterward more particularly.) Hereupon follows at last the definite conclusive declaration respecting the time, day, and hour, according to human calendar-reckoning. No one knows it, ver. 36—the coming of the Son of Man will at all events happen unexpectedly; as for the race of men who are to be judged, like Noah's time, vers. 37–39; so, with its separation between the judged and saved, vers. 40, 41, for his people also, who are therefore directed to wait and watch from one generation, to another, vers. 42–44 (watch, for ye know not time and hour! ver. 43. Remember ye what others forget! ver. 43. Thus be ready! ver. 44). This conclusion already in the parabolic form then leads over to the following parables.

Verse 29. The interpretation, recently brought forward by Dorner with great confidence and much acuteness, according to which vers. 29, 30 are not at all to understood of the rebus extremis (which, indeed, his mistaken nexus forbids him to say), but of the destruction and overthrow of the heathen world, gradually going on through the entire period of history—is the strangest and most forced thing in the whole of his learned monograph. "Paganorum imperiorum gloria splendorque interibit, orbis terrarum evadit Christianus et novum aevum incipiet." The powers of the world are no longer worshipped; Christ sitting in the heavens reveals himself to the world. "Jam adest secundum stadium (οἱ καιροὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν) continens Ethnicismi occasum!" This is without example in the whole ancient Scripture, the language of which alone Christ as Prophet in Israel, can speak; we find rather in the prophets the whole of the figures here used, always applied only to judgments as types of the end of the world. (The assertion directed against this, p. 54, 55, is completely erroneous.) We shall not, therefore, in this our second edition deviate from our interpretation hitherto.

The darkening of the light or the lights is, first of all, a general metaphor for the extinction of happiness, the coming in of the tribulation and anguish; so, for example, Jer. xv. 9, and, in the microcosm for the individual, the day of death, which is his last day (Eccles. xii. 2). Then, in particular, the obscuration of the lights of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars, Jerusalem, the most immediate thing which it is proper for me now to announce and for you to expect is, that the sun," etc. But Christ actually speaks bona fide just as he himself sees. [We cannot accept the author's interpretation of our Saviour's language. We admit indeed, on Christ's own direct assertion, that the time of the end was a secret veiled even from his human consciousness, but this is a very different thing from any misconception of the matter on his part. The author's argument is even destructive of his own position: for how, if Jesus did not know when the final catastrophe should occur, could he with the least candor venture thus to assert its immediate connection with any preceding events.—Am. Ed.]

* It is finally not to be overlooked, that every generation is to wait for Christ; and probably for those who die in this attitude of expectation the space of time to the fulfillment is one that quickly passes over. Roos: "The apostles, also, were to represent this as something near; for the greatest part of their waiting was to be passed in heaven, where there is no being weary." Let the commentator, with true thoughts of death, transpose himself into that frame and that point of view which reduces to small compass the little bit of history upon earth before the last day. [The author here loses sight of the real point of difficulty. Our Saviour does not merely express haste or speediness, which in a highly impassioned style may be measurably extended, but a positive consecution of events in explicit terms. Moreover the passages from the Apocalypse are not in point, as they probably refer to more proximate events.—Am. Ed.]

is a figure variously recurring in the prophets, expressive of great tribulations and judgments upon nations and men on the earth, Isa. v. 30, xiii. 10, xxxiv. 4; Jer. iv. 28; Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8; Amos viii. 9; Mic. iii. 6. The word of Christ here certainly includes also this figurative sense; and teaches us to expect again, before his second coming, great θλίψεις and ἀνάγκας, tribulations and distresses. Here it is chiefly the heaven of the Church that is spoken of: the sun of revealed religion; the moon of intellectual culture and science, upon which the sun casts its rays (while in other respects sun and moon neither shine nor are darkened together); the stars of the heads of Churches and ecclesiastical teachers (see already Dan. viii. 10, 11, and then Rev. i. 20, xii. 1)—all these will be darkened in the great falling away, which takes place ever more and more at different periods.* In this sense it is not said that the stars fall to the earth; but (as Mark has it) only an ἐκπίπτειν, a falling out or extinction of these in the heavens. But the word then reaches further: although the literal fulfillment actually comes only as a corresponding testimony to the figurative fulfillment that precedes it, seeing that what is outward and material is in general what is unsubstantial in God's world, although the darkening in the heaven of humanity is the proper reality, of which that in the physical heaven is rather only the figure—yet for this very reason, must this physical realization of the multiplying signs (Joel iii. 4) quite as certainly follow, even to the last letter of the prediction. The shaking of the heavens with the earth (Hagg. ii. 6, 21)† fulfills itself not merely before, in great commotions of the world (there, vers. 8, 22), but at last actually just as it is interpreted in Heb. xii. 26, 27; see Rev. vi. 12–15 with reference to Isa. xxxiv. 4, l. 3.‡ At all events, in no sense are we to understand it of occurrences "in the heavenly regions," which remain invisible to men upon earth; but of truly visible things within the horizon of human vision. The δυνάμεις τῶν οὐρανῶν, powers of heaven, are also not the stars, which were already named (צְבָא הַשָּׁמַיִם, comp. Psa. xxxiii. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 4, Sept.); still less the angels, who are then to be "in great commotion," for they immediately follow in their own proper name;* but, as the Vulgate puts it in this instance correctly, virtutes coelorum, the sustaining and working powers of the heavenly edifice (with their influences upon the earth). Our Lord means to say, finally summing up, All things shall be shaken, and at last dissolved, so that not even "one stone shall remain upon another" (2 Pet. iii. 10–12). Still he now only touches preparatorily on this actual passing away of the heavens with the earth, which is reserved for the third coming (ver. 35); inasmuch as (not indeed without reference to Haggai) he merely signifies a forewarning σαλευθῆναι or shaking, and only announces this as preparing the way for the next τότε, then, ver. 30 (here the οὐρανός and its νεφελαί are still in existence).

See now how in harmony with this Luke, vers. 25, 26, first of all mentions similar σημεῖα or signs in sun, moon, and stars; then, however, he adds, what Christ certainly also said, how it will be ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, upon the earth: a fearing and trembling of nations on account of such signs, a fainting away of men from fear of an evil conscience, which by these signs speaks to them of judgment, and from expectation of the things that are to come upon the world—for they will not expect him, the coming One; therefore as a punishment the wilfully blind fear of an indefinite something, as we often already plainly see it in the unbelieving race of our own days. The raging sea and its σάλος or waves, are spoken of in like manner, in a twofold sense: figuratively of the disturbances of nations, as the πόλεμοι and σεισμοί, wars and commotions, Matt. vers. 6, 7 (for see Psa. xlvi. 4, lxv. 8, lxxxix. 10, 11, xciii. 3; Isa. xvii. 12, 13; Rev. xvii. 15), but also literally as the accompanying testimony.

Verse 30 This is a different τότε, "then," from all the preceding, with an open prophecy brought much nearer; an actually personal ἔρχεσθαι or coming of the Son of Man, still more properly visible than the lightning-like παρουσία or presence, ver. 27. For the whole scene gradually draws nearer and nearer to one end after the other. Here already, at the beginning of the section, is a stronger expression than at the end of the first, ὄψονται, "they shall see," and φανήσεται, "shall appear;" for, after all the signs mentioned at ver. 29, there goes immediately before the proper coming still a sign of the Son of Man in heaven—now mysterious in the prophecy, but quite manifest in the fulfillment—which is

* It remains a question whether the ruling powers in a political respect (in so far as they are connected with the outward Church in Christian and Christianly governed nations) are here also meant. Compare again an Irvingite essay by John Hooper, entitled: "Translation or Transformation of the living saints."

† Where also just as here in the prophetical period there is a "yet a little."

‡ I shall therefore certainly not deny this real destruction of the present world, which the entire Scripture certifies, nor interpret the words of Jesus here merely figuratively of the preceding commotions of the world and Church. When, however, Kurtz (Bibel u Astronomie, p. 126) maintains against me that the application of that prophetical usage, otherwise recognized, is inadmissible here, because the same thing is said previously in dry and naked words—he greatly mistakes the prophetical manner, which often says the same thing in different sections, now figuratively and now properly. In this chapter, indeed, vers. 4–14, had partly a generally introductory, anticipative character, partly again, vers. 29, 30 speak purposely in expressions respecting the end as at last literally so coming.

* Also not the mountains that bear the heavens, its pillars, as Sepp has fancifully explained it.

most emphatically announced by the article. Here, therefore, is the final answer to the question, ver. 3 (What the sign of thy coming?). Already on account of the reference to the question of the disciples, but also according to the clear word itself, we cannot possibly understand by this sign the υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου or Son of Man himself, in his visible appearance;* for the seeing of him who comes is distinguished and separated from the appearing of his sign, by the lamentations that come between. Therefore it is not a special token connected with his visible appearance, to prove the identity of the glorious Lord with him who was once crucified, such as the wounds in his side (Rev. i. 7; Zech. xii. 10); but certainly some sign of his approach plainly manifesting itself to all the world, analogous to those foregoing signs in the heaven; and still at last ἐν οὐρανῷ, "in the heaven," of which we are warranted only in saying with Von Meyer, "It remains uncertain until the fulfillment."† The nearest analogy is certainly to the star of the magians; except that then the significance of it will be indubitably evident to all. All φυλαὶ τῆς γῆς or tribes of the earth shall beat the breast, and utter lamentations;‡ i. e., not merely the tribes of the land of Judah (although Zech. xii. 10–14 has a typical connection therewith), but the ἔθνη and ἄνθρωποι ἐν τῇ οἰκουμένῃ, or nations and men on the earth, as is plainly to be read in Luke (comp. Rev. i. 7, πᾶς ὀφθαλμός, and the φυλαί there as at Rev. v. 9, xi. 9, xiv. 6 in the sense of כָּל־מִשְׁפְּחוֹת הָאֲדָמָה, also Rev. vi. 15–17). First, there is the cry of lamentation, He cometh! before they see him. Then, however, he cometh in the clouds of heaven; which here, as in chap. xxvi. 64, and also in Mark, is the intermediate expression between μετὰ τῶν νεφελῶν, "with the clouds," Rev. i. 7 (at the same time his continual coming in the cloud-veil of judgments, which already run through the whole history of the world) and ἐν νεφέλῃ, "in a cloud," in Luke, which designates still more clearly the advent-cloud (the white horse, Rev. xix. 11) as corresponding to that cloud of the ascension (Acts i. 9, 11).* Thus, in a way which we cannot now more nearly determine, will actually follow the middle coming of the Son of Man (of which in general Rev. xix. prophesies); although it does not yet coincide with Matt. xxv ?1 (in his entire and full glory), yet by a visibly personal manifestation: μετὰ δυνάμεως καὶ δόξης πολλῆς, "with power and great glory." This δύναμις or power is again not to be understood of an accompanying host of angels or saints, but merely corresponds to the powers of heaven mentioned before; as a δύναμις θεοῦ or power of God, irresistibly manifesting itself in his coming and judging, as the δόξα, "glory," the brightness (כָּבוֹד) that glorifies him, now alone shines after the darkening of the heavenly bodies, as a last type of that which, in a last future, according to Isa. xxiv. 23, lx. 19, 20, shall be literally fulfilled (Rev. xxi. 23). The entire description of the coming of the Son of Man in the clouds gives finally, at the conclusion of Christ's discourses to his disciples—as afterwards, chap. xxvi. 64, to his enemies—the most solemn declaration as to the sense in which he has called himself "Son of Man," viz., according to Dan. vii. 13, 14. This prophecy of Daniel indeed strictly points to this intermediate coming for the setting up of his kingdom; it again connects itself with the beginning of the last prophetical writing in the Scripture, Rev. i. 7, 13.

Verse 31. All power and glory is his, all angels are his servants and messengers. That which later, in Heb. i. 13 14, an apostle again begins patiently to teach for believers and unbelievers in Israel, Christ himself also testified from the beginning according to the Gospel of Matthew (chaps. xi. 27, viii. 41, xxii. 43). Only the angels (who in general know many things which no man knows, as ver. 36 afterwards indicates, 2 Sam. xi v. 20) know how to separate between the good and the bad, and rightly to bring together the elect from all quarters of the earth. The trumpet is not merely figurative, as according to Num. x. 2 the host or congregation of Israel was thus convoked; but rather

* Storr, to whose forced exegesis one is accustomed, says, "The Son of Man himself is this wonder!" So unhappily Bengel also: Ipse erit signum sui—for which he compares Luke ii. 12, where, however, it is not the child that is the σημεῖον, but the cradle and swaddling clothes. Recently Hofmann (Weiss. und Erfüll. ii. 185) very decidedly: "He himself, his own self-representation"—with reference to Bengel. Similarly at least Victor Andreä (Lebensfragen der Kirche Christi, p. 99): "The sign of all signs, the sign of the prophet Jonas in its last potency, the splendor of the resurrection-body." But the text distinguishes by a second τότε the coming itself.

† It is interesting to notice the different opinions that have been expressed on this point from the earliest times to the present day. The ancients (from Chrysostom and Theophylact downwards, also for example Beda, Thomas Aquin.): a cross in the heavens. Others: the clouds in which he comes. Also: a comet, such as it appeared according to Josephus, Bell. Jud. vii. 30. Hunnius: the star of the magicians. Grotius: the spread of the Gospel (to which Dorner inclines). Others: the sound signal-call of a trumpet. The Irvingites now understand it to be the first resurrection. Finally, Rud Hofmann: the appearance of a Son of Man at that time in the Holy of Holies recorded in the Hebrew text of Josephus—because the Gospel which was published after the destruction of Jerusalem has introduced this.

‡ Where the play upon the word noticed by Lange: κοψονται, ὄψονται, can have been only accidental.

* For that (as Stein thinks, who so diligently traces out the usage) this singular in Luke is merely a consistency on the part of the writer, who in his two writings has never used this word in the plural, is a jejune remark. Besides chap xii. 54, the word occurs in "both writings" only at Luke ix. 34, 35 and Acts i. 9, where the singular is quite as distinctively correct as here.

to be understood as calling to mind the law of Moses, given on that day when the Lord himself summoned his people from Sinai with the voice of a trumpet exceeding loud (Exod. xix. 16, 19). This is what Christ means by the σάλπιγξ φωνῆς μεγάλης; for when he comes to judgment the law again comes into force for those who are judged, while, for the redeemed who have become his people by the obedience of faith, it is, "I am the Lord thy God!" The sound of trumpets is in general associated with any special solemnity in which the King reveals himself and is praised (Psa. xlvii. 5). What the Spirit in the Scripture, however, further prophesies of the seven trumpets, Rev. viii. 2, and a last one of all, 1 Cor. xv. 52, belongs not to the interpretation here; it is only to be observed that in this passage Christ means already the same trumpet which Paul, 1 Thess. iv. 16 (still distinguished from the voice of the archangel), mentions with reference to the first resurrection—on the other hand, 1 Cor. xv. points still further beyond. For although we do not know more particularly of these things, yet the return of Israel evidently in the prophetical word closely connects itself with the intermediate coming of Christ for the millennial kingdom. Here our Lord as yet conceals this mystery, as also the resurrection; yet the elect gathered together are now (while at the first appearing of the kingdom after Jerusalem's judgment it happened as described at Matt. viii. 11, 12) chiefly the restored of Israel: hence the expressions employed point back to Deut. xxx. 4; Isa. xi. 11, 12, xliii. 5, 6; Zech. ii. 6-13 (xiv 4, 5). Yet are the Gentiles, as the πλήρωμα or "fulness" brought in, joined to his saints (Psa. l. 1–5); and his whole people are the διασπορά or "dispersion" now brought together in power and glory (1 Pet. i. 1; James i. 1). The ἐπισυνάγειν or "gathering together" is seen to be something quite different from the fleeing out of Judea before! The elect tribe, as the people of heaven in opposition to the φυλαῖς τῆς γῆς or "tribes of the earth"—therefore also are they gathered from the ends of the heavens (in which again there is a hint as yet veiled of the resurrection). The somewhat different expression in Mark, "from the end of the earth to the end of the heavens"—means not merely what is directly equivalent to "from one end of the earth to the other" (Matt. ver. 27; Deut. iv. 32, xiii. 7, xxviii. 64), but, together with this, indicates that then, in general, heaven and earth shall wondrously come together.

Verses 32, 33. All this however takes place not at a period arbitrarily fixed by an interfering power, but according to a regular law of development and preparation: as the eagles of judgment do not come until the carcass grows putrid, so the elect are gathered into the heavenly garner when their ripeness is attained. In the fig-tree learn the parable—namely, of these things; so it runs quite exactly in Matthew. This, however, is the general sense of the parable, which we are to learn from the fig-tree (and all trees, as Luke adds): when the trees put forth shoots the summer is nigh (Song of Sol. ii 12, 13); therefore is the gloriously bursting fruit and harvest season of the kingdom of God near before the door (as the Judge, James v. 9), when all these things come to pass before the eyes of believers who perceive them, i. e., when all the signs above mentioned, together with this last one, come. For the budding of the fig-tree is the surest sign of the season of the year. If any are satisfied with this point of comparison, viz., the certainty of the signs or indications which indeed also retains its truth, let them be so;* we think ourselves warranted in asking further, what then is this fig-tree, so significantly marked out? Even Ebrard rightly perceives that τῆς συκῆς is intended to bring to mind that fig-tree which was cursed by Christ;† but then he certainly interprets wrongly thus: When the poisonous bitter fig-leaves sprout, when the antichristian character grows and flourishes, then is the harvest time near, when the trees which have leaves only and no fruit, are cursed! For Christ gives here certainly a joyful sign of summer, pointing to the ripeness of the elect; and says nothing of "only leaves," or of poisonous leaves, as is proved already by the "all trees," which is added in Luke. These are certainly the blessed missions for the preaching of the Gospel among all nations (see in the antitype, Rev. xxii. 2)—shall then the late fig-tree, which once withered under the curse, also again bear leaves and fruit (which in this instance go together)? Clearly enough for a simple eye does Christ show here, in this significant parable, Israel again restored to life; he points to the greater blessing that will accompany the Jewish mission as the surest sign to his people of his near approach—as will be immediately confirmed to us in the following verse.

First, however, we must insert here what is said in Luke, ver. 28; because it refers not to those joyful tokens of spring, but to terrors and anguish, vers. 25, 26. When men on the earth tremble for fear of the judgment, then shall the children of the kingdom, although partly involved in the distress, yet lift up their heads; for to them redemption comes, to them such tribulation is only "like a stormy thaw after a long winter, which announces the nearness of spring and the time of blossom" (Schmieder). The godless ones proudly stretched their neck on high, but must now bend in fear before the Lord when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth (Isa. ii. 10-22); while they who have humbled themselves in due time now on the contrary lift up their heads. Here, again, is the echo of that old word, 2 Chron. xv. 7. The near coming of the Lord comforts the hearts of those who wait for him; for the Judge is also the Saviour, and it is right in his sight to judge the one class, and to bring rest to the other, 2 Pet. ii. 9; 2 Thess. i. 5-10.

* As the treatise already mentioned well expresses it: "Then even the most simple peasant does not need to ask the learned, whether the summer is near."

† On the other hand Dorner has protested against this ancient interpretation, not first to be laid to my account, with an Ingeniousius quam verus, arbitror. He objects that Luke records nothing of that cursing, therefore that he cannot have thus understood the parable—as if an Evangelist knows only the incidents which he records, and as if he must already understand every thing in Christ's discourses which he records, exactly as we now do! When, further, Dorner requires the express naming of the cursed or withered fig-tree, at least an αὕτη as at ver. 34 (which yet would sound very awkward), this is contrary to the nature of such prophetical hints in their background where special reference is concealed beneath a general sense first of all. Thus "the fig-tree" may denote here in the first place only the species in natural history; but then comes the reminding hint in addition, for those who can perceive.

Verse 34. We have found, hitherto, a regular progress in the discourse, ever moving onwards from what is typically near to what is remote and prophetically near; and now, is it to be supposed that all at once "everything moves back again to the immediate presence of the apostles?" Yet we must suppose that our Lord thus moves to and fro in his discourse, if the term γενεά here can be understood as signifying only generation.* All these things of which he has spoken since ver. 29 shall come to pass before this generation passes; i. e., not merely shall be visible in their beginnings (as Ebrard says, p. 613, not to speak of the complete confusion, p. 618). Besides, only an artificial interpretation which violates the simple flow and connection of the words can understand here an antithesis of different points of time; so that, while ver. 34 again refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 36 means the latter day of judgment, with a designed distinction. Bengel's long note which, according to a preferred reading, distinguishes between ταῦτα πάντα, ver. 33; and πάντα ταῦτα, ver. 34; and interprets, "All this which has regard to Jerusalem comes to pass even in this generation; but of that more distant day of the second judgment knoweth no man"—is in this instance a false complication, and an unwarranted interpolation of the text. Where, then, has Christ looked back to Jerusalem since ver. 29; and what meaning would lie in the parable of the fig-tree, whose withering rather than its budding again was what came to pass in this generation? The exact understanding of this figure assists us in determining what the γενεὰ αὕτη must be for both are in fact the same. The critics hitherto with their philological strictness have regarded it as a thing established that γενεά can signify only generation (which Strauss boastingly maintains), but this was not even correct philology. For Dorner, after Fritzsche had led the way, has proved with the most perfect demonstration that the fact is not as those critics supposed; and we very thankfully accept this, as it was by no means our wish even from the first (in the inexact expression of the first edition) to proceed *relaxando imperio philologico, renuente philologia. But it was overlooked, with still greater injustice, that after all even a seeming contradiction with the classical Greek usage may lose its force when an expression can be shown to bear the peculiar stamp of biblical usage, from the Old Testament downwards. This latter, and, properly speaking, decisive, proof, which Dorner has merely touched, I on my part give here as a necessary supplement to his demonstration and earnestly request that he will consider it

Already in the prophetical usage of דּוֹר הַזֶּה this aetas in the Old Testament (frequently enough, comp. also הַמִּשְׁפָּחָה הָרָעָה הַזֹּאת, Jer viii. 3, Sept. γενεὰ) do we find that connection of the fathers with the children, which afterwards recurs in the discourses of Christ, now reaching forwards, now backwards. In confirmation of this we have, immediately above in Matt. xxiii. 36, a very decisive parallel. For, as there not merely the then present, last, generation was meant, but, including backwards the entire race as one stock and lineage, the entire people who are judged in the last generation (for at ver. 35 it is said: Ye have killed); so the term here has the same signification pointing forwards. Just because the children are like the fathers, γενεά in reference to the γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν passes beyond the species into the idea of the γένος; and this (as at all events may grammatically lie in the γενεά, even if no such passages occurred besides those in the Sept.) is the proper sense of this expression, when it is used concerning Israel. Not merely, to speak with Dorner, "significatio gentis acuitur in voce γενεά, si usurpatur de gente aliqua, quae est una inter alias. Sic enim est una et singularis, ut differat ab aliis, et peculiari quadam natura insignis sit seu indole. Quare γενεά non solum universim denotat gentem seu genus, sed notæ specificæ et singularis genus quoddam seu gentem." Not merely so; rather is Israel as this דּוֹר, or this γενεά, always

* As Erasmus has at least in Matthew and Luke put aetas for the generatio of the Vulg., making but an ill improvement. Here Dorner happily sees the truth, and restores its due honor to an interpretation hitherto almost rejected. Upon right grounds he builds the inference: Quare omnes reor concessuros, vocem γενεά, si eam vertas aetas, multas easque plane insuperabiles ciere difficultates, contextum vero et orationes progressum flagitare significationem gentis, nempe Judaeorum. With especial truth and force he notices that vers. 34 and 36 would contradict each other if Christ announced every thing still for the same generation; as well as that the first Christians, nay, the apostles, would not possibly have continued to wait for him, when Israel was not converted and Christ did not come; therefore that they cannot have so understood the word.

* Recently Hebart (Die zweite sichtbare Zukunft Christi, Erlangen, 1850, p. 43) has likewise referred simply to Homer, in a passage overlooked by Dorner.

designated with the accessory idea of evil. Such is, in particular, the meaning of Luke xvii. 25 (of this evil generation, the unbelieving and perverse, Matt. xvii. 17); and with this are then connected such passages as Luke xvi. 8, where the two γενεαί or γένη are contrasted: Acts ii. 40; Phil. ii. 15, the perverse generation of unbelievers; 1 Pet. ii. 9 the elect γένος or nation. All these passages are far enough removed from the more limited idea of generation;* so as to warrant us in understanding the same thing here by ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη, "this generation," as is meant in Luke ver. 23 by ὁ λαὸς οὗτος, "this people"—a very evident, and almost decisive parallel. When Olshausen admits "that every thing includes at the same time its further reference to the future"—we are entitled to ask: What further reference then does this γενεὰ include, if not the wondrous continuance of Israel even to the end, for which it is spared? We cannot even say here, with many, that the expression is transferred from the type to the antitype; that Christ speaks "with intentional ambiguity," so that the expression might denote as well the generation of his time as the Jewish people as a whole;† that he says "in a certain double sense, This generation of the men now living shall not pass away until all has come to pass that has reference to Jerusalem; and this generation, the people of Israel, shall not pass away until every thing further has come to pass."‡ For ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη does not at all mean a generation of men in general, but what Christ has every where before designated by this, viz., the corrupt Israel; and πάντα ταῦτα has now nothing more to do with the destruction of Jerusalem. This rather is the ὀξύμωρον of the ambiguous expression: this generation will, as it were, not die; it will propagate itself in children and children's children, as a generation ever the same as the present;§ this generation which rejects me will so remain until it again cries Hosanna to me in truth! The withered figtree will stand until it again puts forth shoots! Observe here that the οὐ μὴ παρέλθῃ, "shall not pass," is quite parallel with the παρελεύσεται, "shall pass away," in reference to heaven and earth. And thus we have, in the words of Christ, a most significant reference to the historical miracle of the hand of God upon Israel (according to that ancient word of Balaam, Num. xxiii. 9), whose continued separate existence, ever maintaining the same nature and character of one race even under the curse, mocks the power and cunning of all nations, and contradicts all the usual order of history. It is related that a prince once asked a preacher* to mention to him a convincing argument for the truth of the Bible in one word; and the striking answer was, "The Jews."† After these explanations it will be unnecessary to refute other more singular interpretations of γενεά; such as that which understands the nation of believers, Christendom,‡ or that which has been brought forward by the Irvingites.§

Verse 35. That which at the beginning in the Sermon on the Mount, chap. v. 18, and then again at Luke xvi. 17, was said of the law; that which already in the Old Testament was testified of the word of God in general (Psa. cxix. 89, 96; Isa. xl. 8)—our Lord here affirms of his words whose prophecy will therefore also not fail of fulfillment. It will rather obtain its entire fulfillment, and the word of God be established in everlasting continuance, precisely when heaven and earth shall pass away, and their present form be changed into a new one. First earthquakes, figuratively and literally (vers. 6, 7); then shaking of the heavens in the same twofold sense (ver. 29), finally, in the third epoch and last coming, to which Christ here glances forward in the futuro,

* Also in the Sept. γενεά stands often not merely for דּוֹר (as, for example, Psa. xcv. 10), but often more generally for מוֹלֶדֶת, patria, Num. x. 30, for מִשְׁפָּחָה, Lev. xxv. 41; Jer. viii. 3; even for עַם, Lev. xx. 18.

† Tippleskirch's Zwanzig Predigten aus Rom, p. 13.

‡ Schmieder's Predigten zu Rom und Pforte, p. 108.

§ Alford has correctly expressed it in the sense given above: "Never were a nation so completely one γενεά, in all accuracy of meaning, as the Jewish people."

* According to Eyth (Klassiker und Bibel) it was Frederick the Great and a learned man.

† Hamann expresses it more fully: "The far greater, immovably abiding, sign and wonder of a burning, unconsumed bush, in the colonies of that extraordinary race of men scattered even to this day over the wide world—speaking pillars of salt for the truth and certainty of the judgments once revealed in the old valley of vision and long since fulfilled, pledge and security for the hitherto as yet concealed treasure of those promises of grace and blessings with which heaven and earth are pregnant."

‡ So Origen, Chrysostom, and others. Dr. Paulus: "This my spiritual posterity, Christendom, shall survive it." With him Lange agrees: "This race of men planted by me, viz., believers, the disciples of Jesus as an imperishable race—this new race of men, noble race of Christians, the eternal spiritual generation—there will always be a Christian people." That this is meant "decidedly appears from the connection which he shows;" but we put another connection in opposition, and think it very flat to find here the assurance "that there will always be Christians!"

§ That generation which will then survive the before-mentioned signs, so that all will take place within the limits of a generation (John Hooper, The Translation, etc., p. 15; Das prophetische Wort, p. 42. Compare against this Tholuck's Litt. Anz. 1848. p. 270). [All this special pleading on the author's part, in favor of a forced signification of γενεά or generation, as denoting simply the Jewish race in general, is evidently imposed by his erroneous interpretation of ver. 29 above noticed. It is sufficient to adduce in refutation our Saviour's parallel expression, chap. xvi. 28.—Am. Ed.]

that passing away of the heavens and the earth properly speaking, which is predicted in Isa. li. 6; Psa. cii. 27; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 10; Rev. xx. 11, xxi. 1. At present, indeed, the fools say: Heaven and earth shall abide for ever, there shall be no last day, Christ's words shall pass away in the course of time—but we wait for the test.

Verse 36. Our Lord, having reached this point, now in the first place again connects together the last day of his coming with that announced at ver. 30, comprising them in the one ἡμέρα ἐκείνη or יוֹם הַהוּא, "that day" (chap. vii. 22); and he assures us that his people shall indeed perceive the ἐγγὺς ἐπὶ θύραις, "near at the doors," but that the exact determination of the time (for this is what is meant by καὶ ὥρα) is and remains what the Father reserves for himself alone. Not even "the decree of the watchers" in heaven (Dan. iv. 10, 14), which has many other times and hours in its knowledge, knows this day; but the Father alone, in the reserved, eternal decree—what a word against all such apocalyptic curiosity as degenerates into special reckonings of time! Mark expressly says also οὐδὲ ὁ υἱός, neither the Son; Matthew has omitted this, but not from regard to the readers of the first Gospel (who, besides, rather entertained Ebionite views of Christ); for it is included in his ὁ πατὴρ μόνος, the Father only, just as in chap. xx. 23 the like antithesis occurs. The Son also knew not—he said of so important a thing as this, I also know it not—what a rebuke to the false theology which, without understanding the complete humanity of Christ, transfers the communicatio idiomatum into the state of his humiliation; and which, from the earliest times, could only wrest and trifle with this word.* He does not say, "This I have not to tell you, I know it not for you"—but "the Son knoweth it not;" thus he speaks of himself simply as of the Father and the angels. It is wrong also to have recourse to the artificial distinction that as man he knew it not, although as God he knew it; for such knowing and not-knowing at the same time severs the unity of the God-human person, and is impossible in the Son of Man, who is the Son indeed, but emptied of his glory. It is not enough to say with Bengel, "Quia non habuit in mandatis, ut diceret diem illum;" or with Melanethon (Epist. ad Matthes.), "Profitetur se nescire, in quantum missus est ad ministerium evangel.i, nescit ea nobis"†—but for himself and his own course of faith, in which, as our Leader, he must be like unto us (Heb. xii. 2), he could not, and was not permitted to know many things, and chiefly this. It is also too great a refinement to which some have recourse in order yet to find something of the communicatio idiomatum, when (as Lange), instead of allowing to this not-knowing the force of a "positive ignorance," according to the text, they merely understand it thus far, that Christ in his sphere of vision would not reflect upon it, in opposition to the sinful wish to know on the part of his disciples. Compare on this the convincing refutation which Liebner has given in his Dogmatik (i. 1, p. 22). We will allow nothing to explain away this rebuke addressed to that false curiosity and speculation which anticipates faith, and admits of no Nescio! The Father knows the day—the Son knew it not then when he thus spoke—and the Spirit? He indeed knows all things, and searcheth also the deep things of God, 1 Cor. ii. 10. Therefore the Spirit in the Father knew, the Spirit in the Son knew not: here, however, is the limit of our understanding as regards the mystery of the incarnation. Did the risen Lord know afterwards when he spake as in Acts i. 7? The words "it is not for you" at the beginning, are in favor of an affirmative answer; while those at the end "the Father hath put it in his own power" seem to say No. Indeed, we also might say here, "We know not," if there were not other grounds for believing that he who was about to ascend into heaven then knew. But that the ascended One, who now sits at God's right hand, knows all things, is quite certain; we doubt however very much whether, in the δεῖξαι τοῖς δούλοις αὐτοῦ, to show unto his servants, Rev. i. 1, the revelation of the day and the hour is also included, as at least the calculations hitherto seem to show; and in our simplicity we think that no believer, even to the end, has a right to know more than the Son knew in the days of his flesh.*

Verses 37—39. Already in Luke xvii. had our Lord spoken similarly, with the addition of the times of Lot; for all strikingly prominent judgments of God, from the beginning, form a typical perspective, each reflecting itself in the other. This Christ here teaches, at the same time confirming the historical truth of that flood which swept away all, and that entering into the ark; declaring them to be as historically true as one day his own παρουσία or "coming" will be. Peter adduces the same parallel against the mockers, 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6. It is significantly not the crimes and vices of which the earth was then full, that are here mentioned—"these are but details which arise on the broad ground of the earthly mind" (Braune). Christ marks and describes, as the proper character and point of comparison, merely this earthly mind, which despises God's word and warning. After the general propo-

* As, for example, one may read in the Evang. Kirchenzeitung, 1828, p. 797. Ambrose, De Fide v. 8, appealed to old Greek manuscripts in which these words are not found; but who ventured to add them?

† Much earlier had Augustine said: "Nescit—non ad cognoscendum, sed ad proponendum." Hilarius: "Non sibi nescivit, sed nobis.

* "If the coming of Christ will be as a thief in the night, then can neither political arithmetic nor prophetical chronologies fix the day; and, to speak humanly, he who betrays the thief, may reckon at least for such revelations upon Satan's striking in the face, and that is not any body's affair" (Hamann).

sition, ver. 37, it follows more particularly: they lived in earthly enjoyments,* plans and projects (Luke xvii. 28), carried on merchandise, planting, building, as looking forward to a secure future—and cared not, or knew not, what was hanging over them, because, although it was indeed foretold to them, yet the day and the hour had not expressly been revealed. So shall also the παρουσία of the Son of Man be—now with a return to the more general expression, ver. 27, although in the first place, ver. 30 is meant. For, Christ is showing the similarity of all judgments; and in Jerusalem, even to the last moment, a blind security prevailed to a fearful extent. See here, at the same time, the reason why the wisdom of God reserves the day in his own power: in order that the righteous separation may be manifest between those who despise his word, and those who do not. It is, moreover, easy to understand how this security is not inconsistent with that fear, Luke, vers. 25, 26. They say: It is peace! and act outwardly as if it were so; but in their hearts and consciences the pangs of travail for the judgment are preparing themselves (1 Thess. v. 3). (Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus angit.)

Luke, having already at an earlier place recorded these words of Christ, now gives instead of them, vers. 34–36, another conclusion of the discourse: this may perhaps be intended to express the essential import of Matt. vers. 43–51, but it may also be an actual supplement of words originally spoken by our Lord. Κραιπάλη καὶ μέθη is, it is true, not precisely eating and drinking excessively, yet it is a general expression for all that indulgence in bodily and earthly enjoyments which clogs the heart and stupifies the inner man. This, however, is again a further warning figure for every sort of intoxication which may be opposed to sobriety and being filled with the Spirit (Rom. xiii. 13; Eph. v. 18; 2 Thess. v. 6, 7; 1 Pet iv. 7, 8)—even were it the most refined seemingly spiritual, yet sensuous intoxication in poetry, art, or the like. The μέριμναι βιωτικαί or "cares of this life" are only the other side of the same earthly mind; the two are essentially one and inseparable. Ἀφνίδιος ἐπιστῇ, come unawares, finds its literal echo again at 1 Thess. v. 3; just as the praying always enjoined by Paul, ver. 17 (as in 1 Pet. iv. 8), points back to this discourse of our Lord. "As a snare on all them that dwell on the earth"—reminds us of Isa. xxiv. 17; and the dwelling upon the earth again indicates the earthly character and mind, as frequently in the Apocalypse. "That ye may be accounted worthy;" as was said at Luke xx. 35, and as the apostle again repeats at 2 Thess. i. 5. Accounted worthy to escape—this points back to the first fleeing from the judgment of Jerusalem (Luke ver. 21; Matt. ver. 16) in the grand and significant unity of the whole; it is likewise, however, one of the manifest distinctions between the two, and is meant to say, In that second calamity it will no longer be possible thus to escape to the mountain, to a Pella! Finally, "to stand before the Son of Man"—first of all, to stand as one escaped from the judgment, saved from the wrath and judgment (Rev. vi. 17; Psa. lxxvi. 7; Nah. i. 6); but, then, at the same time, as the highest and last thing of which we can be made or thought worthy, viz., as heirs of his kingdom to stand before his face (Rev. xxii. 3, 4).

Verses 40, 41. With the twice repeated declaration, So also shall the coming of the Son of Man be! and the glance back to its earliest type, Christ now makes all his disclosures (which after all reach further and contain far more than we understand) lead back to the general warning, Beware! With this he began all, and with this he will end all; the advance made, however, from the first to the second consists in this, that the first warning, viz., the end cometh not yet so soon! is now changed into the opposite, Christ cometh unexpectedly, be always ready! This seeming contrast, in which when rightly understood there is perfect harmony, and which offers much material for thought, belongs also to the wondrously profound plan of the discourse; and so in like manner the contrast, thus sublimely harmonized only in the discourses of Christ, between the abstract and the concrete in the depths of all truth—here between the authoritative announcements, grasping the future as a present reality, and the simplest most condescending tone of instruction in closely connecting parables. Only read and hear the whole again from ver. 5 onwards, in order to feel how sublime beyond comparison, with what mildness in the midst of majesty, with what a holy play of imperturbably tranquil wisdom in the midst of world-judging severity, the prophetical discourse now passes into the parabolical. The first transaction is formed by the two sentences in vers. 40, 41, which still connect themselves with the foregoing prophecy, and yet are already spoken in the admonishing form of the parable. The two in the field and two at the mill are not selected in order to indicate that common people also shall be worthy of the kingdom (as Grotius thinks), or that nothing depends on worldly rank or position (as Braune arbitrarily finds only the masters in the field, the slaves at the mill), or even (what is quite self-evident) that nothing depends on sex, man or woman; but the whole is meant first of all prophetically to say, that when the work of life is going on, ver. 38, the separating judgment will break in. Then this separation is portrayed as breaking through all human fellowship: the foolish person relied upon his outward and earthly fellowship with the wise, and thought himself as secure as his companion. (Luke xvii. 34, still more strongly the two in one bed who are the same night separated.) It is also thereby hinted, that those who are worthy of the kingdom, with all their internal readiness in watching and praying, yet do not idly separate themselves from the business and order of life. In the parabolical sense, however, they are at the same time male and female laborers in the service of Christ, who do not all stand before him—as a transition to the parables of the servants (and virgins). Finally, it is not to be mistaken, that the description in its antithesis to vers. 16–18 denotes quite different relations: the "being taken" is more than the fleeing there; but the "being left" is also, on the other, hand, not yet that which, in the following chapter, the last scene before the judgment-throne of the King will announce.

* They drank—wine also before the flood? The parallels, Matt. ver. 49 and Luke ver. 34, leave us to suppose this. We at least read in Gen. ix. 20, nothing of a first introduction of the vine, this "second tree of the knowledge of good and evil"—and Matt. xxvi. 29 shows us on the new earth what was therefore also from the beginning.

Verses 42—44. There is now a return from the third person to the direct address: because, according to ver. 36, no one can be sure at any time whatsoever that the Lord will not come to him; because at all events every human life has its last day at death, its judgment already very closely connected with the last judgment. The not-knowing stands in each of these three verses, while in the midst (ver. 43) is the true γινώσκειν or knowing. Christ comes to his people as their Lord, to the unfaithful and secure as a thief in the night (Obad. 5; Rev. iii. 3, xvi. 15); to both as the Son of Man. Our Lord has already, Luke xii. 39, 40, spoken of his coming as a thief in the same words;* and the same figure recurs at last in the Apocalypse. So his Spirit very fully comments upon this saying by the apostle at 1 Thess. v. 1–10: comp. there ver. 7 with Matt. ver. 49.

FIRST PARABLE: THE FAITHFUL AND WISE SERVANT.

(Matt. xxiv. 45–51; Mark xiii. 34–37; [Luke xii. 42–46].)

We are now to consider the first of the three parables which follow in full, forming in Matthew the continuation of the discourse. Parables like the first and third, according to Luke, our Lord had already spoken; but, as we in simplicity believe on the authority of Matthew, he now at the end repeats them with special significance. His last discourses recorded by John before the esoteric words spoken to his disciples are, in a great measure, references to what he has already spoken, as if he would now graciously and emphatically say, Behold, I have told it to you, remember it! (see Luke xii., especially the connection with vers. 31-35 before).

This parable of the faithful and wise servant applies, as we may easily see, chiefly to the official servants of Christ in his house or his Church; yet, at the same time, it is meant (like that of the laborers in the vineyard) for all Christians in common, as afterwards at chap. xxv. 14-30 still more plainly appears. First of all are described the official commission, faithfulness, and reward of the good and true servant (vers. 45–47); in order then to place in opposition to him the bad servant, in his false wisdom, or wicked folly (ver. 48), his unfaithful conduct, ver. 49, his terrible recompense from the Lord, who comes unexpectedly upon him with the punishment, vers. 50, 51.

Verses 45—47. Who is this faithful and wise servant whom I will now describe! Thus does Christ ask, to awaken and admonish; so that each one may ask himself, Is it I? does this picture answer to me? At the same time the question signifies what Luther, on Luke xii., has rightly paraphrased thus: "What a great thing it is to find such a servant! Will many such be found when Christ cometh?" In Luke the office was still more especially denoted by οἰκονόμος, "steward," as also the burning lights and marriage, vers. 35, 36—already a general anticipation of the parable of the virgins, which at last appears as a separate parable. All such affinity in the manifold discourses of Christ, at different times, is far more naturally explained on the supposition that he actually thus manifoldly yet harmoniously spake, than by the now favorite supposition of a confused arrangement on the part of the Evangelists. Faithful and wise: the first stands before the other, because the true wisdom of the heart that looks simply to the one thing (Luke ver. 34) proceeds from faithfulness, and is one with it. Yet so far as this is still wanting in us, we may on the other hand be incited to faithfulness at least from considerations of prudence; this salutary fear Christ will warningly and condescendingly recommend to us, at all events beside the love which indeed alone would be the entire faithfulness. He knows well the weakness which, even to the end, needs both the alluring and threatening presentation of reward or judgment; and he requires not the proud self-deception of the amour pur. The meat which the steward, placed over the domestic servants, is to give out, is his word for his servants; all labor of love towards the brethren, according to the talent of grace intrusted to him, which is to be profitably employed for the good of all. The article, τὴν τροφήν, "his [the] meat," means here the same which, in Luke xii., is called τὸ σιτομέτριον, "their portion of meat;" and points to the ὀρθοτομεῖν, "rightly dividing," 2 Tim. ii. 15, in its full signification: To every one his due, undiminished and unadulterated, wisely and faithfully, according to need and right.* The ἐν καιρῷ, beside it, has the like twofold signification: at the just and fitting season, so that it be neither neglectfully withheld nor inconsiderately given in over-abundance. Whom the Lord finds so doing he pronounces blessed: first of all, because he is already blessed in his deed (James i. 25)—then because it is a new blessedness to him so to be found of his Lord—finally, the Lord promises to him a high promotion from a few things to many things (chap. xxv. 21, comp. 1 Tim. iii. 13); nay, he here already says more than afterwards (here again the difference between the intermediate and final decision is intended to appear), inasmuch as every such servant is set over all the goods of his lord! (See the gradation of the promises, Rev. ii. 26, iii. 21, on to xxi. 7.) Here, therefore, there is a glance forward to the last, highest reward; just as in the antithesis, ver. 51, the punishment already points beyond the being merely left without, vers. 40, 41, chap. xxv. 11, 12. For, the intermediate sentence upon the servants at the appearing of the kingdom stands already in close connection with the final and eternal one.

Verses 48–51. Here we are given to understand that by all means a χρονίζειν or delay is to be expected, as in chap. xxv. 5; comp. Hab. ii. 3. What the preacher, Eccles. viii. 11, laments as alas! the prevalent experience; what, even in the poem of old Homer, is shadowed forth by the unexpected return of Ulysses; happens in the case of every other bad servant, whom Christ at once puts in opposition to the former as a well-known person—not asking now beforehand, Who is this? The examples of such are not rare. It is to be observed, moreover, that he also is a servant, placed in the same office, who still knows and presumes to say, My Lord—as he said in the good beginning of his faith and love. He also presumes not, with the mockers, altogether to deny the return of the Lord; at first he even says only in his heart, It will yet be a long time! If such folly, however, has once found place in the unfaithful heart, there will then soon follow the outbreak of wicked conduct; he begins, with an evil falling away, after the good beginning has ceased, to conduct himself ever more improperly; from the first beginnings of evil a more rapid advance is then made, because the evil element was already in these beginnings. The first and most immediate outbreak of pride and selfishness is the beating of the inferior servants, who yet before the Lord are his fellow-servants; i. e., he plays the lord politely and mannerly at first, but soon more roughly, with quarrelsome controversy, with assumed lordship, becomes a priest and pope as much as he can, causes dissension by violence and injustice, by the unconscionable abuse of the power and calling committed to him. This leads him ever deeper into sin; until, although calling himself a servant of the Lord, and confessing his name, he yet eats and drinks with the drunken, the secure of the world (ver. 38); whether it be in grossly overt act, or, as Christ says at last, with the hypocrites. Woe to him when the Lord suddenly comes! His severe judgment is denoted in the words διχοτομήσει αὐτόν—an expression into which many, as Grotius,* artificially insert the milder signification: He will, at the division of his house and house-servants, in the separation between the faithful and unfaithful, cut him off, and separate him—to this the μέρος θήσει, will assign him a part, that follows, corresponds only in appearance. For, διχοτομεῖν along with the αὐτόν can only mean to cut asunder (as the animal to be sacrificed, Exod. xxix. 17, Sept.); therefore for men that dreadful punishment in ancient times corresponding to our "quartering," which occurs Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29, in the Chaldee, as also Susanna ver. 59 (σχίσει μέσον), and which we find frequently in Greek and Roman writers.† This, then, remains a dreadful figure; in the background already a type and beginning of that punishment which, laying open the evil intents of the heart (Heb. iv. 12), puts its victim into the everlasting contradiction of dying, and yet not dying, misery: first of all, in reference to the coming of the Lord here meant, it is a designation of the judgment which suddenly removes the unfaithful servant, casts him down from on high, and brings him thoroughly into disgrace.‡

Mark, chap. xiii. 34–37, gives a short abridgment of Matt. xxiv. 43, with the two parables of the servants, xxiv. 45–51, and xxv. 14; and in this instance it is plainly seen to be such a summary of the main import. (See the conclusion of Mark's Gospel, chap. xvi., which sums up in the same way. Hence he has ἄνθρωπος ἀπόδημος, as Matt. xxv. 14, ἄνθρωπος ἀποδημῶν, and the servants in the plural.) The rest is easily understood without special interpretation; save that the porter or door-keeper who is expressly named, and the four night-watches, are only a further filling up of the picture in this simple representation, which gives prominence only to the watching and not sleeping (even with a slight echo of the parable of the virgins). We have, therefore, in this instance hardly to interpret the porter separately; at all events, he ranks with the servants who are admonished to watch, and denotes at the same time the duty of every one in the place that belongs to him, also as door-keeper, to give attentive heed to the coming of the Lord, as well as to whatever else might come. Or, if "to every one his work" was alotted, might the porter perhaps be entrusted with that which pertained to the entering into and departing from the Church,

* Even Zeller, in the Monatsblatt: "There will be a judicial division and separation such as admits of no middle party!"

† In both one and the same, for example: Herodotus, of Pythius, who was cut asunder at the command of Xerxes, so that the two halves were laid on the way; Horace, Sat. i. 1, 100, "securi divisit medium."

‡ Only it does not mean "the divisions by which the ministerial office loses its authority and power, falls asunder into dead parts" (Lange). For this servant is not a collective designation of the office, but an individual of a class very common.

with the power to admit ?* Since, however, in the explanation, such an office is not distinguished from the office, properly speaking, of giving meat, we rather recognize in Mark only a variation resulting from a further extension of the picture. With such unity of the fundamental ideas, showing itself remarkably even in the strongest deviations from the literal word of Christ, we will therefore in simplicity hear his Holy Spirit (who actually watches for all servants, and admonishes to watch; who in John x. 3, in another reference is called the porter) when he utters aloud the last word: What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch !

SECOND PARABLE: THE WISE VIRGINS.

(Matt. xxv. 1–13.)

The wisdom in the former parable connected with faithfulness is now specially represented; as, immediately after, in the following parable, the faithfulness by itself. Already, in Luke xvi. 8–12, both were connected in such a manner that Christ exhorted to faithfulness at least from considerations of wisdom or prudence; so that men should not eternally perish from want, but in the time of reckoning might know whither to go. Here, however, the wisdom of the virgins, penetrating deeper and disclosing the heart, is so viewed that all management of goods entrusted, all active performance of work committed, falls into the background, as compared with the state of the heart—the wisdom of going out to meet the Bridegroom, waiting for him, watching with a patient zeal, which has regard alone and entirely to his marriage. Thus does this middle parable stand significantly between the two others; and shows us the wisdom, as it not merely leads to faithfulness, but also proceeds from faithfulness, and is one with it. If ver. 13, at the conclusion (where the more extended reading also corresponds to the sense), as the link of transition to the following parable, sums up what was said in chap. xxiv. 42, 36—so in ver. 10 αἱ ἕτοιμοι brings into prominence the retrospect to ver. 44: the readiness is the watching and waiting of the heart for him, which is represented in the burning of the diligently and carefully trimmed and tended lamps; just as in the same lamp there appears again, at the same time, the effect of the wise faithfulness, the life and actings of faith, which are in that case certainly not wanting. Finally, however, and this is of great importance for the understanding of the parable, the foolish virgins receive by no means so severe a punishment as the wicked and unprofitable servant, but are merely in this instance shut out, as having come too late; this wisdom or folly is therefore not quite one and the same with that described at Matt. vii. 24–27, in so far as both parties in this parable are virgins. Again, the wise virgins are also not commended, as the servants were, on account of their work; the going in to the marriage says here enough.

Verses 1, 2. So far Olshausen has rightly seen, that these virgins denote rather the passive love to Christ, as the servants rather the active employment in his service; and that this distinction represents itself in different persons, according to the type of John and Peter, Mary and Martha. But we would lay a stronger emphasis upon what he has merely noticed as the principal sense, which only includes the former application; namely, that virgins and servants are the same persons viewed under different aspects. The internal aspect, that namely of the disposition of heart which lies at the foundation, remains, in all, the passive watching and waiting of the attached heart; the outer side, on the other hand, which appears in the revelation made by the separating judgment is the exercise and profitable employment by the servants of the power and gifts which they have received. The many-sidedness, resembling the play of colors in a diamond, which is specially characteristic of this last trilogy of parables—in which, at the conclusion of the discourses the parabolic wisdom of Christ finds its consummation*—is meant to say and hint much on all sides, and is far from being exhausted by a single acknowledged reference. Thus has our Lord (as C. H. Rieger rightly sees) first of all, in chap. xxiv. vers. 38, 39, announced the general security of the great mass, such as he will find at his coming; then in vers. 45–51 chiefly the corruption and falling away of those who are teachers in his Church; now, however, he predicts also the becoming remiss and remaining behind of the noblest souls, who have joined themselves to the bride. Yet this also is only an accompanying accessory sense; for the ten virgins comprehend the entire Church of Christ, actually entered upon its divine calling. Then shall the kingdom of heaven be like—when the Lord and Bridegroom comes; the state of this Church, which is called to him as bride, will manifest that not all who belong to it have in entire faithfulness wisely prepared themselves. Therefore more exactly: first the state of the world in general; then the state of the outward Church in which the evil servants create disturbance and confusion; finally, even the divided state of the inner true Church. For, the foolish virgins, who remain without, are by no means one and the same with the evil servants who are cut asunder. The kingdom of heaven: the collective company of those in whom it more or less subsists upon earth, who know that they are called thereto and wait for its appearing. Ten is in general the number denoting completeness (as also in the ten servants, Luke xix. 13); according to the Jewish ordinance ten persons formed a Passover-family; then also a Church, assembly or קָהָל; in like manner, at a marriage, at least ten bridesmaids were appointed. Therefore these ten together are the Church; their relation to the bride in this marriage is precisely such as was said already, at chap. xxii., of the guests. Every Church which belongs to the great Church is also, on its part, a virgin presented to Christ (2 Cor. xi. 2). Accordingly, it may be supposed that, besides the application to individual souls, which retains its truth in the first place, there are indicated in the prophetic background of the τότε ὁμοιωθήσεται, "then shall be likened" (in which may lie many things now unknown) different churches, whose predominant character in their relation to Christ (as in those in the Apocalypse) will at least so represent itself.* Finally, when we look back to Psa. xlv. 14, 15, understood in a different way certainly from that of the current exegesis, it may appear that the bride, in the most proper sense, is Israel at last restored; while these virgins are the nations joined to it, i. e., churches out of the heathen world.

Something to this effect is probably meant by the reading (not to be despised when viewed as least as bearing witness to an earlier interpretation), which adds in ver. 1: "to meet the bridegroom and the bride."† In the parable this signifies, first of all, that they betook themselves to the house of the bride, there, as belonging to her, to wait until they were brought away by the bridegroom. For such was the custom which lies at the foundation of the entire parable; late in the evening, not indeed till the night, the bridegroom came with his friends (see on Matt. ix. 15) to conduct the bride with her virgins in the festal procession with torches to the nuptial supper. This, in its entire scope and aim, is what is meant already by the εἰς ἀπάντησιν τοῦ νυμφίου, "to meet the bridegroom," that they go out from their houses in order to assemble around the bride; this first going out is by no means a prolepsis of the subsequent one at ver. 6, as if it where only meant here. They would go out to meet him, they made preparation for this; but they were in the house of the bride, where the ἀπάντησις ("meeting") or preparation, the waiting for the coming one, took place.* And when now he came, it was said again differently, Go ye out to meet him! But what is the signification of all these circumstances? The first going out is the going out from the world and from self, whereby they become virgins belonging to the bride; the second is the last joyous readiness which meets the coming of the Lord. Whether precisely that going out from Babylon required by many, in particular "out of a false Babylonish union" (as the cry is now, with which Father Zeller almost agrees)—we leave entirely aside; the text contains nothing of this, and is rather, according to chap. xxiv. 26, to be kept free from all such outward dealing with its profound meaning. This, however, is further to be well observed, that both parties are virgins before Christ, not merely before the world; there is among them no hypocrite or harlot (who would be quite out of keeping with such a company); they all go out, all go to meet him; and that not as the present time drives us all, even the strangers and harlots without, against their will towards the coming One, but with a good foundation and beginning of their own will, faith, and mind turned to the Bridegroom. Both parties expect—a better state of the world? That is not enough. They go out to meet not a pseudo-Messiah of the political kingdom of heaven, as at the present the Jews who cry for emancipation in order to unite with Christendom without Christ—not "the ideal bridegroom, who at length celebrates his nuptial festival upon earth in a purified system of doctrine, and in general virtue"—but as it simply stands in the text, the Bridegroom, the true and genuine Bridegroom. We cannot, therefore, in this instance agree with Von. Meyer's interpretation of the parable (Blätter für höhere Wahrh. vii. 247), which indeed, in the extended application, expresses much that is profound, striking, and in itself true, but which, by a false exegesis, departs from the essentially narrower fundamental sense of the whole. These Christians and Christian societies are virgins: in order to this it is not enough that they "do not stand in an attitude of rebellion against the one true God, which the Scripture calls adultery, and that they all outwardly maintain a virtuous walk, or even, at least, preach it"—but they are also not disloyal to Christ, the Lord and Head of his Church, the Bridegroom. For even that wicked servant, the hypocrite, said, "My Lord"—but these virgins are completely parallel with those who, afterwards at ver. 24, are called his own servants, each of whom actually received and took his talent of grace from the Lord, and did not throw it away, but only did not faithfully and diligently enough traffic with it. Nothing is here said of Christians or Christian Churches which are fallen away; these, however much or little they may still retain of his name and confession, yet, before the Lord, belong to the heathen

* Yet we are not to take this sense, which applies to collective bodies, congregations, churches, also peoples and nationalities, as the plain, first and direct sense; though many do so (comp. Zeller's Monatsbl. 1837, No. 10) on the ground that prophets and apostles (2 Cor. xi. 2) always use the word virgin only in this sense. Here in the parable of Christ, all that is said of the virgins applies undeniably in the first place to individual persons, and only in comparison with them to collective bodies.

† Not merely in the strongly interpolated Cod. D., but also in the Vulg. sponso et sponsæ; even the significant Peshito לאורח חתנא וכלתא.

and the children of this world. Therefore the foolish virgins are certainly not those who "demean themselves sentimentally towards him who calls himself the Bridegroom of the Church and of the soul; whose love to him and desire for union with him is likewise idolatry, Jesulatry." Not those who inwardly pay homage to "Astarte together with Baal, the moon-goddess of false philosophy, who therefore neither practically nor theoretically bear with justice the name of virgins"—these are just on this account not foolish virgins, for Christ gives the name to them not without justice. But they are those who on the whole have continued in the true doctrine; and, still more, have not merely the knowledge of Christ, but also a waiting and preparation for him in its beginning; who have also lamps burning with the oil of the Spirit, an inner life kindled from above. One may work diligently as a servant or maid in the field and at the mill, without the perverseness of the evil servant, and yet not even be a foolish virgin: this name always signifies much, although of course it does not apply to the foolish ones in the entire unmixed emphasis with which it is used in Rev. xiv. 4. The article (καὶ αἱ πέντε μωραί) now, in the first instance, brings forward these foolish ones as a warning principal figure in the parable: but it is meant thereby, at the same time to say: Even of the ten virgins there were only five wise, the other five were, also, all foolish! Whether in this equal number a precisely corresponding truth is to be sought is a question to which we venture, with Pfenninger, to answer: "One would almost think so."

Verses 3, 4. That the λαμπάδες do not signify "lamps," as we are accustomed to understand the term, but the ancient torches, chiefly marriage torches, which at the same time were lamps,* we indeed believe; although we do not hold it to be decided or important. At all events we admit that Winer is right in maintaining that Jahn unjustly applies to our parable the later custom of bearing wooden staves with a vessel of oil above. And what is very important, the ἀγγεῖα, "vessels," are certainly not these bowls of oil which were on the torches themselves; but (as the parallel αὐτῶν, of the vessels and lamps, and the μετά shows) a special supply by way of precaution, so as to be able to fill again: to erase this from the picture, is to take away the principal feature. The virgins have all not merely lamps, all too have oil in their lamps, so that these burn for the present. Consequently, the ancient interpretation (combated by Calvin) which finds here only the empty appearance; as well as the ordinary preaching, founded upon that interpretation, concerning dead faith, lamps without oil, or even without flame, is a perversion of this text, and passes by the warning of Christ, which reaches much deeper.* Again: foolish virgins are not hypocrites or false Christians, who have the form of godliness altogether without the substance —not "such as carry in their hands only the hollow, dry vessel of their selfishness." For, their lamps also burn; nay they burn long, even to the last late moment; and were therefore perhaps at first so copiously filled that, for this reason, no further stock seemed to be necessary. They thought, "It burns at first, and that clearly enough; so that it will certainly suffice." Here lies the critical point of difference, and no where else; Calvin hits the point when he says: "In eo vertitur summa parabolæ, quod non satis est ad officium semel accinctos fuisse et paratos, nisi ad finem usque duremus." (Compare in general Luke xiii. 24.) What are the lamps? The hearts that are turned towards, prepared for, awaiting the heavenly treasure, the joyful supper, the king of the feast, the Bridegroom. They burn with the flame of spiritual life, illuminated and kindled by God. Oil also is not altogether wanting to the foolish virgins; their lamps have rather such an abundant measure of it that they have become secure: according to the general symbology of the Scripture, this is the Holy Spirit who nourishes the flame of life in the heart, which without him holds merely a dry, extinguished wick in the bowl. And now, what are the special vessels in addition; and the supply of oil in them over and above what consumes itself in the lamp, from one moment to the other? We may speak of this with all kinds of words, if we only mean, understand, and hold the secret thing which it is hard to put into words. Von Meyer's note, "Understand here the right measure of faith, the inward anointing of the Spirit, the true wisdom" —is, we think, so far right; but not the further antithesis, "as opposed to outward ecclesiastical or moral character," etc. For the lamp of the foolish virgins, which burns even to the last, is more than this outward character; thus the warning would fail to hit precisely those who are warned, who joyfully say, My lamp burns indeed most brightly! If the lamp is my heart, as before said, then the vessel containing the additional supply is my whole remaining personality, body, soul, and spirit (2 Cor. iv. 7), which also must be well furnished with oil, sanctified throughout; in order that from thence a constant influx may come into the weak heart, in which the oil burns itself away by the flame. The taking the oil with them in the vessels, prudently collecting it and laying it up, corresponds in a certain measure to the faithful trading and making profit on the part of the servants afterwards, as oil and flame are what is given by the Lord; those and those only take oil with them who allow more to be given to them ever anew in addition to, and besides, that which they have; who watch so that their flame may not go out, so as to give diligence to make their calling and election sure (2 Pet. i. 10). Their lamp goes not out even during the night (Prov. xxxi. 18). The five wise virgins, in the simplicity which did not thus severely test their companions, have not known and admonished the foolish ones; but the coming of the Lord will discover them, and put them to shame. "We must call it virgin folly, folly of the children of light in their generation, when believing souls let themselves be satisfied with the first tasting of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come; when they deem it sufficient to possess within them some light, and some fire of love for to-day, but are regardless of more abundant gain, in order to the strengthening and growth of their inward man" (Feldhoff).

* So that the bowl of oil with the wick was somehow fastened to the stick above.

* As in a certain sermon, for example, it is expressed thus: "Who carry the lamp of Christianity in their hands, but the light is wanting!" So Lossel's Fisher (1845, No. 47) says against the text: "They have only the dry lamp!" In that case Christ would certainly not have put five against five, or ten against ten. We cannot understand how Jul. Müller (Deutsche Zeitschr. 1850, p. 32) can think the ancient interpretation, that the burning lamps without a supply of oil are the "outward profession," to be "more natural." Assuredly, the lamps are not merely "forms of faith"—these virgins of the Bridegroom are not merely "dead members of the Church, destitute of the Spirit," as even Lange enigmatically maintains.

Verses 5–7. That the bridegroom will delay, and let himself be waited for longer than was at first thought, Christ now says openly, as in chap. xxiv. 48 he had already hinted at this; the error of the virgins now, however, was the opposite of the thoughts of that evil servant. He thought, My lord cometh not for a long time yet! But these, The bridegroom will certainly not let us wait long for him! Thus those who expected him too soon, and those who expected him too late, fall both into a nearly similar fate, when now he comes to both unexpectedly.* They were wrong in their calculation; he remained away when the lamps burned most brightly, and when every footstep was joyfully listened to: this, alas! had an ill effect upon the entire Church of the faithful, and yet was necessary as a trial in order to their separation. They all became drowsy, all even actually slept, not excepting the wise; that is indeed the true midnight, when those also who should be watching are asleep. Wesley in vain tries to escape by the false rendering: they were all "easy and quiet," the wise enjoyed a true, the foolish a false peace! True, if it were said—The one part slept through carelessness, the other through confidence in their preparation—there lies in this a truth, but yet the sleeping of the wise virgins remains a weakness. "This is the last trial of the virgins, in which they could not stand of themselves. Yet we see that the wise virgins are kept also during their slumbering, and their oil-vessels no one dare take from them; Christ watches over them with his compassion, the keeper of Israel slumbers not nor sleeps" (Von Meyer). Their weakness is not judged so as to make them ashamed; for "there certainly remains a difference between the sleep of the wise, and that of the foolish virgins"—as Lisco says, and Cant. v. 2 shadows forth. Rightly and simply the Berlenburg Bibie says: "They were also not without nature. But they knew that a drowsiness was in their nature, and therefore provided themselves well with oil, so that all notwithstanding would be ready; just as people are wont in the night to keep the tinder-box and every thing in readiness, whereby they may at once strike a light." They had perhaps, just before, paid attention to their lamps, and given them a copious supply of oil (which almost follows from ver. 9, where their vessels also have no more left); while the foolish, already carelessly slumbering, no longer observed the good example of the wise, so as to be reminded of their duty. Therefore the readiness of the wise virgins is reckoned to them as an entire watching, notwithstanding the intervening slumber; for a man watches as much as he can when he has made provision for the possibility of his sleeping.

He who comes as a thief, comes at the same time as the bridegroom; ever in the night, at an hour when one thinks not. But whence now is the cry of his coming (comp. in another reference, 1 Thess. iv. 16), since all are asleep? Christ here actually hints that, although the general predominating state may be called a sleeping, he will yet graciously see to there being individual watchers on the walls of Jerusalem (Isa. lxii. 5–7), who sleep not. It will not suffice to understand merely "the Holy Ghost;" because he must still have human heralds. This voice says plainly, The Bridegroom! and that with a Behold! before he actually cometh, ver. 10.* Upon this awakening call the virgins again all rise up, there is a great general commotion among all "believers;" they even all trim their lamps, every one as well as he can.† The foolish, therefore, begin again to become wise; they were never deficient in the knowledge how the Bridegroom is to be received, and the will is present with them—ah, how gladly would they be in the same case with the others! But the cleaning of the wick alone‡ will not avail, if at the decisive hour there begins to be a want of oil.

Verses 8, 9. How sad at this hour to hear, in common with the others, as a virgin called and come thus far to meet the Bridegroom, that now the Bridegroom comes—to arise with

* Zeller: The delay was not objective. it was no delay on the part of the Bridegroom, who wisely allows the night of judgments to come beforehand; it was only subjectively, in the opinion of the virgins, a delay. How are the pleasant and speedy expectations of marriage then deceived!

* We have already before expressed our opinion as to how far Olshausen is justified in calling to mind here the Συρφορός, Mark xiii. 34.

† The rest of the world and pseudo-Christendom sleep quietly on.

‡ Or, besides, "arranging the garlands around the lamps," as Braune ingeniously adds.

them in the first moment of joy, when every door flies open—to take the yet burning lamp in good confidence, to begin to trim it for the festal reception—and now, even now in the moment which is to bring the fruit and reward of all the previous waiting and preparing, suddenly to perceive with horror that the lamp is gone out! Yes, if the Lord would but come at once to fetch us, when our lamp is first lighted, when the first love burns most brightly and ardently! But he will delay, and then surprise us. Now, thou prayest fervently, O my soul; be not weary, so that he may find thee watching and praying! Now, the flame burns; but consider that the good oil also is thereby being consumed, and have a care for the supply, that thou mayest have when it is needed. What is necessary is not merely at the outset to love his appearing, and afterwards to be content; but wait and hasten with all earnestness to meet his coming. The decisive moment at the last (ver. 8) makes the great want manifest, the ground of which was already present in the folly from the first. Then, indeed, in the extremity, one lays hold on his next neighbor, and entreats him: Help me in with you, give me somewhat of your excellent preparation! But, then, no soul can communicate to another; none can have more than it needs for itself, to stand with its entire preparation. "There might not be enough for us and you"—or μήποτε, אוּלַי, lest it may not be sufficient—understand before, "We can give nothing!" The wise are at once wakened up, are again truly wise, so as, with good intention, and in true zeal, to avoid all delay.* They direct them rather to the traders or sellers of oil, if they may yet find time for this. Is this an idle feature in the picture, and without significance? Hardly so, and just because it comes thus strikingly into prominence. Is it a well-meant but false advice, which is here put by Christ into the mouth of the wise virgins?† This also contradicts our feeling—still more, however, to suppose, that it was a mockery of the poor foolish ones from the mouth of their modest loving associates, as even Luther says: Thus must it happen, "Justi ridebunt in interitu impiorum"—or more gently with Calvin: "Non admonitio est sed exprobratio. Fuit antehac emendi tempus, quod a vobis negligi non orpotuit." This is, indeed, alas! implied, except that those who give the counsel do not precisely thus mean it. At all events that remains true which Calvin also goes on to say: "Prostabat enim tunc oleum venale;" i. e., there were and are actually traders from whom this oil may be had. According to Rev. iii. 18 we can buy pure gold, white raiment, eye-salve, all that we require for Christ, only from Christ himself; the sellers here must therefore indeed be his servants, whom he has appointed for this, only not exactly as Olshausen strangely enough expresses it—"the holy Scripture and its authors." We say, instead of this: Prophets and apostles, witnesses and stewards of God, in the most general sense. (Comp. Rev. xi. 4, according to Zech. iv. 11–14.) We understand our Lord as meaning, by this feature of the picture, these two things: first, for the time of preparation, to direct to the "hearing and learning and receiving, through the ordinary means and persons" (according to Zeller);* then, however, to give the warning that at last to take this course will be very uncertain, if not impossible. Just as before there were watchers, although all slept, so now there are sellers, although as a rule no one can any longer give to another.†

Verses 10—12. Here lie hid, in general, prophetic hints which the future alone will unseal. The time of the marriage is denoted in Rev. xix. 6–9. The foolish virgins have become wise, and actually go thence to buy; the best and only thing they can do, certainly better than with lamp extinguished to go to meet the bridegroom. But it is too late; not an hour, not a minute does the coming one now wait for those who had had time enough for preparation. So the words appear to run. If, however, we read quite exactly, it is only said, And they that were ready went in with him—so in like manner, only, At last came also the other virgins—they are not said to be five in number, nay, the rejected ones are not even now any longer called foolish, because they went to buy oil. There remains, therefore, a slight, very concealed, hope that one, perhaps, of the foolish virgins had recovered in time what was neglected;‡ upon this, however, no one is to rely, for the coming too late after the door has been shut is fearful enough. This sentence is expressed in words which are meant to bring to mind the Sermon on the Mount, yet it is not the same. The saying

* "Had the wise virgins watched"—says Meyer well—"they might perhaps have been able to give a supply to the others." Namely, in the time before, instead of sleeping; but then the foolish must likewise, in order to this, have been watchful and wise.

† "Why do they not cry to the Bridegroom? Why do they run to men for oil?" So preaches Luther on this, and compares Luke xvi. 24 the crying to Abraham, but he forgets that it is here not a folly of the foolish but a counsel of the wise.

* We are not inclined, however, to find in this feature of the parable an argument for a special, nay even a paid, office of teacher in the Church (as Alford).

† But—buy in good time for another reason. Before the coming of the Lord "the right good lamp oil becomes very rare, the illuminati have confiscated it for their phosphorus" (Stilling's Heimweh, iv. 438). Similarly Zeller speaks of the gaslights of illumination and enlightenment set up from beneath, which lead many to mistake the night for the clear day; persons thus misled, however, are outside of the parable.

‡ One may certainly (as Zeller) understand this form of expression only to the effect that it is meant to indicate, how it was not their wisdom but their readiness that brought them in. This, however, is not enough, because in the entire passage wise and ready are reckoned the same.

Lord, Lord, of the virgins it not so bad as that which we find there; for here they entreat humbly, there they adjure in an insolent question. Also the answer I know you not! is evidently milder than I never knew you! which indeed cannot be said to the virgins who at one time were ready. Therefore also they are far from receiving the curse which follows afterwards at ver. 41; not even a sentence such as the servant, ver. 30, or chap. xxiv. 51. They are left behind, and are come too late, only for this time; which must certainly be always a source of sorrow to those who already waited for the Bridegroom. When Stilling says: "I think the Bridegroom will let himself be entreated when once the sun shines over all hills"—we agree with him so far as to think that a further hope as regards the last end must remain for awakened and pardoned ones, who are not entirely fallen away; but protest against the error which means still more than this, and which betrays itself behind the expression, "all hills;" for chap. xxv. 46 is the last decision, after which no sunbeam any longer remains behind the hill. We are also at one with Feldhoff* in this, that Luke xiii. 25–28 is something different; when the householder is arisen (not as Luke xii. 36), and the evil-doers come not into the kingdom of God. All these discourses of Christ, sounding so much alike that they insensibly mix with each other, are yet characterized by well-weighed differences, which a true prophetic theology may forecast, and which the fulfillment will clearly demonstrate. Only we ought preliminarily to read and acknowledge so much, namely, that the coming of the Bridegroom, the Lord of the servants, is not yet the last advent of the Judge.

THIRD PARABLE: THE FAITHFUL SERVANTS.

(Matt. xxv. 14–30, [Luke xix. 12–27.])

We preachers, almost all of us, do not enough imitate in our office the highest wisdom of our Master; but are too indolent or too fastidious to learn from his Spirit the use of "coelestium similitudines ex humanis," in order to our preaching by parable to the people. Many pay their tribute, indeed, to the recorded parables of the Master, but do not themselves venture a step further on this way; many think they have nothing better to do with these parables than to distil them into a purely abstract essence, in order that they may become worthy of the pulpit. We, ought, indeed, to interpret them for ourselves and others, with a distinct "that is" for the principal features in them—this our Master also teaches us; but then, it requires the experience obtained through his Spirit to show how parable and interpretation together open up a sphere of inexhaustible meaning, of never finished application. Such is the wondrous nature of the parable concerning the kingdom of heaven, which Christ has drawn forth into light from the recesses of nature, and the secrets of human life, precisely where the common eye sees only what is vulgar and common-place.

What is more common-place than the trafficing and acquiring gain in human commerce, corresponding to the sowing and reaping in nature (see here ver. 24), the making money, which is to so many the sole impelling principle of life? Christ does not shrink from the contamination which avarice, selfishness, and sin had, even at that time, made to cleave to this; he is not thereby deterred, but rather induced, to place in opposition to this earthly prudence and faithfulness his heavenly counsel, Γίνεσθε καλοὶ τραπεζῖται (be ye good merchants). Already in Luke xix. he had spoken a similar parable; but so far are we from the opinion that Christ can have spoken this only once, either here or there, that we rather think he had already spoken before, in Luke xix. 12, 13, the saying which he here repeats shortly before his departure. As in that place the parable is strictly connected with the context, ver. 11 and ver. 28, so here it stands in the same close connection, in order to explain the prophetical εὐθέως, immediately, chap. xxiv. 29, by a subsequent μετὰ χρόνον πολύν, after a long time (ver. 19). Those features which are added in the first representation by Luke—in particular the side glance, there interwoven and here omitted, at the judgment on the citizens who would not have him to reign over them—we shall leave to our interpretation of that Evangelist. At present we only consider what, as an explanatory parallel, immediately belongs to the second representation.

Verses 14, 15. There is something wanting here to correspond to the ὥσπερ, as; and many, according to chap. xxiv. 37, would supply οὕτως ἔσται ἡ παρουσία τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, so shall the coming of the Son of Man be—but this goes too far back. The English Bible more correctly puts: "For the kingdom of heaven is as a man," etc., for the γάρ, for, points first of all to ver. 1, and, by the connecting link in ver. 13, places the faithful servants immediately parallel with the wise virgins. Therefore it is to be read thus: For the kingdom of heaven is then further—to represent it by another figure—like unto the servants of a lord, with whom it happened thus. These servants are, therefore, now no longer chiefly such as are placed over churches, as in chap. xxiv. 45; but actually every individual to whom, on his part, something is entrusted and committed, out of the gift and grace of Christ. These are his goods, the spiritual gifts and possessions of grace purchased by him for his people, and left behind at his departure. They are not the earthly possessions of the householder, Luke xvi. 1, which indeed also require faithful management (and in so far are reckoned also to them as servants); nor are they yet the πάντα τὰ ὑπάρχοντα, "all his goods," already spoken of in chap. xxiv. 47. but the small first-fruits of these, as a test of faithfulness, in order to the recompense of the whole. It is his property, legitimately acquired and only distributed by him; and the servants, whom he calls with the evangelical calling into his kingdom and its service, are thereby already pre-supposed to be his own servants, i. e., who have become his in faith (in contradistinction to the citizens in Luke who would not). The departure also of the Saviour, after his first manifestation, entirely corresponds to the departure of God at the beginning of the old covenant, chap. xxi. 33; for, "divine providence, after it has organized a new plan of life, lent out new capital, is always followed by an ἀποδημεῖν, or "going into a far country," in order to a trial how men will make use of it—the instructive revelation is followed by a quite as instructive silence.* This is the delivering of the goods of the Lord to the free disposal of his servants (although, of course, they are not entirely left to themselves); because he will one day have in his kingdom only such as are free, and have become worthy. As the servants have become his servants through grace, he has thus a further right to require faithful and active service from them; for it is only his capital that can and is to bear interest in their hands. He calls them all to this work: τοὺς ἰδίους δούλους, "his own servants," is here equivalent to the number ten in Luke (as in the virgins). There is no one left out who receives nothing; for in that case the right to the servants would be taken from him. When prominence is given to the difference in the gift by five, two, and one, this is in perfect harmony with the former equality of the ten pounds for the ten servants; they are only two sides of the same thing. In relation to, and comparison with, others, each one receives a special measure of the gift of Christ, of the calling as an office-bearer or a private member to a greater or less measure of active work for the kingdom; but every one, considered by himself, receives equally the same, just as one who has only half the strength of another bears as much, in his half-burden, as that other with his double strength and his double load. This equal distribution, which is removed from all caprice, and is rather righteous in the seeming difference, is evidently denoted in the clause which is added, and which points deeply into the secrets of the divine dispensation, ἑκάστῳ κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν δύναμιν, "to each one according to his several ability;" where the ἰδίαν, several, by way of gracious acknowledgment, stands opposed to the foregoing ἰδίους, own, in order to teach that this Lord, who willingly gives to each one as much as he can receive, not merely knows his servants, but also certainly assigns to them neither too much nor too little.

Is there then a co-operating ability of nature in the work of grace; is not every thing only of the ability which God imparts? Thus asks anxiously the man who is zealous for the glory of divine grace;* but his mind ought to be set at rest by remembering (as Pelagius himself knew better than the Pelagians), that the natural power and capacity here pre-supposed in the servants, and brought with them to the service of their Lord, is already a first gift of grace from the Creator, and no merit. For no one has created and made himself such as he is. But that the χαρίσματα or spiritual "gifts," are, as a rule (perhaps actually in every case, even where it appears to be otherwise), exactly and justly proportioned to the natural capacity, to the individuality and character of each person; that, if not every gift, entirely in equal degree and without exception, yet generally the gift "is transmuted from a spiritual talent of nature into a spiritual talent of the kingdom" (according to Lange's expression)—is the great truth which our Lord here utters, not more and not less.†

Verses 16—18. But now, alas! the freedom of man, in faithfulness or unfaithfulness, brings yet another difference, which is willed neither by the Creator nor by the restoring Redeemer. Occupy till I come! This word, which was before distinctly expressed in Luke xix. 13, although not expressed here, was as evidently implied in the παρέδωκεν, committed, as, in chap. xxi. 33, it was implied in the ἐξέδοτο, let out, that the householder will have fruit from his vineyard. (The ἐργάζεσθαι here used signifies also in Greek, negoatiari, πραγματεύεσθαι; yet it is selected on purpose, as a more general expression, to indicate the activity and labor belonging thereto.) In proportion to the gift received stands also the measure of profit acquired; this is the rule and principle of judgment before the righteous Lord, beyond which he asks and expects nothing (Luke xii. 48). Therefore the parable here abides by this; while before, the different degrees of faithfulness were denoted, according to which the same pound gained in the one case ten, in the other five pounds. In this, however, was denoted not merely the faithfulness, but different success lying in the outward circumstances. (Ἐποίησε is equivalent to ἐκέρδησε—not merely a Latinism, pecuniam conficere, as Erasmus here puts it, but, in perfect conformity with the Greek language, a word taken from the analogy of fruit-bearing with every other produce.) We are of course not at liberty to pursue further into specialities the similitude of trading with,

* Beck, Christliche Lehrwissenschaft, i. 345.

* And, to save his theology, has recourse to an exegetical artifice, as Wesley, who refers the δύναμις (against the clause ἑκάστῳ) to the Lord: "according to his own mighty power."

† To infer, with Braune, that the talents are therefore not inward gifts, but "spheres of labor" of different extent, is certainly false, and can be carried out only very artificially. The sphere of labor is indeed to be considered as belonging thereto; but in itself this is no gift, no intrusted possession.

and profitably investing, a capital of money, as will appear from ver. 27. The two faithful servants are, notwithstanding their different capital and interest, equally faithful; they both double what they have received, which is meant to be denoted, by ὡσαύτως καί (likewise also) and καὶ αὐτός (he likewise), as emphatically as possible for him who has less so that no one may hold him in less esteem on that account. How are our hasty judgments (1 Cor. iv. 2, 5) here rebuked, when we measure the fruit without knowing how much God has sown in nature and grace! He, however, who brings no fruit at all, is certainly to be found fault with and warned. If the one talent gains only one more, the Lord will be alike satisfied with it; but he will have his own again with interest, since it was for this he gave it. All the intermediate cases in which five talents received gain only two, on the contrary, two gain five, or perhaps even one five, while five bring nothing at all—these are not in any way denied by the parable, which only selects from among them the examples most significant for the present purpose. Lord, thou hast given me nothing at all—this can no one say to him, who yet claims to belong to his servants. But so little, that it was not worth the trouble to attempt any thing with it, so that thou canst only ask back that is thine—this is, alas! that frequent excuse of indolence which is meant to be refuted by the example here selected for the purpose.

This evil servant is again a counterpart to that foregoing one: there it was positive evil-doing; here only an indolent not-doing, which is rather parallel to the idleness and carelessness of the virgins. Yet there is also implied in this—and it was not otherwise possible, seeing that the gift of grace was there—a positive spoiling and throwing away of that gift, by which feature the parable of the virgins is supplemented. It would be treating this servant too harshly to regard him as one who has entirely fallen away; this he is not, so long as he still possesses the talent. But it is dealing too favorably with him, and giving more credit to his own false word, ver. 25, than the Searcher of hearts who does not give credit to it (but, false as it is, applies it in a better sense), when he is described merely as a timid character, who had avoided entering into buisness with a view to gain, who, in false humility, had trusted himself too little. The judgment passed upon him by the Lord, ver. 26, gives him his true distinctive name which comprehends all his guilt, Thou slothful servant! It is, indeed, implied in this that the slothful one shuns exertion (Prov. xxii. 13, xx. 4)—but the spiritually slothful finds occasion for labor enough safely to keep, as he thinks, the talent which admonishes to activity. He imagines and persuades himself that he will at least secure it against loss and theft; but in reality he hides it from his own eyes, when he puts it into the earth, and thereby himself commits a theft on his Lord's money, the increase of which he owed as an obligation to his Master. The ἀπελθών, departed ("went") which stands opposed to the πορευθείς, "went;" and still more the burying of the talent, cost him as much trouble, if not more;* since there is required for this an evil, sullen labor to keep himself in idleness, in opposition to the impulse of the Spirit. The Deutsche Theologie calls this "hoarding up the merit of Christ"—and in those who do so the grace of God has been received in vain (1 Cor. xv. 10). The burying in the earth, whereby Chrysostom too fancifully understands the heart, which is earth and ashes, is first of all a proverbial expression in the parable (according to Sir. xxix. 13, xx. 30, as we also find the expression, defosso auro incubare); then it may also denote the sinking of the idle one into an earthly mind and course of conduct. As in Luke, the σουδάριον or "napkin" at all events might slightly indicate (what Gossner and Richter, following the Berlenburg Bible, remarks), that shunning the sweat of labor, he knew of no other and better use to make of his napkin.†

Verses 19—23. As surely as the prophetic glance of Christ, immediately after this parable, stretches far beyond to the last day properly speaking, ver. 31, so surely in these intervening parables, from the χρονίζειν, chap. xxiv. 48 onwards, does it extend at least to a coming which reaches far beyond the destruction of Jerusalem; and it is now no longer a "coming again at the time of the apostles" that is spoken of, although the apostles are included as the first representatives of his gifted servants. (Μετὰ χρόνον πολύν, as already said, is an evident explanation of that first prophetical εὐθέως.) The coming one remains the Lord of all these servants, of the unfaithful as well as the faithful; and in the case of the latter will show himself as Lord in the reckoning. What is said by the servants to the Lord, although here figuratively represented, will yet be found, when they appear and are made manifest, to correspond to the thoughts of their heart. The good servants who (as also afterwards before the King's throne) first receive their judgment and commendation, can present themselves before their Lord with a frank and joyous confidence: See (not merely ἴδου but ἴδε). They have in his presence a clear consciousness of the measure of what was received at first, and what was further gained, of the difference and relation between the two. I have therewith gained other five talents! thus does Luther render it according to the parallel in Luke, where the faithful servants humbly ascribe the gain to the gift of Christ: Thy pound has gained or borne ten, five pounds. (So 1 Cor. xv. 10; not I but the grace of God.) Yet ἐπ' αὐτοῖς here signifies in the first place not per ea, as Erasmus, but in addition to them, as increase and produce; Vulg. more correctly: superlucratus sum—comp. in Luke προσειρ. γάσατο. The same sense, however, lies indeed already in the grateful acknowledgment: Thou deliveredst unto me five, two talents, i. e., this thy capital has thus increased in my hand and management. The faithful one now receives a gracious commendation, inasmuch as the Lord kindly reckons again to him as merit, what the servant ascribed only to the gift of his Lord: this is precisely what is just and right in the account and reckoning between God and men. With a foregoing Εὖ (Well done!) breaking forth from the heart of the satisfied, nay, delighted Lord, the servant receives the honorable name of a good and faithful servant; now even more fully than chap. xxiv. 45, 48.* Before this rich Lord even five talents (at that time a large sum) are held but little, in proportion to the yet remaining abundance of all his goods. (In Luke ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ; because the capital of each one was denoted as a small tithe, small indeed, yet not to be despised when with diligence it is profitably employed.) He is now set over many things by way of recompense: this is not quite the same with that setting over all his goods in which, at chap. xxiv. 47, there was already an anticipation of the last end; for the cities which correspond to it in Luke, are still more or less according to the gain acquired, they lie in the same country and kingdom as the αἰώνιαι σκηναί or "everlasting habitations" (Luke xvi. 9.) It is a continued and exalted activity, a dominion fraught with blessing in the millennial kingdom, that is here spoken of; but it is another kind of labor and exertion from that hitherto, namely, a joy. And it is the joy of the Lord, i. e., not merely the joy "prepared, destined for thee by the Lord"—but precisely his joy, that which he first achieved for himself (Heb. xii. 2), which consists chiefly in the joy in his redeemed and faithful ones, his delight to communicate to them all that himself has, nay, at last to adjudge to them also all his grace which others have despised. The faithful servant enters into the fellowship of the joy of his Lord (comp. John xv. 11). This Lord has distributed the talents, not truly for the sake of the profit and gain, but to try his servants, and that he might make blessed those who are approved; just as in chap. 20 he hired the laborers in order to bestow upon them the reward of their labor. Therefore also do those who were differently endowed, having shown a like faithfulness, receive the same commendation; not, Thou hast gained much! but, Thou hast been faithful over little!* The detailed repetition of the same colloquy is meant finally to show that it will not be tedious to the Lord in his joy to express in full to each one his special commendation; and that to receive this from such lips will be a greater joy to every good servant than all other power and honor.

* Thus wrote Hamann to Lindner: "Save yourselves the trouble of digging, and the expense of a napkin—betake yourselves to the bank of exchange, where we may invest and exchange our talent."

Verses 24, 25. The slothful servant must also at last come forward, but he has no joyous ἴδε, see, for the Lord; before venturing to speak that word in quite another sense, he prefaces it by some very ill-sounding expressions as a vain excuse. What thoughts of his heart now become manifest, so that he must represent himself in sad truth, although in so doing he yet means to deceive himself! They are the equally insolent and pusillanimous, the self-contradictory and judging thoughts of every natural conscience before God; for so far alas! has this servant who had once also received the gift of grace, sunk back through the non-use of that gift. Thou art a hard and severe master—(Luke, αὐστηρός)—this I knew!—More sharply, ἔγνων σε; thus, I knew thee! But why not more: I know it, I know thee? Because he will excuse his former conduct, but not because the friendly judgments which preceded had made him wiser: for he was not yet present when these were pronounced; therefore he still presumes to speak of the good Lord, contrary to the proof which had just been delivered, as of one who unjustly exacts more than can be yielded, and he expresses this in the rudest manner: Who reaps, will reap where he has not sowed, and gather where he has scattered nothing.† Thereby must the evil servant bear testimony with his own mouth to the innermost truth, and the most perfect right, according to which the Lord requires fruit or produce from what he sows or gives—in which idea this last parable of Jesus remarkably harmonizes with the first, Matt. xiii. 3–9. That God demands fruits and works—that he will reap—is the truth which remains in the speech of this evil servant; but that he makes his demand beyond the capacity of sinful man, without first imparting grace—this is the lie with which certainly the slothful man strives, but in vain, continually to deceive himself. "One cannot become so holy as God requires; it is in vain for one to attempt to satisfy his strictness"—this he has said to himself long before, until he comes into disgrace, when at last he must say it also before the face of the good and gracious Lord. I was afraid—this excuse is half true, since Adam (Gen. iii. 10) spoke this word for the first time before the Creator; for, the fear of

* Meyer. indeed, would construe this εὖ adverbially with the ἦς πιστός; but this sounds strange. It is certainly an interjection of the pleased and warmly commending Lord—in one little word of his mouth the highest reward! Therefore as else where εὖγε, so also μαλ' εὖ and simple εὖ thus occurs.

* "Not good and successful servant, but good and faithful," as a missionary speaker in London once expressed it.

† We do not think that διασκορπίζειν here is to winnow; but, comparing with Luke, take it as simply synonymous: to scatter seed.

the evil conscience is actually the reason of the slothfulness in what is good, just as the joyful confidence in grace is the ground of all santification. Yet this excuse is, at the same time, half false, and already a self-judgment out of his own mouth. For (as Lisco very aptly observes), the pretended fear and this impudent speech, as if the Lord were unjust, agree but ill together; a true, and thoroughly honest, fear of the strict reckoning would not have remained idle, as we shall immediately perceive. The servant must also himself at last entirely refute his own words, inasmuch as the talent which had been delivered also to him comes to light. Lo, there hast thou, or thou hast that is thine! A counterpart to the word of the householder, chap. xx. 14, which has almost no other sense than the timorously insolent, confused application: I have stolen nothing from it, only be satisfied with it—thou wouldst certainly rather not have given me it; take it now, and let me have nothing further to do with what is thine! In fact this evil servant has never actually appropriated to himself the gift of grace; he has, as much as in him lay, thrust it from him, through non-use; and yet he has received it, and this is the ground of his sentence. (In his case it is εἴληφώς, with emphasis upon the past; in that of the others it is λαβών, of the continued taking and keeping.)

Verses 26, 27. He has judged himself, as is said in Luke xix. Thou evil and slothful servant!* That is the true reason of thy conduct, even if with the greatest mildness I allow to be true what thou sayest and take thee at thy word—more mildly I cannot judge thee! Even the fear of my hardness should at least have had some effect, if thou hadst been thoroughly in earnest. The Lord convicts him of a complete contradiction in the speech which mixes truth with falsehood; and forcibly takes away from him the false Ergo. Knewest thou actually that I would reap where I have not sowed? Then must thou have made what I have sowed in thee at least as fruitful as possible! Have I sowed nothing in thee? Is the talent which thou thyself now producest to me nothing? (Even five talents were little before; but a single talent is much when viewed as the means of obtaining a like reward by the faithful employment of it.) Yea, thou shouldst rather in thy fear have been more zealous than the others; or—if I would exact even the smallest thing—thou shouldst at least have given what was entrusted to thee to the exchangers, if thou thyself hadst no active hand and inclination to employ it! This alone appears to us the simple sense of such a direction: thou hadst at all events open and easy opportunity to do something with it, instead of burying it. For the rest, we are not at liberty to ask here who are the exchangers; they belong to the metaphor of doing business with money, and Olshausen seems to us to go too far, when he speaks of "more timid natures, who are not fitted for independent labor, joining themselves to stronger persons." This servant is by no means merely a timid person; besides, to make a profitable use of grace by means of others, without one's own labor, is in itself an impossible representation. The Lord therefore cannot mean thus; for he sanctions and acknowledges the putting of the talent into the public bank (joining societies, and other acts corresponding to the figure) only when in this there has been faithfulness and activity on one's own part. This he will, and must, require; and it is only as a proof of this that he requires the usury, τόκος (what the capital has produced or borne in interest), without which he does not take back his own when offered to him. If he speaks thus to the servant who has remained idle, half in fear, half in presumption—what will he say to those whose excuse might run thus: I knew that thou art a compassionate, most indulgent and kind man! Fundamentally only the same thing, with a different turn: Didst thou really know this, then my great love must have awakened reciprocal love in thy heart, and therefore impelled thee to a zealous gratitude and faithfulness, nothing of which I find in thee!

Verses 28–30. Behold how the judging Lord comes as a thief, as a taker away—not merely upon those who dwell on the earth in their houses built of sand, to teach them by experience, what they would not believe, that all their possessions are empty and transient—but also upon the unfaithful ones in his kingdom; the foolish virgins, however, less than the wicked servants. From those virgins who were left outside the door nothing was taken; for their lamps were burning again, when they knocked too late. They have therefore a stronger hope as regards the final end, if in the interval they shall have thoroughly made amends for their present carelessness; but the unprofitable servant who is of no use to the Lord in his kingdom, just as the one before who beat his fellow-servants and rioted, just as he who was found without the garment, is at once cast into outer darkness, while the diligent ones enter into the bright marriage-room and mansion of joy. Into this prison of pain he cannot, of course, take with him his Lord's talent of grace, so long despised by him, laid aside as useless, only thus hardly kept for the reckoning; it is taken from him, and, notwithstanding the objection against this startling command of the Lord, even by those who are to execute it (Luke xix. 25), given to him who already has most. Here, in the first place, we see again that the Lord desired the gain, not for his own reaping or gathering; that so far also the diligent servants are in nothing profitable to him, in that other sense of the word in Luke xvii. 10; Job xxii. 2, 3. Then there appears here, again, at the end of the parables, the great fundamental principle of God's kingdom and house, which,

* Πονηρὲ καὶ ὀκνηρέ—an accidental assonance from which Schleiermacher inferred that the discourse was spoken originally in Greek, probably in Galilee. One may thus be over-fine.

in Matt. xiii. 12, marked their beginning;* this is of great significance, and indicates that as well the first as the last giving and taking on the part of the Lord proceeds according to the same rule. In Matt. chap. xiii., we reserved for this place the full development of this saying of the highest justice, which sounds contradictory and unjust; but there is properly nothing now to be explained; as the entire parable has already furnished the explanation. Von Meyer's note at that place, "Whosoever hath, in which every thing depends only on the desiring to have, not despising and well using"—is, indeed, true as regards the sense; the expression, however, does not quite satisfy us, and we would rather denote the three decisive ideas which it implies thus: the being able to receive, holding fast, and using well. The first giving, distributing and sowing of the Lord is done, it is true, in the way of a general offer, but can only become actual giving, when it meets a receiving in the hearts of men, or the field: this is the first having on our side, the capacity to receive in faith. The unbelief of the unsusceptible, is indeed—inasmuch as the Lord still offers—a not willing (that this one should reign over us, should give his gifts to us!), but precisely therein the not being able, which the gift of grace removes. Only the servants who had come when the Lord called: Come unto me, whosoever will belong to me, and serve me! who, therefore, had already an obedience of faith, an open and outstretched hand for the gift, received then something for further management. Thus the slothful servant was at the first also one who had; although perhaps that he received so little may have lain in his inferior δύναμις or "ability" (with a new sense of that first word which, however, is not the sole sense for all cases). Now, all depended on the not despising, or holding fast and preserving of what had been received. Was the talent not well enough kept in the hole or in the napkin? No, the slothful servant despised it as "his Lord's money," with which nothing was further to be done; although he had received it, he had yet not truly taken it, and appropriated it to himself: therefore the sentence at last, Take it again from him! only corresponds to the evil word of his own mouth, Thou hast that is thine! In a certain sense, indeed, he had it up to this time; yet this having was no true preserving or keeping, he had only hoarded up the seed dry, instead of letting it bear fruit. Therefore this is finally decisive: Whosoever will rightly hold fast the gifts of the Lord must use them, with diligence and labor, in order to their increase; for this they are, according to their nature, given: keeping and profitably employing are one and the same thing. Works are the nourishment of faith, the diligence of faithful use is the oil for the burning lamp; doing nothing in the strength of grace, and bearing no fruit from its seed, is enough for the judgment which again takes away that which one seemed to have, but in reality had not. Observe here an important limitation of the apostolical saying in Rom. xi. 29, so often one-sidedly misunderstood; for it is clear as the sun that the Lord again takes what he has given, when the receiver does not rightly take hold of and use it. Preliminary judgments according to this principle manifoldly occur even now, so that in the one, the grace which was not carried into work is lost, lost to him even out of the hole in which he had secreted it, as he will find when he feels inclined again to look after it; on the other hand, the grace which has departed from others is, as it were, manifestly given to him who is faithful. What the final state of the case will be, however, in regard to all these things and relations—this only the fulfillment of the prophetic parable and saying will make quite clear; when the Son of Man shall come in his kingdom, to strip many who are accounted children of the light, of the last glimmer which is still in their possession unused, and to turn them quite naked into outer darkness.† "How wretched, how incapable, how dark, how hateful such a man will be, no one can now conceive; because there lives no man upon earth from whom his pound is taken, let him be as bad as he will"—this remark of Roos sounds strange, but it is true when we understand it of the natural gift, which is still always present. See what has been already said on Matthew xiii. 12.

* Again a proof that Matthew has not merely transferred here what was said at an earlier period.

LAST ADVENT: GENERAL AND FINAL JUDGMENT.

(Matt. xxv. 31–46.)

Could Christ have spoken of his coming three times in succession, and that so differently in each instance, if an actually different fulfillment did not correspond to each of his words? First of all, a coming, not personally, but as the lightning, a manifestation in order to judgment, by the eagles gathered to the carcass, when his people have fled; then a visibly personal coming, already with great power and glory, in order to a separating judgment upon his called ones, when the elect are gathered together, and enter into the kingdom; now again a ὅταν δέ (this δέ is not to be overlooked), "but when" and a τότε, "then," certainly still a different one from that at ver. 1, and a last separation of all who are not yet separated, in which his own people appear with him as already justified and not coming into judgment. (Comp. 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, with 2 Thess. i. 7–10; and mark these two things, a promiscuous mingling as regards detail, and yet a perceptible distinction between an intermediate and last coming of the

Lord.) Is then Christ's own prophecy of the last coming also a parable, like the three that precede? Strangely enough, commentators, in other respects intelligent, nay, acute (even Lange), speak of it as such; as if the single expression, "the King," justified this, while every thing else contradicts it! The Son of Man stands quite properly and expressly in the foreground; the angels, the nations, the kingdom, the fire, the devil—all these are not parabolical, and certainly also not the throne of glory, which will be incomparably more real and unfigurative than any that has ever hitherto stood upon earth as a prophetic figure of it. The single parabolical feature in ver. 33, which is introduced by a ὥσπερ, "as," ver. 32 (it is surely not usual to insert in this way one parable into another), is carried out only for a moment, and as was natural, nothing further is said of speaking sheep and goats. Finally, the speaking of those who stand on the right hand and on the left, is easily understood; just as many things which are not to be taken exactly literally, yet quite as little to be taken parabolically. Therefore, "nunc plane et sine figuris." So plane or literally, indeed, that a certain echo of the condescendingly parabolic tone is not to be mistaken, even at the conclusion: thus the world-Judge speaks simply also for children concerning the end just as Moses did of the creation, so that the prophetic mysteries are covered as with a slight veil; but yet, along with this, there are many things, the greatest and most decisive that could be spoken of beforehand to the sons of men by the Son of Man, here openly declared with a calm clearness and dignity, which we cannot enough admire when we think that he spoke all this a day or two before his suffering! Here the condescendingly sublime poetry of the New Testament, in contrast with the prophetical rhetorical flights of the Old Testament, appears in its most striking form.

Verses 31–33. His glory, twice with highest emphasis: this is more than chap. xxiv. 30; for here it is the entire glory of the King upon the throne, of which Rev. xx. 11 speaks. Then, and not till then, will he thus sit and judge as Judge of all the world; as, since Gen. xviii. 25, nay, since Enoch, such a last general day of judgment had been announced and expected. The ἅγιοι, "holy," before the ἄγγελοι, "angels," is certainly to be cancelled; yet as an early opposition (which originally meant others in addition to the angels, until the two words afterwards came together), it is a hint at what is evidently pre-supposed in ver. 40, namely, that the saints, already gathered around him, now encompass the throne of the King with the angels—already belong to his glory (Rev. xix. 14, 8; Jude ver. 14; Zech. xiv. 5—which also is partly fulfilled at the middle Advent). All the angels, all the brethren of the first-born of the kings of the earth (Psa. lxxxix. 28; Rev. i. 5, 6), all nations, i. e., all men, living and dead (Acts x. 42; Rev. xx. 12, 13)—what a scene! First they are gathered—presented in the body before his throne at his almighty call (John v. 28, 29); then all that till now was not yet separated, although already different, is separated with a final definitive separation and decision. While, since chap. xxiv. 31, the fate of the others remained as yet in a certain obscurity, all nations are now evidently placed in antithesis to the elect of his kingdom, to those who were called as virgins or servants, and even already separated: in consequence of mistaking this circumstance, this last judgment was for a long time not rightly understood. Then comes the recompense to every one, κατὰ τὴν πρᾶξιν, according to his works (chap. xvi. 27; Rev. xx. 13). At last appear also before him those who had hitherto been led indirectly by latent unconscious grace without the knowledge of his person; whose Shepherd this King alone not the less was and is. Those who are now accepted of him were already his sheep, as in John x. 16; and he himself personally fulfills in them the word elsewhere committed to his messengers, Behold here is your King, behold here am I! The Son of Man sits upon the throne, again the King is the Shepherd, and easily and safely, as a shepherd upon earth, does he seek out his flock for his kingdom, and separate the sheep from the goats, according to the prophetical word (Ezek. xxxiv. 17), which at that time did not yet extend so far. The sheep are the tractable ones, who were obedient also only to the indirect, concealed, call of grace, to the eternal mercy which taught them mercy; the goats are the refractory, proud, injurious, with allusion to the prophetical usage, as in Isa. xiv. 9, and elsewhere. But not also stinking, wanton, etc., as even Von Meyer would unwarrantably carry out the figure.*

Verses 34–36. As in the parable of the servants, as already in the Sermon on the Mount, chap. vii. 22, so here Christ does not speak of all who are judged in detail, according to the condition and desert of each; but "adduces a test," brings forward two extreme classes, under which all must range themselves, on the right hand or the left: this also is to be well obseved! Here for the first time, Christ designates himself, not parabolically but quite properly, King, as afterward only again before Pilate. The King of all nations now opens the kindom which each one along with the others, and yet entirely for himself, now inherits. His "Come!" is addressed now for the first time also to those who have not openly had, or fully accepted the preaching and invitation, chap. xi. 28; but yet have become equally with the others, and now completely the blessed of his Father. For, in his Father's name and authority, he has led and prepared them by his Spirit; and now also the judgment is com-

* Sepp mentions the he-goat of the great day of atonement as the antithesis to the Paschal lamb, and further notices the Jewish usage, according to which all Goim or gentiles, as children of Edom or Seir (the hairy one), were called goats of the desert, but Jacob the lamb.

mitted unto him by the Father (John v. 22–27). They are already saved from the curse of sin, blessed of the Lord (Gen. xxvi. 29; Psa. xxxvii. 22, cxv. 15; Isa. lxv. 23); and this is now made gloriously manifest. For them also is the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world, which however (here equivalent to πρὸ καταβολῆς, John xvii. 24; 1 Pet. i. 20), designedly goes back only to the creation of the human race. It is now not merely the kingdom of the Son of Man, in which were as yet tares and offence, but the kingdom of the Father, at the same time, however as the completed, manifested, kingdom of Christ, comp. Matt. xiii. 41, 43.* The being blessed, as also the inheriting, excudes all merit, apart from the gift and grace of the Father; the for which follows in connection with the works of mercy, is therefore to be understood accordingly, as an acknowledging manifestation by their acts of the worthiness wrought in them. The King addresses, however, a strange word to them, which they, of course, are not able at once to apprehend: I was the hungry, thirsty, homeless, naked, sick, imprisoned one, to whom ye have shown kindness.†

Verses 37—40. The righteous, now declared to be such by the gracious judgment of the King, actually do not know that they have done such acts of kindness to him; and every interpretation which perverts and misconstrues this their simple confession is false, and does not yet know who these favored righteous ones are. Their humble reply is truly no mere empty phrase of modesty, which would be very unseasonable on such an occasion, before this throne; it is also no forgetfulness of their good works, such as is spoken of at chap. vi. 3,‡ but it is plainly antithetical to the distinct consciousness of grace received and profited which the ἴδε, "behold," of the faithful servants, vers. 20–22, expressed. It is plain from this ἴδε that the disciples of Christ must then know what he means to say to them. Such are evidently not the persons here meant; these righteous ones are clearly distinguished at ver. 40 from "his brethren;" and that not merely "as the bridesmaids from the bride, the servants from the domestics!" The just made perfect, and the Church of the first-born, Heb. xii. 23, are now already around him in glory; they come no more into this judgment (John v. 24; 1 Cor. xi. 31), but now judge the world with him (1 Cor. vi. 2), inasmuch as the conduct towards them as towards their Lord is what decides; but they had already been presented at an intermediate judgment (Rom. xiv. 10), and now receive on this great day their complete crown (2 Tim. iv. 8).* They were once upon earth for the most part poor, wandering, and indigent; there were some of them to be found among all nations, and in them the great King, who actually was and lived in them, went begging, so to speak, incognito, in order to try the rest of men, for the judgment.† Therefore, that the righteous, who are here accepted, had done their good works for the sake of Christ, to serve him—and thus the works were named only as the evidence and effect of faith in his person (to speak with our narrow theology)—so much does this lack of being true, that they actually do not know this, and their ignorance can only express itself in the question, When saw we thee? For, that they have done good to others, who were in need, they know well. We find fault, therefore, with Krummacher's interpretation of this text in his Bremen Sermon.‡ It is the false interpretation which has been current so long, and which rests on the erroneous opinion, still pretty general among believers, that Christ here announces a general judgment upon Christians and heathen; contrary to the express statement at ver. 32. So much remains true, that certainly here also, works are only valuable and decisive as the expression of the inward character and state of the heart; moreover, that a knowledge of the name of Jesus is pre-supposed in the righteous, as in chap. x. 42, xviii. 5; for until the Gospel has been every where preached there is no last judgment. So much is true; not, however, that (according to Neander) a general confession of faith in Christ by all men may here be taken for granted, which would contradict all prophetical theology. The speakers here exemplify the lowest class of those who stand as righteous before the judgment-seat, such as are not yet come to full decision, and yet are prepared for this, to

In ancient times, especially in the East, persons in prison might for the most part be visited; it was no strictly solitary confinement. For the rest, the Catholic Church should not have presumed to increase these six works of bodily mercy (which is also a complete number) to the number seven, by adding the apocryphal one of "burying the dead."

‡ Although even Lange abides by this: These merciful ones are also humble, they do not remember that they had acted as such angels of mercy upon earth!

* We enter our protest here against the entire import of the remarkable essay in Tholuck's Litt. Anz. 1848, Nos. 38, 39 (although it professes to connect itself with our statement): and must emphatically reject all mere Jewish parabolical speaking concerning the last judgment.

† He speaks here certainly only of his brethren, not in any wise of men in general, in so far as there yet lives something of him in every man, as Ullmann (Stud. u. Krtik. 1847, p. 164) very doubtfully, at all events in an exegetical point of view, wrongly maintains.

‡ I, My, to Me, Me, these are the words upon which the emphasis rests here. Jesus was the life of these people, on his account they did this or that, etc.

whose humility the others (although with more distinct consciousness) willingly and becomingly join themselves; of these, however, actually holds true what Von Meyer's note says, as indicating the only right interpretation, "Wherever there exists a preponderating love to mankind, there is grace yet possible." We say, in addition: There already was the preparing, blessing grace, the love of the Father, out of which the love that covers a multitude of sins (1 Pet. iv. 8) has proceeded; the mercy of the not personally known Shepherd and King, which alone could make them merciful (Matt. v. 7); the faith that sanctifies and saves; the faithfulness which is tractable to the leading of God! Again, however, not merely as Braune speaks of the "Christian instinct" of yet undeveloped Christians, in "whom Christianity was an undeveloped power, whose faith did not come the length of saying Lord!" for these righteous are actually in part also such as have hitherto been heathens.* Such also as might not yet be able to say with consciousness and experience, as that converted Hindu: Me, when hungry, Christ has fed; to me when athirst he gave drink, etc.† Thus, at last, does mercy abundantly triumph over judgment (James ii. 13)—only those are cursed into whose hearts nothing at all of the love of God, that draws all nations, had penetrated. That there is not required in all to whom the King will at last entirely reveal himself, a faith in him which has already reached a dogmatical form and expression, is with a solemn protest here certified against our harsh and narrow theology. Let this be duly considered!

Verses 41–43. As the sheep, who now for the first time come to know their Shepherd, are yet as in a last outbeaming of love joined to all his righteous, sanctified, elect ones, as fellow-heirs of the same kingdom—even so, on the other hand, the accursed are actually ripe for the everlasting condemnation, although the deficiency in works of love which is held up before them, not indeed to be viewed outwardly, gives the ground of decision. These two addresses of the King concerning the having done or not done are, as it were, a significant curtain which hides the wondrous depths of the divine guidance of all souls, even to this limit: only read the superscription which truly corresponds with the innermost course and state of the thing, and exercise thyself accordingly in inquiring and explaining what is its meaning in connection with all the teaching of Scripture elsewhere, for to this Christ would here draw us; beware only of bringing in that which would be foreign and contradictory to what is simply said. If the evidence adduced from the works, vers. 35, 36, and 42, 43, leaves unexpressed in the background much that concerns the bottom of the heart, which those who are addressed know and experience as the proper ground of decision, the two sentences, vers. 34–41, are not the less on that account most decisively and plainly declared, so that between those on the right and on the left, any further and third class remains for ever impossible. It is the first and last, the only curse from the mouth of him who was to bless all nations; which irrecoverably falls upon the class here brought forward as a specimen, along with all the cursed and rejected. That they have before heard, and on their part rejected, a "Come unto me," addressed to them in some sufficient way of divine invitation, is so self-evident that the Judge, as the announcer of his judgment, does not need now to say it. The rejection is the same as in chap. vii. 23, at the close of his first discourse; here, however, it stands in a striking, precisely marked antithesis, word for word, with the reception of the righteous. Come—Depart—now even more strongly: from me! Ye blessed—Ye cursed—but not of my Father; for they have themselves chosen the curse which drives them from him, the Son, while the righteous now fully and finally come by the Son to the Father. The kingdom, with all its glory and bliss—the fire, with all its misery! which is prepared for you—which is prepared for the devil and his angels, the partners of his fall; for there is for men no decretum reprobationis, no book of death, no hell of their own, because the blood of Jesus has atoned for them all; only those who would become the devil's obtain at last his portion. The kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world: instead of this it is now—the everlasting fire. For only that which is good is in the counsel and will of God everlasting a parte ante; what is evil, with its torment, only a parte post The hell of the devil who was created as an angel was, no more than his sin, ordained from the creation, but the hell was prepared from the beginning of his sin: for the devil, i. e., since a devil was; comp. Isa. xxx. 33. Only the inheriting of the blessed has no antithesis, and can have no other than that it is omitted for the cursed. For the rest, the fire is the inextinguishable continuation of the great conflagration of the world, which is to break forth from the centre of hell (2 Pet. iii. 7, 12, 13), and which is met by the avenging fire from God out of heaven (Rev. xx. 9); Rev. xx. 10 is here pre-supposed to have already taken place. Were the unfaithful children of light before cast out into a darkness—now a fire receives the children of darkness, which fearfully lights up their darkness. What have they done to deserve this? Certainly as evil-doers much that was evil and only evil; they have certainly also in part hated and persecuted Christ and his followers; at all events they have kicked against his shepherd's staff (as goats), obstinately and completely resisted his gracious leading. All this, however, is not specified; but only the one thing, that in all their doings not even one good work of true love is to be found, which might have showed this resistance to be not complete, on which the love of the gracious Judge that covers many sins might, on account of the love which was yet there, be able to graft a gracious sentence. The exact repetition of the particulars in the address to the rejected (from which those foolish preachers, to whom the sublime is too simple, seek to escape by greater abridgment or variation), indicates the exact care with which the Judge will, in the case of every individual, overlook and omit nothing that specially affects him. With respect, however, finally to the fearful curse, we observe that in it the end of the pontifical office of Christ is clearly expressed: He who after a once offered sacrifice still sat upon the throne, in order, Melchisedek-like, to intercede and bless, has now no intercession-prayer, no blessing more, for the condemned. The first and last curse of his mouth must be an irrevocable one, and he remains the King over all throughout eternity (the לְעוֹלָם however Psa. cx. 4, with its αἰών, is expired). Dan. vii. 14 (Luke i. 33) stands written now also of the priesthood.*

Verses 44, 45. The reply is, as regards the inner sense, the same as in chap. vii. 22, although the persons are different in the two passages; here it is the worst, most hardened class of all the condemned, with whom the others would willingly put in their word, and lyingly protest even in the moment of well-deserved judgment, if they could. Christ will certainly, at the day of judgment, not literally allow the damned "still to speak for themselves" (which strange thing Roos finds here) —so far the literal truth is not to be pressed; but their thoughts are reckoned before him as if they were expressed in words. Many have oppressed and persecuted Christ also in his followers, as Acts ix. 4, instead of letting themselves be taught; all have been goats, as they are called; these here have perhaps done some so-called good works, but not to him, not to God or for God's sake, hence they have had no earnestness and zeal of love, which is always and in every thing like itself, but here and there one of the least of Christ's disciples has been hard-heartedly passed over. This is enough to show how it has stood with them in other things besides these decisive sins of omission. Now every thing is made manifest, now the entire want of any truly good work, of any actual acknowledgment of Christ as concealed in his disciples, alone condemns—the entire not-having of that grace laid open to all (with or without the name of Christ), which has atoned for and covered also the sins of the blessed. Now, however, Christ, also the Son of Man and Shepherd, King and Judge, reveals himself as the centre of all the inner leadings and relations of the human race: Ye did it unto me, ye did it not *to me!

Verse 46. Final fulfillment of John v. 28, 29 (Dan. xii. 2); as the fourth Gospel further lifts the curtain. The eternity of misery is quite as endless as the eternity of life;† after this ἀπελεύσονται, "they shall go away," according to the terms of their sentence, ver. 41, there follows no Δεῦτε πρός με, "come unto me," again, in any æon whatsoever.‡ When the present world passes away, and all that has been prepared in God's decree comes into full realization, then first begins the eternal misery of those men who are associated with the devil; of whose restoration there is not the smallest word to be found in the whole Scripture. As the righteous received their sentence beforehand, so that the damned must hear it, so now the condemned go away beforehand without seeing any thing of the glory of the blessed. First comes Rev. xx. 15; then over the closed abyss of the lake of fire, the new world for the blessed, Rev. xxi. and xxii. Only in accordance with this is Rev. xxi. 4 to be understood—from their eyes, i. e., the eyes of the blessed; and ver. 5, all things new, i. e., in this new world. For there still remains what is said at chap. xxi. 8, 27, xxii. 15, 19. We cannot otherwise read the Scripture, nor otherwise understand Christ. The enduring misery of such as fall to the devil is a deep mystery, just as is the devil's first fall; but it is at the same time quite as clearly attested as is the eternal life, the mark and prize of our heavenly calling in Christ Jesus. Follow, thou who art called, as a sheep the good Shepherd, obey his gracious invitation, Come unto me! with which the first part of this commentary upon his words closed—then wilt thou not hear his dreadful curse, Depart from me! with which we must now warningly close the second part.

* Not as if in Heb. vii. 24, 25, an atonement ever open, ever going on, were meant.

* Of which profound truth (comp. our remark on John v. 37) what Hase would teach us is only a very distorted presentation; viz., that this judgment is conducted "according to the rational law of humanity itself, which Christ as it were personally represents and exercises."

† Against this exegetically irrefutable sentence, Oetinger in vain maintains that misery cannot, in the nature of the thing, be equally everlasting; see in Auberlen, p. 492.

‡ In vain does Lange find a ground of consolation here in the darkness which envelops the rejected, for the words present a clear and unconditional contrast.

THE GOSPEL OF MARK.

TO THE UNCLEAN SPIRIT: HOLD THY PEACE.

(Mark i. 25; Luke iv. 35.)

Our exposition of the sayings, as recorded by Matthew, concluded with the words in which the Saviour of men pre-announced his final, unalterable, judicial sentence. These words are, "Depart ye cursed into the everlasting fire which has been prepared for the devil and his angels"—therefore not prepared for you men, but for the devils; not indeed from the foundation of the world, but from the time that there have been, and because there are, devils. The new commencement of the Lord's public sayings, as resumed in Mark, is from the very first in accordance with this their termination in Matthew. We here see, in the first chapter, the Son of God whose coming to us is the Gospel, introduced by the forerunner in the name and in the concluding words of the prophets; anointed and glorified from heaven by the Spirit, and the voice of the Father; tempted by Satan, spared by wild beasts, served by angels; followed by disciples whom without delay he had called; acknowledged and named by the devils whom he expels from men, but rejecting with marked sternness their final enforced testimony. He has come to deliver men, to judge devils: this the latter know earlier and better than the former; for heaven and hell bear testimony to him for behoof of the earth—"the kingdom of spirits knew him even under the form which concealed him from the world." So far the scene which the second Gospel discloses to us is the same as that of the first. But the whole is delineated, all at once, within very brief compass, in great, simply and sublimely powerful strokes; so much so that the very first chapter expresses clearly the special character of Mark's Gospel as indicated by us in the Introduction. We observed in our first Preface that any one Gospel, even that of Mark, gives clearly, strongly, and incontrovertibly enough, the truth, ever verifying itself afresh, on which, as on a sure historical basis, the doctrine of the Church stands. If we contemplate and examine thoroughly this single first chapter of Mark, what a fulness of testimony does it contain, encircling on every side the one who stands in the midst; what antecedents and consequents are there connected with him alone; how great is the assurance of this second writer,* who knows that he also writes and testifies of Jesus through the Holy Ghost! How entirely unconcerned is he about the doubts or oppositions of his contemporaries or of future generations! And yet every thing is written with a wise regard for the future.

Mark has the special gift of sententious brevity and of graphic painting in wonderful combination. While on every occasion he compresses the discourses, works, and histories into the simplest possible kernel, he, on the other hand, unfolds the scene more clearly than Matthew does, who excels in the discourses; not only do single incidents become in his hands complete pictures, but even when he is very brief, he often gives, with one pencil stroke, something new and peculiarly his own. It is very instructive and interesting to consider these peculiar gifts of Mark; this however is foreign to the design of this work, as these peculiar gifts have to do rather with the narratives than with the sayings—as, for example, in the expression, ver. 13, "He was with the wild beasts." On the other hand we have now to do with the narrative at vers. 23–25.

In the synagogue at Capernaum† there is a

* For we repeat that "the result of sound criticism will always be to prove that the order in which the Church has arranged the four Gospels is the correct one, whether viewed externally or internally."

† Mark and Luke anticipate the later occurrence. Mark, with his carefully used εὐθέως, has given, vers. 21, 22, partly a general description, such as that we have at Matt. iv. 23 (εὐθέως is the word he employs from the beginning to denote the rapid course of the Lord's life, as he passes from one great and important event to another); here he passes over, in the first place, the choice of the disciples, the Sermon on the Mount, the Leper, the Centurion, and steps forward into the midst of the first teaching and working of miracles, a scene of paramount importance for the beginning of his Gospel. After this he carries forward his historical narrative till ver. 39. Then, however, he introduces, at last, the healing of the leper; let it be demoniac, who, of course, has crept in unobserved. The proximity of the Lord compels the unclean spirit to make himself known by bearing testimony to Jesus through the utterance of a loud cry. There is nothing peculiar in the fact that the Lord expels the spirit: there is something peculiar, however, in the fact that the spirit knows and names the Lord.* The injunction, "Hold thy peace," standing, as it does, by the side of "come out," is new in Mark, and is of great significance. Christ will not suffer himself to be named and praised by the devils. To them, and to their dark knavery, he is sharp and severe. He has none of his Saviour-tenderness for those who are condemned and reserved for judgment. He never permitted the devils,† after the first attempt, to proclaim that they know him (ver. 34), although they often made the attempt, chap. iii. 11, 12. The address of the spirit here, ver. 24, is partly parallel with that other address, chap. v. 7 (Matt. viii. 29). In three respects, however, it is peculiar. First, in the ἡμῖν and ἡμᾶς, us, the utterance of the single spirit speaking in name of the whole body of the powers of Satan. Secondly, in the Ναζαρηνέ, "of Nazareth," by which he at once addresses the Lord; not merely making use of the appellation common at the time (Luke xviii. 37), but undoubtedly using the word because this name of contempt, given to Jesus in his state of humiliation, was destined to be brought into honor on earth, in hell, and in heaven (Mark xvi. 6; Acts ii. 22, xxii. 8). Finally, in using the name, expressive of mediation and victory, borrowed from the prophecy of the 16th Psalm, or at least closely connected with it, and very specially denoting the person of Jesus as the antagonist of hell, "The Holy One of God." (Erasmus correctly translates this phrase by Ille sanctus Dei; compare the other appellation which generally corresponds to this one, Luke iv. 41; Mark iii. 11. Ἦλθες ἀπολέσαι ἡμᾶς is a question, as in Matt. viii. 29.) He breaks forth with an ἔα of anguish (not "desist!" "let us alone!" as if it were an imperative from ἐάω, but an interjection ah! woe! Heb. אֲהָהּ in anticipation of the judgment, of which the associates of the devils also shall in time to come be made partakers, Heb. x. 27. "Let us rather give testimony to thee." But the Lord will by no means be thus publicly proclaimed. The devils malignantly and maliciously, with all fear, anticipate the plan of his life with a view to perplex him in regard to it, and to prepare for him (as Mark iii. 22 follows after verse 11) scandal and suspicion. Therefore, as the Master, he does exactly what (Acts xvi. 16–18) his apostle afterwards did; and what, unfortunately, his disciples now-a-days often fail to do when they do not reject, with sufficient decision, any testimony given from hell in their favor. "Hold thy peace," he says. The spirit, yielding a reluctant obedience, cries out at least once more before he departs; but he dares not utter one other word after his Judge has shut his mouth.

TO PREACH IN OTHER PLACES ALSO.

(Mark i. 38; Luke iv. 43.)

The three Evangelists unite in relating that the miraculous cure of the mother-in-law of Peter brought many sick persons to Capernaum, on the evening of the day on which it was wrought. But Mark and Luke add that our Lord, early on the morning after this day, a day spent in labor and in preaching, retired into the wilderness. In the narrative of Luke especially, we may observe how the noise and the concourse increased (iv. 14, 15, 32, 37, 40–42); and this suggests the cause of the withdrawal of the Lord into the wilderness at this time, in order to collect his thoughts in solitude, and prepare himself afresh for dealing with others. According to Mark, who undoubtedly knew most exactly the real state of matters, it was "Simon and those with him," who hastened after Jesus, and said: All men seek for thee; it is not only we that wish to have thee for ourselves, but all men are in this same state of mind. The view of Luke, which is indeed in substance the same as the above, is that the multitudes, ὄχλοι, go after him desirous of bringing him back; the οἱ μετ' αὐτοῦ or "those with him" of Mark may also have been individuals whom the people had dispatched as their representatives. There is thus a struggle for him, the result of the many instances of healing and of the expulsion of devils which had taken place; men are determined not to lose sight of one in whom such power resides. In the midst of all this press, however, the Lord is altogether as calm, serene, and collected on the subject of the work which observed, however, without a εὐθέως and with the indefinite expression καὶ ἔρχεται. Thus the incident in the synagogue, as is obvious from ver. 29 (and with this Luke iv. 38 agrees), is to have its place assigned to it between the 13th and 14th verses of Matt. viii.

* Acts xix. 15: "With Jesus I am well acquainted, and Paul I know."

† Not "the sicknesses," or "the sick!" We may see how impossible it is that such was the meaning of "possessed" as understood by the Evangelists.

had been given him to do, as he had been, when, according to the preceding narrative of Luke, he was expelled from Nazareth. He needed, according to Matthew viii. 17, to collect his thoughts and to strengthen his soul in solitary prayer; but when found out and disturbed, he immediately recognized the interruption as an admonition from his Father to work: He feels no annoyance at the intrusion, but is ready once more, in all kindness for men —"I am at your call, I have had enough of rest." But he does not so give himself up to them as to return back as they desired to a place in which he had labored enough; the way on which he was sent, to which his Father calls him, leads him further on, that all men, whether they seek him or not, may partake his benefit. He who commanded the devils to be silent, will by no means suffer himself to be lauded with turbulence even by men, as a mere worker of miracles; when matters are taking this turn he goes away, as he does every where else in similar circumstances. The import of his address given in reply to those who seek him and hold him fast, which Mark and Luke record in different words, but to the same effect, lies thus in the double antithesis: Not here only, but elsewhere also; not merely to work miracles, but to preach.

The reading in Mark ἄγωμεν ἀλλαχοῦ, Let us go elsewhere, which rests on good external authority, is in this way recommended and justified: it brings εἰς τὰς ἐχομένας κωμοπόλεις, "into the neighboring villages," into more exact similarity to καὶ ταῖς ἑτέραις πόλεσιν, "and the other cities," of Luke, and gives strong emphasis to καὶ ἐκεῖ, "and there." The Saviour of the world, sent in the first instance to Israel as Minister of the Circumcision, could certainly not continue to reside in one place, or even in several places in succession. He must proclaim, testify, and work, every where; at least he must travel carefully over the populous public cities or large market towns of Galilee—the great theatre which was assigned him; as, for many reasons, he had it not in his power to confer favors either personally or even by means of the apostles upon all the cities of Israel before the judgment (Matt. x. 23). There is thus given, at the beginning, part of the explanation of the reason of his travelling up and down the country. The other reason is strictly connected with this one: That I may preach there also, namely the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, as Luke explains it; compare Mark i. 14; Luke iv. 18, 19. For therefore, says he, and not only to heal the sick and those possessed with devils, have I come, and been sent. There we have, still further, in the very first chapter, an explanation of the design and value of his working of miracles; such as we find near the beginning also of John, chap. iv. 48. Miracles were wrought only to introduce and confirm the word; never in such numbers as the people desired; but always to such an extent only as was good for directing them to that work, which he was always commencing afresh as his proper work, the preaching of the word.

The expression in Luke is, "therefore am I sent;" that in Mark, however, is assuredly the original, "therefore I have come forth"—for the reading ἐξελήλυθα is to be preferred. We must not, however, with Pfenninger, adopt the superficial rendering, "I have come forth from my domestic retirement and obscurity;" and certainly not, "I have come out at this early hour from the city into the wilderness, in order thus to escape being followed by the crowds of the citizens of Capernaum." This exposition* is very plainly refuted by the reading in Luke, ἀπέσταλμαι; which shows us that we have here in Mark a remarkable instance of one of the expressions peculiar to John's Gospel put into the mouth of the Lord, "I have proceeded forth from the Father, and come into the world"—although this designedly is not expressed so plainly at the beginning. In fine, it is to be understood that the Lord, by the expression before us, declares his prophetical office to be merely the first and immediate object of his life (as he does also in John xviii. 37), without prejudice to other duties, as we know, and as he himself elsewhere declares. He knows, however, his way and walks in it, rejecting every false claim, firmly and securely; to preach the Gospel from place to place is quite as sacred a duty in its own time (to speak with Luke, I must), as it is afterwards, when the hour has come, to suffer, to be silent, and to die. Let a single word be sufficient to point out the practical import of this saying to those who are sent out by him as heralds, according as their vocation is to one city or to one nation.

THE SONS OF THUNDER.—(THE LITTLE SHIP READY.)

(Mark iii. 17 [9].)

To introduce into this exposition of the Lord's discourses all his sayings which are indirectly quoted or indicated, is a task beyond our ability; and one, moreover, which we have not the least desire to attempt. We proceeded on this plan throughout the Gospel according to Matthew. Occasionally, however, there must be exceptions. Thus, for example, in the very passage before us, Mark iii. 9, though there is no more than a mere indirect indication of what our Lord on one occasion said to his disciples, we would by no means withhold that saying from our consideration merely on account of the form in which it appears, if there were in it any thing of special import. This, assuredly, there is not; it forms one of those merely human utterances of human intercourse, which the Evangelists, for this very reason, rarely quote directly, occasionally indirectly, but most commonly omit altogether. The scene, which is parallel with that of Matthew xii. 15–21, merely shows us the Lord again withdrawing himself from men; as much from their pressing throng, as from their active hostility. He is desirous of having provided for him the means of proceeding by sea as often as he finds it convenient to do so; frequently retiring from the place altogether, and frequently, at least, from the "press," to a quiet place where he may preach the Gospel, as in Luke v. 1–3. He wisely provides for this as a matter of human arrangement; and therefore enjoins his disciples to see to it that a small ship wait on him (not at this particular time merely, but generally); that it be ready, in order that he may enter into it, as we find him frequently doing, as often as the multitude renders this desirable. Thus we behold the Saviour not merely manifesting "a regard to suitable accommodation," as Bengel correctly remarks, but also with all humility as a man planning and arranging for what his divine wisdom finds to be good; taking due precaution against the pressure of the multitude, as often as he trusts his person in the midst of it. Here lies the spirit and substance of this saying, which so far, has not been recorded in vain, or without a lesson for us.

The giving of the names by our Lord (ver. 17), and the statements made by him on that occasion, are certainly of much more weighty import—certainly not merely a subject of exegetical curiosity, as Gurlitt superciliously affirms. By the insertion of his catalogue of apostles at this place, we see that Mark refers (ver. 13) to the choice of the apostles which took place previous to the Sermon on the Mount (Luke confirms this, vi. 13); but that, at the same time, he appends to this a more general view. Consequently we are by no means to understand that all the names were given precisely at this time; but as Simon was surnamed Peter at an earlier period, the sons of Zebedee may have received their appellation earlier or even later, as Boanerges. There are two similar and common names: since Mark evidently means to say that they were to be so called not only when spoken of together as a pair of brothers; but also that each brother by himself was to be a Son of Thunder. We have already expressed our sentiments (pp. 16 and 307 on the giving of the names considered in itself. Our view is that on these two disciples was conferred the honor of a new name as being men of a like spirit; for the same reason which led to their being taken with Peter into a narrower circle within the Twelve. If this be so, it is certain that their name indicates two things: first, a description of their natural character (as brothers, as sons of Zebedee), a character full of meaning and power; secondly and chiefly, their apostolic character, for the new name which the Lord gives them is assuredly a name summoning them to their office, and prophetic of things to come. Hence every view which entirely disregards either of these is false. Most assuredly is that view false, which finds in it a mere expression of blame; for the Evangelist has, with perfect simplicity, placed the appellation Peter by the side of their honorary titles. The Lord by this title designated them neither as "boisterous" nor as "hot-headed men" (as Von Ammon has expressed himself, and refers us to רגשׁ); but most certainly, though not without a warning running side by side, he indicates a good natural ground in them, out of which his grace will afterwards produce something of powerful efficacy. To connect the incident related at Luke ix. 54, 55 with the giving of these names, is so far correct that these brothers, who generally spoke and acted very much together, and were very closely bound up with each other, were men of a strong ardent spirit, and not in the least of the soft and effeminate character which unfortunately and without any reason has been supposed to have belonged to John. The idea that at the time when they would have called down fire from heaven the Lord gave them this name, in the way of a reprimand and "that they might always be reminded of their enemy," as Tholuck says, is simply to be rejected. For as Olshausen convincingly remarks, there is not a single instance in the whole New Testament, or even within the entire compass of Bible history, of a reproof being given by affixing a name. Moreover, this false combination, in the case of the Evangelists Mark and Luke, cannot be maintained with a due regard to their inspiration. Mark would not, in his catalogue of apostles, and by the side of the name of Peter, have fastened firmly and solemnly upon the brethren an epithet which, on this supposition, the Lord assuredly did not intend should remain with them. And Luke (whose Gospel, besides, refers to that of Mark) would not have recorded other matters and omitted the most striking point, had these words been uttered on that occasion.

That Mark's translation, vioi βροντῆς, "Sons of Thunder," must be correct, is self-evident, and is confirmed by Christian antiquity. And though we cannot exactly restore the root of the Aramaic word (for the roots רגז, רגשׁ, רעשׁ run into one another, and we know little of the dialect then in common use), this much is certain, that the thunder is here used in the sense of power to shake. The Hebrew word רַעַם is used in this sense. The point of comparison is not the secret nature, nor the terrible effects (and so on in their fanciful applications) of the thunder; but the power of the word, as in Psa. xxix. and Psa. lxviii. 34. Even heathen antiquity speaks of powerful eloquence as thunder.* Theophylact, in his μεγαλοκήρυκες, "great preachers," gives the simplest expression of our view; but on the other hand, by his addition of θεολογικώτατοι, "most theological," introduces an idea for which there is no warrant. On whatever occasion the Lord may have said "Ye are or shall be called Sons of Thunder," he must have conveyed to their minds, "I know that out of the depths of the strong feelings of a fervent heart there shall break forth a powerful testimony of the word. I will therefore make you as my apostles, at a future time thunderers with the thunder of the heavenly word." It is not exactly (as Meyer, and Luther's marginal note have it), "I will make you fiery, terrific, evangelists and preachers;" for that would be lightning instead of thunder. We know nothing further of James, who met an early martyrdom. But John's thunder-power is sufficiently seen in the sharp edge, the fearless and unimpeded march of his majestic testimony, by the side of that stream of abounding love which prevades it and sheds its halo around it.

PARABLE: THE SEED GROWING OF ITSELF.

(Mark iv. 26–29.)

We have already pointed out (p. 248) how this beautiful parable, the peculiar import of which has, in consequence of its simplicity and brevity, been commonly, but most unjustly, overlooked, fits into the cycle of parables in Matt. xiii., like an extra one omitted there, or an intermediate clause thrown in as a bond of connection. It is not merely an appendix to the preceding parable (as Braune says), but an independent link in the chain. To consider it as another version, the product of inaccurate memory, of the parable of the tares (to which it appears appended even in Rieger's New Testament), is a piece of great folly, originating either in irreverent treatment of the sacred text, or in a superficial reading of the text on the part of such believers. Neither can it have been given at one time by the Lord as a simple basis which he afterwards and on another occasion expanded into the parable of the tares; it is, generally, no mere modification of another parable. For, in the first place, Mark gives from vers. 1 and 2 to ver. 33 an exact account of the many parables delivered at the same time; and in the next place this extra parable, not belonging to the kernel of the seven, has a fundamental idea altogether peculiar to itself, and one which has nothing to do with the tares among the wheat.

Seedtime and harvest: this was the general fundamental tone of the first four or exoteric parables in Matthew. The seed grows on till the harvest; this was the chief note at the end of the second, Matt. xiii. 30, which the third, ver 32, again takes up. In all probability, therefore, this parable given here by Mark, the idea of which is remarkably and completely contained in this growing, takes its place as a transition from the tares to the grain of mustard seed. The seed once sown grows, according to its own nature, of itself from its own impulse and power of life, with this we have manifestly the immediate reference and limitation with which our Lord here speaks of it. The self-inherent power of growth of the kingdom of God (as a whole and in individuals, great and small), in reference to what we know of it, and what we do to it, in its independence of human care and labor—this and nothing else is the theme, as Lisco has well said, and as Brandt's Bible, guided by its special object, has for once happily expressed the true meaning. The man who overlooks this must find himself in the predicament of saying of the main subject of the parable that the description is not to be pressed, that it is not the main thing! Seedtime and harvest are mentioned only briefly at the beginning and end: the idea lying between these, viz., "the kingdom of God has been established broadly and deeply in order that its development may proceed from within," comes forward strongly in the two intermediate verses. It is affirmed that the growth proceeds at certain fixed times; secretly, without the knowledge of man; of itself, without the cooperation of man; finally, also, in a natural progress from one step of advancement to another

The man who sows the seed, τὸν σπόρον (not his own seed, αὐτοῦ; as in Luke viii. 5), is throughout this parable not the Son of Man, the divine sower, properly so called. For, first, the sleeping during the night is not applicable to him. And although this may be interpreted as descriptive of appearances (it seems to us as if the Keeper of Israel slept, not looking after his seed), yet the ὡς οὐκ οἶδεν αὐτος, "he knoweth not now," is decisive—an expression which, especially when so strong as it is here, can in no sense be applied to him. For, the seed is neither more nor less than the energy of the Lord; his power, Spirit, life; even the the Lord himself. How should he then not be cognizant of its most secret springing and growth?* The person of the sower, therefore, is varied according to different didactic purposes, like the seed and the field; and the man who sows the seed in this parable is a disciple and servant of the kingdom, one who labors in and about the kingdom. Particularly is it one who scatters the seed abroad upon others; though the analogy admits a certain application to the heart which has received the seed, and its subsequent care for itself. Further, as in nature the fruit produces seed, or the self-propagation of the plant is the seed (Gen. i. 12; Isa. lv. 10), so here the σπόρος or seed, ver. 26 (exactly what in the two preceding parables is termed the seed of the kingdom), and the καρπός or fruit are to a certain extent identical and run into one another. What is said in ver. 21 of the lighted candle, may so far be applied here: will any man have merely fruit without at the same time casting abroad seed? (Additional remarks on this subject will be found on p. 255.)

Verses 26, 27. First, therefore: The kingdom of God in regard to its growth, its great development, from seedtime to harvest (a development, however, which proceeds onward through an oft-repeated seedtime and harvest), is of the following nature. A man scatters, or men scatter seed abroad: it is, therefore, always spread and propagated by human instrumentality; subject to this condition, however, that the springing and the growing of the seed are beyond the knowledge and control of the man who had scattered it. He lets day and night succeed each other according to the ordinary course of nature; he leaves the God of heaven to bring day and night over the earth, an operation beyond the reach of man; and remains quietly within his own sphere, the sphere allotted to man: he sleeps during the night, and is awake during the day. Assuredly the reverse, indolent sleep during the day, is not permitted; on the contrary, the ἐγείρεσθαι, or the daily new awaking, expressly includes all diligence, carefulness, and attention on the part of the laboring husbandman (2 Tim. ii. 6), rendered necessary by the place which he occupies. Not to concern himself at all about the seed after he has once cast it abroad were certainly culpable neglect; for, the looking after it, that it be not destroyed, or that the field be not turned up, the watering it and such like occupations, form still so many parts of the prolonged duty of the sower, just as the education of children forms part of the τεκνογονία, 1 Tim. ii. 15. But our Saviour means to say this (and in doing so to glance at Matt. xiii. 25), that no one need be in painful anxiety about it; he is not, after he has sown his seed, forthwith to go to sleep altogether; but he is permitted and enjoined to take that sleep during the night which the necesities of human nature require. We may from the figure make a still further application, and limit Eccles. ix. 6 by Psa. cxvii. 1; thus finding out the due medium between useless tormenting anxiety and ruinous thoughtless indolence. This much is certain; all that man can do in protecting and helping is a mere trifle; the great business of springing and growing goes on without us, chiefly in the secret fruitful womb of night, as is well known to all who are acquainted with nature. There is a truth corresponding to this in the hidden progress of the growing kingdom of God: the nights of men and of nations quietly force the seed even more effectually than do the days, although here again the sunshine and the life-dew of the light are indispensably necessary for conception in the womb of darkness.

The expression "night and day" here signifies two things. First, the necessary amount of the time intervening between seedtime and harvest; so many days and nights must elapse ere the blade, the ear, and the full corn in the ear, appear in succession. Secondly, the quality of this time, or the favorable influences of weather and fructification which the days and nights given by God contain within them. This is the usual way with the seed in the ground. Upon this we might consider that in regard to spiritual seed, the Lord God on his part gives only favorable weather, and nothing but his blessing (1 Cor. iii. 6, 7). Here then are entirely excluded both the knowledge and the influence of man. Especially the knowledge as to the "how" of this secret and wonderful thing (ὡς οὐκ οἶδεν); on the other hand, all the most secret shooting, forcing, springing, in the kingdoms of grace and of nature, lie open before God, because this is his very work. Mark this well, ye preachers and educators, in opposition to all anxious Methodism.* Apply this also to your own heart, ye anxious spirits; beware of the petty measurement of the daily and hourly barometrical state of your feelings and

* In Von Gerlach we read: "After Christ has scattered the seed he exerts no influence by his personal presence or by outward means upon its growth." But ὡς οὐκ οἶδεν αὐτός means a great deal more than this. Even non curat cannot be said of the Lord, who truly looks after his field. With equal violence to the text, Alford understands the expression as applicable, at least at the same time, to Christ and his servants: to the former, "He knows not how; i. e., from bodily absence, he watches not how, witnesses not how." But the words will not admit of this—and the sense, moreover, is not true. For Christ continues to influence by his spiritual presence; effectually watches and protects.

* The good Wesley, in commenting on this parable, cannot away with this; hence he gives as the meaning of "sleeping and waking, night and day," exactly the reverse; that is, he has it continually in his thoughts. [This feature of the parable, however, is quite as much directed against inattention to the spiritual progress as against solicitude respecting it; for the sower wakes as well as sleeps. Indeed it applies solely to a mistrustful inquisition as to the divine growth in others, and cannot be meant to discountenance self-examination, however earnest and frequent.—Am. Ed.] spiritual life; beware of watching, and brooding, and refining; beware of keeping diaries in such a sense as this. Ye must not childishly uncover the seed, and look how the growth goes on.

Verse 28. Still less can we draw upwards the seed and the stalk with the hand, so as to produce a more rapid springing and growth. Every false help is excluded. Man (ver. 26) has no need to know any thing about the matter, or to render any help at all; for the earth brings forth its fruit αὐτομάτη,* "of herself." This means, naturally; because of the principle of vitality made inherent in the seed. Assuredly to hope for harvest without having sown is stupidity. It means more: For the earth bringeth forth—originally endued by God with the fertility which meets the seed, and which he continually renews and fertilizes by influences from above: assuredly stones and rocks form a surface on which nothing grows. The αὐτομάτη excludes only the co-operation of man (the αὐτός immediately preceding); it includes the energy of God, which is at work in all things. It has now been sown, it has its own part to act; you may now be quiet and act yours; see that you procure good seed, do your day's work in sowing it, then wait (James v. 7). "Earthly seed is long in springing up; imperishable seed is longer still." It is only when the seed comes forward of itself—when it grows up—that it is shown to be seed. When covered up, and apparently dead, it bursts through the ground, rising from the dead, having been brought to life and having grown when below (in the night, in secret); next it continues to grow, springing further up when above ground (in the day time, in the light). The sprouting below ground was a concealed growth, the growth above ground is a continued shooting and sprouting; we know, however, and understand, as little of what is above as we do of what is below, as little of the day as we do of the night.

Once more, we have the natural progress of the plant from stage to stage—the most observable feature of the season between seed-time and harvest, and of the vegetable world during that period of the year. The three stages mentioned in the parable correspond to the children, young men, and fathers, 1 John ii. 12, 13; only in general, however, and without any sharp boundary lines. Hence, after the πρῶτον, first, we do not find a δεύτερον and a τρίτον, or a secondly and a thirdly, but merely an εἶτα, then; for there are no intermediate stages and transitions: the meaning is, one after the other, and not before; as at the end the harvest is after and not before the ripening of the fruit. (A man does not sow grass or ears of corn; neither does he reap and use them as such.) As the root spoken of in the first parable (ver. 17) is pre-supposed in the springing up, so must the ears stand upon the blade, and the corn must find the ears in which it is to grow. The blade is still like tares, as the little children in Christ are still "as carnal," 1 Cor. iii. 5; the ears, on the other hand, seem even ready for harvest, before they have received the corn and are filled or ripe. Our Lord gives every thing here in a figure drawn from nature, simple yet full of meaning, that we may meditate upon the kingdom of God. In this figure he brings prominently forward the most important fundamental features of that kingdom; he teaches us not to despise quiet perennial growth, not to lose heart because of small beginnings; but to wait without any precipitate misconceptions, for the right termination.

Verse 29. To the eye of the true husbandman the fruit presents itself with sufficient distinctness at the proper time, as ripe; i. e., quite full, as fruit. This idea, in contrast with the concealed condition of the plant at its origin, and with its uncertain appearance at the intermediate stages, is expressed emphatically by παραδῷ, affords itself ("is brought forth"), —a word which has been manifestly selected for this very purpose; (on its middle signification see Winer, § 29). The idea meant to be conveyed is therefore not merely, "of its own accord also," but still further "as he himself also knows." The fruit visibly ripe invites to harvest. It is only in its most general application that this harvest can be regarded as denoting also the last great harvest of the whole world before God; for, as has been already said, the parable in the first instance speaks of the manifold human sowings and reapings which intervene between God's seed-time and God's harvest. The harvest therefore, in the first instance, is the human harvest, with a view to a sowing to be again immediately commenced. Do not come back with the harvest wagons immediately after thou hast sown a little, but let the earth and the seed have time; dost thou see, however, the fruit, then immediately (εὐθέως) put in the sickle, Joel iii. 13. The Lord here again designedly changes the expression: he does not speak of reapers as in Matt. xiii. 30; for here it is the people connected with the farm that are the sickle-bearers; there is no need of angels. (Ἀποστέλλει is not a Latinism of Mark's, immittere falcem, but a Hebraism of our Lord's discourse, as in Joel iii. 13, שַׁלְּחוּ מַגָּל, ἐξαποστείλατε δρέπανα; even ὅτι παρέστηκεν stands literally there.) The man must now appropriate to himself the corn that has grown up; he reaps it, and in doing so he gathers it together, that he may again sow it out to advantage, in order to be always acumulating fruit to life eternal (John iv. 36). His design is not to store up in granaries, that he may rest and enjoy himself before the time. The parable begins again at the beginning; and thus the growth of the kingdom advances before men upon the earth. We have here, on the one hand, very peculiar thoughts, deeply hidden in their simple expression; yet, on the other, the significant selection and arrangement of these expressions, makes the meaning clear in its simple unity. This parable given by Mark is not therefore an inaccurate version of some other parable; neither is it a rough and unfinished draft, drawn up hastily on the spur of the moment by the Lord, and intended to be afterwards wrought out into a larger form. No, it is a parable which to a right exegesis becomes self-interpretating; yea, it is a most precious gift of the Lord to his servants, preserved by the Holy Spirit through the instrumentality of Mark, containing a very essential supplement to the other kindred parables, a very wholesome warning on the subject of all human interference with the sowing and the reaping of God, a complete explanation of what the growth of the seed properly is, and how that growth goes on.

* Even Philo applies αὐτομάτος to what the earth brings forth without the labor of man.

EPHPHATHA, AND THE PROHIBITION TO SPEAK OF IT.

(Mark vii. 34–36.)

This one single little word, "Ephphatha," though soon translated into every language, as here in the first instance it was translated into Greek, is a word of mighty power and import. It was so when first uttered by the Lord to the man who at that time was healed; and to the people who praised this new miracle in common with all the other miracles of this miracle-working Physician. It is of still greater import to us who know better, and should praise better, him who makes all things good which have been made evil by sin—who by a pure work of opening and loosing the bands, brings a restoration to the first creation in which all things were very good. But, in order to bring ourselves into contact with this mighty word of the Lord's lips, we must consider in connection with it the whole instructive history, and especially those actions of the Lord by which he accompanied the miracle, and by which he also intended to speak to the dumb.

He would not and he could not be concealed; the Father sends to him every where, even on the confines of the heathen world, the poor and the miserable for his assistance. He is returning to Galilee, through the midst of the half-heathen Decapolis, still tarrying and turning aside by the way. It is not an individual case of the miracles mentioned in Matt. xv. 30, as the harmonists have been accustomed inaccurately to represent it (although afterwards Matt. ver. 31 may fall in with Mark ver. 37), but an earlier case which occurs by the way, that Mark here details; who has preserved for us two cases of healing, here and in chap. viii. 22, connected together by very peculiar circumstances. (The Septuagint, and in like manner Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, use μογιλάλος and ἄλαλος indifferently for אִלֵּם; see Exod. iv. 10, 11; Psa. xxxviii. 14; Isa. xxxv. 6, lvi. 10: the enraptured song of the people after the event had taken place classes the μογιλάλος among the ἀλάλους. Yet it is evident from the history generally, and also from the ὀρθῶς of ver. 35, that the man was only a βραδύγλωσσος or ἀγκυλόγλωσσος—an old Lexicon has μογιλαλεῖν, βατταρίζειν—a פַּאקָא, a stammerer, as the literal Peshito has it.) It was the case of a man whose malady is clearly distinguished both by the Lord and his Evangelist from possession, such, for example, as we find at Matt. xii. 22; Luke xi. 14. So much the more remarkable is the ceremonious and protracted operation of the Lord, instead of the customary laying on of hands, which is what he was here asked to do: he does not work the miracle for the sake of the people; he does not show his power in the manner prescribed by them, and which was the usual manner of healing. The miracle in this case is an act of kindness to the poor man; and the Lord in working it acts so as to awaken his faith, with a view to this bodily cure as well as to salvation of a better kind. Oh, with what kindness does he still condescend to each one's peculiar necessity, and give us exceeding abundantly above all that we are able to ask or think! The faith which he would awaken with a view to unloose the bands of the soul comes from hearing. But, because the poor man, whom our Lord designs not merely to restore thus suddenly to the perfect use of his bodily powers, but whose desire for blessing, and whose confidence in him, he would also first excite so as to lead him to utter greater praise and thanks, is shut out from the use of language, our Lord therefore take him apart, and, having thus secured his undivided attention, speaks to him by signs. This is manifestly the special reason why on this occasion he envelopes the healing power in so many external actions, touching especially the ears and the tongue. Even the spittle—in this case as in that of the blind men, in chap. viii. 23, and in John ix. 6—is really no medicinal application; but a symbol employed, with his other actions, to denote very significantly the energy proceeding from his person. Grotius remarks that he employs nothing except what comes from himself; we are reminded of more than this, namely, of the streams of vital energy (so repeatedly referred to by the physician Luke) proceeding from his holy human body, as they operate at present in his glorified state, and as they then operated in combination with the might of the Father which at all times was his. Further, we are to regard the looking up to heaven as intended to indicate this last idea to the deaf man and to ourselves; so that we have here a parallel to John xi. 41. But the holy sigh (to the understanding of which, as Kleuker says, a verbal exegesis is as little sufficient as is any system of psychology with which we can be acquainted) was an utterance, proceeding from his divine and human natures, and characteristic of his office as High Priest—an expression of his sympathy with this and with every malady of sinful humanity, bodily and spiritual all in one; yea, with all trouble and sickness (which assuredly sin has brought in and still continues to bring in) felt by him as near at hand, and represented by this dire calamity.* In contrast to those fools who fancy they have discovered in the narratives of healings peculiar to Mark something which will enable them to account for miracles on rationalistic principles,† the simple wisdom of Luther may teach us what the exposition of a spirit of faith brings up from the depth at the right place. "It was not drawn from him on account of the single tongue and ears of this poor man; but it is a common sigh over all tongues and ears, yea, over all hearts, bodies, and souls, and over all men, from Adam to his last descendant. This Gospel thus depicts Christ, that he as man took such an interest in thee and in me, and in all of us, as we ought to take in ourselves, when he was involved in the sins and sufferings in which we are involved; and that he sighs over the very devil who has been the cause of the sorrow." Luther also, who on other occasions is hostile to all playing with allegory, admirably indicates that this sympathetic sigh breaks out especially over the deaf and dumb, at least that it is on such an occasion that the Holy Ghost has recorded it. We hold also that there is good reason for supposing that it was exactly under this bodily emblem that there came up before the thoughts of the heart of the Saviour of men, on the one hand, compassion for spiritual blindness, from which proceeds also, as in the case before us, the incapacity of the tongue to speak and to praise God; and, on the other hand, the lamentable evils of tongue-sins all over the world. Luther renders prominent this latter point: "Our beloved Lord saw well what an amount of sufferings and sorrows would be occasioned by tongues and ears. For the greatest mischief which has been inflicted on Christianity has not arisen from tyrants (with persecutions, murders, and pride, against the word), but from that little piece of flesh, which abides between the jaws; it is it that inflicts the greatest injury upon the kingdom of God. I speak of this, that after Christ has loosed the tongue and given it the Gospel, it should inflict such extraordinary and great injuries. It is a fearful thing to see a man's head cut off; but a false sermon, yea, a false word which has gone forth in the name of Christ, takes off the heads of souls." Thus, according to this, Christ must have been thinking upon the injurious tongues, and also upon the shameful ears which will not hear any thing else except such false injurious tongues (2 Tim. iv. 3, 4). We add to this: perhaps also, and in the first instance, he was thinking upon the sins which this man, on whose body this miracle of healing was wrought, would hereafter commit with his tongue and ears; and that it might have been better for him not to have received the help which this Ephphatha brought. We believe that these and similar thoughts made up the hidden substance of this Ephphatha, uttered in a sigh, and hence we have given them as expository of it.* "Ah, that I, O my Father which art in heaven—Thou knowest how these things are—Ah, that I could open and unloose the ears and tongues of all men!"

The Ephphatha is the first word which the ears no longer deaf must hear. And what is the first word which the tongue loosed from its bands (its strings and feebleness, as in Luke xiii. 16) spoke? It is not recorded. Instead of it we have the prohibition to make known the miracle. Among the "them" whom our Saviour charged not to make it known, is undoubtedly comprehended the man who was healed. Thus the gift of speech was scarcely given him, when silence was enjoined; in order that he, or at least we, might learn that right hearing consists in obeying, the right use of the unbound tongue consists in its willing bondage with a view to obedience.

* Chrysostom to the like effect: "Pitying the nature of man, and the degradation to which he was brought by the hater of all good, the devil, and through the failure of our great progenitors."

† As e. g. De Wette calls Mark "the patron of natural interpretation."

* The tribute of praise in Mark. ver. 37, uttered by the people, puts us in mind of Gen. i. 31, at the first creation; but if the people, when the Lord said "be thou opened," really thought of "let there be light" (as Von Gerlach supposes, though we are doubtful), they must have entirely misunderstood the meaning of the sighing cry.

THE GRADUAL HEALING OF THE BLIND MAN.

(Mark viii. 23, 25, 26.)

We have here a second narrative of healing by Mark, containing a description of a particularly circumstantial procedure on the part of the Lord; and not certainly a mere specimen of what had happened on other occasions, though not recorded by the Evangelists, but with the clear and express stamp of distinctive truth. We still see how each Evangelist brings forward his peculiar gifts, supplementing and completing the scenes described by the others. This blind man was brought to the Lord at Bethsaida, the eastern town of that name, and which was also called Julias. Our Lord treats him with a condescension similar to what he had shown to the deaf man on a former occasion; entering into his necessities and circumstances, of which, however, we know nothing more than what is here recorded. He also acts in the exercise of his wisdom according to his own discretion, differently from what he had been asked to do and from what would have been convenient for himself: he not only touches his eyes as he had done on another occasion, Matt. ix. 29,* but takes pains to lead him away out from the crowd; which certainly is more than he did on the former occasion (ἀπολαβόμενος ἀπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου κατ' ἰδίαν). The immediate reason why he did so was to withdraw the man from the first effect of the gaze of the crowds; and to prepare for him a more blessed object for his first glance, under the free open canopy of heaven, as in John ix. 7. Then the slow gradual process of healing is remarkable; indicated by the question put after the first touching of the eyes,† "if he saw any thing?" There must have been in the condition of this man some special reason why he was brought thus step by step to the full light; and though we do not, in the case before us, see through this, yet we have here represented to us the long-suffering wisdom and gracious condescension with which our Lord must deal with by far the greater part of those who are spiritually blind When he therefore puts to us the confiding question, let us not, when we are only beginning to see and are seeing things as yet indistinctly, reply with a too proud, hasty, and full "yes;" but let us be as sincere as this man was. He saw figures which he recognized by their walking to be men: they appeared to him, moreover, to be as yet quite as indistinct as trees.* But now our Lord lays his hands upon him the second time, and addresses to him a second friendly word, "Look up again"—or, "See now," in contrast to the former question, and announcing a complete recovery. For this probably is what Mark means to say by his very curiously ambiguous phrase: ἐποιησέν αὐτὸν ἀναβλέψαι. This might mean, "he gave him sight again," "he made him again see completely;" compare ἀναβλέπειν, chap. x. 51; Matt. xx. 33, 34, xi. 5, where, however, this sense is not probable. But, because this result is for the first time strongly announced in the following context, we should understand the expression in accordance with the whole history in the first mentioned sense: "he bids him look up" (even although we may not be able with Luther to see the "again"); compare ποιεῖν almost equivalent "to command," Luke v. 34. Finally, the general sense of the injunction not to go into the town, nor to spread abroad the report outside the house (see at chap. v. 19, p. 147), the intimation neither now nor at any future time to tell it to any one ἐν τῇ κώμῃ, "in the village," if he should have occasion to enter it; has already been ascertained when expounding similar sayings of frequent occurrence. It almost appears as if this Bethsaida, to which our Lord gives prominence by the repeated κώμη, village, was for some special reason not to be permitted to hear; perhaps this might be one reason why our Lord led the blind man out from the place. (Last of all, that nothing whatever may be overlooked in Mark, we may remark that the μηδέ is not altogether grammatically wrong, as Winer supposes, but stands instead of καὶ μή on account of the implied antithesis to "sending him to his own house.")

* From this we see what as far as he himself was concerned he could have done in all cases. But in every act of healing which he wrought he sought to include and use man's advancing faith and to care for the necessities of the sick; and it is in this that we are to seek the true reason of the variety of procedure in different cases.

† Mark gives in the first instance ὄμματα, sights organs, which in this strict sense corresponds to the ἀκοαί, chap. vii. 35 (comp. Heb. v. 11); afterwards he employs the usual word ὀφθαλμούς.

* "The masses of people which they had left behind in the distance appeared to him like a dark forest; only the trees walked" (Lange). He was born blind; therefore, of course, he knew nothing about trees.

THE TRUE GREATNESS OF THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST; THE NOT FOLLOWING WITH US; THE FIRE AND SALT PREPARED FOR SELF-DENIAL.

(Mark ix. 33–50; Luke ix. 48–50; [Matt. xviii. 3–20].)

We have already in our remarks on Matthew considered all those parts of the passage before us which have parallels in that Gospel. A special consideration, however, of Mark is necessary: partly because he gives us, in common with Luke, the remarkable interlude, ver. 38–41; and partly because he gives us, what no other Evangelist gives, the profound utterances about the worm and the fire, the fire and the salt, and in general has preserved a peculiar account of the sayings of our Lord spoken at this time—concluding sooner, yet at the beginning preserving more of what was delivered. Referring to what has already been said on Matthew, we must request the reader to take a fresh general survey; this will satisfy him that the theme and leading thoughts are essentially the same in this new account.

The true greatness of the disciples of the Lord among themselves consists in humility and love; and is obtained by self-denial. Thus Mark elevates to the rank of a main section what in Matthew, vers. 8, 9, came in only as a secondary thought; and then he leaves it. Matthew, on the other hand, goes on to narrate what the Lord further said on the subject of the foundation on which this greatness rests through the grace of the Redeemer, and the manifestation which it shall assume in the community or Church. It consists in humility and love! This position, this great fundamental principle of the kingdom, addressed solemnly to the twelve apostles from the seat of teaching and of judgment, is uttered in the first instance in opposition to the proud φιλοπρωτεύειν or ambition of the disciples among each other. It is exhibited, first by a most peculiar and decisive expression, ver. 35 (which we must regard as having been uttered before the third and fourth verses of the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, although the same in sense as these verses); and then by the figure of the little child brought in. Upon this, however, Mark, ver. 37, merely traces out the sentence parallel to that in Matt. ver. 5, with an addition repeated at an earlier period; for, from his efforts at brevity, he merely takes up the one saying, in which there are sufficiently indicated both the greatness graciously attributed by our Lord to the little ones, and also the duty on our part thence resulting of loving them. For this reason he gives the extended account of the statement which Matthew omits; occasioned by the confession of the disciples that, acting under the influence of pride towards others, they had questioned a certain man, and their "we" had risen up in an arrogant and exclusive spirit against other followers of the Lord. To this the Lord replies—"Without arrogance (which manifests itself in forbidding, in strong contrast to assisting or acknowledging) think the best of others; without seeking the honor that may arise from their externally following me in your company, ver. 39, 40. Rather believe, and forget not, that even the smallest thing done on behalf of the kingdom of God is graciously recompensed by God, ver. 41." (Just so ver. 37 is repeated by our Lord from Matt., chap. x.; but here he will utter it in this connection, "Take care only without boasting of it, that ye yourselves belong to Christ.") Finally, "Offend not one of those little ones, who believes in me," ver. 42. In this again Mark concurs with Matthew ver. 6 (p. 335).

The true greatness of the disciples is obtained, and also secured or rendered permanent, by self-denial, by putting away or destroying the real ground of the offence in one's self. Mark (passing over the other opposite in Matthew, ver. 7) gives this as fully and literally as our Lord uttered it. Hand, foot, and eye, separated by the thrice repeated rigorous declaration—"It is better for thee now to put to death the offending sinful member than at a future time to fall into eternal death!" (Vers. 43–48 is parallel with Matt. vers. 8, 9.) It is only by a wholesome mortifying fire and salt that man escapes the unquenchable destroying fire; but the easiest and the best way is to use salt for self-denial, ver. 49. "Therefore found upon such willing self-denial your true dignity before others (as salt of the earth, always itself first salted, in humility); and your place among yourselves (as messengers of peace to the world, united in love!)" ver. 50. This is a natural conclusion at which the Evangelist may well break off.

Verse. 35. This is one of our Lord's repeated sayings, which here agrees particularly well with the intimation of his sufferings given in ver. 31—"This is the very way in which I, your Master, go before you." Comparing Matt. xx. 26–28, xviii. 4; Luke ix. 48, xxii. 26, 27, we see that our Lord does not intend to say any thing of a threatening nature—"Whoever will be the first shall be the last, as a punishment of his pride!" This statement—generally elsewhere true as given in Matt. xix. 30—is in this passage blunted and turned aside by the humility in the exercise of which a man willingly humbles himself as the ἔσχατος or last in order to his becoming really the πρῶτος or first; the addition of the word διάκονος, servant, in this verse, as well as the whole connection in Matthew, shows that this is the sense meant to be conveyed. Whoever in humility looks upon himself as the last, will be found ready to devote himself in love to others, as their servant in helping and in serving them. Let him who desires great things seek true greatness in denying himself; in giving himself up entirely to that love of the Master which will lead him to serve him, to realize him, to work in his strength. The ἔσται, "shall be," signifies, first, Whosoever φιλοπρωτεύει, is ambitious, in the true and right sense, will forthwith show it when put to the test: it goes, however, beyond this and becomes a hortatory imperative. If we take the θέλειν πρῶτος εἶναι, wish to be first, in the good, praiseworthy, and therefore commanded sense, there remains of course the simple, strong key-note of the saying. Still, we should not be averse to apply, even in different ways, these antithetic sentences of our Lord's, constructed, as they are, with such admirable simplicity. Thus, for example, we may understand the one before us, as the words admit—"Whosoever cannot but observe within himself the (natural and false) desire of pre-eminence (φιλοπρωτεύειν), let him humble himself on this very account; let him acknowledge that on account of the desire to be the first which is deeply fixed in his heart, he is really the last—therefore, for the very purpose of impressing this on the contrary upon himself, with a view to wholesome resignation and self-denial, let him become externally, as is right he should, the servant of all!"

Verse 37. This saying, with which Luke begins, ver. 48, and whose abbreviated form is found in Matt. ver. 5, is repeated here entire from Matt. x. 40. It appears, therefore, that the promise there applied to the twelve with special honor, is now extended in similar terms to the very smallest child; this is precisely the meaning and the design of its repetition in this place. "Do not suppose it is applicable to you alone, or even to you chiefly: I declare it to be the Father's will that every one of those little ones in whom not only I begin with my whole grace to dwell and to work, but also the Father who is in me and one with me, shall be received and acknowledged; not despised or offended, but humbly honored and served, as much as the greatest."

It is very natural that John should have felt himself impelled to make a confession, somewhat as if he were putting a question, in regard to an act of injury which had taken place in violation of this statement. The proud heart might have been too ready, as the disciples hitherto had been, to appropriate exclusively to itself such great promises, and to conclude, "We aught therefore to be received for his name's sake which we acknowledge and bear upon us." But the word of the Lord, "one such little child," gives rise to the counter-question, "Shall we really thus esteem and received every other man, on whom we find thy name? has, then, every one who chooses to own and to use thy name a right forthwith to do so, without first becoming connected with us?"* The "I" which broke out in the contest of the disciples among themselves, about pre-eminence, has no sooner been dismissed, than it immediately returns, at least in the shape of a common "We" of the disciples set up against others. John does not mean to take upon himself exclusively the blame of the κωλύειν or forbidding: hence we cannot reasonably find here an expression indicating any highly impulsive character peculiarly belonging to him, such as we have in Luke ix. 54.* John, by this, rather shows that he had felt our Lord's remark (rather than Peter, who, not apprehending so promptly the meaning of the sayings about humility, laid them up in his heart). Under this feeling he begins in the name of all to ask and to confess, "Was then what we did not right?" It is only in this way that we can understand the interjected ἀποκρίνεσθαι or "answering;" it is exactly because it is used of John that we cannot suppose him to have said nor to have asserted, "Was not this certainly right?" Nor can we suppose, as some have done with extreme perversity, that we have here an example of arrogance of spirit aptly condemned. In the honest narratives of the transactions of this period, there is to be noticed the echo of the tone and feeling which prevailed at the time: εἴδομέν τινα, "we saw one," looking down upon him somewhat slightingly. This "somebody" perhaps one of John's disciples who had not yet begun externally to follow Jesus; or perhaps even a believer who took the liberty of pursuing his own separate path, but had in reality cast out devils in the name of Jesus (more than one devil, Luke expressly τὰ δαιμόνια); and had not merely "made the attempt to do so," was not such a one as the sons of Sceva (Acts xix. 13), but one who could do more with his faith, which was by no means feeble, than the disciples themselves (Mark ix. 28) were able to accomplish. Perhaps they felt annoyed at this, if the event happened at a later period. Enough, they forbade him; and why? He follows not us. Oh, how often even till the present day have Christians had nothing more to object to their fellow-Christians than this! In Luke the expression appears somewhat softened: οὐκ ἀκολουθεῖ μεθ' ἡμῶν, "he followeth not with us;" that is, he followeth not thee with us,† in our company. (Still, this may be the Greek construction of ἀκολουθεῖν with μετά (of which Pricaeus on Luke has given examples), as in Rev. xiv. 13. We prefer taking this view, because in this case the reply of our Lord οὐ καθ' ὑμῶν comes in with effect.) Then, also, in the exact version of Mark—"he followeth not us"—there is a sharp, self-condemning, self-convicting expression of that proud imagination in which the "we and us" almost forgets the Lord himself; in which they intrude into the place of him, to follow whom is and must ever be the great concern.

* This is quite a correct connection. There is, therefore, no vestige whatever of what Neander supposes; viz., that John, from misconception, without understanding the proper sense of the expression, took a strange view of the words, "My name." The want of understanding is in this case rather in the expositor.

* Niemeyer in his Charakteristik, for example, generally rather peculiar, says, with half truth, "A noble soul is commonly at first intolerant." Braune has a more correct and finer observation, "John was, perhaps, in the least degree too quick in forbidding; but he soon repented of it in his heart, and was not long in feeling the guilt of the deed."

Verses 39, 40. The humble and timid question, which the disciples could scarcely venture to utter, is abruptly and decisively responded to by the instructive answer of our Lord, which, taking the particular case by the roots, gives forth a general and deeply impressive utterance, and one which it becomes our own age (as Braune well remarks) to lay particularly to heart. The confessed prohibition he prohibits in turn; and then in a condescending manner assigns his reasons for doing so. "Never forbid after this the casting out of devils in my name, either to one man or another in a similar case:" the αὐτόν, "him," thus brings out the indefinite τινά, "one"—so that "any one who may do so" is meant—(the future with οὐδείς γάρ indicate the same thing). In former times, Num. xi. 26–29, Joshua would have forbidden the two men, Eldad and Medad, when they prophesied in the camp, the Spirit of God being upon them, on the ground that in regard to external order they were not connected with the others; but he did not know that they were accepted before God, and that they had only not gone out with the others to the tabernacle. Moses even in that age did not regard their formal defect, proceeding apparently from an innocent mistake, as a reason for depriving them of the Spirit which had been bestowed upon them (supposing this in his power), but, on the contrary, gave expression to the large-hearted wish that the whole people of the Lord might prophesy; and most assuredly there can be no such thing now, under the grace of the New Testament, which works at large and unconstrained, as a confining of the Spirit of the Lord to this or to that place, to the communion of this or of that party. The Spirit bloweth where he listeth: where is the man who will or can hinder him? Wherever devils are cast out, there is the Spirit of God, Matt. xii. 27, 28; wherever the name of Jesus is confessed, the confessor of that name is accepted before God, whether he stands in our roll or not. This, at least, is the view which our Lord, in the first instance, teaches us to take of this incident, in so far as our own knowledge and conduct are concerned. He extends the special case of casting out devils to the general idea of ποιεῖν δύναμιν, working a miracle, i. e., effecting or performing any thing, in his name; and thus, in condemning the disciples, negatives the manifest conclusion to which they had been brought. Anticipating a case which might occur, he says, graciously and convincingly—"Whosoever uses my name for a good work, so that virtue and the Spirit are manifest, will not be able forthwith, shortly thereafter, to reproach or revile me, as for example to attribute my own casting out of devils to Beelzebub." For, as John Von Müller says, "he will be convinced by it," viz., that there resides in my name an effective power of truth. Or he will not probably prove such an inconsistent and perverse man as ταχύ, "lightly," forthwith, almost in the same moment, to revile him whose name he himself had used with such effect. Compare the expression of the apostle, 1 Cor. xii. 3, which may be understood as meaning that to confess Jesus as Lord, with the powerful conviction inwrought by the Spirit, and at the same time to curse him, cannot co-exist in the same individual. But how now? Are there really none who call Jesus Lord, and yet not in the power of the Holy Ghost? Were there really no hypocritical miscreants who yet cast out devils and removed mountains? (Matt. vii. 22, 23; 1 Cor. xiii. 2.) Assuredly no where do we find it asserted that the working of many miracles (ποιεῖν δυνάμεις πολλάς) is a sure proof of real communion with Jesus. We remark that in the ταχύ there lies concealed something like this, "Ye should wait a little before ye judge and forbid." Is there then really no one who may unwarrantably perform deeds in the name of the Lord? Certainly; but to know such is reserved for the Searcher of hearts, or for us after successive manifest evidences of hostility towards the Lord. We observe, therefore, that the Lord can mean by the general statement which he appears to lay down without any exception only this—"It becomes you thus to think; ye ought, in every case, in the first instance, lovingly and humbly to assume it to be so, so long as ye see nothing else than what ye tell me, a good effect resulting from the use of my name against the kingdom of the wicked one, in the confession and conduct of any one." That this is the proper sense becomes still more evident in the following verse, which certainly rejects the οὐκ ἀκολουθεῖ ἡμῖν, "he followeth not us," as an insufficient reason. This following statement can by no means be regarded as unconditionally true in all cases, any more than the preceding one; for many may take the name of Christ into their lips, may preach his Gospel ἐξ ἐριθείας and προφάσει, "of contention" and "in pretence," Phil. i. 16–18. But the great apostle, when he leaves in the background the εἴτε προφάσει εἴτε ἀληθείᾳ, "whether in pretence or in truth," and that in a case which left little room for doubt—when he suffers not his joy at the preaching of Christ to be disturbed by the hostility manifested against himself—speaks and acts in the spirit of the Lord's statement now before us, which dictates to us nothing but the modest presumption of good in others with which it is proper for us to act.

Verse 40. We remark, by way of introduction, that the reading ὑμῶν, you, instead of ἡμῶν, us, in Mark is undoubtedly the correct one, and this both on internal and external grounds. This passage is one of those which show clearly the necessity of a revision of Luther's Bible; for the "us," put here into the mouth of our Lord, disturbs and almost destroys the whole sense of his most important saying. The fault of the disciples is exactly this, that they presume to set up an externally visible communion with themselves, instead of communion with the Lord, as a mark by which to judge a man; and the exact way in which our Lord expresses his disapprobation of this is by employing a "You," sharply turning away the case from himself, so as to form the counterpart to their proud "We." Ye need not at once conclude that whoever is not with you is against you; ye should rather take it for granted until something to the contrary appears that he is for you. Moreover, there would be room for many mistakes if the expressions "against you," or even "not with you," were made a test—but "to be also not with me," that is, "against me," is an unerring test. We may look back upon the other correlative saying, Matt. xii. 30 (Luke xi. 23): "He cannot and he will not so bind himself up with his people, not even on any one occasion with his apostles, as to sanction the maxim of man's judgment, no salvation without our Church, or our communion; he lays down the 'You' in strict opposition to this." (Let this be repeated from p. 230.) Our Lord, on one occasion, says, "Our friend Luzarus," John xi. 11; "That we may not give offence," Matt. xvii. 27; and on one single occasion, with a far reaching sense, "Thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousnesss," Matt. iii. 15. But this is the whole: every where he discriminates exactly, and uses the "we" only in connection with outward circumstances. Here, at least, it was impossible for him to say, "we;" for it is exactly in opposition to the presumption and rash judgment of the disciples that he is constrained to discriminate between communion with him, which in most cases can be known for certain only by himself, and communion with them. Olshausen fails to perceive the exact meaning of the saying, inasmuch as he applies to different persons the two sayings which are meant mutually to supplement and limit each other: "He who has been called to spiritual service must be against the Lord and his cause if he is not engaged in positively promoting it; but he who has been called to less than this, yea, he who stands dependent spiritually upon his superiors, is reckoned as on the side of the cause of God, if he only keeps himself free from the wide-spread hostile influences that are around him." For the "whosoever" in both sayings lays down a rule which is entirely general; to discriminate the sphere of its operation on both sides must be effected in another way. Every one, as we have remarked on Matt. xii. 30, is called to spiritual work of some kind or other; but it is not always necessary for him to proceed according to the form and manner of this or of that community of the called.

The well-known treatise of Elwert (Studien d. Evang. Geistl. Würtembergs), has in like manner entirely failed to bring out the sense; the author supposes the great difference between the two sayings to lie in the μετά τινος and the ὑπέρ τινος εἶναι, or the being with one and on one's part, the former according to him denoting inward unity of heart, and the latter outward community and operation. We might as well on the contrary take μετά as denoting mere companionship and expressed co-operation (as this undeniably is its ordinary use), and ὑπέρ, on the other hand, internal relationship. For that ὑπέρ literally denotes by itself a relation of working, of acting in favor or in behalf of another, is an entirely groundless assertion, although Ullmann repeats it (in the treatise hereafter to be named). At all events the ὑπέρ τινος εἶναι does not point to work, but to internal condition and feeling.

In the second saying, Mark ix. and Luke ix., so far as regards its commencing clause, or the οὐκ ἔστι καθ' ὑμῶν, "is not against you," it is certain that our Lord is not speaking immediately of the state of mind or internal relation to the followers of Christ, and consequently to Christ himself; though we cannot, consistently with truth, affirm with Elwert that the whole statement has nothing whatever to do with this internal relation. For how can the words "is for you," merely mean "he is serving your cause," "promoting your objects?" It is certainly not to be supposed that the apostles had a cause other than that of Christ, an object different from what he had; Elwert himself acknowledges that "the cause of the apostles is here to be regarded as identical with that of Christ." When our Lord, in the first saying, proceeds to remark, "Whoever gathers not with me scatters abroad" (this certainly refers to work), he asserts the inseparable connection between inward state and outward work, as we have explained the passage.* According to this clear statement we must deny that the "undecided" may in the very least "be profitable to the cause of Christ."

The contrast of both sayings lies, therefore, manifestly in something altogether different. First and foremost in this, that in the one case, the Lord says "against me," and in the other case, "against you." How can any one overlook this? Assuredly in relation to the person of Christ, there can be no μετά, "with," of mere external communion, least of all in the intention, since he is here speaking as the Searcher of hearts and the Judge of hearts, not only about temporal relations, but also in regard to all future time, and in reference to both kingdoms. In the second saying he adds

*Elwert's evasion is very naive: "The gathering and the scattering is only a continuation, in the form of a proverbial saying, of what had been formerly affirmed, and the words are not to be taken literally." The acknowledgment sadly betrays his own want of understanding; in any other case there would be no possibility of comparing the two sayings!

this: "To be with me must not be supposed necessarily the same as to be with you, in a manner that shall be visible and subject to your judgment." For, in the second place, there is the clear difference: Christ, the Searcher of hearts, pronounces a decisive judgment, makes it manifest to the heart of each; but in our case, where no such judgment can exist, all that is required in the ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐστιν, "is for you," is manifestly a kind assumption, a taking for granted in the meantime. "Let such a one be to you as if he were for you (and for me)—until something occurs which proves him to be the reverse. Speak thus of him."

Elwert, without any reason, introduces into the case the very questionable position, that "absolute decision for Christ may not strictly be assumed of any one"—that to demand this "in order to a work rich in blessing," will in the end "destroy the Church itself and all activity in it on behalf of Christ." Such an assertion is exactly the opposite of the first saying in Matt. xii. 30. What in this is relatively true, will always, at the same time, have an influence upon practice; thus the meaning to the apostles might have been—"In so far as any one is still undecided, in so far he acts against your cause and mine." But to understand our Lord as saying, "Whosoever is only not absolutely against me may, with some degree of blessing, work on my behalf,"* is the very thing which the former statement has sharply and unquestionably denied.

Christ in the second statement refers not merely to the toleration, so dear to some, of imperfection and half decision (this in us may be appropriate)—not at all to the blessing in the objective power of the means of salvation irrespective of the personal character of him who administers them, etc. These are matters irrelevant to the subject on hand. But he testifies, in the verbally clear contrast of the two sayings, that communion of being and of working with him (these two are inseparable, and both are imperatively necessary) is not altogether bound up with the communion of external fellowship, association, participation with his people. There is here a contrast, but there is no contradiction. We see scarcely an appearance of contradiction in the two sayings as soon as we take them in their proper literal sense, without turning aside to general, irrelevant thoughts.

We do not therefore understand how Ullmann can set out with the assumption of a contradiction to be solved—as he has done recently in a treatise on the supposed problem (Deutsche Zeitschr. fur Christl. Wissensch. etc. 1851. No. 3, 4).† Even he finds first and foremost in the second saying the proposition "that every one who is only not against Christ is for him"—a proposition which neither was nor could be uttered. Even he appears not to observe that Elwert's result is an entire misinterpretation, and endeavors to find in the difference of the prepositions μετὰ and ὑπέρ (a difference of little moment in this passage), a false key. In the end, however, he comes to a right conclusion, as we have already seen he did once before—that in the second saying our "Lord does not so much speak about the relation to himself as about the relation of fellowship with his disciples." Our view, on the other hand, is that the contrast and difference are clear without any "not so much" of qualification. What Ullmann regards merely as a secondary difference we regard as the first, the very decisive, and assuredly the only one—"that in the more severe saying our Lord speaks in the singular and in the first person, and, therefore, only of himself, of his own person; but in the milder saying, on the other hand, in the plural and in the second person, and, therefore, of the disciples and of fellowship with them." This we thought we had set forth long since in our exposition, and that we had deduced every thing which rightly flows from it: that it is not in the state of the soul and conscience towards Christ that the fundamental difference is to be explained; there, there is an absolute "either—or" as to being on the side of Christ, as to working with him, as to being united with him; this internal relation, however, always remains in some respects not perfectly cognizable to human eye and judgment. No Christian community, therefore, no visible Church, however constituted, may adopt the fault of Roman Catholicism and say that there is no communion with Christ and his people except in it.

We earnestly beg the reader's pardon for this digression on the exegetical literature of the day; we have been led into it by a desire to indicate once for all, on some prominent passage, the relation in which we stand to it. We return from this digression to our usual course, and observe in conclusion, that we must mark, consider, examine the immediate occasion and cause of the action and word of the apostle John, in order rightly to understand the reply and the rule here given by Christ. The faithful and wise Teacher lays hold of this individual case in its deep general significance and symbolical import; he sees here all Popery in the widest sense of the word in its kernel, rising in the assuming We of his beloved apostles; and therefore he decidedly rejects and condemns it for all time to come. His word rebukes the smallest beginnings of assumption, as well as its full development in the "Church which alone confers salvation;" it protests against all restraining and quenching of the Spirit with rules, forms, and pretensions which have their origin in "Us," against all binding of the gifts of grace to any communion or succession, against all narrow-mindedness of confession, system, and method. Our Lord is most assuredly a God of order in his Church; and inculcates upon his people, as the rule, fellowship with each other, and, so far as possible, exact uniformity. But inasmuch as his people are very much inclined to misunderstand this order, and to substitute, first, the best form, and also by degrees some other form, instead of the internal reality—for this very reason his Spirit makes exceptions, and he himself gives us in this passage the rule for these exceptions in the last extremity, as well as for a whole wide field of human assumption which will quickly see unjustifiable exceptions. Oh, how far and deeply does his brief master-saying penetrate, if only the hearts of his disciples were willing to receive it! "Bind no man so to your doctrine as that ye shall say, he speaks not as we speak, therefore we regard it not though he also as well as we owns and praises our Lord. Bind not the people to your ways—Whosoever does not as we do, does not right. Finally, never in this, or in any other sense, bind any one to your communion unconditionally—Whosoever does not adhere to us does not follow us, but is regarded by us as one who is not a follower of the Lord." Our Lord speaks on this subject in the spirit of kind concession, because he has the apostles in his presence:* in our case there may be very good reason for a man being against us and yet no opponent of the Lord; it may rather be in obedience to our Lord's will that he is opposing what is faulty in us. But, finally, even where an organization among ourselves may be compared to the circle of the apostles, the rule of the Master remains in its integrity. Peter, John, and James, durst not have said to Paul, "Thou mayest not preach the name of Jesus, we know he hath not called thee," even though Paul had inquired after them still less than he did, and had carefully avoided altogether their communion.

* As Elwert, p. 128, understands the second saying, and pays no attention to the fact that the expression is not ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ in this case. This certainly is not to notice the chief point.

† We still less understand the praise there (p. 22) bestowed upon the totally useless treatise of Elwert. But certainly exposition, proceeding strictly from the word, is so little a matter of concern with these systematic and historic theologians, that even Ullmann himself begins with the commentators in expounding his views: some take this, and others take that, as the object of the saying. Oh that our interpreters would first of all read and reflect upon the text and its connection! I first read it myself, and then consult the commentaries.

Verses 41, 42. In these verses Mark again turns into the train of thought in Matthew: first, a further retrospect towards those sayings, Matt. x. 40–42; and secondly, in opposition, the warning against giving offence, the ground and meaning of which we have already set forth in our exposition of Matthew. (The correct reading is undoubtedly ἐν ὀνόματι ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἐστε—although this form, common at a later period in the writings of Paul, occurs no where in the four Gospels except in the passage before us.) The expressions of the Lord alternate between kindness and severity, between promise and warning. Scarcely has the Saviour expressed disapprobation of the assumption of the disciples, who would not acknowledge as a follower the man who followed not them, than he begins again to assure them of the dignity and honor which still remained for them in the presence of the Lord (assuredly here, according to ver. 37, common to them with every little child), and scarcely is this said to them than they are again impressively exhorted to avoid on their part offending any little one. For, that in the kingdom of heaven we should be loving children, honoring one another reciprocally and equally, is, as we have already seen on Matthew, the fundamental thought of the whole of this saying of the Lord.

Verses 43—48. Mark does not give here, "according to his usual way," a paraphrastic version. What Matthew has drawn in brief stands here in its original fulness. It is not to be imagined that the strong, thrice-repeated, astounding expression concerning the worm and the fire had its origin any where else than in the lips of our Lord himself; and here as the natural sequence of this expression, we find a corresponding threefold word concerning the hand, and foot, and eye. The import of the saying we have already expounded in the Sermon on the Mount, and afterwards at Matt. xviii.; we may here notice the very regular distribution of the particular expressions so as to produce a significant variety in the repetition. To go "into life," "to enter into life," "to enter into the kingdom of God"—this is the one series, over against which are the alternates and counterpart "to go away into hell," "into fire unquenchable," "to be cast into hell fire." This is not a wide and empty fulness of words, but a solemn and emphatic address which presents to the mind at each turn a new view of the important matter. Πῦρ ἄσβεστον, unquenchable fire, does not refer to the language of John the Baptist; but is an original application of the terrific threefold warning quoted in the following clause from Isaiah, a quotation which Mark alone gives us. The excellent J. F. Von Meyer—a man too little known in the theological world, and whose grateful scholar I shall ever with pleasure acknowledge myself, without, however, adopting from him what I regard as erroneous, and in whose doctrine, particularly of the final quenching of the fire, I can never sympathize—threw out on one occasion, referring in a letter to this passage, the brief expression, in opposition to my views: "Thrice is less than once." This expression, if I understand any thing at all by it, can only mean that a proverbial saying is not to be interpreted too strictly in a doctrinal matter. There would be some truth in this, were it the case that our Lord was uttering a mere proverbial saying; not, however, to the extent of enfeebling the essential fundamental thought. Our Lord, however, is quoting a passage of Scripture (which had certainly become a proverbial saying in Israel), as is manifest from the αὐτῶν, "their," quoted literally from Isa. lxvi. 24, and the use of which had not been occasioned by any thing hitherto said. (Nay more, he strengthens the expression there to a certain extent by the simple finally decisive οὐ τελευτᾷ, οὐ σβέννυται instead of the future in Isaiah, οὐ τελευτήσει, οὐ σβεσθήσεται; in like manner by leaving out the second αὐτῶν, whereby, as absolutely confirming the ἄσβεστον, there remains the pure, plain expression τὸ πῦρ οὐ σβέννυται!) We dare set nothing over against this, we dare not consider it as an indefinite Old Testament expression, such as we have in 2 Kings xxii. 17; Isa. i. 31, xxxiv. 10, and in similar passages; but as a clause expressing the full truth corresponding to such typical passages as those which stand (Rev. xiv. 11, xx. 10) at the end of the New Testament and of the whole sacred volume. Least of all is it conceivable by us how "death itself can, shall, and must die of its own sting, and hell of its own pestilence."

We have already seen how thoroughly the Lord, when quoting passages especially from Isaiah, opens up their depth of meaning. We have here a new proof of this. There (chap. lxvi. 22) the eternal existence and endurance of the seed and name of the righteous before God in the new heaven and the new earth had been dwelt on in the preceding clauses: corresponding to this we have here (ver. 24) the perpetuity of the dishonor and shame and suffering and pain of the condemned. Over this there may be thrown there a certain drapery of figurative language; here our Lord brings forward the real truth in the most unfigurative language—the same Lord who, in Matt. xiii. 30, 40–42, knew no other way of explaining the figurative fire except by the literal fire. What Judith, with Jewish pride (xvi. 20, 21), addresses merely to the heathen, who torment the people of God, and Sirach vii. 17 (19) to all the ungodly in general—our Lord here, though he is in the very midst of a most friendly address, in which he accommodates himself graciously to little ones and children, threatens to these his own ransomed beloved, blessed little children, if they will not perfect holiness by self-denial and the mortification of their own sin. The worm (in the first instance emphatic instead of "worms") denotes here the internal corruption proceeding from death itself; see Job xvii. 14, xxi. 26; Isa. xiv. 11; Sir. x. 11; the fire, the destruction of a corpse, anticipating the worm, and proceeding from without, such as took place in the valley of Hinnom, and not a mere reference to the custom of burning instead of burying—this is the idea which gave rise to the expression in Isaiah, where mention is made of the carcasses of the people who had sinned against the Lord. Whatever is represented as pictorially horrible in bodily death is wrought up into an inconceivable figure, and predicated of the peculiar horror of second and eternal death. The word of prophecy here announces that both the worm and the fire are together; although in the imperfect figure it is only the one or the other that can exist, because the one excludes the other. And what in the case of the undying death is the import of the one and the other in their duality? Even those come short of the right sense who understand by the worm the gnawings of conscience in the soul, and by the fire the burning pain of the body; because both are applied in Isaiah to the body, as they are here in the mouth of the Lord to the body of sin and death with its unmortified members. In the resurrection, the whole is indissolubly reunited: body and soul enjoy together the bliss of life, or experience together the pain of death. The worm, therefore, rather denotes the self-corruption, the self-infliction of the man who has been doomed to death; and the fire the effect, corresponding to this, of the righteousness and holiness of the living God. But the consuming fire cannot annihilate the worm; the worm cannot die by being consumed so that the fire finding nothing more to prey on should be quenched.* These are hard, terrible secrets: may grace save us from understanding them in the depths of Satan, Rev. ii. 24! The expositor can only intimate that they are set forth in plain and certain words.

Verse 49. We have again an extremely simple and plain statement, if we consider it in regard to its literal import. To grasp its meaning, however, in the connection in which it occurs, is one of the most difficult efforts that exegesis ever made—an effort which can succeed only by a profound insight into those fundamental ideas which are peculiarly biblical, and by renouncing every ἰδία ἐπίλυσις or "private interpretation" of the sacred word. We begin to spell out the passage with πᾶς, "every one," and inquire who is meant by it. It has been correctly observed that the masculine πᾶς is always connected with something understood which limits or defines its general character. What is this here? Erasmus translated "omnis homo sicut omnis victima" (every man as every victim). It is soon seen, however, that this is too wide a grasp. For, in this case, to "be salted with fire," must denote, or at least include, the pain of eternal fire. We learn, however, from the second clause as well as from the following verse, that in reality the salting must denote the opposite of the consuming, agonizing burning; if indeed this is not apparent in these two words themselves. We include here, as it is proper we should, the γάρ, "for," which certainly belongs not to the immediately preceding sentence, but to the entire threefold exhortation—Cut it off and pluck it out, for it is better for thee! This "for" introduces the strong, clear, and urgent consideration, "Let not this trouble and terrify you, for there is no other way; we must be prepared by fire and salt for God as a sacrifice—that is, if we would escape eternal fire." Therefore, Every man who would not come into Gehenna, but would obtain the better part. Not, as many think (that we may guard against misunderstandings beforehand)—Every one who will not be salted by willing resignation and self-denial, must sink into the fire! For, as was said, the salting fire, in common with the salt, denotes the opposite of the πῦρ ἄσβεστον. "To salt," does not signify "to destroy;" but "to preserve," "to render durable and acceptable." Although that fire assuredly never completes its work of destruction, yet this is alone what, as pure fire, its object is; and that those who burn in it are never consumed by it, but unceasingly endure it, does not arise from the fire, but from the undying worm. Our Lord does not institute any comparison between those who are condemned in fire and the burnt-offerings—or between those who are sanctified and the meat-offerings—as we shall see if we read and spell on without bringing to the passage any new idea of our own. Πᾶσα θυσία, "every sacrifice," is strictly parallel with πᾶς; and the θυσία, according to the passage quoted from the law, means not merely the מִנְחָה or offering: the "and" between the two clauses is manifestly also, indeed properly speaking exactly, equivalent to, "as;"* for, whatever is salted with the salt of the covenant (and this might be done with fire or merely with salt), is certainly an acceptable offering.

The Lord has a little before quoted a passage of Scripture which rests upon a similitude taken from nature; he now quotes, in the literal ἅλι ἁλισθήσεται, "shall be salted with salt," the passage from the Mosaic law of sacrifices, Lev. ii. 13, but gives to this ordinance a sense, in the connection in which it occurs in his discourse, which unfolds its typical import. The future intimates that the ordinance is to be retained and perpetuated in New Testament times. Dost thou ask, as a theologian, where Christ has taught and established a system of typology? Thou hast here the indisputably clear axiomatic utterance of his mouth, in which he deliberately takes for granted an essentially valid sense, not merely for this particular passage, but of course for the whole ceremonial law in which it occurs. We cannot certainly write a book within a book upon the whole typological system of the Levitical sacrifices; still the main features of this system may be briefly indicated. First, as to the burnt-offering to which the fire in this passage points us—What is shown, what is meant by the fire in which the sacrifice was consumed and ascended to God? Bähr† has recently repudiated very decidedly the old view according to which there was nothing in this fire except the hell fire of eternal condemnation. Kurtz,* also, who generally opposes him, is not disposed to acknowledge this fire as any thing but the emblem of purification and holiness; agreeing with Bähr, he finds an irrefragable proof of this "in the similar and simultaneous burning of the meat-offering with the sacred incense, oil, and salt." We are not disposed altogether to resist these consideration to the extent of renewing the old limited view; as little, however, can we altogether agree with them. For, although it be admitted, on the one side, that the fire as a sweet-smelling savor of the Lord must indicate a reconciliation to his good pleasure—i. e., the offering was accepted by God as an offering of propitiation; and grace and not wrath was manifested in this, that "the Lord has his fire in Sion and his furnace in Jerusalem" (Isa. xxxi. 9)—still, on the other hand, it must be maintained, as Kurtz at least knew well, that in this reconciliation the punishment was inflicted upon the victim offered in sacrifice—the avenging sentence of the merited death and destruction. And this, in our opinion, lies not merely in the preceding slaughter and shedding of blood, but quite as much in the consuming fire; just as the putting to death contains in it a returning to life in order to pleasing God, an offering presented as if it were something living in death. The burnt-offering is in the first instance Christ, and in the second place we in him. Now, therefore, exactly in so far as the wrath of God, and death as the wages of sin, have to do with the death of Christ, who yet is life, and gives us life, to the same extent, and neither more nor less, does the eternal fire belong to the fire of the altar of burnt-offering. Of this fire, not without the most significant connection with that of which our Lord has spoken, it is written, "the fire on the altar shall burn, and shall never be put out; eternally shall the fire burn upon the altar, and shall never be put out" (Lev. vi. 12, 13). Compare for the individual offering, ver. 9. Here both are embraced in one: the warning allusion to the fire which consumes in righteous wrath; together with the reconciling grace which converts this same fire of holy love, into which we must all enter in fellowship with the Saviour given for us, from a destroying into a quickening fire, into a propitiation. The fire assuredly is, in reality, only one, and of one kind. Kurtz speaks in the first place of light and warmth; in the second place of a quickening, and therefore of a purifying efficacy; and in the third place of death bringing destruction as what is yet to come (p. 89, 90). This connection is correct; but the order must be reversed. In the first instance, as is clear in nature and Scripture, fire consumes; and if there were no sin in us the light of God would never be fire to us. It purifies and quickens us only in so far as it condemns and casts out sin, puts death itself to death, Isa. iv. 4.* Wherefore, also, in the unburnt meat-offering which denotes the new life, praise, and obedience, there is at least an intimation of the fire in the salt; as the salt, on the other hand, is seen in the sin-offering and trespass-offering, as confirming the covenant, and preserving before God.

* The so-called ϟ exæquationis; thus both Fritzche and De Wette regard it here.

† Whose well meant purpose to consider the symbol as such, without regard to type, is impracticable, and must, therefore, necessarily involve him in many errors. We cannot thus separate what God has joined together.

We have now reached the very heart of the matter; and may understand the expression before us, in which our Lord designs not merely to point us to a single isolated precept, but to give us a key to the centre of the whole sacrificial system. He speaks at once of the fire and the salt of the sacrifices; embraces both in one by the one word ἁλισθήσεται, which he applies to both. "Fire is salt and salt is fire"—says Stilling.† "The salt is a condensed embodiment of fire"—writes Von Meyer.‡ We have here, however, a solution not only of the apparent but of the real opposition; sacrificial symbolism supplies us with the key. The same fire of the divine purity, holiness, and love, which must, in the future state, unquenchably burn the unclean, the impure, and the dead in eternal destruction, must, at least in this world, salt every one who would come into contact with it, must sanctify him by putting to death every thing within him that is worthy of death, by a gracious, condemning, purifying destruction of the sin, accompanied by the deliverance of the sinner. This, and nothing but this, is the thought of the Lord: see 1 Pet. iv. 12, 17; Luke xxiii. 31. But he expresses this in the typical language of sacrifice; both because this language supplied him with the briefest and most comprehensive expression, and because in Isaiah, whose concluding words he had quoted, two of the preceding verses had affirmed that the saints should be brought to the Lord for a meat-offering, Isa. lxvi. 20, compare lx. 7; Mal. i. 11; Rom. xv. 16. Even the fire consumes only that which is combustible: if the worm in Gehenna should die, the fire also would be extinguished, and there would remain in the ashes the pure salt, the basis of things allied to fire, and which resists all destruction as well as corruption. Now the grace of God in the sacrifice converts for us the fire itself into salt; yea, it covers and softens, to the greatest possible extent, its unavoidable effect, in the mere salt. Salt, in the Old Testament, although it is called, Lev. ii. 13, "the salt of the covenant of thy God," and mention is made, Num. xviii. 19, "of an eternal covenant of salt," does not depend for its meaning on any allusion, such as has been derived from profane writers, to a common, friendly meal—like the eastern and western proverb "to eat with another a bushel of salt"—but on an allusion to its being akin to fire, to which, at the same time, it is a marked opposite.* Salt is imperishable, it resists the action of fire, it has an indestructible endurance; salt also makes what it salts thus durable; still it does this exactly by its burning power and effect, bringing with it in another form the salutary fire. This is the covenant of God with man; the covenant of delivering and preserving grace with the sinner in the sacrifice of reconciliation.† It has been falsely supposed that no salt was applied to the burnt-offering; but the regulation for the meat-offering, Lev. ii. 13, is extended in the concluding sentence to every offering (כָּל־קָרְבָּנְךָ; and קָרְבָּן is the general name for all offerings, Lev. i. 2). Our Lord accordingly says here πᾶσα θυσία, and in Ezek. xliii. 24, the burnt-offering is salted, to show that the fire has been changed from a killing into a preserving fire.‡ The salt of the offering is certainly not (as Michaelis in his Typische Gottesgelahrtheit, pp. 63, 64, and Oetinger in his Wörterbuch, p. 426, singularly enough, considering the miserable mistake, agree for once), the rendering of it indestructible for the eternal fire of vengeance.§ The mere salting, finally, is the mild-

* It by no means follows, however, as Von Meyer once wrote to me, that "the eternal fire consumes only sin, this being what is represented by the animal sacrifices;" for the question is, Can sin in any case be separated from the sinner in the way of judgment, destruction, without faith in grace?

† Hence at the highest point the two appear once in complete unity (Deut. xxix. 23).

‡ "The nature of salt is of itself fiery," says Pliny (Nat. Hist. 31).

* We cannot (like Bähr, Stud. u. Krit. 1849, 3) hold to the sense of the covenant from the passage in the Pentateuch as the only one which the Lord must have had exclusively in view; for, that passage does not exclude, it rather suggests, a wider sense (if we correctly understand the covenant according to its radical idea); and the Lord manifestly speaks of salt and fire in regard to the effects which they produce. We leave our readers to compare our exegesis with the treatise of Bähr, which, correct though it be in many respects, does not apprehend the proper kernel and connection.

† "Salt is what preserves the earth, and fire and wind (spirit) are concealed in salt. Take dust by itself, its power arises from its combination with salt" (Visions of a Prophetess, Hamburg: by Perthes, ii. 172). "The basis of all matter is salt, as is seen when any substance is burned and the ashes all washed" (Von Meyer, as above, i. 336, where there is also given an explanation of Isa. li. 6, different from the common one, and which makes the word parallel to the rags of Jer. xxxviii. 11, 12).

‡ On the use of salt in heathen sacrifices, see Rosenmulleri Scholia on the passage in Leviticus.

§ Compare Oetinger, as edited by Auberlen, p. 151, etc. "In order that the fire of hell may do him no harm, he must be salted with fire; i. e., he must be pervaded by the heavenly corporeity of the flesh and blood of Jesus." Is this exegesis? The modern resuscitation of Oetinger renders it necessary to advert to his errors and confusions. Very frequently only his fundamental ideas are correct· est form of exempting and preserving against all other fire.

Of what, therefore, does our Lord speak in ver. 49, after he had previously spoken of hell-fire? He means and he very plainly mentions three processes in relation to ourselves. The terrible portion, which is the final issue, is the proper consuming fire. The better portion which he advises us too choose, and which he recommends to us as a voluntary self-offering, is to allow ourselves to be sanctified by the salting salt. In the middle between these there stands an intermediate clause—the salting fire; and of this also he says that every one must experience it, that no one without a burnt-offering can become a meat-offering before God.* He intends to teach that in order to escape condemnation, there remain for us two means of becoming holy and happy. Nitzsch, in his sermon on the Saying before us, names these with perfect accuracy: "The salt of truth, and the fire of affliction." Braune calls the salt, "Evangelical doctrine, the truth of the Gospel." The mere being salted would thence denote the voluntary purification of our souls, in obeying the truth through the Spirit (1 Pet. i. 22): thus the life which mortifies the old man would enter in the gentlest manner possible, although even thus the Gospel must show its burning power against sin. For, "the holiness of God, manifested with the grace of God, in all its consequences, effects, and demands, is the salt of truth of which we speak"—grace chastises us so severely for the denial of our ungodly nature, that "we must read in the last sufferings of our dying Redeemer, that if we sin willingly there remains no more sacrifice for sin." But who has become an offering of God without the aid of affliction which, through the accompanying help of God, constrains us to obedience? Consequently, we must not sever the two united means of grace; they always go in every variety of way together, as the Lord here embraces them in one view. In themselves they are not entirely separated; because the salt burns as well as salts, and the fire salts as well as burns. Even the word is a fire (Jer. xxiii. 9), in the same way as the Holy Spirit is (Matt. iii. 11). Besides in every case the rod of affliction is indispensable (Heb. xii. 6–8); and, on the other hand, no affliction is salutary unless the word of God accompany it, or be recalled to our mind if we have forgotten it. Each of the two former gives efficacy to the other; but the salt is, and continues to be, assuredly the main thing even when fire accompanies it. The conflict teaches us to attend to the word (Isa. xxviii. 19), and the word renders the conflict salutary to us. Finally, if we have thus far understood our Lord, we cannot submit at the end to any limitation drawn from a theological system, as to the fire of judgments destined yet to heal and to deliver—as Bengel does, who finds it necessary to add, "in this life, however." For that a salting with fire may still be possible and real, there as well as here, in Sheol as well as on earth, as is frequently intimated elsewhere in Scripture, our Lord here is as far from denying as he is on the other hand from being able to say of his πῦρ ἄσβεστον or "fire that is not quenched," that πυρὶ ἁλισθήσεται, "it is salted by fire."

Verse 50. Our Lord passes from the fire that shall never be quenched to the fire that salts; from that remote fire to the mildest salt which contains fire. In so far as we are a meat-offering, well pleasing to God, certainly not without a burnt-offering to be prepared in the first instance; and also afterwards, in so far as we would be, and would continue to be such, among each other and before the world—are we exhorted in the most gracious manner never to suffer this salutary and necessary salt to be wanting, never to suffer it to be lost. The fire must, alas! afflict us because of sin, and itself cometh of evil; Salt is and alone remains relatively the best for us, the unmingled good (καλόν, which of itself can and will help to the καλόν ὅσι, vers. 43–48), which works out our preparation even in the fire. Hold this fast, have it, keep it, and use it well—is our Lord's word to his disciples. "The more salt there is in you, the less will you need fire." This fire stands alone in the hands of God: ignem habere non est facultatis humanae (it is not in human power to have fire). But to receive and to hold fast the power of sanctifying truth for voluntary obedience in self-denial, and to reject our own inward corruption (to forsake all that we have, as the passage in Luke, xiv. 33, 34, is again explained in harmony with the above)—this is good and beautiful. Our Lord thus returns to the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 13). The light, though contrasted with fire in its mild and beautiful illuminating power, cannot nevertheless be without the pungency of salt, in order really to do its work effectually: "would ye be the light of the world, then show yourselves also as the salt of the earth." The salt of God is good, the power of his truth and the effect of his Spirit; but ye children of men, as always previously salted yourselves with this salt, must also become another salting salt. This salt, in its secondary effect, condescendingly so-called, which salt ye are, may alas! become saltless (ἄναλον); its calling, its name, and appearance giving the lie to its nature, its vile end standing in marked contrast to its good beginning: beware of this, for man can-he fails altogether in rearing his superstructures. I regret that I have not as yet seen his special treatise Das Geheimniss vom Salz (Stuttgart, 1770). Still I can refer to his Denkmal der Lehrtafel des Prinzessin Antonia (Tübingen, 1763), where, pp. 379, 388, there is a full discussion on the Sagings of Jesus by Mark; for the critical consideration of which this is not the place. Compare what Auberlen, pp. 445, 446, has contributed on this subject.

* Therefore not as Hamann (i. 112, 113) for once superficially writes, "Instead of the fire we escape with the salt." This latter is merely "the sense of our sins, and faith in him who has extinguished the fire of sin." There is no understanding of the text here.

not be renewed and born again the second time. Has the strength of the first sacrifice become annihilated by a complete apostacy, there cannot be a second. How, in this case, would ye again help yourselves? O how many great lights of the world and of the Church, who allowed themselves to become deficient in salt first in their own hearts and houses, and by and by in all their light and teaching, have finally fallen into this condemnation! Therefore have, keep and use well, the salt of truth in yourselves—that truth which works holiness and self-denial within us, lives through the energy of grace and of the Spirit, and mortifies sin. "Then and then only shall ye have and keep peace also among yourselves as disciples." Again, "maintain peace and love, in order that ye may not lose in contentions the salt of humility:" the one acts and reacts reciprocally upon the other. Hence after this our Lord turns back to the fundamental theme of his discourse, which he had prosecuted from vers. 34, 35; and, hence, Mark may conclude with this saying, leaving out the further statements given by Matthew, xviii. 10–20. We may notice the contrast ἐν ἑαυτοῖς and ἐν ἀλλήλοις, "in yourselves" and "among one another," introduced into the unity of the necessary connection:* the inward humility, which always judges itself, and which thus rightly appreciates the real worth and greatness of the lowly and the poor, is the already valid holiness of those who are still sinners, secures the peace of love, and is secured in it. In the first instance, certainly, and above all other things, let each man judge himself only, and exercise patience and forbearance towards others. But then, in the next place, this is not enough of itself. Olshausen remarks, "As salt does not salt salt, but that which is unsalted, so also ought the vital energy of the children of God not to be dissipated in mutual strife, but applied to the quickening of the world." Very good, if all disciples and brethren were one mass of pure salt! But when a brother sins, I ought to punish him even as a brother, according to the more full directions given by our Lord in Matthew. I must show my love, working peace and bringing the influence and might of brotherhood to bear upon him in truth, not in a soft insipid style (like the pietistic reciprocal fondling of each other by the dear children of God), but according to the necessities of the case, with all sharpness of punishment. Consequently, also, "Salt yourselves one with another, in order that all together may be able to salt the world; but do this in the exercise of that lowly love which rightly exercises and rightly endures punishment." The ἐν ἑαυτοῖς and the ἐν ἀλλήλοις run mutually into each other. Let your speech (and your conduct), first, towards each other, and secondly, towards every man, be at all times not merely ἐν χάριτι, lovely and loving in forgiving grace, but, at the same time (and the genuine χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ is never any thing but this), seasoned with salt, and made effective for improvement and edification (Col. iv. 6; Eph. iv. 29). This is something more, something better than the Greek charis (grace) of amiable intercourse with one another, on which many saltless persons are again in their insipidity expending much false diligence. The salt of the disciples of Christ means something very different from the Attic salt which Stilling (Heimweh, iv. 246) though in a style not Attic, satirizes—"It is good for nothing but confectionery!" The ancient Catholic Church had in view the salt of Christ, when they used that substance at the ceremony of baptism, and on other occasions. It is only of it that the proverb in Horst's Dämonomagie holds true: "The devil cannot endure salt, and all the dishes at the devil's meals are without salt." Search many of our modern festive entertainments, and you find it alas! to be so: but be not present at such without introducing the salutary offence of the cross among the false charities, without introducing in season and out of season (2 Tim. iv. 2) your little grain of salt, provided you have any, to the vexation of Satan and to the salvation of his saltless companions in the name of the Lord. Again, ye brethren, quarrel not among yourselves, if one goes abroad and another stays at home; but punish only this in yourselves and others, that ye who are the salt of the world, instead of salting it, feed together on what is unsalted.

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

(Mark xii. 43, 44; Luke xxi. 3, 4.)

Mark preserves, in a few words (and Luke agrees with him, or copies from him, almost word for word), an externally lovely incident from the last days of our Lord—an incident which, in its simplicity, is still as fresh and expressive as ever it was. The saying of the Lord which occurs in connection with this incident is, we may observe first, the last which we have to consider of the new Sayings given by Mark; as we have resolved to follow, in the first instance, all the Evangelists only up to the history of the last sufferings. There is little of explanation needed, for the simple incident and the saying express of themselves a clear meaning: still it is right to call attention to the easily overlooked connection of the whole. Immediately after the denunciation of woes upon the Pharisees, consequently also (as Matt. xxiii. informs us) after the announcement of the judgments upon Jerusalem, and of the desolation of the temple, after the terribly sharp word of farewell, "Ye shall henceforth see me no more," he does not at once go forth—no, he sits down quietly once more to observe what is going on in this temple. By his very silence he says, "Have ye, whom I have now upbraided, any answer to return? I am ready to hear it." Before this he has had many questions put to him, and he has always been ready with his answer. In holy wrath, and in the language of rebuke called forth by the zeal of love, he has spoken his last public temple-discourse, and no man has dared to reply to him, but he lets it depend on them whether it is to be his last. He does not seek to escape from the wrath which he had provoked by his powerful rebukes, for his hour is not yet come—after such a discourse he sits quietly down. This is one general point. Still further—he sits down right opposite the treasury-chest, to observe how the people put in their contributions.* During the few preceding days he had taken a view of every thing in the temple (Mark xi. 11); he lingers here before he leaves it: for what other purpose but to manifest his condescending patient sympathy with the sanctuary, now desecrated and given over to destruction; and then to intimate symbolically what in future he would by no means fail to do in every house and sanctuary of his people as the rightful Lord and supreme guardian? It has been supposed that our Lord takes notice of the pious widow contributing out of her absolute poverty in order to draw a contrast that might put to shame the rapacity of the Pharisees, who devour widows' houses, on which he had previously been pronouncing condemnation in the 40th verse of the preceding chapter. This idea, however, appears to us to destroy the tender beauty of his conduct and of his saying. We suppose that after the lamentation of his Saviour-heart, as recorded Matt. xxiii. 37, had been uttered, he does not return to the same strain; he has entirely finished his rebukes, and he has no intention to renew them. He rather calms his agitated heart, by kindly condescending to any trace of godliness which is still to be found† in that den of thieves so soon to be broken up; and rejoices over two mites brought to this temple with simple good intent for the sake of God (Luke εἰς τὰ δῶρα τοῦ θεοῦ). This is a lofty contrast between wrath and love; like what we find in Matt. xxi. 13–16; the healing of the sick and the joy in the hosannahs of the children following immediately the words of rebuke. What manner of man is this! He is never exhausted in the immovable depths of the love of his holy soul, never unduly excited and moved by the most powerful outbursts of judicial zealous testimony; immediately after a discourse like the preceding one, he has again the calmness, the delight, the ready mind to search out and observe the smallest good.* Did he then feel and act thus in the flesh? How does he now look down upon the gifts and offerings in every little church and community, upon what is given and done in the whole world, that he may try it according to its value, its want of value or relative value, especially that he may not overlook the smallest thing; and that he may cry to the churches for each individual, "I know thy works," and at last proclaim to all from the judgment-seat, "This ye have done, this ye have not done!"

His disciples ought to learn, observe, and lay up in their minds for all future time that he thus sees and shall see. He calls them to himself, as to witness "an official act," in order that they may learn something great from this little incident; in order that he may bequeath to them and to all his future disciples a word of truth which has ever since been of eminent use in guiding to right judgment those who hold office in his Church; and in encouraging and gladdening many a poor man who has given willingly out of his poverty. But at this time it was not designed that the widow who passed by should hear her own praises; the remark was made confidentially to the disciples alone. Although it might certainly be true that the greater part of the money collected in this chest was applied to evil purposes, and did not go to uphold the true worship of God, yet the Lord pays no regard to this, but looks at the heart, the good intention of the giver. There is something in his saying, though infinitely higher and deeper, which bears a resemblance to the exclamation uttered by the martyr Huss, when

* The γαζοφυλάκιον is not a chamber, or the לִשְׁכָּה of the treasury (it is not possible that John could indicate this by the ἐν, viii 20—access to it would scarcely be open); nor is it one of thirteen שׁוֹפָרוֹת or (so called after their form) chests for free-will offerings which were to be found in the woman's court, and of which Sepp (iii. 309) gives a very correct account; but, as the article shows, a particular collection-box, to which also Josephus alludes in his Antiq. xix. 6, 1, and in other passages, where he uses another word. Mark and Luke have made no error or mistake; we know nothing exact about the matter.

† So far there is something true in the remark of Braune, though expressed by him in too strong and general terms: "In order to recover himself after his discourse against the Pharisees, to take refuge in the piety of the people." The observation of Lange is more correct, and conceived in a finer spirit: "That he might leave the temple with a warm look of blessing upon the true piety found in the old temple service"—namely, upon as much or as little of it as was to be found.

* "It was assuredly no littleness at such a time, when every influence was united to destroy the Redeemer, that he should with calmness of spirit and a heart full of sympathy observe what is related in this short paragraph. Who could have thought that at such a moment such a story could have been told of Jesus?" (Stein on Luke, p. 227).

a little peasant brought a small piece of wood to increase the flame of his pile, "O sancta simplicitas!" For there was indeed such simplicity in this case; when a poor widow denied herself of her poverty-penny, which she had carefully saved up, in order to make a little more full the temple treasury, which truly stood in no need of it.* But how far is he from the spirit of those who, to show their wisdom, would blame a humble, well-meaning heart!

Our Lord gives emphasis to the expression of his mind by a "Verily, verily, I say unto you" (Luke, "truly"). There were many rich people in Jerusalem, who assembled in the temple before the feast, and whose wealth was displayed by their gifts, though in most cases with Pharisaical ostentation. Still our Lord does not draw the contrast in such sharp outline, because he has now no satisfaction in uttering the language of reproof; he does not expressly, for this time, blame and contemn the others; he takes the mildest view of every thing. He merely places over against all the gifts from the rest (what was certainly a light and small remnant), the two farthings of the poor widow, as being greater than all in his view and in the view of God. He speaks positively; gracious condescension and heart-felt joy become apparent in the very fulness of the language by which he confirms his assertion of the mere relation between her possessions and her gifts. At the same time, however, his intention is not merely to estimate a relative plus, but in doing so, to point out the zeal and ardent impulse of her heart as it prompted her to give and offer in simplicity to the house of God. So far from having any thing superfluous, she is in need, and might have asked alms privately or publicly; but instead of doing so she gives away out of her need the last pittance of her poverty, all that she has in her possession.* Her means of subsistence, her daily supply, consisted of two very small pieces of money, which together make up a quadrans, or a fourth part of an as, to which Luke correctly reduces the amount for the convenience of his Roman readers. Was not this imprudent and strange? She might reasonably have retained one of the two small pieces, if she was determined to give an offering at this time—this would still have been the half of all that she had.† But she gave the whole, thinking now in faith of nothing beyond; only now moved, as we manifestly see, on close observation, by something special in her spirit to this frame of gratitude and offering; so that, completely forgetting herself and her poverty, and the morrow, she rises up and gives all that she has. The Lord knew this —we ask not whence. When he looked upon any one with the whole strength of appropriating love, he could read by a glance what was in the heart; when the Father designed to give him a word for the world, he gave him, in the particular case, the wonderful knowledge of what otherwise would have been concealed. Thus, in this homely utterance, the majesty and condescension, the greatness and the kindness of the Lord, are again united; thus it stands for us like a testimony taken from the midst of a life and conduct throughout of a similar character—telling us who he was who died for us, what divinely-human clearness of vision, and fulness of love, dwelt in him, even in these last days.

* In so far we have here indirectly what Lange would put too much in the foreground, a confirmation of the objection of Jesus to the Pharisees, who robbed widows' houses.

* Attested by Luke, simply and strongly, "all the living she had;" by Mark still more strongly, "all whatsoever she had."

† The prescript of the Talmud, that one λεπτόν shall not be given to the treasury (Sepp, iii. 311) must then have been in force; and this was accordingly the least of the offerings.

THE GOSPEL OF LUKE.

THE FIRST PREACHING IN NAZARETH.

(Luke iv. 17–27 [Matt. xiii. 57; Mark vi. 4].)

The first two chapters of the third Gospel, as we observed at the very beginning of this work (p. 1), reach to a point further back than the commencement of either Matthew or of Luke; and manifest an aim the opposite of that which characterizes the prefatory verses of John, regarding the Word made flesh. It is for this cause that Luke's Gospel leads us at once to those introductory events, lying far back, which preceded the birth of Jesus Christ, through the power of the Holy Ghost; lets us hear the announcement of Gabriel, the songs of praise of Zacharias and Mary, the glad tidings of the angels to the shepherds, and the praise of Simeon and Anna; and next gives us the only record which we have of the first Saying (earnest of what was to come), uttered by the Son as he grew in the Spirit, concerning his heavenly Father. It is hence entirely in accordance with this character of the Gospel of Luke, that instead of the summaries of the public Sermon on the Mount delivered in Galilee, Matt. iv. 17; Mark i. 15, we have an exact (as it were esoteric) narrative of the first appearance of our Lord in his own Nazareth. For here Bruno Bauer is most assuredly right, in opposition to Ebrard, in maintaining that a first appearance is here related. This is so patent on the face of the whole transaction, and in all its details—from the quoting of the text in Isaiah, down through the fastening of all eyes upon him, and the "to-day" of his own lips, to the wicked close—that it is impossible to have a clear view of any one thing, if we are to suppose that Jesus had on a preceding Sabbath spoken in the synagogue at Nazareth. And then, what other than the first appearance, or nearly so, could it have been? Why all the wondering and offence taken on any occasion subsequent to the first? There is nothing against its being the first visit in the expression κατὰ τὸ εἰωθὸς αὐτῷ (a pure Attic Greek phrase), "as his custom was"—an expression which has been very generally misunderstood. These words refer not, as Schleiermacher supposes, to our Lord's habit of teaching in the synagogues: such a habit, in so short a period, could not yet have been formed. In this case they would form a continuation of the 15th verse, and would be sufficiently tautological. Moreover, we should find the Redeemer here already in the middle of his duties as teacher; and Luke would have antedated this apparently late event to favor his own plan. This εἰωθὸς (which certainly does not denote a habit beginning no longer ago than yesterday or the day before, see Matt. xxvii. 19, Acts xvii. 2) depends not upon the rising to read and speak, but upon the going into the synagogue at Nazareth, and is manifestly to be read in close connection with "where he was brought up." Luke, casting his eye back from Nazareth, manifestly connects his narrative with chap. ii. 51, 52, making it, as it were, a continuation of the account there given. We consequently perceive in this a notice extremely important, which brings before us, though in a single accidental trait, the entire private life of our Lord, as subject to all authority; viz., that hitherto he had been accustomed to attend this* synagogue at Nazareth as a silent hearer. He had not withstood all the folly and perversion which, in the reading of the word, must have proceeded from many lips, because the Spirit had not yet anointed and sent him to speak.† It is quite correct to take a deep view of the statement, and reason out the conclusion, that Jesus, from his twelfth till his thirtieth year, had attended every Sabbath day as a devout hearer: we cannot strike this great record out of Scripture except by an exposition which is not only false in itself, but which produces confusion also in other directions.

Further, we have already explained, p. 278, that we regard the visit to Nazareth, recorded in Matt. xiii. 54–58 (Mark vi. 1–6), as a second visit paid at a later period; and the account there given, notwithstanding all its apparent

* The only one in the little village; for the plural in Matt. xiii. 54, which is expressed by Luther, is a false reading.

† Therefore he had never up to this time read aloud, as Bengel supposes; this would have been inconsistent with his condition, though his keeping silence would not. Sepp (ii. 122, comp. 62) thinks of him also as the Maphtir or reader, perhaps also the interpreter in the synagogue at Nazareth: but this is a very absurd idea, which must disappear when narrowly examined.

similarity, as by no means in all respects identical with the first appearance which Luke records in the passage before us. From an independent and firm conviction we abide by this view; and shall neither appeal to the learned in its favor, nor discuss at any length the arguments of its opponents. Schleiermacher's critical research has very far from succeeded in establishing the identity of such different histories recorded in such different connections: an identity which cannot be held without a strange violation of Scripture. Where the Evangelists give no positive chronological data we hold that we are at liberty, and that it is our duty, to assign any place we please to their narratives—to such narratives, we repeat, as are given in a general way, and not in chronological sequence. But when we find a clear and express connection of time, we regard, in conformity with our principles of criticism, these terms as at least so far inspired that they cannot record any thing which is historically false. This is the case here. We must not vaguely read Matt. xiii. 54 as meaning, "He came (among other things) also on one occasion at an early period to his native city;" because to simple readers (and it is for such that the Scriptures are written), the καὶ ἐλθὼν, "and when he was come," according to all rules of language, depends upon the μετῆρεν ἐκεῖθεν, "he departed thence," of the former verse 53, and this again upon the ἐτέλεσεν τὰς παραβολὰς ταύτας, "he had finished these parables." Similarly, in Mark vi. 1 the ἐξῆλθεν ἐκεῖθεν, "he went out from thence," depends upon the preceding chapter, the fifth, by a self-evidencing chronology; inasmuch as only the cures mentioned in Matt. ix. 27–34 come between. And there are assuredly many histories anticipated by Matthew which come between Matt. xiii. 52 and 53. But the fact that the Lord visited Nazareth after and not before the discourse which he delivered in parables, is firmly established, and cannot be overturned. Where then is there, in Luke iv. 28–31, room for the performance of the several miracles which Matthew and Mark relate as having been wrought previous to the second visit? There is an undoubted difference; and it is quite as "theologically" arbitrary as is any thing to be found in the exposed theological nakedness of Strauss, Bauer, and Co., for Olshausen to say, "He probably healed a few sick before speaking in the synagogue at Nazareth," and then to remove the contradiction which thence arises between this and Luke iv. 23 by adding, "such cures may have been wrought in the quiet family circles," so that the rest of Nazareth knew nothing about them. More orthodox theologians have ceased to treat the written word as Schleiermacher of old did; and it is said that, in such instances as the above, Olshausen, otherwise of precious memory, should have to be classed with that old school. Finally, Alford holds it "utterly impossible" that Jesus should have been thus treated at his first visit, and should then have expressed wonder at their unbelief on his second visit. But we simply reply that it is precisely at their confirmed unbelief that he expresses wonder; at their continued unbelief after their former outbreak of passion, and the disgrace which followed it, after his long continued teaching and working of miracles.

Thus, the first visit to Nazareth, an event which comes in between the 13th and the 11th and 12th verses of Matt. iv.—which is related by Luke, and alluded to by Matt. iv. 13—furnished the cause why our Lord selected Capernaum as his place of abode; he visited Nazareth at a later period a second time. Fearlessly, though they would have put him to death, did he afford them a second gracious opportunity, kindly dealing with them and not giving up his own native city. It can scarcely be thought that he has at once altogether given up his own unhappy Nazareth for its first sin, though that sin was certainly a grievous one. The denial of his return once more strikes out of his life a trait as beautiful as it is significant. On the other hand, it may well be imagined that the inhabitants of Nazareth, though a little ashamed of their first outbreak of passion, and not disposed to act in the same way against the Lord, after the lengthened and strong demonstration which they had received of his character, would still continue to cherish the same sentiments and adopt the same language, πόθεν τούτῳ ταῦτα, "Whence hath this man these things?" Then, in regard to the accounts given by Matthew and Mark of the address and the reply—accounts which by no means give a conversation between Jesus and the Nazarenes, held literally and exactly in this very way, but only a general view of what was stated and of what followed from it—we are not indisposed to grant that there is an echo of the former incident in their narrative; and, so thinking, we shall give in one exposition the kindred and blended results of the two visists to Nazareth*

* John iv. 44 is a mere note, which is quite unintelligible except on the supposition that John had in his view other well-known records. All intelligent critics are prepared to admit that he generally supplements and refers to the synoptical Evangelists; consequently "it cannot be compatible with sound principles of hermeneutics not to regard that exposition of this passage in John's Gospel which makes it agree with the other Gospels, as the most obvious and most natural one" (Bäumlein, Stud. u. Kritik. 1846, 2). We accept this with the greater confidence as the "Jesus himself testified" cannot in the language of John be merely "a remark of the Evangelist" (as Weiseler asserts), but must be a reminiscence of a saying, and a well-known saying, of the Lord. Jesus, however, did not give his testimony as to a prophet's not being honored in his own country so frequently that "he was accustomed to say so;" he merely said so once or twice in Nazareth. It is not absolutely impossible that John gave to the saying of the Lord a wider application of fulfillment; and that on this occasion he alluded

The incidents related by John, from chap. i. 35 to chap. iv. 54, come in chronologically between the 13th and the 14th verses of the chapter before us. The first appearance of our Lord in Nazareth falls in with this commencement of his work of preaching and working miracles in Galilee—with his visit at the feast in Jerusalem, and a short residence in Judea—for naturally he left his own city for a little while, but would not let it wait too long for him. He had already been residing in Capernaum, John ii. 12. In that place, after the second miracle, with which John ceases (John iv. 54) generally to enumerate, or indeed fully to narrate, the miracles wrought in Galilee, he still wrought a few others; this, however, is doubtful, see afterwards Luke iv. 23. From that time, however, he took up his proper abode at Capernaum, as Nazareth had cast him out. His preaching in Nazareth certainly took place before the Sermon on the Mount; and was no other than a preliminary and lowly commencement of his evangelical work, exhibiting its utmost fulness of grace—a private prelude, as it were, to that magnificent beginning which was immediately to follow.

Here spake he "the gracious words" (λόγοι τῆς χάριτος), which the Holy Spirit has not seen fit to record for our use, but whose substance we may gather partly from the text drawn from Isaiah, and partly from the opening word as given by Luke in the 21st verse. So, too, we have here the first word of his mouth to a private circle, uttered with all the grace of a divine captatio benevolentiæ; and, though with a perfect knowledge of their unbelief and envy, in the mildest possible form—I have come to fulfill; it is of me that the Scripture prophesies. And this beginning of the word—by the Spirit who anointed him to preach the Gospel—is similar to that which we afterwards hear on the day of Pentecost; viz., a passage from the prophecies, with an announcement that this prophecy has now come to pass and is fulfilled.

But the hearers would not hear in faith, and were offended at the son of Joseph. The subsequent address, which followed this gracious preaching, in which he still continues with the same kindness to utter to them the words of truth (ver. 25), is peculiar to Luke. In this address our Lord directs the attention of those who despised him to the general unbelief of Israel, as manifested against the prophets of God from the beginning till now; and in doing so he ponders within himself, in the spirit of prophecy, what at a future period he would be compelled openly to express, Luke xiii. 33, 34. First of all, anticipating any further expression of what they might say, he exposes to them their unbelieving, contracted, provincial, sign-demanding, thoughts; and yet he pleads on their behalf that they were only like the rest of Israel, yea, like all other men, by quoting a second proverbial saying, ver. 24, in reply to the former one which he had put to Judea, because of our Lord's birthplace at Bethlehem, in opposition to Galilee. Origen was the first who adopted this view; he did not however suppose that there was any reference to Bethlehem, but regarded Judea as the native land of the prophets generally, which assuredly it was not. So Wieseler supposes that John alludes to Bethlehem. But when we reflect that this ingeniously imagined allusion to Bethlehem as the Lord's birthplace (it is no where spoken of as such in John's Gospel, not even in chap. vii. 41, 42), and the extension of the idea of πατρίς from little Bethlehem to the whole of Judea, are exceedingly strange—that Jesus (and here, at least, Lücke is in the right), at the commencement of his course, was well received in Judea, as is related in chap. iv. 1, ii. 23, iii. 26—that (according to Bäumlein's correct remark) πατρίς, where it occurs in connection with this well known proverbial saying, uttered as a testimony by Jesus, must decidedly have the sense of "the place of his home"—that πατρίς in the writings of the synoptical Evangelists themselves, to which John allüdes, is the usual designation of Nazareth—further, that the natural cause which gave rise to the proverb "that a prophet is not esteemed in his own country," does not exist in the birthplace which the prophet had long ago left (most certainly not to it as denoting the country in which it lies), but to the place of abode where he had for a length of time lived like other men—and finally, that even John, as at chap. vii. 41, and at a later period, chap. xviii. 5, 7, and also in a very appropriate passage, chap. i. 45, 46, was acquainted only with the common opinion in regard to the origin of the offence taken at the Lord, that he was of Nazareth—we shall be inclined to give due weight to the view taken by Cyril, and which was long the prevailing one, in opposition to Bruno, Bauer, Baur, Ebrard, Wieseler, and others, and by no means to regard it as "deserving of notice only at the first glance," as Lücke supposes. The view of this last mentioned writer, who finds Galilee in the πατρίς and considers γάρ as equivalent to "in fact" (Jesus found here in Galilee not such faith, without miracles, as in Samaria), is, we agree with Wieseler, "very hard." Hauff does not mend the matter (Stud. u. Krit. 1849, 1), who sees "a comprehensive view of the effects of the work of Jesus in Galilee," and, contrary to the meaning of the word, explains ἐμαρτύρησεν as meaning, "Jesus himself, like all other prophets, must furnish a proof of this adage!" Our judgment therefore is, that

John indicates, very briefly, the cause of what he is afterwards to mention, that Jesus went to the land of Galilee generally and not specially to his own Nazareth (as might have been expected according to chap. i. 45). In chap. iii. 22 at least, there is such a distinction, viz., between Judea and Jerusalem—a distinction which it has been erroneously supposed as not to be thought of. Or rather (and this we believe is the whole truth, if every thing be considered), John has in his mind, ver. 44, the whole preceding occurrence at Nazareth, gives a general preface in vers. 43. 44, and then goes back and gives the full statement in vers. 46–54. In this case we see the accuracy of ver. 54—we have the nobleman's son referred to before Luke iv. 23. Bäumlein gives in general a good defence of the application of this passage to Nazareth; and Gemberg agrees with it (Stud. u. Krit. 1845, 1). Here also for once we agree with Sepp (ii. 236), according to whom John mentally understood the clause: οὐ δὲ μετέβη εἰς πόλιν Ναζαρέτ, but he went not to Nazareth.

into their lips, regarding "the physician only for others." This more immediate Israelitish proverb—summing up the well-known, melancholy result of all Israelitish history—contains in itself a description of faith (the reception of a testimony), as a necessary condition which he would require; and also of unbelief as the cause of his rejection—an event which he was well aware was near at hand. Upon this he gives two most striking examples of this too true saying, drawn from the history of the first two great prophets and workers of miracles; but certainly he cannot say any thing to show that the truth, which his grace cannot and will not keep back, is at the same time leading him on to the very verge of prophesying that the word of God, which the Jews were rejecting, would pass over to the Gentiles.* He would apparently have said something more, had not their wrath, breaking out into an open tumult, interrupted him by a demonstration that he had spoken the truth; by plain evidence that he was something more than merely Jesus of Nazareth; and by such a revelation of the souls of these sinners, among whom he had grown up as the Holy One of God, as revealed still further his long-suffering patience and kindness in this same Nazareth.

Verses 17—19. It must have been a matter of great delicacy and difficulty (humanly speaking, and humanly viewing it, as we are entitled to do) for the Lord Jesus to deliver the first sermon and testimony on behalf of himself in that very Nazareth, and in that very synagogue where he had so long been a humble, silent listener. He referred that testimony, therefore, very specially to the hands and counsel of his Father. He had begun to manifest himself before the world, and had been magnified in many other schools, when an intimation of the Father's will, conveyed through the Spirit, lead him back for the first time to the place where he had so long remained in concealment. That he will not keep silence, is certainly the expectation which all entertain concerning him; still scarcely has any one ventured to ask him to speak, as they would have asked a Rabbi or a man of learning. He stood up—which according to a custom existing from the days of Nehemiah (viii. 4, 5), was a special intimation that he wished to read a passage of Scripture, including the usual exposition.† Who cannot but feel the importance of this moment for him and for Nazareth! What shall he read, as he certainly does not mean to be satisfied with the mere reading? The Son, in his humility—with which, on his coming forward after his long period of self-denial he must have been specially filled (to speak again in the language of men)—was not under the necessity of being anxious about this, or of inquiring after it. The rule and wont to which he had hitherto been subject, accompanies him with its blessings up to this point of publicity and transition; the Father prepares every thing for his hand and for his mouth, in this path of obedience. It is a matter of great importance that the practice of the synagogue, of introducing the text of Scripture previous to the oral address, is here, at the turning point between the Old and New Testaments, consecrated by him, who himself is the substance of all Scripture, and is confirmed anew for all future time. There was delivered to him (by the minister afterward mentioned as the חַזָּן, שַׁמָּשׁ) the roll of the prophet Isaiah, undoubtedly because in the ordinary course a lesson from that prophet fell to be read on that Sabbath. But here is the limit to which the Lord will and can go in compliance with the ordinary course of procedure in the synagogue. He has to testify and to proclaim something new and for the first time. We cannot, certainly (with the worthy country minister in the Evangelical Kirchenzeitung), find in the fact that our Lord "left the Parashioth and sections and asked a text from his Father," an example to be imitated by us, and to be regarded as sanctioning our modern freedom from ecclesiastical control in regard to the portions of Scripture to be read and preached from. There is still a great difference between our sermons and this Sermon; and, moreover, there are sufficient other reasons against the slavishness of unqualified adherence to prescribed portions, a practice which quenches the Spirit, and forces into the background the other parts of the sacred volume. But this much appears clear to our humble judgment, that Luke by the expression "found the place" does not indicate that our Lord opened the roll, searching for and carefully selecting a passage, but that passage was the gift of his Father, provided for him by his guidance; that as soon as our Lord opened the roll his eyes fell upon the right text for his word, and that he forthwith began to read it.

It is, in truth, the most suitable passage of Scripture that could possibly have been found; and, if others admire the wisdom of the Lord in its choice, it comes to the same thing if we acknowledge that this wisdom was on this occasion bestowed upon him at the moment by the Father. We feel at once that no royal and kingly text would here have been appropriate; as the utmost possible degree of condescension was necessary in order that Nazareth might not take offence, except through its own sin, at the first word of testimony spoken by its "carpenter." Hence, in the first instance, mention is made only of his having been sent and anointed by the Holy Spirit to preach (a fact which becomes immediately obvious); and only of the Gospel for men's broken hearts—in expressions that spiritually interpret the miracles of healing which the Lord had already begun to work, like the words in which we afterwards read of them in Matt. xi. 5, 6. Therefore in the very first word there is an appeal directly made to the baptism of Jesus in Jordan, which was his anointing with the Spirit; and to that which occurred at the same time, viz., the testimony, which could not possibly be unknown to the Nazarenes, given by the Baptist on behalf of their own Jesus, and which had introduced him to them in the way appointed by God. But still there is not here, as had been the case every where else at the commencement of his preaching, any lofty utterance concerning the coming kingdom of heaven, or any earnest word about repentance. He takes for granted that there are already present some penitent souls who would welcome, as tidings of joy, a proclamation which brought healing of broken hearts, deliverance and redemption from misery; to them this would be, what it it was, the most benignant and most attractive announcement of grace and love—taken from the very midst of all that had in former times been written of Christ. Are we not right in saying that it looks as if this passage had been written for this very occasion and could not have been written in any other way of its fulfillment?

* Another illustration of the reason why this sequel to the preaching is embraced in the plan of Luke's Gospel—the Gospel specially sent to the Gentiles.

† Alford aptly reminds us of the title given to Ezra by Josephus: ἀναγνώστης τοῦ θείου νόμου, "a reader of the divine law" (Ant. xi. 5, 1.

In the book of Isaiah, from the 49th chapter to the end, which may be regarded as the third great section of the whole, the Messianic prophecies become, more than before, yea, as far as is possible under the Old Testament, free from types, clear, and perspicuous. Every thing looks and points straight forward into the future, when Israel shall be delivered by the Lord with an everlasting deliverance (chap. xlv. 17), and brought into an eternal covenant of the sure mercies of David (chap. lv. 3). The spiritual import of this future redemption, deliverance, and preparation for a true Israel of God, is every where declared. The wonderful counsel according to which this true Israel should be prepared in the person of the Servant of the Lord, who himself is in the first place the true Israel, the fulfiller of all prophecy and more than all this, is pre-eminently set forth and unfolded, chap. xlix.–lv. The engrafting of the people into this Servant Israel, through his expiatory and regenerating and quickening sufferings, is the thrice returning subject for announcement; is three times expressly asserted in the conclusion, and declared to belong to the gracious covenant about to be thus ratified. (The three sections are, first, chap. xlix.; second, chap. l.–lii. 12; and third, chap. lii. 13 to the end of chap. lv.) Upon this, as a sequence, there is founded, chap. lvi.–lx., an offer of these mercies of David, that is of the Messianic mercies, in the form of an address, which, containing within it an emphatic contrast, and ascending each time from reproof to consolation, is directed to rebellious, sinful Israel, such as it was at the time the prophet wrote. But the text for Nazareth is not taken from this section; it is taken from the very last one, which speaks plainly upon every preceding subject, and brings the whole to a close—from that first affecting evangelical invitation in the lips of the Sent and the Anointed One, through the blindness of Israel, the calling of the Gentiles, and subsequently the restoration of Israel, to the most remote final view of the New Jerusalem created for joy, and of the new heavens and the new earth. I beseech you, I beseech you with my whole heart, my dear brother theologians, read once more the so-called Pseudo-Isaiah, and read with real simplicity, that you may read and understand him as our Lord who here testifies that the Scripture was fulfilled in himself must have read and understood him. Then, assuredly, will you see in the clear light of his Spirit (if only you really pray for it) that chap. lxi. 1, 2, 3, was spoken not only by the prophet then speaking, but also through the mouth of this prophet by the other Prophet yet to come, of whom he prophesies, and in whose mouth alone the words reach the full sense for which the spirit of prophecy gave them; a delightful summary of the whole consolation of redemption which he alone is able to preach, and in preaching to impart, because he himself is the Redeemer.

The Spirit of the Lord is upon me: this is he of whom this had already been announced at the beginning, Isa. xi. 2, and afterwards at chap. xliii. 2. Because (οὗ εἵνεκεν, יַעַן is manifestly to be thus understood) he hath anointed me (therewith): this means in truth the Messiah or Christ; and Jesus must assuredly announce himself as such, even in the very first word at Nazareth. He hath sent me to preach glad tidings to the poor: that is, this is certainly he whom the Lord and his Spirit sent, according to Isa. xlviii. 16 (on this we request the reader to compare our exposition in the preface to the first part). In and with this בַּשֵּׂר or Gospel message, there begins, at the same time, the חֲבֹשׁ לְנִשְׁבְּרֵי־לֵב, the binding and healing of broken hearts with the consolations of grace, chap. lvii. 15, Psa. cxlvii. 3. In connection with such preaching there is further announced and proclaimed a deliverance (ἄφεσις, דְּרוֹר, with reference to the type of the year of Jubilee, Lev. xxv. 10, Ezek. xlvi. 17) for all captives, for all who are in fetters, condemned, held in bondage; consequently for all who are such in a spiritual sense, like the נִשְׁבְּרֵי־לֵב, Isa. xlix. 24, 25—yea, with absolute assurance, a real פְּקַחֲקַח־קוֹחַ in the most complete sense to all who are bound; an opening and loosening of all bonds.*

So far, the progress of language and thought in the original text of Isaiah is as clear as it is deep. In what language or translation the Lord read at Nazareth, we do not exactly know; the Evangelist, however, gives this text to his original Greek readers in a form which partly follows the Septuagint (according to the well-known, well-grounded practice of the New Testament), and partly supplies the want of exactness in that version. On our principles of criticism,* we do not believe that he left out the healing of the broken-hearted —a clause which is not wanting in the Septuagint, which expresses so correctly the kernel of the saying, and which is pre-supposed afterwards in verse 25, in order to account for the introduction by our Lord of the proverb about the Physician. We maintain, with Bengel, that the correct reading is that which contains the clause in question. Further, as the Septuagint (applying פְּקַחְקוֹחַ to the eyes, as פָּקַח and פְּקָחָה are used in all other passages, of the eyes; and only once, Isa. xlii. 20, of the ears) has translated by καὶ τυφλοῖς ἀνάβλεψιν, Luke retains this expression. For, corresponding really as it does, so far as spiritual captivity and opening are concerned, to the internal meaning of the word in the original, with its double allusion, it also connects the individual passage before us with other kindred passages, such as Isa. xlii. 7, xlix. 9. In order, however, to supply the want thus created, and, further, to show that the Lord meant and used the individual passage in its full sense, as interpreted by the entire prophecies of Isaiah, he adds a passage from chap. lviii. 6, blending the two together: ἀποστεῖλαι τεθραυσμένους ἐν ἀφέσει, "to set at liberty them that are bruised," which again suits well with the συντετριμμένοις or "broken hearted." (The doubled ἄφεσις is tautological exactly in the same way as לַאֲסוּרִים פְּקַחְקוֹחַ and לִשְׁבוּרֵי דְרוֹר are in the original text.) It is by no means "a complete interchange of passages, a confounding of words, a failing of memory"—we would certainly not deny this to be the case, if our conscience and Biblical science could find any satisfactory traces of the existence of any thing of the kind any where. We have rather here an intelligent grasp of the passages quoted, so far as their spirit is concerned (furnishing an instructive lesson to the sticklers for mere words), accompanied by a regard to the version then in common use—a grasp such as that which the Spirit of inspiration taught the New Testament writers to take. Is it not, however, a pity, we must here once more ask with our own heart almost broken, to be obliged to annoy ourselves with contending against such attempts to bring down holy writ to the level of a human composition, and to disturb in our own heart, and in the hearts of others, the simple impression of passages such as the one now before us, where the believing reader should have no other feeling but that arising from the power of the great message, the blessedness of the glad tidings for the poor? When will it be noted more than it has hitherto been to believing interpreters in their treatment of the Old and New Testament, that (as Harnack says) the foundation of all true theology is neither more nor less than a broken heart? Truly a broken heart is at no loss to apply to itself in its simplicity the abundance of words, for example, which are given by Luke for this text; and feels also in it the mind of the Spirit through all the imaginary traces of humanity.

Finally, it is not merely Luke who breaks off with the acceptable year of the Lord; Jesus himself, as simple feeling will tell us, read no further than this שְׁנַת־רָצוֹן. (Compare Isa. xlix. 8. This is generally the New Testament season of grace, the allusion being to the great jubilee year, Lev. xxv. 10, the year of grace, year of favor; not the "welcome year," according to the Septuagint; δεκτός cannot be limited to this.) For he will have, as it was fit that he should have, a purely gracious evangelical text for the beginning of his ministry at Nazareth. The clause which follows in Isaiah, "and a day of the vengeance of our God, to comfort all that mourn" (with deliverance from their condemned enemies, see Isa. xxxiv. 8, lxiii. 4, "the great day of the wrath and judgment at the close of the year of grace"), occurs in the old versions and Fathers (Vulg. et diem retributionis, the day of retribution), but it was obviously introduced from the desire of completing the unfinished text. The Lord, however, had read enough, he closed the book when he had reached this part, and followed up what had been read with the remark, "This day is this fulfilled" with which he began his gracious sermon. And Luke understood this well enough to abstain, on his part, from appending the clause.* There lies, however, in this ἐνιαυτὸς δεκτός, "acceptable year," with which the Lord ceases to read and begins to preach, a secondary allusion, exceedingly obvious and beautiful, to what has been called "the Galilean year"—a year peculiarly rich in Christ's gracious preaching. But the reference is not so exclusive as Bengel would have us suppose.

Verses 20—22. Every thing is done according to the rule and custom hitherto observed; this the exact narrative of the Evangelist is designed to tell us. It was the practice in this synagogue, after the passage of Scripture had been read in a standing posture, for the speaker to sit down to deliver his own address: on the contrary, at Antioch in Pisidia, Paul stood up to give the word of exhortation (Acts xiii. 16).† The practice here was in harmony

* Which, with the almost entirely unsatisfactory and fragmentary character of the manuscript apparatus, inclines us more and more to decide according to internal reasons.

* Compare on this correct view the (Irvingite) treatise, "on the Counsel of God," etc. Frankf. (Zimmer), 1847, 1, p. 116.

† The later Jewish arrangements as to the pos-with the Lord's manner on other occasions; for we know that he usually adopted the sitting posture in teaching—an attitude expressive of elevated repose, and which formed a striking contrast to that in which the Baptist called sinners to repentance. In this case, particularly, had our Lord remained standing during the delivery of the gracious discourse, addressed in such accents of tenderness to the heart, his position would not have been, at least, to our feelings, consonant with the occasion. He returned the closed book of the prophet to the officer; probably in conformity to usage, but at the same time because he did not mean to confine himself to the exposition of the text. In our day, when preachers have no new word of fulfillment to add to the text which contains within itself the glad tidings (not even to the text of the Old Testament, as brought before Christian congregations in the light of its fulfillment), it is a bad practice to shut the Bible and lay it aside when the sermon begins. This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears! This was the sermon to Israel from the text of the Old Testament; just as at a later period the Epistle to the Hebrews sets before us the utmost depths of Christian doctrine only as the right interpretation of the word of the Old Testament.* This Scripture, like every Scripture, and like the entire Scriptures—we are not to construe, "this Scripture in your ears," as if the meaning were "this Scripture which you have just now heard:" ἐν τοῖς ὠσίν ὑμῶν belongs to πεπλήρωται, is fulfilled in your ears. For, I preach to you, the person who, the substance which, and in the manner in which it is written. "You now hear the very sermon which the prophet here predicts shall be preached" (Von Gerlach). This day—a great era this for Nazareth; the first hearing of the tidings of joy and grace (compare Acts xxvi. 29), the first day of the great year of Jubilee which had now dawned. The Lord himself does not begin from a point far back, with a long argumentative exposition of the text, as was more suitable in his servants (Acts xvii. 2, 3, xviii. 28); but, in the immediate power of the Spirit which was upon him to reveal him as the Anointed and Sent One, he hastens to delivers his testimony in the very first word which he utters. The eyes of all were fastened on him, with eager curiosity to see what this son of Joseph, of whom, for some time past, they had heard such great things, has now, after such a long silence, to say to his native city: the Lord places in opposition to this their ears; and in doing so, solicits, in the most kindly way, a right hearing undisturbed by their eyes (as at Acts ii. 14); for faith cometh into the heart only by hearing (ver. 18). And now he has preached the most gracious Gospel for the poor, as yet without any demand to practice righteousness in testimony of the grace which brings it, as he did afterwards on the Mount before all the people; so far, therefore, his Sermon is on this occasion a counterpart to that discourse which, after the gracious commencement, took a wider range. Still, we should not have had this lovely, mild, most proper introductory statement (of which Lange very beautifully says "in opening this Scripture he opens his own heart"), wherewith in some small measure to draw a veil over the sin and the shame of the Nazarenes who rejected it.

The first impression produced by this sermon, which is briefly and strikingly described in ver. 22, is not to be conceived of as if the people merely wondered that this carpenter's son "could preach so beautifully"—which would be too much like the modern "vicious practice of perverting preaching from its proper object, and making it the empty vehicle of empty every-day entertainment." No; this was not possible, where the Lord was the preacher; and if the conduct of the people could not at first be so bad as this, so much the worse was their subsequent demeanor. All bore witness to him at first, and in the end all were full of wrath, ver. 28. The sweetness, benevolence, and grace (for all this is comprehended in the χάρις as in the חֵן) which, according to Psa. xlv. 3, were poured out on the lips of the Messiah, necessarily evoke a sense of delight on the part of men (Luke ii. 52); but, when sternness of truth follows the grace, the wrath of opposition breaks forth. The Evangelist does not intend to describe the first testimony or praise as having been given in express words: the καὶ ἔλεγον, "and they said," properly follows after this. As the result of deep impressions, they involuntarily give their assent in the first instance to the gracious preaching; at the second step, however, they turn aside; they wondered at these gracious words—out of this mouth. Instead of hearing simply to receive (wondering always denotes the opposite of this, as at chap. ii. 18, 47), they close their ears, and use only their eyes; they look at the mouth, and judge, according to appearance, a false judgment. They are like the blind, ver. 18, who suppose that they see; for their rule runs in perversion of the right one, Not what, but who. How must the Lord have restrained and concealed himself during these eighteen long years? How must all the rays of his glory have been drawn in, as the carpenter's son, even the carpenter of Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). Almost perplexed for a moment, as to whether it could be the same person and the same mouth, they here put the question, as being the first which after a variety of feelings and thoughts escapes their lips: Is not this man the son of Joseph? Compare, at a later period, John vi. 42. Thus Luke compresses into a few words the entire reference to his common descent and personality, suitably to the first impression which did not then find utterance in more copious terms; ture, whether sitting or standing, of the teacher or reader, were at that time not established.

*In New Testament times the Gospels would very soon and naturally come to occupy the place of the sections in the reading of the Scriptures.

Matthew and Mark, on the other hand, on the recurrence of the angry, malicious feeling, thus consistently and firmly cherished, quite as truly and as naturally give us stronger and more copious terms. On this later occasion a regular proof had to be obtained that the πόθεν, "whence," of his wisdom and deeds could not be ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, "from heaven:" his mother (after the death of his father) is mentioned as being poor and of no note; his brothers and sisters in this connection manifestly as the full brothers and sisters, the members of one and the same well-known family. "Mere common people, like ourselves, all with us—the brothers (mentioned by name) bring him no particular honor—as for the sisters we do not, at the moment, remember their names." Certainly by such wondering and questioning Nazareth involuntarily and unconsciously gives further testimony, though only for the good of others who believe, while they are hardened in anger and unbelief; their witness is against themselves.

The son of Joseph had walked till his thirtieth year blamelessly in friendship, humility, and obedience, with the favor of all; like the son of no other Nazarene, of no other Israelite, of no other man; and so as to excite in those who had right eyes and right hearts the presentiment that he was something higher than he appeared to be—this was the case with John the Baptist, after only slight intercourse with him. But the beggarly village pride of the Nazarenes cannot at all comprehend the humility of the Great One; they are ready to say, with his brethren, "He who would be, or who is, of any note, will show himself as soon as possible to the world."* Thus the humanity of the divine Saviour is incredible at first to all of us; and thereby we, in our turn, bear involuntary testimony to the condescending grace of God and to our own wickedness. Like one of us—this cannot be any thing particular. Thus Nazareth frankly confirms what other people say of it, John i. 46. Whence has this man this wisdom and these deeds? From his father and mother he has received no education, as his brothers and his sisters show; that he has not studied any where else is well known, John vii. 15; consequently, as we do not know whence he has his learning, he has nothing that we can acknowledge.

Verse 23. On this occasion, before the people are able to add more words to their first brief expression (which is rather wondering than anger), and to confirm themselves in their sin, the Lord, who has learned to know them through and through, anticipates them by a graciously forbearing expression of their thoughts. He who has proclaimed himself to be the Physician of the heart, shows himself, in proof and token of this, to be the Searcher of the heart. The natural train of thought in the minds of these Nazarenes, according to ver. 22, was: Is he not like ourselves? Yet is he the Anointed of God, whom the Spirit sends and in whom he dwells? Let him prove it to us! Therefore the Lord says: πάντως, "surely" ye will say to me—I know it well before you utter it, and I say it to you; and assuredly, in a certain measure, you have a right to say it. That he clothes it in a proverbial saying, is partly with a view to its being popularly understood, and partly by way of gracious excuse for them, in harmony with the human disposition which made this proverb.* As, in accordance with the prophetic text, he had announced the healing of the sick, he calls himself a Physician; but they understand this misapplied proverb only of bodily healing and help. We do not believe that it was intended to be taken in a strictly literal sense: "Let him work a miracle on himself,† make himself a rich instead of a poor man, a mighty instead of a lowly man;" in our opinion the σεαυτόν, "thyself," is to be explained by ἐν τῇ πατρίδι σου, in thine own country, the common way of applying proverbial sayings being to widen their range. The thoughts of the Nazarenes in their petty pride ran as follows: "As the son of Joseph art thou not ours? We have, at all events, a right to thee, if thou art any thing, and art able to do any thing; why then hast thou not begun among us with thy mighty works? But thou hast done this εἰς Καπερναούμ, to ("in") Capernaum, i. e., Capernaum has the honor. We were thy neighbors, and thou hast passed us by to make thyself of importance outside—thou art, like many a one, a physician who will help others, but who can do nothing for himself or for his own house." The indefinite ὅσα is very well expressed by "what great things"—for these will man for ever seek, instead of the humility of Christ, of which he has no conception. Half in a tone of exaggeration, and half also, perhaps, in irony (for it is as if the expression in the mouth of the Lord was their own), their ὅσα hints at flying rumors of what he had done in Capernaum, and on which they look with jealous eye: we see manifestly that it could represent only the single miracle wrought on the Nobleman's son; they do not appear as yet to have heard any thing about the many miracles wrought at Jerusalem,‡ in regard to which less offence would

* Still more foolish would be the idea here that the Lord should have referred to or proved his miraculous conception. This, the greatest of all miracles, and mysteries, is assuredly not a foundation on which faith may build, but a fact to be apprehended by faith.

* Only here in the New Testament is παραβολή used for a proverb, expressed in figurative language.

† As the words are again heard under the cross.

‡ The events at Cana, perhaps, they regarded as quite uncertain, not deserving of notice; this, at least, would seem to be assumed by the Lord. At all events the ὅσα ἠκούσαμεν we cannot regard (with Alford) as a sure mark of a later period. For, though we were to admit the force of his statement, in opposition to what we have said above, "that ὅσα could not have been applied to one be taken, as a beginning made at the right place. Inasmuch, however, as they acknowledge ἠκούσαμεν—that they had heard—they bear testimony against themselves, that they might and should have believed even though they had not seen signs and wonders wrought before their own eyes (John iv. 48). Mark how significantly the Lord here once more indirectly rejects the demand for miracles before it is made; as for himself, he absolutely never offers a miracle in demonstration of his mission and preaching.

Verse 24. The εἶπε δέ, "but he said" (Luke frequently throws in such formulae in a continuous address) is meant to mark this proverbial saying as one of special note, one that had become well known, and which was afterwards repeated—a saying used on the present occasion in the same sense in which it afterwards occurs at John iv. 44. In Matthew and Mark this proverb (here used in reply to a proverb) is prosecuted into a still narrower circle, "and in his own house;" Mark, in addition to this, and between the two expressions, inserts the clause, "and among his own kindred." The formula in Mark, οὐκ ἔστι ἄτιμος εἰ μή, "is not without honor except," gives the strongest expression: "Is a prophet even in other places, and generally, despised? I say unto you it is not so every where, and in comparison of the contempt with which he meets at home, scarcely any where at all; but if it be so no where else, yet it is certainly so here." The proverb about the physician who should save himself, is generally a human one: the proverb about the prophet, who is in no estimation at home, has also a general analogy for extraordinary men, and witnesses of the truth; but the Lord gives it rather an Israelitish range, pressing home the case. A prophet is a physician for the heart by means of the word. An ordinary prophet, such as those whom Israel hitherto had known, has, as a man gifted and sent by God, along with the official character, which he is acknowledged as bearing also, a human relationship also toward the immediate neighborhood in which he has grown up, and here there is no room for unbelief to take offence. In addition to this extraordinary capacity he bears also a common relationship. Now, the Lord humbly places himself in this class of prophets; he desires not to take any higher position than what subjects him to the common lot of prophets (as at Luke xiii. 33), when he rises to preach as one sent of God. In the οὐδεὶς δεκτός, no prophet is accepted (which is here quite as suitable for this first utterance as the stronger term ἄτιμος, used subsequently, was for the other), he already points, in passing, to the receiving and accepting faith which must bring the soul to the true Physician that he may help it.

Verses 25–27. The Scripture and its testimony to the truth, which, and here especially its historical incidents, the Lord by his own example teaches all preachers carefully to notice and to use—the Scripture is more than proverb, it is itself the fountain of all those particular Israelitish proverbs, the truth of which can be proved from it. The Lord, by the 24th verse, had advanced from the narrowest sense and circle in which the Nazarenes understood πατρίς, "country," into the large field—Israel, the proper fatherland of the prophets. He might have mentioned the fate of Jeremiah in his own Anathoth (Jer. xi. 21, xii. 6), or something of the same kind, which, being on a small scale, might have been more like his own rejection by the Nazarenes; but, according to the Spirit who is in him, he opposes to the Nazarenes' limited circle of vision a wide and comprehensive view of the subject. In this we see as before partly a mournful apology for them, that they acted not worse or otherwise than Israel at large had done; but we also see the earnest rebuking truth, which, as they have rejected his former kindness, he cannot now withhold. Elijah and Elisha are the two great prophets who stand at the proper commencement of prophetic antiquity; they are also the two great workers of miracles, whose miracles in many respects prefigured the miracles of the Lord (compare Matt. xiv. 20 with 2 Kings iv. 43, 44, and Luke vii. 15 with 1 Kings xvii. 23). He also will in truth feed the poor and cleanse the lepers. It is to these miracles of mercy that he points; and not to the fire from heaven, or to the bears which destroyed the mockers. Not only through the same traditions as James (v. 17) does he know the exact time during which the heaven was shut;* he knows it also from the revelation of the Spirit in whom he speaks; and further that Elias was not sent with similar aid to any other of the many widows in Israel at that time of oppression and distress. When he begins to speak and testify of this matter, he speaks as if all was luminous and sure before his eyes, yea, more than stands recorded in the narratives themselves. (Ἐπὶ Ἐλιόδαιον is a note of time, just as in a preceding passage ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἡλίου; compare Luke iii. 2; Mark ii. 26; Acts xi. 28; for the prophets were employed, like the kings and high priests, to indicate eras of time.) That there were also many lepers as well as widows, was due to miracle," it may have been the case that several miracles had been wrought at Capernaum, though only one is recorded. The only thing certain is that these could not have been wrought (as Lange asserts) before the second miracle in Galilee so specially recorded by John.

* This is not so exactly specified in 1 Kings xvii. 1, xviii. 1. A time of suffering, however, for Israel, was frequently thus measured out (compare Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7); and "the shutting up of the heavens" had been a specially threatened punishment from the time of 1 Kings viii. 35; Deut. xi. 17; hence Sir. xlviii. 3. Braune remarks very correctly that if the shutting, 1 Kings xvii. 1, was threatened at the beginning of the rain season, the half-year preceding would not be reckoned; and 1 Kings xviii. 1, is not inconsistent with the four half-years.

the sins of the time; and reference to this generally is made at 2 Kings vii. 3. The healing of Naaman, who also at first took offence and did not believe, leads back again to the Physician. By both these parallel histories, however (which very strikingly remind us of the Canaanitish woman of Sidon, and of the ruler of Capernaum), the design of the Lord is to deliver a genuine prophecy derived from the past and referring to the future. He announces beforehand that Israel would not receive him, its great Prophet and Physician; and, consequently, that his preaching of grace (ver. 18, 19) would, because of their unbelief, pass over to the heathen. All this is well known to him before he preaches; and yet from the beginning he speaks as graciously as if he had nothing before him but broken hearts. It is the manifestation of the opposite of this that first compels him, ἐπ' ἀληθείας, "in truth," to speak in any other strain.

This, however, was the truth which Nazareth and Israel, with incurable Jewish pride, will not hear; and which, on every occasion down to Acts xxii. 21. 22, xxviii. 25, calls forth their wrath. What happens here at Nazareth is again a symbolical prophecy for the country of all prophets, and of this the last great Prophet; it intimates, what Luke throughout the whole of his two books is ever showing us, that the Gospel must pass over from the Jews to the heathen. This is the first exception to the general glorification of the Lord, as he was teaching in the synagogues; see above ver. 15. They do not suffer him to speak further, they interrupt the worship of God by a general uproar. He allows himself, as if he were a false prophet, who, now that he is put to the proof, cannot make good his pretensions, to be cast or pushed by the first outbreak of anger into the street; and even, still patiently, to be led to the high brow of the hill by the multitudes now prosecuting their object more quietly—the result of his patience—with the intent of casting him down headlong. What fellow-townsmen are these of the Holy One of God! As his hour is not yet come, passing through the midst of them he goes his way. It is not meant that they were struck with blindness, that he became invisible, or that there was an external miracle. This is the very thing which the Evangelist means to deny by διελθὼν διὰ μέσου, passing through the midst. The Lord turns on them a look of majesty hitherto restrained; and they, receiving from him at parting a sign of the power of his spirit, are restrained from touching him, and compelled reverentially to make way for him, right and left, as he moves along! "They stood—stopped—inquired—were ashamed—fled—separated," as Pfenninger, with graphic pencil, paints the closing scene.*

PETER'S DRAUGHT OF FISHES AND HIS CALL.

(Luke v. 4–10; [Matt. iv. 19; Mark i. 17].)

In addition to what we have already said, p. 29, on the difference between the first call of the fishers of men and the Lord's present work and word in further confirming that call; and in addition, further, to what we have said in anticipation of our exposition of the latter, a few remarks must still be added, now that we have come to the immediate consideration of the narrative of Luke by itself.* The whole history, from the first crowding of the people to hear the word of the Lord up to the time when those whom the Lord won over to be servants of the word left all and followed him, is throughout of a kind more eminently fitted for typical instruction than most other portions of the Gospel narratives. Few preachers have ever been able to abstain altogether from allegorizing here. But our business is only with the words of the Lord. We have to remark first on ver. 4: He commands them to launch out into the deep, partly to exhibit the miraculous draught of fishes as contrary to all the rules of fishing; and partly also to withdraw from the eyes of the people the miracle, which was the sign given to apostles in confirmation of the promise accompanying their call. Further, we have to define in all its fulness the meaning of the miracle which accompanied the word. It was designed by our Lord, first, to be a σημεῖον, a sign, standing in most direct connection with the preceding preaching of the word of God; a symbol of the new call for Peter, in which the old calling is consecrated and exalted by being made a prophetic type of the new. It was, secondly, a figurative prophecy of the blessing attached to preaching, of the benediction which should forever rest upon his servants' labors, which shall never cease to operate. It was, finally, and subordinately, a sedative to the fear of earthly need in following Jesus. These three points in the history appear to us to be intimately united in one whole. In regard to the first, it is figuratively taught us that the casting out (the letting down) of our nets, our laboring the whole night through, is productive, as Peter's word shows, of no good without the blessing of God; while, on the other hand, it cannot be dispensed with, for the Lord, in promising the draught, at the same time commands to cast out the net, and sends the fishes into the net, but not directly into the boat. In regard to the second we see that the word of promise, εἰς ἄγραν, "for a draught," appended to the command, is parallel to the ἔσῃ ζωγρῶν, "thou shalt be a fisher," which afterwards conveys a similar assurance of the result. The third beautifully follows as a consequence from the fact that the Lord immediately and superabundantly recompensed Simon's loan of his boat for preaching; consequently, as he is now sending out Simon himself to preach, he will not suffer him as an unrequited laborer to suffer want. We may notice also as important, how prominently the difference is brought forward between the ὑμᾶς, you, of Matt. iv. 19, and of the whole narrative before us, and the address to Simon as the foremost and the representative of his disciples. It is for this reason that the Lord selected out of the two ships the one which belonged to Simon and entered into it; it is for this reason that the address in the singular, launch (thou) into the deep precedes the plural, cast (you) out your nets; it is for this reason, finally, that the other expression, ver. 10, is addressed in the first instance to Simon the sinful man,* although his equally astonished associates have already received a similar call.

* We may here correct the mistake of Neander, who supposes that a sense of sin so suddenly called forth in the case of Peter is conceivable only at an early period, at the beginning of his connection with Jesus. On the contrary, such a state of mind is the result of deep experience, when a man is brought into close communion with the Holy One.

* Robinson (Palestine, iii. 421) commits a sad mistake when he supposes that Jesus took advantage of the narrow streets of the city to escape from their snares.

The general expression, "fishers of men," ἁλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων, of the earlier call, is modified by the ζωγρῶν (a catcher), a word chosen designedly by Luke as the corresponding expression. For, men are to be captured for the kingdom of God; not for slaughter (2 Pet. ii. 12), but to be preserved alive (and this is exactly the meaning of ζωγρεῖν in Josh. ii. 13), brought to a willing obedience, and thus made serving captives. We may compare 2 Tim. ii. 16, where, though in a bad sense, as much of this application remains as is sufficient to let us see that the expression here denotes the wonderful capture of souls, for a free and willing obedience, by means of the miraculous Gospel-net. Henceforth: from this time, when thou a sinful man, in full knowledge of thy sinfulness, now becomest my disciple; and comest to be prepared by me for the higher work of fishing, which also, as a work of faith, must be learned step by step! We may thus in general draw the contrast between this call and their former calling now abandoned, without descending (with Bengel) to any thing so minute as the approaching mission of the Twelve.

THE RAISING OF THE YOUNG MAN AT NAIN.

(Luke vii. 13, 14.)

Ebrard, from a mere oversight, has erroneously assigned this history to the very day after the healing recorded in vers. 1–10. In this he was influenced by the reading ἐν τῇ ἑξῆς, without paying any attention to the important variation τῷ ἑξῆς (see immediately again chap. viii. 1, καὶ ἐγένετο ἐν τῷ καθεξῆς, and over against this, chap. ix. 37, the next day ἡμέρᾳ), as we have already pointed out, p. 197. External authorities do not, indeed, decide (the Syr. ליומא is rather opposed to the Vulgate deinceps); still, there are other considerations in abundance. Even Schleiermacher, to whom, on this occasion, we may appeal as an impartial critic, characteristically decided that chap. vii. 10 is the conclusion of a connected "collection," and gave the preference in ver. 11 to the τῷ as being a wider mark of time. Bengel has decided in the same way; and for the same harmonistic reasons which we are constrained to own as important.* For, if the resurrection at Nain, which at all events is placed vers. 18, 19 in intimate connection with the message from John the Baptist, is to be understood as having happened on the very day after the event recorded at vers. 1–10, the narrative will contain many things irreconcilable and inconceivable. For instance, the young man at Nain must have been raised before Jairus' daughter. But, first, when we consider the answer of the Lord to John, "the dead are raised," we can hardly think that he would use this lofty language concerning one single event; it gives us the impression that such a thing must have happened at least more than once.† Secondly, the whole history of the daughter of Jairus; the fact that her father, after hearing that her death had actually taken place, does not venture to entertain any further hope; with all the details of our Lord's conduct and words; lose their luminous simplicity of truth if we do not regard that as the first instance of a resurrection—that is, if any similar fact had already publicly taken place at Nain. We refer, therefore, to our exposition on that passage.* Luke, we infer, who has so many transpositions, hastens forward here to (vers. 11–35) the events of a later period, intending afterwards to bring up the parables, the storm, the Gadarenes, Jairus, etc. This is not applicable, however, as far as ver. 50, for the anointing (the incident of that passage) stands again undefined for the general καθεξῆς, "afterward," chap. viii. 1.

* [None of the critical editions (Griesbach, Scholz, Knapp, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Alford), however, adopt the τῷ, nor is it read in the lately discovered Codex Sinaiticus.—Am. Ed.]

* It has been correctly observed that ἀνὴρ ἁμαρτωλός is an acknowledgment of personal, special sinfulness, and not merely of that which is common to man: ἄνθρωπος would have been used to denote this.

† We cannot deal with the word so wantonly as Schleiermacher does, who supposes that the "Compiler" inserted the narrative here in order to do justice to (to find a suitable place for?) νεκροὶ ἐγείρονται.

We have no wish to enter deeply into the harmony; but feel compelled at times, in vindication of important sayings, to point out the place which they really occupy. The two short sayings of the Lord which the history before us contains are so incomparably sublime in their simplicity, that we are almost afraid of injuring them by any added remark; yet the believing reader, coming to such wonderful words, feels the need of a suggestive hint. We see, in the first place, and very remarkably, the deep humility and absence of all ostentation with which the Lord (ver. 13), announcing his miraculous aid wrought by the power of God, clothes in the most general expression of human comfort, the consolatory address in which his purpose is announced; and then, in language as simple as words can make it, commands the dead man who was being carried to his grave to rise. Pitiable is the infatuation which dreams that men could have invented any thing like this if it had not really so happened. We feel as we read that the simplicity and humility of the Son of Man, who is always like himself, must turn to the exhibition of his majesty and glory. The coming up to the gate of the city, the seeing the great grief of the widow sympathized with by all the people, the allowing the grief to sink into his own heart, the comfort imparted, the aid granted—all together is quite natural to him, because he is directed at the moment by the Father. For certainly he did not on every occasion perform a similar miracle when he saw a funeral, or met one on the road; as assuredly people in affliction did not, on all occasions, venture to cry out to him (it was natural that they should not) to restore to them the dead. They scarcely at any time venture to expect from him this, the highest manifestation of his power—a manifestation which even at the very moment of the triumph over death fills our minds with dread (ver. 16), for we are poor slaves of death. Even the sisters of Lazarus had no thought of this. But this poor widow is counted worthy; the hour has come for the manifestation of the works of God; the Lord instantly knows and feels this, and rejoices in the opportunity of giving expression to his sympathy in word and in deed.

We do not read that he bade the procession halt. He has no desire by the exhibition of his might either to terrify or to dazzle the people; but he stoops down soothingly to the afflicted widow, whose heart-rending weeping he heard at once from the midst of the throng. It is not for the sake of bringing back the dead to a vain earthly life, but for the sake of comforting the living, that he works this miracle. The words here alone unfold the meaning of the great deed. The Lord does not begin by saying, "Stand up, thou dead man!" "Weep not" is the first word which he utters; this is the only reason why he works the miracle, its significance lies here. Immediately after the ἰδών, "saw," before the προσελθών, "came," follows (ver. 14), with soft approach, with tender salutation, and with strong promise, he meets the widow with one simple affecting word, "Weep not!" This time, he uses only the first half of that former expression of comfort, Luke viii. 52; for the second half, in its reference to the dead, would have been here in this public appearance too much. Could he have begun with more of lowly sublimity, of simple majesty, of tender power, more like one whose nature was at once human and divine? Assuredly, he does not blame or reprove the weeping of the deeply-afflicted woman, which the Father had appointed to her for her good: this weeping was quite different from the noisy weeping of Mark v. 39; and his address here has nothing of the tone of the rebuke which he uttered then. His word is very different from the miserable comfort of the men who say what he said to the afflicted, but can do nothing else. Weep no more, weep no longer! His design is to say this as a kind promise; undoubtedly he says it in such a way that the word carries with it its consolatory power, as the word that follows addressed to the dead carries with it its quickening power. Weep not! Gladly would he bring this to the whole human race in all its affliction and in all its sorrows of mortality: he is proclaiming this even now in the act of applying it to the widow; as a testimony of his boundless love and might to all mourners in fair Nain, which is still bringing out its dead, to all afflicted ones in Israel and on the earth. To how many since that day has the Spirit made it the source of consolation, and in doing so given them to taste beforehand the full import of that last great saying: Weep not! Rev. v. 3.

This one word is enough. Silently he approaches, silently he touches the bier, only beckoning to the men and making preparation for the great moment. There is a presentiment of what he intends to do; at least no one dares to offer any resistance to the extraordinary interruption; the bearers (advancing according to Jewish fashion with rapid steps) stand still; soon the whole multitude from Nain, and that which was accompanying him into Nain, stops in its progress. Not till all have stood still and are waiting, does he speak his second word. He utters it in a tone not louder than is necessary to enable all to hear; but loud enough for this, because the glory of the Father is now about to appear in the Son before these men. The three resurrection-words, which are recorded in the Gospels, are very similar. In the first the damsel, here the young man, finally Lazarus by name, in the presence of the great crowd, are addressed, that the dead may hear the voice of the Son of God who calls them as if they were living—then the "arise" for the two who are laid out, and at last the imperative "come forth," to him who had been laid in the grave. Whether the σοὶ λέγω, "I say unto thee," was added by Luke, as it is by Mark v. 41 (compare Luke viii. 54), we do not certainly know; the above analogy might lead us to suspect that it was. Assuredly its import, even though it had not been expressly uttered, is found in the single word קוּם, arise! There is no calling upon God, as in 1 Kings xvii. 21; but the most simple command in his own might. There is not even the touching, or taking hold of the dead by the hand (as in the case of the damsel); he touched only the bier. There is no "Live again," or "Come back from the dead," or any thing like this; no—only the simple "Arise," as if the young man were asleep.

* We would almost venture to suppose, though this is merely a matter of feeling, that Christ did not proceed to his first miracle of raising the dead unsolicited by man. That he could do even this, and that he should do it, was to him before this time a matter of trial; and this trial he was now about, for the first time, to make.

And he gave him to his mother. Luke thus directs our attention to two Old Testament histories, 1 Kings xvii. 23; 2 Kings iv. 36; and perhaps also indicates that the Lord uttered a third most gracious word to the mother (which is omitted here as being addressed only to the individual), as in the ancient history: Take away thy son. This is more probable than the other, "Behold thy son liveth," which the Lord already appropriated, John iv. 50. He who does this shall assuredly restore also to all who are separated (whom the kingdom of the Father shall unite), those whom they have loved; that in the general restoration to life there may be also a restoration to personal recognition and special fellowship of love. As certainly as there will be a resurrection will there be a seeing again, and a having again: this also is promised and guaranteed in the three resurrections, typical as these are of the general resurrection.

THE WOMAN WHO WAS A SINNER, AND SIMON THE PHARISEE.

(Luke vii. 40–50.)

Luke, the experienced physician of souls and accomplished painter of sacred scenes, gives us here one of his most precious histories, the sweet kernel of which poor sinners never will be able to exhaust. The narrative, because of its very glory and importance, stands without any special chronological or topographical note; it is designed to bring generally before our very eyes the Lord in the wisdom of his love, as he receives sinners and puts Pharisees to shame. We must at the outset designate as a piece of very unhappy and shallow criticism, the view of Ebrard, viz., that Luke intended to represent this weak woman as a contrast to John the Baptist, who, though a mighty prophet, yet did not completely understand Christ. When will ye cease, beloved brethren, to cast reproach upon the greatest man born of women, who needed only to understand Isa. xl. and liii. to keep him right in regard to the "Lamb of God?" Assuredly the Baptist had had enough of such sinners before him, in the light of God's presence, to render it impossible that any one of them should surpass him in knowledge of the Saviour (and of his salvation in the forgiveness of sins, Luke i. 77). It is not as a contrast to the question of John, but as an example and as an illustration of ver. 34, in the answer of the Lord (compare also ver. 30), that Luke places this narrative where it is. No simple and intelligent reader of the Gospels can imagine that this anointing is identical with that of Mary, which took place at Bethany—an idea which the acute Schleiermacher undertook to defend. The reasons against this are so powerful that one is ashamed to mention the subject. Finally, this woman can by no means be Mary Magdalene; for in that case the same Evangelist would not mention her, immediately after (chap. viii. 2) without any intimation, and as a new person.

Jesus called sinners to him; and allowed himself to be called or invited even by Pharisees (chap. xi. 37, xiv. 1), even by enemies who lay in wait for him, or by cold-hearted inquisitive persons. That this Simon (not the leper who had been healed) had been laid under obligation by any act of kindness or miracle wrought in his behalf, there is nothing recorded to lead us to imagine. His behavior (vers. 44–46) is inconsistent with such a supposition; nor is it necessary to enable us to understand the parallel drawn between him and the woman. The sinner, however, may be called by us the sinner, without a name, that every soul who reads of her may think of himself as standing in her place. She was a sinner;* up to this time (in Pharisaic language) she had been so; and she was still a sinner before the eyes of the world, although before God the sanctifying change had already begun to take place, through repentance, forgiveness, and love in return for forgiveness. Her great love, however, still remained humble, scarcely laying hold of consolation, in penitence. She had become in her own eyes a great sinner, and this is the real difference between her and the Pharisee: this was what brought her to Jesus. At all events she had sought and inquired after him, as Luke intimates in his ἐπιγνοῦσα, "when she knew;" it is his personal presence alone that is again desired, because (mediately or immediately) she had been awakened, converted, humbled, and certainly also comforted by his word. Had the Lord's invitation, Matt. xi. 28–30 (if Luke's narrative here is in chronological order) at a former period completely arrested her attention and drawn her to the Saviour? It may have been so; yet the καθεξῆς, "afterward," chap. viii. 1, does not determine any thing; and we are in general ignorance of the whole matter, as to what city it was,* etc. The Evangelist finely avoids saying that the sinner came to Jesus; this is self-understood under the pressure of her first love, seeking to be assured of the love of the Saviour, and in the deep contrition of the repentance which has already met with acceptance, while struggling to obtain a sense of it. In this marvellous intermediate and transition state of a soul turning to God, and under the influence of strong feeling, we see the woman, if either our own experience, or the experience of others, has given us eyes to see her. Repenting sinners have generally a twofold trial to undergo; the mockery of their former associates, and the proud contempt of the virtuous and pious—as we see in the analogous case of baptized Jews. The second of these trials is the more painful of the two; and in this latter test the deep earnestness of the woman is seen. She shuns not the Pharisee's house; she heeds not the eyes that will meet her there: for she knows well that where Jesus is present, no one will dare to thrust her out. She has brought a vessel with ointment; for the purpose of honoring the Lord with what, during her sinful life, she had misapplied to the purposes of vanity and shame.† Not only is this ointment a demonstration of her love and devotion; she intends that it should also be an acknowledgment of her return to God, and of her renunciation of her evil ways. In token of her deep sorrow, her hair, which but for this would have been well dressed, is dishevelled: all in simplicity, and from the depth of her heart. She stands behind at his feet—having pressed forward thus far with animation and eagerness—suddenly she is cast down, hesitates, and weeps—"not the lips now, but, what is far better, the eyes, give expression to that of which the heart is full."* This is all that she can do, all that she ventures to do, all that she says; but it is enough, and it leads on to every thing else. The tears which fall upon the feet of the Lord open to her the shortest road by which she can come nearer to her purpose. For she must dry his feet; and she takes her hair for this purpose, as slaves were wont to do when washing their master's feet. Now she has touched them, and this draws out her whole heart to kiss these feet. Soon would she have forgotten all about the ointment; but at length she brings it out, not venturing to approach his head.† And last of all, while she pours herself out in the tears of blessedness, which express her sense of the guilt of all her sin, at the very feet of the Saviour of sinners, she thinks of nothing, and of nobody around her, except only of him, who receives all in silence, without as yet arresting her by even a single glance. What more could she have? What comfort to her soul is this! Therefore the Lord does not suddenly cut short these happy moments.

A sight to give joy to the angels in heaven! But the Pharisee sees with other eyes, and has other thoughts within himself. He does not express with his lips the import of these thoughts: there is still something good in him. But his doubt whether this Jesus be what he professes, draws its inferences, and in doing so assumes premises that are altogether false. The position is not in the present case a false one, that a prophet ought at once to know all men who come near him, and to understand every thing that happens to him. For although Elisha, for example (2 Kings iv. 27), might make the confession, "The Lord has concealed the matter from me, has not revealed it to me," the application of this to Jesus is a very different thing. Simon is quite correct in supposing that if Jesus be such a prophet as the people take him to be, and as he himself gives out that he is, something else might be expected from him.‡ But the bluntly assumed axiom of the Pharisee is fundamentally false (an axiom which, if true, must keep God and man eternally separated), "that a holy man can have no contact with sinners." Why then has the Saviour had so much intercourse with the Pharisees? It is also fundamentally false that this woman is "a sinner,"

* The article ἐν τῇ πόλει refers only to the preceding τὴν οἰκίαν: in the same city where was the house of this certain Pharisee, and, therefore, she was well known to him as a notorious character. Meyer, without any reason, supposes the city to have been Capernaum; Wieseler, Nain, etc.

† We do not, however, see why (according to Braune) the ointment should be the "wages of iniquity."

* P. D. Burk, in his excellent and suggestive treatise on this narrative; the over drawn character of many of its remarks we have no disposition to find fault with.

† Which idea pleases us better than the usual one, that she anointed the feet as a mark of her deep reverence. With this woman there is no such thing as ceremony; every thing comes naturally from her heart as the events emerge.

‡ It is not at all probable that Simon had previously believed in the prophetical character of Christ, and that he was now perplexed about him. This idea is quite inconsistent with his very uncourteous conduct from the commencement, as afterwards described.

and, on the other hand, that he who has invited Jesus to his house is no sinner! Finally, how cold and unfeeling is his language, when the word "touch" is all he has to say for the weeping, kissing, anointing of the woman; her loving, as the Lord afterwards rightly calls it.* O Simon, wert thou not a poor sinner, Jesus would not have come to thy table; had not this woman been a penitent sinner, she would not have sought him in thy house. Oh that thou knewest what a Saviour he is; how he knows thee and her—her repentance, thy pride! But all this Simon shall soon learn. The Lord suddenly arrests his attention, and gives him an opportunity of having something said to him by the "prophet." A very simple parable leads him—with lightning conviction, but with forbearing kindness—to the main point which his thoughts had left out of view. He must reply: he judges correctly; but he does not know that he has judged himself. Then comes the interpretation of the parable, opening his eyes, and setting him and the woman, in three clear contrasts, before the company at table, as before God. The parable certainly puts the Pharisee to open shame; yet the lesson of instruction turning back again to the parable in ver. 47 is expressed forbearingly and graciously; instead of nothing, a "little" is left to the Pharisee, while to the sinner her "much forgiveness" is indirectly expressed in her "much love."

Verse 40. Even from the beginning the design of the Saviour in entering upon the conversation is not merely to bless the poor Pharisee with the knowledge of salvation in the forgiveness of sins, but to protect the woman from the censure which was about to break out against her. His first word closely borders upon the humble modesty of the guest, as if he intended to say—"May I, Simon my host, speak a word to thee?" But his holy dignity does not permit him to express himself literally in these terms; for he is. and in every company he must ever be, the Prophet who has something to speak to the world. and —more than a prophet—to speak it in his own name. In the first place. to thee (not as yet to the woman, she may go on quietly weeping, and kissing, and anointing!)—in reply to thy present thoughts, which I read in thy countenance; to thee, thou Simon, thou man, whom I know and address by name, knowing well what kind of man thou art generally and at this present moment. I—to thee—something to say; this arrests his attention, prepares, and impresses him: What thinkest thou I have to say to thee? Canst thou not observe what I have for thee?† The man thus impressed could not but yield assent to the Master, in a brief enforced expression, which shall prevent him from afterwards complaining of the severe lesson.

Verses 41—43. And what a lesson of the perfect Teacher, giving, without lengthened preaching and discourse, in most pointed, brief, impressive touches, all the instruction which the case required. In the form of a convivial parable, which a Rabbi invited to an entertainment was always at liberty to give without any breach of politeness, he represents the sins of men before God by a common popular figure, that of a debt to be paid. "Two debtors"—this is the first expression: that is, thou and this woman; that is, the man who despises his fellow-sinner, and that fellow-sinner himself. Thou sayest in thy heart, "She is a sinner:" I have to say to thee, "Ye are both sinners before God," in this respect essentially alike; ye are both insolvent; and bankruptcy is the same, whether of much or little. But, although in the deepest sense of the truth every one without distinction is guilty of much in the presence of the Supreme Judge, and yet the proud man and the hypocrite even more guilty than other sinners, still the Lord, in the exercise of tender forbearance, condescends, at the beginning, to the Pharisee's way of viewing the subject; which, when looked at externally, and at first sight, has in it apparent truth. Conceiving thyself in company with this woman in the presence of God (a great step this from one's own thoughts about himself), art thou not conscious that thou art not perfectly holy; knowest thou not some sins, however little they may be, which the grace of God has forgiven thee? Then you are alike, with every admitted difference. He forgave them both (ἐχαρίσατο, comp. Col. ii. 13)—this is the great point, the whole process between God and man; in which every pair of individuals stand by each other's side on a footing of equality. Oh with what kindness does he anticipate and allure the Pharisee, whose sin is already really forgiven, according to 2 Cor. v. 19! And what consolation does he provide for the listening woman! Say (an εἰπέ for his εἰπέ); I will not merely teach thee, thine own knowledge shall decide the simple case: Which now will love him more? That is, which will be bound to do so, by the new obligation arising from the remission of the debt? which will be so disposed and able from natural gratitude, and so really love him more? finally (and this is the last point), which will be allowed to love him more?* Will not the creditor receive the larger gratitude from the man to whom he has remitted the larger sum? This would have been amply enough if Simon had had open ears—"the touching of this woman is an expression of her most sincere gratitude; it is her much love for the forgiveness of her many sins: and should it be repelled by God, or the prophet of his grace?" Simon perhaps observed something, but certainly nothing clearly; otherwise he would have been silent from shame, or would have said, "Master, thou art in the right, I have been wanting." On the other hand he replies promptly, with stately confidence, as if this parable had nothing to do with him, "I judge" (ὑπολαμβάνω, compare Acts ii. 15) —it appears to me that the case is very simple and the affair very natural; the more of forgiveness there is, so much the more is there of love and gratitude.* Upon this the Lord speaks kindly, "Thou hast now judged correctly, more correctly than before; but even now, alas! more correctly than thou yet knowest; thou hast judged thyself, for thou art the man with the little sin and little love."

* Alford says finely: "Touching—this is all that the Pharisee fixes on: his offence is merely technical and ceremonial."

† This, rightly applied as coming from the mouth of the Lord, would, at the present day, be a powerful text, and enough for any man: I—to thee—something—to say! Shall I say it? Or canst thou not, wilt thou not, say it to thyself?

* Bolten reads here with strange absurdity: Which would be most full of adulation?

Verses 44–46. If it had not been necessary, the Lord would certainly not have proceeded fully to expose and put to shame the Pharisee. But nothing else will suffice: and Simon probably did not lay even this to heart. He now turned to the woman, although speaking to Simon; he casts a look of benediction upon the penitent and loving woman, still without speaking a word, in order that she might slowly arrive at the full enjoyment of his grace. Now he praises and brings into notice the despised creature in the house which only her regard for Jesus made her dare to enter. Seest thou this woman? now with right eyes, as heretofore with false? Look upon her; thou hast, properly speaking, not seen her yet —look upon her in the light of the parable, and of thine own correct reply: see, she is truly no longer a great sinner, but one who loveth much; i. e., a great saint, in contrast with thee, in thy coldness and pride. The sight of a penitent sinner should bring the proud saint to confession. Whether the Saviour had become aquainted with the life and character of the woman on a former occasion, or whether he now saw all in the Spirit, we know not certainly, there is at least no reason for assuming this on every such occasion as this. In the present instance, it appears that he drew the inference from the great love of the woman, in the same way in which he directed Simon to draw it. "I came into thy house!" Possessing, as he did, the dignity of the Son of God, he reckons this favor done to his host as a favor from God, for which he ought to have manifested more gratitude, for which he should have bestowed a little more honor upon his holy guest. But what a poor counterpart does his conduct in this respect form to the expressions of love which had been witnessed on the part of the woman! Three contrasts in succession show this in the clearest light of truth. "Thou hast not remembered even that most common time-honored usage of hospitality, the washing of the feet of the man who hath travelled to thy house* (an act of hospitality shown by Laban even to the servants of Abraham); this woman hath performed this duty for me with her tears, her tears of penitence, the noblest of all kinds of water—a duty which thou neglectedst, and for her performance of which thou shouldst have given her thanks. Thou hast cautiously abstained from giving me a kiss,† that the world might not regard thee as too intimate a friend, or as a disciple; but this woman from the beginning‡ till now hath not ceased to kiss my feet." The very obtrusiveness of love is praised, not blamed. "Some one has sarcastically said—If my servant were to come and fall upon my neck and say, Oh, how I have loved thee, Master! I should teach him a very different lesson. He thus threw mockery upon the love of man to God, and even upon God himself, who has commanded such love from man. But praised be God, who condescends to our lowliness from infinite majesty" (Burk). The Lord Jesus receives the expressions of love and honor with equa. dignity and humility: he would have suffered himself to be kissed even by the false Simon, as he does not withdraw his feet from the tears of a woman who was a sinner. He is so humble in his majesty, and so majestic in his humility, that—shall we say like a child, or like a sovereign—he complains before a whole company of men, who were watching his words, that certain marks of respect had been

* Others (whom Braune follows) understand a wavering, not fully outspoken reply: I consider—i. e., probably, yes, it might be so. But ὑπολαμβάνειν (like διαλαμβάνειν), to assume, to hold, never denotes uncertainty, but rather, and more frequently, a fixed, firmly held judgment. Thus Acts ii. 15, it is "As ye decide," or answer (vers. 12, 13); as ye explain the appearance.

* This is so very striking that many have endeavored, very erroneously, to read the words as a question: Hast thou not given me water? hast thou not given me a (ceremonial) kiss? Others suppose that the custom could not have been a general, constant one, as Simon would scarcely have intended to be absolutely uncourteous. But, on the other hand, it is manifest that it is only the most common respect and not any thing special for his own person that the Lord desired.

† Although we do not read of it any where except in the case of Judas, it is improbable that no one (as Bengel supposes) had ever given Jesus the customary "kiss of reverence, of greeting, and of farewell," according to the classification of Rabbinical writers at a later period. The Lord on this occasion graciously invites men to do this; gives it to be understood that he expected it. The kiss of Judas was only in accordance with the general custom of the disciples. The Lord does not keep himself aloof from such expressions of affection, or from such salutations on the part of any. He does not even say to the hypocritical Pharisee, "Thou hast no right to this."

‡ The reading εἰσῆλθεν is to be preferred to εἰσῆλθον. Still even this is not to be taken literally; it merely means, "from the beginning." She came hither—this was not to be forgotten in her praise. Further we cannot altogether conclude, with Alford, from the ἀφ' ἧς εἰσῆλθον, that the woman had entered along with Jesus, accompanying him and under his protection; for, ver. 37, ἐπιγνοῦσα ὅτι ἀνάκειται points this way only by a forced construction.

culpably withheld from him: and every one must be made to feel that he does this not for his own sake, but for the sake of men. He is not afraid to speak of these things explicitly and strongly, when the conduct of the woman furnishes him with the points of contrast: her tears remind him of the omission of the washing of his feet; her kisses of the kiss withheld; finally, her ointment very naturally of the oil with which the host ought to have honored the head of his guest. But this Simon probably meant no more in his invitation than to gratify his curiosity in regard to this alleged prophet, to examine him closely with a view of ascertaining whether he were really a prophet: it can scarcely be supposed (for of this the history gives no hint) that he intended to make a suitable acknowledgment for some favor received. He keeps himself, however, very discreetly on his guard; not only avoiding every extravagance of feeling (for there is nothing in his heart to flow over), but carrying his reserve rather too far. A striking picture of these cold, stiff "worshippers of God"—who gave at the most a half reverence* to their Creator and good Father, or even it may be the "Redeemer"—he supports Jesus before the world, and yet will not underlie the suspicion of any particular love for him. This the Lord Jesus lays open to him: for in his mind to love or to hate himself was to love or to hate the Father. The design of the Lord is not to recommend such people to show at least a little more dissimulation; in this respect he has been frequently misunderstood. He takes the man as he is inside and out; and rather turns his censure of him into comparative praise, that he had acted so as to show himself to be what he really was. It was obvious that the Lord might have censured him in more severe terms, and might have put him to yet deeper shame: let it be observed, in particular, that not one word is said of the sin of harsh judgment against the woman. He confines himself as tenderly as possible to the manifest relation between the two sinners, the one of whom is inclined unrighteously to condemn the great love of the other.

Verse 47. This word is to be understood only in strict connection with the parable, the application of which it now conclusively introduces. It is neither more nor less than a convincing inference from the great love of the woman, as seen before their eyes, to the already past forgiveness of her many sins—an inference quite legitimate according to the foregoing premises. "Her sins, which are many (the five hundred pence), are forgiven her; so that thou mayest no longer reproach her with them, or desire that I should not permit myself to be touched by her as a wicked sinner. Whence do we know this, good Simon? Canst thou not know it as well as I, without any such special knowledge of the heart as belongs to a prophet? Thou hast already conceded to me the main point; and, as thou seest, she loveth much." Let us be on our guard, however, against the Popish perversion of the way of salvation, which has laid eager hold of this saying; let us take care not to approach that perversion by any strange exposition of "reception love," or something of this kind, to be pre-supposed in faith, in order to the forgiveness of sins. Here, alas! many students of Scripture have gone astray. Neander speaks strangely of the faith of the woman being sound because it proceeded from love, which is a perversion of language; he speaks also of a concealed fire of love present in her heart, even in her state of depravity, and only choked and depressed by the power of her sin. Olshausen had led the way with the strange exegesis of a receptive activity of mind, an analogous fountain of receptive love in the root of the innermost life, in order to her being able to believe in forgiveness: to this, however, the πολύ, "much," does not very well correspond. According to Lange, the Lord was pleased to call the ardent desire of the woman love, by means of which the forgiveness had been imparted; in this way, moreover, satisfying the Pharisee's sense of right (by a kind of meritum congrui et condigni?). Steinmeyer preaches in the same way about a love of ardent desire, longing for forgiveness, as having been present in this special case; and to this he would limit the application of the saying.* We must express our astonishment that such men could be so far prejudiced as to entertain such varied interpretations of a text which is in itself an exceedingly clear one. For, nothing is more certain, according to the whole connection as it lies before us, than the inferential force of the ὅτι, "for," in the passage;† nothing is more simple than the "argumentum non a causa sed ab effectu," which the Lord here makes use of, as when one says (to speak with Braune), "the sun is risen (it must have risen), for it is broad day." How can the aorist ἠγάπησε, "loved," occasion any difficulty? It merely sums up into one the particulars which had been described (vers. 44–46) in pure preterites. "Her much love and thy coldness and heartlessness have both a good reason." The expositor who would place the love before the forgiveness contradicts the parable (in which ἀγαπήσει is the consequence); and moreover destroys the contrast, which in this case would run, But who loves little shall be forgiven lit tle. Von Gerlaeh's language, speaking of this perverted exposition, is not less true than strong: "An unworthy disfiguring of the beautiful story, in the very spirit of Simon." What in our case, who have nothing to pay, may precede forgiveness, cannot at the most be more than an understanding and a receiving of the love of God, on the part of a heart susceptible thereof; but this is by no means the full meaning of the word ἀγαπᾶν, love. The Lord says —what we have before our eyes in 1 Tim. i. 13–15—The more sin in past time, the more rich is the grace in forgiveness, with faith and love. The mockery of the world runs, Young strumpets, old beadwomen; but the truth of God is, Great sinners, great saints. "This," as Roos says, "is the great paradox, the wonderful secret of the abounding riches of grace, which out of the greatest guilt can prepare for itself the greatest glory." The major for the Lord's syllogism had been already granted in the parable by Simon—The more forgiveness, the more love. The Lord has given an ocular demonstration of the minor with his question, "Seest thou what this woman hath done? Is there not there a πολὺ ἠγάπησε (she loved much)? Canst thou not see it as I show it to thee?" The conclusion is expressed: "οὗ χάριν λέγω σοι, wherefore I say unto thee, from this I conclude that her hitherto many sins have been forgiven—and this was what I had specially to say to thee (ver. 40)."* We may still further observe how the Lord now half revokes and corrects the συγκατάβασις or condescension of the kindly begun parable, as if Simon had sinned only a little. He does not say, "But to whom the little, his own little, αἱ ὀλίγαι αὐτοῦ, have been forgiven," but merely, "to whom ὀλίγον ἀφίεται, little has been forgiven;" i. e., the man who has received little forgiveness of the many sins (which he as well as the other, like every man, has), has merely derived loss from this imaginary advantage; he remains, alas! a man with little gratitude, and with little love, in contrast to those great saints who were once great sinners. Still, however, even this word is characterized by great forbearance and patience, for Simon's conscience might have answered: O Lord, thou sayest not enough, nothing has been forgiven to me, therefore I love thee not at all.† Still the Lord does not go so far as this; he supposes the poor man to have received an ὀλίγον or little of forgiveness, and therefore of love springing from it; and his design is by this word kindly to allure and touch such souls even while rebuking them. And he designs us to understand that there is a measure of truth in this supposition. Whoever imagines that he has been guilty of little sin, and cannot from deficiency in self-knowledge place himself on a level with vile sinners, yet may, through that rich grace which takes hold of souls at every point of access, receive the forgiveness even of this little; and thus there will come a little love into his proud heart. Blessed will he be if he then take a close survey of the much love of others, and be thereby induced with deep shame to sink deeper into self, and receive for himself also forgiveness of many sins. The remark of the Berlenburg Bible is well meant: "Even he who needs little forgiveness, should on that account love the more, out of gratitude to God for having hindered and protected him from sinning, just as a man does a greater act of kindness who keeps another free from hurt, than one who heals the wounds which he has received." But this is not to the point; for Jesus is not speaking of what ought to be, but what is: further, God does not reckon the little or the much of sin according to outward conduct; and whoever thanks God for preservation must at the same time acknowledge that all the many sins which have not been committed in overt act were really in him. We have to notice finally two important points. The one relates to the person of the Lord Jesus: mark how, in the case before us, he takes, with majestic simplicity, and as if it were self-understood, the place of God forgiving sins and receiving love in return; making the manifestations of love to his own person the measure of men's spiritual posture before God. The other relates to great sinners; who, after their conversion, feel inclined to do penance, and make confession, before the whole world, and glory in the compassion which they have experienced. To them it is here said, Only love much, this is the best confession and penance which you can offer. Only anoint the Saviour's feet in those of his brethren, that thus all who understand the matter may observe how much has been forgiven you. But as to others who do not understand it, and who would turn like swine upon you and rend you, spare them the special catalogue of your sins: auricular confession is due exclusively to the one High Priest.

* I once saw, in an advertisement of a watering-place, that a church for the worship of God was to be found in its neighborhood "for those who should feel any necessity to show their reverence to the Creator."

* See in opposition to this an admirable review in Tholuck's Litt. Anzeiger, 1848, p. 196.

† Glassius, Phil. Sacra, ed. Dathe, p. 535, does not introduce this passage for כִּי, γάρ or ὅτι, but among others, John viii. 44, x. 26; 1 Cor. x. 5; 1 John iii. 14. At least the last is a most perfect parallel to the passage before us. Lücke's remark on it is: Brotherly love is a sign, a proof, of living faith.

Verses 48–50. Now finally, after the poor host had received the full honor (to him specially necessary) of the conversation held with himself, we have the long reserved word for the woman who was a sinner, who had already overheard much of a consolatory and commendatory character. Jesus had in the presence of all her despisers extolled and boasted of the great love of this deeply contrite woman, because she was able to bear this without injury; but he now goes, in his words to her-

*Λέγω σοι is hence by no means to be separated, like a parenthesis, from οὗ χάριν, and the latter phrase to be connected with ἀφέωνται. Hofmann has briefly protested against this view; and we rejoice to find him holding fast the only correct interpretation. Quite as false is the subtile expedient on which Grotius prides himself so much, which connects the οὗ χάριν with ὅτι as its αἰτιολογικόν, and brings out this sense: Therefore, for this end, that she might thus love, has she been pardoned by God; shall I then reject this love?

† For we are not to suppose of this altogether heartless man, as Von Gerlach does, that an inward sense of guilt, and an impression of the wisdom of "the prophet," brought him, even for a little, near Jesus.

self, into the very foundation of the matter, and that too, with equal publicity, in the presence of the whole party. He assures her formally and solemnly of her forgiveness;* and adds in conclusion a decisive statement in regard to its foundation and consequence. It is no longer "thy many sins," but σοῦ αἱ ἁμαρτίαι, thy sins (the αἱ reduces at the last both to a complete level; and the emphatically preceding σοῦ excludes by a gentle contrast Simon, but at the same time allures him with the promise, "I have the same full comfort of forgiveness for all thy sins to address also to thee"). Thus again he speaks boldly, more so than a prophet, as he does at Matt. ix. 2, to the man sick of the palsy; and is not afraid of the objection of ver. 49. (That, however, on this occasion does not assume such a severe form as it did then, viz., of a charge of blasphemy against God.) In order, however, that all who hear the word may know the right road and the right end, he gives, in conclusion, the usual, simple, blessing upon faith unto peace. This concluding word here receives an expreseive, all-embracing significance. In the first place, faith, the intermediate idea between forgiveness and love, has not yet been introduced; and by it, therefore, an answer is given to the question, "How is it that the one has been forgiven, and the other has not?" At the same time the misconception is removed, that love could be the prevenient reason for which forgiveness is received.† Faith in this case is pointed out as the internal principle on account of which God justifies, as the Lord here does this woman; love, on the other hand, as the outward expression and proof to others of the grace that has been given, as the Lord has previously shown. Further, the Lord says, in the mildest condescension of the simple Giver: Thy hand has given it to thee, because it has received it from me. Still further, there lies here an allusion, which supplies the want of any previous notice on this subject, to the faith of the woman that was a sinner, before she saw Jesus and heard the word of comfort from his lips—the faith by which she heard his call from afar and thus came seeking him. She had already found favor with God in her repentance; her sins had been forgiven, and therefore she loved much. And we here learn that the sealing assurance of forgiveness is a different thing from the first forgiveness which had been enjoyed in penitent faith; although, again, every penitent wishes and seeks a special absolution, and shall assuredly receive it in the word, as this woman received it directly from the lips of Christ. Still more, by thus giving prominence to faith, the Saviour directs the comforted woman to the future of the new life: Go on believing, and thus as all thy past sin has been forgiven (the language hitherto used had referred exclusively to this), so all thine in-dwelling corruption shall be taken away. Thou art delivered, thou hast been helped: the Lord says this to her exactly as he had said it to the sick whom he healed, as, for example, chap. viii. 48. Thou art healed; and thou shalt be healed, if thou continuest and makest progress in faith. In the eye of justice, the sinner was at first a debtor; now, before full grace, she is merely an invalid. Therefore go in the use of thy new health and strength; continue not, in the enjoyment of sweet consolation, thus remaining in my presence, and hanging upon me. And this was needful, "for she would have forgotten to go home." Therefore, by this plain word, she who had just been comforted is directed to leave that presence which she had felt to be so pleasant, and to betake herself to her ordinary life, that she might by a new walk from henceforth continue to confess and to love him. Thus she departs not only in peace, but truly εἰς εἰρήνην, to peace, as to the happy termination of the way, the beginning of which is peace—a termination, always near, yet for the first time fully reached only at the end. Finally, the Lord here attracts Simon and all who were present (in opposition to doubting questions and angry feelings, vers. 49 and 13), to believe in himself, in order to their peace. But he approached the believing sinner, and gave himself to her in these four symbolical stages: he first silently received her approach; then he turned upon her the light of his countenance next he addressed specially to her the word of assurance; and last of all he sent her again into the world in the peace of faith

DISOWNING THE ZEAL OF ELIAS; OF WHAT SPIRIT YE SHOULD BE OF, CHILDREN.

(Luke ix. 55, 56.)

The Lord enters upon his last journey to Jerusalem, firmly resolved to meet the sufferings that await him there, through which he has to pass on his road to glory; and in the consciousness that the time is now very near

* We cannot understand (the "many sins" previously mentioned, in particular, render it impossible for us to do so) that this could have been said to Mary of Bethany, "in a reference entirely unknown to us," as Schleiermacher supposes.

† Compare Sander, Das Pabstthum (Elberf. 1845), p. 48, where, after affirming the correct view, in entire harmony with the interpretation given above, he quotes the words of Melancthon: "Christ interprets himself, when he adds, Thy faith hath saved thee."

when he must die at Jerusalem, and thus return unto the Father.* He takes the road through Samaria (chap. xvii. 11), a route generally avoided by travellers to the feasts; and in a spirit of kindness sends before him open-hearted messengers to bespeak for him a lodging, or to ask as a favor entertainment from some well-disposed people,† avoiding, as he was wont to do, places of public resort. But the Samaritans (mentioned here by Luke for the first time) are not on this occasion so well-disposed as the inhabitants of Sychar had been; they refuse to receive him. They feel agrieved that he should turn aside to them on his very journey to Jerusalem. It was natural that at the seasons of the feasts, and in connection with the journeys to the feasts, the rivalry between Jerusalem and Gerizim should assume its bitterest form. When James and John, who perhaps were the messengers themselves or formed part of their number, perceived or discovered the refusal of the hated and despised Samaritans to give a night's resting place to the Lord—whom they had so recently seen glorified before their eyes—they gave way to anger and zeal; their intentions were good, and their faith was strong, yet their conduct was in violation of love, and they were actuated by the returning, persistent pride, of the "We," which had recently been convicted in them, vers. 49, 50. They feel themselves insulted, with their Master; having come down from the Mount, they have Elias still in their mind, who punished, and that too in Samaria, the contempt shown to God in his person, by fire from heaven; they suppose that, as the disciples of Jesus, they are on a footing with Elias, that they may imitate him in the vigor of his zeal —a matter in which we are all most readily inclined to imitate the saints. All this is a very natural connection of thought. Further, inasmuch as they feel that it would not be seemly for them to say, "Call thou down fire from heaven," they do not know very well what to do, but imagine it would better become themselves to do it. Meanwhile they naturally ask first, Lord, wilt thou that we say so? Singular mixture of daring faith, which does not doubt that the event will happen at their bidding; of simple presumption, which scarcely doubts for one moment that he will say "Yes" to their question; of a certain loving zeal for his insulted person, which alone actuated them as they thought; and, with all, in the concealed ground of a self-deceiving heart, of an impure pride, in the subtle working of which it was in reality more their own rejection than the rejection of the Lord that affected them. "They will not receive thee—most strange impiety!" they might think that they meant; but their heart meant, "They have rejected us: shall we then not be angry, and punish them? may we not for once do more than thou hast commanded us?" (ver. 5). Thus they forgot entirely the meekness of their Master, and his love for the poor souls of erring men.

The faithful and wise Master has immediately at hand a reply and a lesson prepared in most striking words—a reply and a lesson available in all similar cases, and for the sake of which alone Luke has recorded the occurrence. It is inconceivable that even the first word of the reply should be a spurious addition. Many old Codices, however (and even the fathers), actually leave out every thing after καὶ εἶπεν, "and he said;" but it is hard to say for what reason, since some reply of Jesus must be conceived of at the time, and is necessary also in the Evangelical record of the occurrence. This mere brief abrupt ἐπετίμησεν, "rebuked" (he threatened them as he did the unclean spirit, ver. 42!), Luke could not possibly have written; although that word of itself says a great deal, and certainly contains this, that he was more angry at their unseasonable application of Scripture, covering much pride and selfishness, than he was at the poor Samaritans. It partakes, according to his kindly manner which considers every thing and pays regard to every thing, of the nature of a decided and zealous rejection of their offensive zeal: Far be it from me and from you to seek or to say any such thing! The lesson which must reply to this example, drawn in to justify them—as Elias did—must take a wider range. "Elias then, and ye now —what a difference! Do ye not yet understand this? What was quite right in him, is a sin in you. Do ye, as my disciples, still know so little? Do ye not know from my whole doctrine, actions, and life, that another spirit altogether than that which inflamed any Old Testament prophet is in me; and consequently of what kind of spirit (the disciples, children, possessors of what kind of spirit) ye are, as my servants and messengers, or ought to be?" That πνεῦμα, spirit, does not here signify a certain state of mind and feeling, thus and

* Although this journey is a protracted one (see Luke xiii. 22, 33, xvii. 11, xviii. 31, 35, xix. 11, 28), and the Evangelist interweaves much that does not belong to it—because, in a certain sense, the whole previous life of our Lord had been a journey to meet death—the above is the correct sense of chap. ix. 51; compare xiii. 33. The expression ἀνάλημψις (on which Wieseler in particular has expended much subtility) can, in New Testament usage (Mark xvi. 19; Acts i. 2, ii. 22; 1 Tim. iii. 6, etc.: it is used of Elias, 2 Kings ii. 10; 1 Macc. ii. 59, and the apocryphal ἀνάλημψις Μωσέως), only mean his being taken up from earth to the Father; but assuredly the passage through suffering is included (hence αἱ ἡμέραι), and the whole refers back to ver. 31. The remark of Von Gerlach is quite correct: "In this expression, death, resurrection, and ascension, are included, all in one." Christ goes forward to this ἔξοδος, not so much externally, by the shortest road, as internally, firmly resolved to meet it: πρόσωπον ἐστήριξε, not merely as in 2 Kings xii. 17; Jer. xxi. 10; Ezek. iv. 3, xxviii. 21, but in the sense of Isa. l. 6, 7.

† This is all that lies in the text. There is not the least occasion to connect with these messengers the sending out of the Seventy, as Neander does.

thus constituted, is certain, because the word no where properly means this. As little may we understand the expression to mean (indeed, the one sense flows out of the other): Ye do not know or reflect, ye are for the moment wholly unconscious, whether it be your own and an evil spirit, or the Holy Spirit, that impels you! For the φρόνημα or "mind" of the flesh never means in the New Testament "a spirit of one's own," though we now make use of this inexact expression.* The οἵου, "what," before πνεύματος, "spirit," refers manifestly to the "spirit of Elias," Luke i. 17, and expresses by one pregnant and instructive word the great difference between the Old and the New Testament economy, exactly in the sense of Rom. viii. 15. What Elias did was certainly not done in sinful wrath or in self-will; still with me there has come a new time, and with it a new spirit. The spirit of servants was then altogether the right one, and it justified a burning zeal for the glory of the mighty Lord; but the spirit of the children of God introduces in gentleness the love of the Father as it appeared in the humble, patient Son of Man. A certain theology cannot, and will not, apprehend this difference of the economies of God; but the difference is well-grounded, and rests truly on most real unity. For example, we are told by De Wette that "the Old Testament stands on low ground; it contains in it views, aims, and ideas, which in part do not reach forward to those of the New Testament, and in part run counter to them." He is unquestionably right in what he says about "not reaching forward." But to what he says of "running counter" we have to reply, it is either not the Old Covenant as such which contains within it such ideas (as, for example, self-righteousness and the righteousness of works, views which ought not really to be imputed to the law as their producing cause), or we make false points of opposition, where we have merely the unity of development by different steps. Finally, however, this patient government of the world exists only in the middle portion of this world's history; the same severity which was prefigured in the judgments poured out on Canaan, Sodom, and the world before the flood, must again be revealed at the end of time in an inconceivably more terrible form. The burning and punishing severity of God in the Old Testament is as really seated in his being as are the long-suffering and patience which first became conspicuous in Christ, and had never at any former period been unrevealed. All the temporal judgments of the first economy are types of the last and eternal judgment—to which the second economy points in language of more terrible import than had hitherto been used—and they are still continued even in their typical character; the vengeance, for example, inflicted upon the Canaanites is repeated in the history of nations till the end of time. Unless we expound the New Testament in an effeminate and one-sided manner, and unless we discard altogether the Apocalypse, the top-stone of both Testaments, in which, in a manner sufficiently striking, when it announces the wrath even of the Lamb, the Old Testament judgments in all their severity return (see, for example, chap. ii. 27; vi. 9 10; xi. 17, 18; xiv. 10; xvi. 5, 6; xviii. 6, 20: xix. 1–4)—we cannot fail to discern the unity that pervades the whole Scriptures. Exactly so is it with the legal zeal of the saints of God under the old covenant; then God demanded and practiced righteousness in the punishment and destruction of his enemies. Impurity might, indeed, mingle with it; as, in the present day, carnal effeminacy and idleness may be mixed up with Christian love and patience. But in itself it was right and holy, like the wrath and zeal of their God, who desired at that time to reveal these his essential attributes. When the spirit which they had, called upon them thus to act and judge, it would only be a misapprehension of this spirit to find in it any thing false or human. Therefore the Lord in the passage before us by no means blames the deed of Elias in blaming the intended deed of his disciples. His saying, asserting the difference as well as the unity, is, ye know not of what spirit ye now are. Diversified is the Spirit; yet it is the one spirit received from God. Wrath is as truly in God as love is; although in the grace of reconciliation, love prevails over wrath, and during the existing period of the Gospel stays its progress. The spirit of the fear of God is the very beginning of the spirit of adoption; the severe zeal of the law is, according to the relation of the man to God, and the stage of divine revelation, quite as pure and holy as is pitying and interceding love. Elias was on the Mount with Christ, and John the Baptist threatened men with unquenchable fire, before Christ brought down from heaven upon the sinful people instead of this fire the fire of the Holy Ghost.

The words following from ὁ γάρ, "for he," which are still more frequently wanting, might possibly be an explanatory gloss added to the "few yet very significant words" of the Saviour; but, if so, the gloss is assuredly one which flows very naturally from the Spirit of Christ, and is as perfectly in its place as if the Lord had really spoken it on this occasion. We cannot, therefore, decide quite as confidently as Olshausen does: "It is at all events a spurious addition;" for the addition, at all events very old (Clem. Alex. has it), sounds into our deepest soul like a word of the Lord, like an expression beautifully corresponding to the utterances which are recorded at John iii. 17, xii. 47. Even Schleiermacher would not agree with Griesbach in rejecting this gracious saying; and we venture to receive it as genuine. It corresponds entirely to the preceding clause, or rather it completely supplements it; it brings in what was really wanting, a decided allusion made for the first time to the person of the compassionate Son of Man, from whom goes forth the new spirit which does not act as Elias did; it gives the striking expression for the delivering, preserving, and redeeming love which was wanting to the disciples of the Lord in the present zeal of their faith. "Do ye not yet know for what I have come?" They had been driving too rapidly onward. Let fire fall from heaven and consume them! How opposite to this the tender compassion of the words which correspond to this, The souls of men! "Do ye not know what these words mean? What is each soul worth before God? Know ye that I am not Elias? I have come to deliver, to preserve, not to destroy, the souls of men." An old reading (the Vulgate also) gives merely ψυχάς, "lives." We prefer the full expression ψυχὰς ἀνθρώπων, "men's lives;" it is the fit counterpart of υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου; "Son of Man," and says more than either the mere ἀνθρώπους, "men," or the mere ψυχάς, "lives." It alludes to bodily life only in connection with the proper salvation of the soul: the Son of Man desires to let men live that he may give them life. Thus was Samaria spared for future salvation (of which the Lord gives here an indirect prophecy); and this same John must in due time pray down upon these Samaritans, in apostolic might, the gracious gift of the Holy Ghost.

A THIRD WORD TO A FOLLOWER; LOOKING BACK WHILE AT THE PLOUGH.

(LUKE IX. 62.)

We refer our readers to p. 138 for our views as to the relation of time between Matthew and Luke. Both Evangelists relate harmoniously the utterances addressed to the man who volunteered, and to the man who was called, to follow the Lord. Although the "And he said unto another" of ver. 59, in Luke, may be understood of the addition of a parallel saying brought from an earlier period, we cannot translate ver. 57 with Ebrard: And it happened among other things, when, on one occasion, they were in the way. This could be admitted only if ver. 52 and ver. 56 had not preceded; for though an Evangelist, especially Luke, may be supposed to collect and unite different narratives, still he unites truly into one whole for the reading Church, which, under the name of Theophilus, the guiding Spirit sets before his mind; and we cannot determine to draw a thick line between particular portions as if they were disjointed fragments. Hence, therefore, πορευομένων, "as they went," is truly connected with ἐπορεύθησαν εἰς ἑτέραν κώμην, "they went to another village," and the definite article ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ, "in the way," denotes the way in which they then were; the Spirit of inspiration did not allow Luke to write what would not have been true. The καὶ προσελθών, "and—came," Matt. viii. 18, 19, is equally definite in the connection in which it there occurs (this is not the case again with the ἕτερος δὲ εἶπε of ver. 21); and there is no other way of explaining the facts except by assuming that according to the definite words of Matthew and Luke, the first of these examples really occurred a second time. Many suppose it suits better a later period; we dissent from this, as the outward poverty of the Son of Man needed to be pointed out rather at the beginning, and must have been well known at the end of his course. But, if the Lord in consequence of having received a repetition of such an offer (and it is probable such offers may have been repeated more than twice), found it necessary to repeat his former reply (and that he should do so is in perfect accordance with his practice, frequently occurring in the Gospels, of going back upon the past), the reply would in this case cease to be unsuitable for a later period. The second follower, and also the first, probably belong to this period. By this we mean not that they came forward in such close succession as they appear in the record (for the sacred writers are not so strictly exact in their histories as this), but that the events occurred generally, about the same time; for, the command to preach the Gospel appears to stand in connection with the mission of the Seventy, which took place immediately after.

Enough that Luke and also Matthew (who is still more complete), show us that the Searcher of hearts employed different methods, according to the different tempers of the individuals with whom he had to do. The first man desires to follow him, but there is something wanting at heart; he is therefore discouraged from his purpose. The second is called by him, and is ready, but in a critical moment he is irresolute; he is therefore drawn and urged onward. The third stands undecided, occupying a middle place between the two; he is neither discouraged nor held fast, but directed by a testing word to decide for himself: the Lord therefore addresses him not directly, but in a general statement. He requests, before following the Lord, that he may obtain permission ἀποτάξασθαι τοῖς εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ, i. e., not "to bring into order what is in his house" (understanding the reference to be to things), or any thing like "to arrange certain relations, some private matters, and still to have the charge of the house which he was about to leave." For, in Luke, ἀποτάσσεσθαι signifies to take leave, or, what is connected with it, to give the last commission; see Acts xviii. 18, 21, and Luke xiv. 13, in a figurative sense. There are thus persons in his house; not exactly a father to be buried, but living relatives, inmates of the family, friends, from whom he will not and cannot be separated without taking leave. We doubt whether the man "desired to give a festive entertainment to the inmates of his house on taking leave, and to act like those senseless people who would rejoice with the world before taking leave of it and becoming pious; or like the children of folly who must first indulge in excesses before they bend the knee to the cross and turn their thoughts to the passion of the Lord." We find nothing so bad in the ἀποτάξασθαι, which rather implies a firm determination to forsake all. Still, this leave-taking might easily give rise to a protracted stay at home, which might end in not taking leave at all. The Lord seriously warns him to consider this, neither forbidding him nor permitting him to do as he had desired. It has been said that the Lord makes use of this proverbial saying about the plough, because on the man's request there immediately occurred to his mind the similar request of Elisha, 1 Kings xix. 19, whom Elijah found and called when at the plough. It may be so; although the circumstances alluded to are the reverse of those in the present instance. Elisha was called away from the plough, this man was called to another plough. But though the Lord took occasion from this history to use this proverb, yet he must have had some reason to compare the call to the kingdom of God with the call to the plough: the figure must have a meaning and truth in itself. We certainly are not wrong if we view it generally in connection with laboring in the great harvest (chap. x. 2); and further suppose that the Lord here speaks of ploughmen instead of sowers (whose department certainly belongs to the great husbandry of God as well as that of the other), because he desires to direct attention to the earnestness and anxiety which should characterize the careful labor peculiar to the first period, when the foundations are to be laid. It is the intention of the Lord to say to this man: In the kingdom of God there is not mere pleasure and refreshment, not only easy and quiet work; but, above all things, and at every sowing time, a vigorous laboring at the plough—confessedly a work of the severest kind. There is labor within ourselves, labor on others; ever and anon the labor of repentance and self-denial, something new to plough, that there may be no sowing among thorns (Jer. iv. 3); it is ever necessary to break up the fallow ground of the world before we can plant any thing that is good. For this work, there is needed a strong arm and foot, and also, immediately and especially, undivided attention, and there must be no such thing as looking back; for whoever looks back from the plough will make no straight furrows.* The "looking back" here alluded to, is not altogether such a looking backwards as that of Lot's wife, who looked back in absolute unbelief; and still less is it the turning round and the going back of 2 Pet. ii. 22. Both of these, however, may, and must proceed from it, unless we cease from the habit of looking backwards, from that attachment to what is behind us which throws all our work into confusion, and arrests all our progress. Besides—and this is the immediate sense of these far-reaching words—whoever at the beginning puts forth his hand, yet does not bring the fixed regard to the plough which he has laid hold of (but looks round upon his village and his flock), is not fit for the work. Thus we have a repetition of the warning, given at a later period—Now in the middle of the great work, and after the full vigor of the first zeal is over, although thou withdraw not thy hand, yet if thou look back only sometimes, thou wilt soon make wretched, crooked work; thou wilt stand still altogether, yea, thou wilt stand at the plough as if thou wert working, while not working at all—not cutting into thine own heart, and therefore not into the heart of any other man. In the end it will come to this, that thou wilt throw away thy plough and return to thine own dear house, and sit down at thy former table. All this is not only designed for those special laborers in the harvest, whose office it is to make known the kingdom of God; the conclusion εὐθετὸς εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ, "fit for the kingdom of God," is intended generally to declare that with such looking back from the labor assigned to each, whatever that may be, no man can himself come into the kingdom of God, or remain therein.

THE MISSION OF THE SEVENTY.

(Luke x. 2–16.)

That the instructions given to the Seventy were probably the same as those which the Twelve received (at least in regard to their first journey), and were also conveyed in the same, or in similar words, is intimated by Luke himself, inasmuch as for this very purpose he brings into notice, on the former of these occasions, only such instructions as were common to it with the second (chap. ix. 2–5). If, however, we compare Luke x. with the far-stretching prophetic instructions given to the apostles in Matthew x., it becomes evident that the language used there refers to a permanent office for a future mission (the present being only a small typical one), yea, to a certain continuation of the office through successors for all time; but that here every thing is limited to the present temporary mission of these Seventy. Hence merely the first section of Matt. x. 1–15 is repeated, the exposition of which, as already given by us, we do not intend here to repeat. Still, a single observation may be made. Between the two missions which Luke has related in immediate succession, there lies probably a year, and that year the final one, in which the opposition was gathering strength. Consequently in these second instructions we find, very naturally for the immediate present, that our Lord has special regard to the rejection of his message. This is seen, at the beginning, in the resumption of the "lambs among the wolves," applicable also to the first journey (see at Matthew x. 16); next in the greater haste (see 4); in the stronger representations of the threatened judgments (vers. 11–15); and, finally (ver. 16 which again is parallel with the conclusion in Matthew x. 40–42), in the contempt spoken of at the close. That the prohibition "not to go" into the streets of the Gentiles, or the cities of the Samaritans, is now wanting, admits of easy explanation from the altered circumstances; we naturally look back upon chap. ix. 52, according to which the Lord himself wished to go among the Samaritans. Still further, it is obvious from chap. x. 1 that the Seventy were not to go to the heathen: as this mission was a preliminary, temporary one, there was no need for such an expressly given commandment. Compare what we have said on this subject in p. 169.

In other respects the progress and substance are very much the same as what we set forth in p. 168, as characterizing the first section expounded there. In the foreground we have, also on this occasion (ver. 2), the necessity which exists in the great harvest (as in Matt. ix. 37, 38) as the reason for this repeated mission (ver. 3)—a mission which, though it might be attended with equal danger, yet could not now be omitted; the "whence" and the "whither" of which are self-evident (Matt. vers. 5–8). Then the same negative preparation for the journey (ver. 4): they were to have no other protection against the danger to which, in the simplicity of their faith and fidelity they were to be exposed, than the taking nothing with them, and making urgent haste. The intimation as to how they were to act runs the same. At the beginning, when the determination of consequences is a matter with which they have nothing to do, general courtesy and kindness of manner, vers. 5, 6. In their progress, an unobtrusive discharge of duty (vers. 7–9), while they should receive the merited and promised hire without choice and change, and also without care. Finally, for the termination of their labors (on this occasion generally unfavorable) the same testimony of freedom from guilt and participtiion, after they should have fulfilled their duty (vers. 10, 11); with also (as at Matt. ver. 15) a glance at the judgment upon unbelief, repeated (vers. 12–15) in a stronger form from Matt. xi. 21–24. To this there is appended very suitably the general ratification of these and of all, even when they are despised, whom the Lord sends forth (ver. 16).

In ver. 1 the μετὰ ταῦτα, "after these things," (which according to Schleiermacher should only mean besides, moreover), points back to what immediately precedes, and the ἑτέρους, "other," only to the twelve, chap. ix. 1.* The mission of the Seventy falls quite suitably into a late period, viz., the one pointed out in chap. ix. 51 as that when he resolved to go up to Jerusalem for the last time; it is a gracious effort made for the last time in opposition to the hostility of his enemies; a most perfect prelude and preparation for the last journey of our Lord himself; a concluding testimony that the preaching of the approach of the kingdom of God was assuredly not a matter confined to a corner.† Even the expression ἀνέδειξε, "appointed," selected by Luke (compare Acts i. 24) points to this; for, with the idea of choice, it contains also that of a public manifestation, in the present instance before the whole world. The number Seventy, standing in connection with the number twelve (compare Exod. xv. 27), corresponds to the Seventy Elders (Exod. xxiv. 1, 4; Num. xi. 16), and indicates as it were from afar an anti-Sanhedrim of the new kingdom; in that case the round number 70 may stand for 72. The idea which has been frequently entertained that the Seventy refer to the seventy nations of the world (Gen. x.; Deut. xxxii. 8; Gen xlvi. 27), according to the Rabbinical reckoning, and the Twelve to the twelve tribes of the circumcision, is false,‡ for the apostles were rather destined for all nations, and the Seventy were not certainly sent to the Gentiles. Lange has recently affirmed, in favor of this idea, that Luke "lays these Seventy disciples for the nations in the scales over against the twelve apostles of Israel." We find, however, no trace in Scripture, or in history, of the

* Not, as Schleiermacher thought, to the "messengers" of ch. ix. 52; for the Sevent, were not sent merely to provide accommodation.

† So also it was to the Seventy themselves a preliminary exercise of their faith, and of the confession of it.

‡ Our recent expositors find it very hard to shake off this supposition. Richter's Hausbibel starts with it as an uncontested axiom; Antfeld announces it without scruple in his sermon; even Neander did not decide against it; Hilgenfeld in his Clementines, however, protests, to our surprise, against the "axiom of modern criticism, that the Seventy owed their origin to Paul's universalism, and that the number points to the number of the nations of the earth."

Seventy being intended for the Gentiles, and the Twelve for Israel; we cannot bring the former into accordance with Luke x. 1, nor the latter into accordance with Rev. xxi. 14,* and certainly not with Matt. xxviii. 19.

Verses 3, 4. We have already remarked that the dangers incident to the second period, accompanied also the first mission. The substitution of the ἄρνες, "lambs," for πρόβατα, "sheep" (compare Isa. lxv. 25, Sept.), appears not to have been accidental, inasmuch as this is the only passage of the whole New Testament in which the word occurs. It is intended to denote on this occasion the simplicity of the disciples along with their defencelessness (Matt. as doves), the simplicity of the faith in the call (I, your shepherd, send you), and the abiding faithfulness to the only work assigned to them, that, viz., of proclaiming and bringing peace. This proclamation of peace on the part of the messengers and children of God is something better than all human courtesy. On this occasion the greeting in the streets is prohibited on account of the great haste; for these proverbial expressions, comp. 2 Kings iv. 29. If, however, we ask here what is the spiritual meaning of these words in a wider application, the reply is, that purse, and scrip, and shoes, denote all unnecessary helps which disturb the simplicity of faith in the Sender; and that the greetings, on the other hand, and according to circumstances, denote all unnecessary explanations in word or deed, which prevent dispatch in the discharge of duty. It may further be supposed, that allusion is made to all false courting of the favor of men or spending of their strength in mere words; but this is not exclusively referred to. The expression κατὰ τὴν ὁδόν, whether we translate it "in the streets" or "in the way," forms in both references a contrast to the houses and the hearts (children of peace in the house), which the Gospel seeks. Every salutation other than the message of peace is an unnecessary impediment, foreign to the object of the commission of the messengers of peace, and interrupting their onward progress.

Verses 5—11. Every thing here is nearly, yet not altogether, the same at in Matthew's Gospel. It should be the duty of the Seventy to pay less attention to selection and inquiry, than the Twelve on a former occasion were instructed to do. Meeting a doubtful position with overflowing kindness, they pray for peace to every man—without inquiring, "Shall we find here the children of peace?" No doubt, this important difference was well grounded in the circumstances of the case. Further, in this instance they are expressly told merely to heal the sick; it is left to their own faith to determine whether they are to consider the demoniacs as comprehended among the sick. The peace of the kingdom of heaven they were not to proclaim in the streets, but preach it in the houses, and to the hearts of the people; and they should solemnly denounce judgments upon the city in which not one house shall receive them—For this purpose they should come out. (The second ἐφ' ὑμᾶς in ver. 11 is spurious.)

Verses 12—16. What the Lord had said on a former occasion (Matt. xi. 21–24), is here repeated at a very appropriate place: I say to you it will remain thus. The Lord remembers, very naturally, on many a later occasion, his own words, which he had uttered when his Spirit was specially moved; yea, they are not his own words (as he himself after the manner of men distinguishes), but the testimony of the Father, uttered by his lips, and therefore of sufficient importance to be recalled again and again. We may now look forward and observe how, after the return of the Seventy, he re-called the consolation from Matt. xi. 25–27. Thus two repetitions from the words spoken on the message of John, come together here at the close: first, the woe then denounced upon unbelief, and afterwards the joy at that time experienced over the faith of the children of Wisdom, then present. The concluding sentence, ver. 16, addressed to the Seventy, is designedly framed in the very same terms as that which had been addressed to the Twelve, Matt. x. 40; for it belongs to all to whom the Lord has in any way said, "I send you," in so far as this sending extends. And though they may be as weak as the Seventy are here, no man may despise their message; for the Lord who has sent them will let it be known that he judges the despisers of his servants.

* Even in Matt. xix. 28 it is manifest, as we there expounded, that it is only the people of God in general, as seen in the type of the twelve tribes, that is meant. Paul belongs to this number of twelve: the reasons for which we gave, though there with too little positiveness, in our Reden der Apostel, i. 18–20. According to Münter (Sinnbilder der alten Christen), there are at most only twelve apostles, inclusive of Paul; Matthias not being included as one. But if Paul belongs to the twelve, there is no opposition between the Twelve and the Seventy for the heathen.

RETURN OF THE SEVENTY; FALSE AND TRUE JOY OF THE DISCIPLES OF THE LORD.

LUKE x. 18–24.

In order to draw a contrast full of meaning, Luke, omitting the intervening narrative (compare chap. ix. 6–10), immediately anticipates the return of the messengers of the kingdom, who, though generally despised, are nevertheless full of joy. With what strict fidelity do the purely historical Gospel narratives every where reveal the weakness of all the companions of him who alone is mighty! the imperfection of the human nature, not yet sanctified by the Spirit, even of those believers whom he kindly acknowledges as his own and presents to all Israel as messengers representing himself! The preaching of the Seventy had certainly to a great extent been despised; whether or not they had ventured to shake off the dust of their feet as they had been commanded, they had been in cities in which they might have done this—in many a Chorazin and Bethsaida which must have reminded them of the terrible woe of the Lord. Still they returned with joy; but what was the source of their joy? It was not because people had every where listened with pleasure to their preaching; because they had found so many children of peace in the cities of Israel; because so many had repented and were rejoicing in the near approach of the kingdom: alas! this was not the report they gave to their Master! But—Even the devils are subject to us in thy name! We have been proved, we have shown our power, and have obtained honor! The Lord beholds the return of that indestructible we of his disciples which he had taken so much pains, alas! in vain, to subdue. The apostles, chap. ix 40, could not cast out one devil, although the Lord had given them power over all devils, chap. ix. 1; the Seventy, moreover, had expressly received power only over diseases, chap. x. 9. So much the greater is the almost childlike joy (Neander finds only "childishness" here) of these lesser men over the fact that they had succeeded even in casting out devils. Although this had happened only to some of them here and there, yet each one, as he makes his report, takes the credit to himself; and the proud expression runs, The devils are subject; while they almost forget and do not bring sufficiently forward the name of the Lord, placing it after their own to us. What a striking and faithful picture of a state of mind and feeling, alas! not rare even at the present day—of the improper joy of the servants at manifestations of power which have been effected through the name of the Lord, and which they have turned to their own glory.

The Lord, as was to be expected, directs to the true joy those who had returned to him with this false joy. The discourse given by Luke is strictly connected as far as the 24th verse; and the second part of it consists of instructive sayings looking back upon the past and repeated from what had been said on former occasions. In the first part, vers. 18–20 (to the middle of the verse), the Lord discountenances the false joy over the subjection of the spirits, the concluding sentences corresponding to the saying of the disciples. In the second, he points out the better, the only sure joy, the joy because of their own blessedness through and with Jesus their Master. In the first part, and before any thing else is said, the subjection of the devils is declared to be not to them, but to the name of the Lord; in order, by the voice of warning, to discountenance the false joy which would appropriate this to itself, and which might by stealthy pride again seize the power which had been only granted, and forfeit true blessedness. "It is because Satan has himself already fallen, and has met with a still deeper overthrow since my coming into the world, that he and all his host have obeyed my name in your lips. But it is from me that you have received power over him."

Verse 18. The words of the Lord are full of majesty, and at the same time full of condescension. They start from the expression, used by the disciples but not sufficiently emphasized by them, "through thy name" "Most assuredly for how were it possible otherwise; why do you see in this so much cause for amazement and rejoicing?" "The victory of good over evil was a certainty to Christ as it were by intuition"—is the remark of a well-meaning expositor; but this is only partially true, and weakens considerably the real force of the passage. Not the evil element (τὸ πονηρόν) is what the Lord here refers to; for, in the esoteric teaching which he gives his disciples, he again expressly mentions Satan as a person, working in the possessed and vanquished in them. And, moreover, not only "as it were by intuition" does he know that Satan is fallen and is falling; but his expression ἐθεώρουν—I saw—is to be taken in its full deep meaning. To interpret the words "fall from heaven" as designating Satan's coming down to earth in order to resist and to destroy—his augmenting and preparing his forces against the kingdom of God—is not only contrary to the whole biblical usus loquendi, but evidently incompatible with the context, according to which the only possible meaning is, It is natural and necessary, that he must fall before you and below you (πεσόντα occurring thus exactly as a parallel to ὑποτάσσεται). "From heaven" standing in the middle refers both to the lightning and the falling; but especially to the latter (as is evident from its being πεσόντα and not πεσοῦσαν). The figure of lightning, used as it is in connection with ἐθεώρουν, "I saw," points to the sure certainty of the beholding (comp. Matt. xxiv. 27), and also to the quick decisive suddenness of what was beheld; but, inasmuch as it is immediately connected by ὡς, "as," with Σατᾶναν, "Satan," it contains at the same time a hidden reference to the bright character of an angel of light possessed by the fallen spirit when he was yet in heaven. And herein we find also the first answer to the question: When was it that the Lord saw Satan fall from heaven? Of course, then, first, when Satan first fell from heaven, before the creation of the earth and world; when the eternal Son in the bosom of the Father (as important, in this connection, observe ver. 22) was witness of this great and awful fall. The addition, From heaven to earth is purposely not made; for what we now call earth became what it is through this apostacy of Lucifer. This is the primary fundamental force of the expression ἐθεώρουν, "I saw;" as is evident from the simple wording of the whole sentence, which cannot be interpreted otherwise so as to retain its full literal truth; evident, moreover, from the unmistakable allusion to Isaiah xiv. 12 (where the king of Babylon is represented as a type of the original proud one who fell before him, compare ibid. 13–15, and Ezek. xxviii. 12–16, a still more distinct passage), forming in this connection a parallel to the words concerning the downfall of Capernaum, spoken before the sending of the disciples; evident, finally, from the warning, which is doubtless in the background: He fell by pride—be ye therefore humble.* They who think that the Lord is here speaking merely of a fall of Satan effected since the commencement of Christ's prophetic career, or of a new weakening and defeat of the enemy resulting from the mission of the Seventy—are greatly mistaken, and overlook altogether the decisive words ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, "from heaven."† We do not, however, limit the words of the Lord to the first beginning of the fall in the strict sense of the word; but pre-suppose that the Lord condenses into this great prophetic word, which looks both to the past and the future, the progression and consummation of this fall. For Satan's fall and loss of power is a process of long duration, passing through many gradations. His judgment recurs continually in an increasingly perfect demonstration, until the end comes; as is manifest from the remarkable passage, Rev. xii. 7–12 (which we cannot interpret here, but which in like manner speaks of what is still future by the type of what belongs to the past). That the old enemy suffered a new defeat by the few feeble exorcisms of the Seventy disciples, and that the Lord had beheld this victory, is the least important element, and scarcely referred to in the passage even implicitly. It is more suitable, not leaving these individual facts out of our consideration, to view the words in connection with the then near casting out of the Prince of the World by the death of Christ (John xii. 31)—this had already commenced even then, for the devils left those who were possessed through the power of his person and name. To sum up all: In this short comprehensive word the Son says—"The whole long course of the enemy's fall, from beginning to end, is before me as one downfall, decided and certain, even at this present moment."

Verse 19. The second thought follows very naturally. "And even as I am with clear and full consciousness the Lord and Conquerer of Satan; so likewise all who are mine have power over him, though this power proceeds altogether from me as my gift. I did not give you this power expressly when I gave you your commission; but, since your faith, which as such I do not despise, but on the contrary reward, has gained this additional strength, behold I give it now unto you, and in future to all who believe in my name." The Lord enlarges the narrow conception of only one kind of power, as exerted by the δαιμόνια,

* This thought so obviously suggests itself, that Erasmus unhesitatingly inserts it into his paraphrase: "Proposuit ipsis exemplum Luciferi, qui ob superbiam a tanta felicitate subito dejectum esset—insignis erat illius dignitas in cœlis, et tamen ob animi tumorem subito dejectus est a summis ad ima."

† It is altogether against the simple natural meaning of the words to refer them only to a "significant vision," in which "the final violent downfall of Satan was represented" (Von Gerlach). Even Neander, though he rejects and quite correctly, every kind of "beholding in the form of a vision" as applied to Christ, yet finds here only a beholding in the Spirit, a seeing by a glance which anticipates the development of the future; nor does he recognize that Satan appears here as one fallen long ago and therefore also judged. We rejoice to meet with the correct view in Hofmann's Schriftbeweis, i. 391, who adds an earnest protest against the supposed foreseeing of a future fall, urging emphatically the Imperfect used in the text (not ἐθεώρησα or θεωρῶ but ἐθεώρουν). [The tense employed should have been the Aorist ἐθεώρησα, had the one great act of apostacy been chiefly referred to; on the other hand, the Perfect τεθεώρηκα would have been more proper, had the reference been exclusively to the events just past.—Am. Ed.] Yes, the Lord speaks here as a "witness of what happened to Satan in the primal beginning"—speaks in the "recollection of a fact, of which he was witnesss, when he was God with God." This fall was an event of a moment, and different from the slowly progressing defeat of the power retained by Satan. Some see in our passage, by a mystical interpretation, the casting out of Satan, up to that time tolerated in heaven, but, since the coming of Christ in the flesh, cast out thence (as most recently Voss in his Satanalogy, Lutherische Zeitsch. 1851, which contains much that is deep mixed with what is fantastic). We make no remark upon this view; it may rest per se on a good foundation, but we do not see it in this word of Christ.

"devils," upon the possessed; he speaks of all the power (at the same time all power of the enemy's hosts, δύναμιν, חַיִל) of the enemy—a power which pervades, to a greater extent than the Seventy could or we can conceive, all nature and all creation upon earth, which is at present our habitation under heaven. The genus "all the power" is most significantly explained and exemplified by its two most striking species, serpents and scorpions; and this again is an allusion to Psalm xci. 13 (as is manifest from the expressions πατεῖν ἐπάνω), in which passage our commentary on the Psalms also points out the concealed reference to the powers of the kingdom of darkness. The passage in Deut. viii. 15 is likewise remarkable, in connection with which the Jews have a legend that all the creeping things of the wilderness had to lie under the feet of God's people that they might walk over them. Compare the promise given by the Lord, before his ascension, to all believers, Mark xvi. 18; where the serpents are mentioned first in the list of poisonous and hurtful elements. If we were at home in the Scriptures, reading them aright with understanding, and if we were at home in nature, reading it aright in the light of revelation, we should learn from Moses what is the significant nature of serpents, and whence their present characteristics originate. And not only they, but every thing which has affinity to them, and to that death which by sin entered the world—all the base vermin and creeping things of the insect world which were not originally created—belong to this category; hence the scorpions are significantly added. "It seems as if Christ classified all hurtful powers under the domain of Satan"—is Pfenninger's diffident remark on this passage; we do not hesitate to leave out the modest "it seems." Serpents and scorpions are the striking representatives of all that is θανάσιμον, deadly, in the animal world; parallel to the thorns and thistles of the cursed ground, in the vegetable world (comp. Ezek. ii. 6). Hence, the Lord refers concisely to all the hostile elements of nature, in which is the power of the enemy and the murderer. But this again, though the primary meaning is not excluded, is only an outward image of all evil power, specially spiritual, of all cunning, of all malicious, spiteful enmity: of all the perils which threaten us, though to a great extent we are in the midst of them without knowing it; and to which those who are not armed by Christ, fall victims, whereas they who are furnished out of his armory are inviolable, so long as they walk in faith.* But the most fatal violence or cunning is indeed that to which the Seventy were at this time exposed, in the midst of their joy of victory—the temptation of pride. Satan would willingly see his δαιμόνια driven out and ὄφεις trampled under foot, if he thereby could find an entrance, as in the case of Judas, into the heart of the deceived victors. For he who, in heaven, was as lightning, became darkness when he fell, and changed to a creeping, malicious, spiteful serpent (which still retains something of the rapid lightning, and deceptive outward splendor). In the first saying the Lord pointed out that pride of the formerly glorious angel through which he fell—in this he shows the wickedness of the enemy who, with cunning malice, is seeking to regain by stealthy deceit his former power.

Verse 20. "That this enemy must be obedient to you arises altogether and exclusively from the power of my name; for it must needs be, that you bruise all his serpents by the name of him who bruises the head of the old first serpent. But do not rejoice overmuch on account of this. Rather rejoice that your souls are rescued out of his power, and have obtained that salvation and heavenly blessedness which he forfeited for himself, and which he envies and hates in you. For it is not such a matter of course that your names should be accepted in heaven!" This, as was pointed out above, forms the transition to the second part, in which the order of ideas is the converse of that in the first. Our Lord begins by pointing out the only true object of great joy (the names in heaven, the persons of redeemed sinners written in the book of life); after this comes the encouraging confirmation of this salvation, exhorting to perseverance. This we heard in the thanksgiving to the Father for vouchsafing his revelation to babes, that is, to humble souls, as the contrast teaches us; in the testimony that this revelation is only through the Son; and in the pronouncing all blessed, who now hear and see aright the Son of Man—a benediction which implies that all are exhorted to continue to see, and hear, and learn aright.

Satan is cast out of heaven, he exercises now upon earth his pernicious power, destroying both body and soul; but they who by humble faith in him who has come to overcome Satan walk secure and unhurt, will be raised to heaven from earth's distress and struggles. The names of the apostates that depart from God are written in the earth, for the bottomless pit, Jer. xvii. 13; but the names of the redeemed are written in the book of life, which contains the names of the citizens of heaven. This expression, which occurs throughout the whole Old and New Testaments, indicates the divine foreseeing and merciful foreordaining of the inheritance of the saints and blessed believers, though not in the sense of an unchangeable predestination. In the very first instance in which the mention of a book written by God occurs, we read of a blotting out of this book, which is therefore viewed as a possibility: Exod. xxxii. 32, 33. Consult also Psa. lxix. 29, compared with Isa. iv. 3, and Dan. xii. 1; and, in the New Testament, the passages Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5, xiii. 8, xx. 12, and (quite in accordance with this saying of the Lord) Heb. xii. 23. Hence it is possible for the Christian to know in faith, and to rejoice in knowing, that his name is written in heaven, even as it is possible to have the assurance of adoption and the inheritance promised. But we are at the same time to regard the fact itself as the chief, the most important thing; and to walk in humility, watching against Satan's wiles and malice, that our names may be found in heaven even unto the end—fearing lest we ourselves fall from heaven, in the same way in which Satan fell. We are to give always all the honor to the name of the Lord, but seek the honor of our own name only in heaven before him; not rejoicing complacently in any thing else. The Lord changes the expression of the disciples, "the devils are subject unto us," into "that the spirits are subject unto you." Certainly he does not intend to say the same thing, though using a different term; but instructively enlarges the meaning, as we see above in ver. 19. There he placed in the foreground the hurtful and antagonistic elements in outward nature; here he glances into the whole depth of the spiritual world, where the πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας, "spiritual [beings of] wickedness" (Eph. vi. 12) are subject to the believer, thus furnishing the most perfect exposition of his former meaning. No possession of spiritual gifts, to the ascendancy of which even the great and acute spirits of the world submit—no victories and triumphs over the strongest κοσμοκράτορες, or world-rulers, not even the fact that a Göthe or Hegel, with all his genius and the whole host who offer him their worship, cannot prevail against the Christian, but must in some cases admit his superiority in Christ—all this can confer no real blessedness upon the Christian. In order that his name be really and remain written in heaven, something more is necessary than that it have authority on earth, be mentioned in books, be recorded in every short compendium of Church history as the name of a man who did great things and made a great epoch. What is necessary, above all other things, is the humility and simple-mindedness of babes; the simplicity which, notwithstanding the performance of great things, remains little, and, undisturbed by earthly activities, constantly looks to heaven.

Verses 21, 22. Now, ask yourself whether these words do not stand here in a connection as deep and internal as that in which we found them to stand in Matt. xi. 25–27—in both instances with the equally distinct assurance that the Lord spoke them at that time, in that very hour. It is not other than a licentious liberty which pseudo-criticism takes when it expunges either of the two reports. It would, indeed, be incomprehensible, on the supposition of a real inspiration of the Evangelists, that the Spirit of the Lord should have permitted them to give duplicates of such sublime sayings, with formulas so distinct and deceptive. Here again we notice in diversity, unity. It is natural that the rejoicing of Jesus does not occur in the account of Matthew, where ἀποκριθείς, "answered," points out a different connection. In his account the words are mere words of consolation; words of submission to the decree of the Father; the comfort with which the Son soothes and calms his soul before the Father when the anger of judgment was kindled in him. But in Luke there is expressed in them, in recollection of the solemn moment when that great saying was first given to him, a real joy, increased by seeing that the little band of his disciples and messengers, whom he can endow with power against Satan, is increasing; and that thus the saying was ever fulfilling itself more abundantly.* The Lord himself rejoices over his babes, notwithstanding all their weakness, against which he has just furnished them with the proper remedy; thus showing them by his own example, how and on account of what they ought to rejoice. The connection between these two verses and the preceding section is indeed deep and internal. We are not to look on the conquered devil, of whose lamentable fall the Lord himself does not think triumphantly, nor on other spirits subject to us, with a joy, the character of which is doubtful and, strictly speaking, not without an impure element. But we are to look up to the eternal Father, before whom the wise and the prudent are confounded, with a joy which, forgetful of itself, loses itself in his praise: in vain triumphing there lurks the truly pernicious self-praise. But we cannot know and see the Father, except in the revelation of the Son; consequently, to see the Son with the open eyes of faith, is alone and must ever be the true cause and object of joy.

Verses 23, 24. The glory of the Lord remains hidden from the wise and prudent; for they have eyes and see not, because the god of this world has blinded their minds through proud unbelief, so that he cannot see the glory of the true God in the person of the only begotten of the Father (2 Cor. iv. 4). But blessed are they who have eyes to see. There is here an almost verbal repetition of what is found Matt. xiii. 16, 17, doubtless in its right place.† It contains here a new truth peculiarly appropriate for the seventy disciples—that he is able to say it to them, as he said it before to the twelve, this is the progress in the joy of the Lord. But his word of rejoicing is likewise, finally, an exhortation to the disciples. They are said to be blessed, not merely on account of seeing what is to be seen in him, but also because they should listen in future, and learn without wearying from the only Master what he reveals to us of the Father.

* It is a symptom of the healthy and well-ordered state of the soul of Christ, that on the same occasions he used the same words and had the same feelings in his soul. Inasmuch as with him nothing depended on high spirits and low spirits, but he always thought, spoke, and acted according to the truth.—Roos, Die Lehre Jesu Christi (new Edit.), p. 337.

† Here it says prophets and kings, in order to magnify the dignity of those, to whom the revelation of the Son in the flesh is vouchsafed.

Let us take this to our hearts; and with all Christ's babes, over whom he rejoices (is not this more than royal honor?), constantly and humbly look and listen to him the only Master. This is better and more blessed than to endeavor to penetrate like him into the depths of falling Satan, sooner or in any other way than he intends to reveal it to his babes.

WHAT SHALL I DO TO INHERIT ETERNAL LIFE? THE COMPASSIONATE SAMARITAN.

How eagerly would the critics seize on this passage, and pronounce the question of a certain lawyer to be identical with the narrative contained in Matt. xix. 16, only differently reported—if Luke had not himself subsequently narrated that second incident (xviii. 18)! This once more shows us that many things could naturally, and would necessarily, occur more than once in the life of Jesus. It is clear, that by the expression καὶ ἰδού, "and behold," the Evangelist does not intend to introduce the standing up (that is, rising with the hostile intention of tempting, disguising pride under a semblance of humility), and the question of this νομικός or "lawyer" (comp. our remarks on Matt. xxii. 37) as succeeding immediately ver. 24.* Yet it is not without significance and truth, that the Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity does not commence with the question of the lawyer, but includes the two preceding verses; thus pointing from the very outset to the grace which has appeared in Christ, which enables us to keep the law; and thereby leading us to the right understanding of the passage. This of itself refutes the strange paradox of Harms (Past. Theol. i. 69), which, though doubtless written with a good intention, is very incautious—that "it is difficult to find in the Gospel of the good Samaritan a Christian theme for a sermon!" Is it not possible for the Christian preacher to obviate the foolish misconception that the narrative refers only to the general philanthropy of moralists? Does not the very introduction, which precedes it, prescribe this to him, even though he should not add a deeper exposition himself? But the introduction is not necessary for this purpose. Our believing preachers are almost as one-sided as the mere moralist, when they rapidly pass by the merciful Samaritan, who, it is true, has often been brought forward; and dwell on the seeing eyes and hearing ears (vers. 23, 24). Dräseke is superior to both, and shows the union and connection of the two parts: "after the blessing is added the condition." It is legitimate to connect in preaching things thus placed side by side in Scripture, and to treat the real, dogmatic connection independently of the historical. And thus when preachers represent the lawyer as if he had heard the words of vers. 23, 24, and as thinking or saying, "Now, let us see and hear, what new and great things thou canst tell us about the way to life eternal! Mere hearing and seeing cannot make us blessed, we must surely also proceed to doing, as we learn from God's word"* —they pronounce correct pulpit thoughts, which possess inward truth so far as typical history is concerned, although not founded specially on that particular history.

The truth in this remark is this, that the lawyer who was tempting Christ (ἐκπειράζων) spoke in a half ironical manner, and wished in his unbelief to try the Lord, what new answer he would give to the grand fundamental and central question. It is incorrect to say, or at least very uncertain, that he refers immediately to the preceding saying of Christ; nor must we forget that, with all the irony, there is also an element of earnestness, though unconscious, in the question, which bears in this way some resemblance to that of chap. xviii. 18. Indeed, if these νομικοί or "lawyers" had not, over and above all their questions about doing and performing works, a question troubling them in their inmost heart, "What lack I yet?" then they would not have even taken the trouble of asking. It is this element of earnestness on which the Lord in his mercy seizes as a point of connection; he answers with earnestness the earnestness which, notwithstanding all other elements mixed up with it, approaches him with the great and important question. He tempts the tempter, but on his part it is out of fervent love; taking him at his own word, and leading him to give himself an answer, which surprises, and, at the same time, judges him. Compare, on the meaning of the question, which was probably common in the catechetical teaching of that time, and on the false interpretation of it, our remarks on Matt. xix. The Old Testament, consisting of the two grand divisions, law and promise

* According to Ebrard, the verses 21–24 conclude, in the general plan of the Gospel, "the section concerning the disciples;" but this does not accord well with chap. xi. 1, xii. 1–12, 22, xvi. 1, xvii. 1–22, etc.; and surely the Evangelist did not write in accordance with such artificial outlines, introducing such formulas as: At that hour—he turned!

* Thus Luther, in the Hauspostille: "Surely this Jesus cannot preach any thing better and higher, than what Moses taught. Hence, not only they are blessed, who see and hear thee, but also they who hear and keep the Law of Moses," etc.

answered the question to this effect: Thou oughtest to do according to the commandments, but as thou, sinful man, art not able to do this, therefore, beside and above the law, eternal life is promised thee as an inheritance. Though this was clearly revealed, yet the masters in Israel did not understand it; and this master here establishes by his ποιήσας, "do," the same false casual connection between doing and inheriting, which the other expresses more openly and fully by the word ἵνα, "that."

Now let us see how the true Master gives the true answer to the question; which, though starting with a misconception concerning the doing, points to the truth concerning the inheriting, viz., What shall I do to inherit life? In the first place, Christ refers (as in Matt. xix.) in general to the revealed law; since he also knows of no other "doing" but the fulfilling of this law; he puts the question in the most general way (ver. 26), and, after receiving a correct answer, confirms the sum of the law or the fundamental commandment of love to God, and to our neighbor (ver. 28). Upon this, when the lawyer, who is somewhat disappointed and struck in his conscience, begins to add sophistical questions limiting the commandment in order to escape the condemnation, which, he vaguely sees, is a consequence of not doing, of omission, Christ adds a special explanation of the commandment of love to our neighbor, by which our love to God is to be tested and to become manifest, but which fallen man can attain only by regenerating grace from on high, which begets in him new love to God. Christ gives this exposition in a parable, of convincing force, which strikes down every self-justification of the disputer, who has not experienced this love. The parable itself, to which is added a practical application, describes in a most graphic manner active love to our neighbor; in order to prove to the lawyer, how destitute he was of such love, and to show in the distant background the merciful love of God, which must first help us.

A man in distress requiring help, whoever and whatever he may be—two men devoid of love, although priests and Levites, such as were at that time—a man of active love, although a Samaritan! This paints distinctly enough the chief point, which is of central importance; and hence the application may follow immediately, exhorting to such love of our neighbor, a love general and free from all sophistical limitations, and showing the questioner the necessity of a regeneration of his heart and character. The simple concluding question (ver. 36) forces him to acknowledge the duty of universal love; whereas the powerful injunction added ver. 37, embracing both beginning and end of the plan of salvation, demands the fulfillment, which, however, is possible only through divine grace—attainable even by a Samaritan, though he be without dogmatics.

Verses 26—28. The law tells you what you ought to do; why then dost thou, a νομικός, a lawyer, who art well acquainted with it, ask me? What is written? it is open to all; thou readest it thyself, and ex officio readest it in the hearing of others. The remarkably simple τί, what? of the first question does not render it necessary to enumerate in the answer the 613 commandments, given to Israel by Moses; nor even "the commandments" of the Decalogue (as in Matt. xix.); but indicates and pre-supposes, that there is a sum of the law, a fundamental commandment, containing a short answer to the short question. Significant is the difference between this τί and the subsequent πῶς, how? which cannot be dismissed with a remark in the style of Rosenmüller's Scholia: "Graecis interrogantibus saepe pro τί" (often used in questions for τί)! What is written requires to be read aright; hence the question—How readest thou that which is written for the use of all? How—with regard to others, as it is your office and duty to be a teacher, searching the truth; how, moreover, for your own heart? This rabbinical formula of quoting a text, "How readest thou?" has a deep and searching meaning when used by Christ! It is because what is written is not read with simplicity and humble submission, that the law, which is a schoolmaster to grace, is misunderstood and abused. The lawyer read correctly in this instance, so far as the letter was concerned; but he was unwilling to accept simply, and without artificial limitations, what is meant by "with all the heart" and by "my neighbor." He does not repeat merely the first sentence concerning the love of God, the well-known שְׁמַע יִשְׂרָאֵל, "Hear, O Israel!" as it is written on the phylacteries, and was read out in the synagogues morning and evening—but he adds also correctly the second chief commandment concerning love to our neighbor (which was not written on the phylacteries), and thus gives the same sum of the law, which the Lord himself has declared to be the substance of law; comp. Matt. xxii. 37–40 (and our interpretation of that passage). It is possible that he had learned this in the school of Jesus; perhaps he arrived at it along with others by his own meditations. However this may be, the Lord commends his reply and says, "Thou hast answered right; thou well knowest, as I see, the law." Then after this is added, "But thou pronouncest thine own condemnation; as alas! thou dost not know." The man asked about doing, and yet he knew very well about doing; hence, he deserved, in the first place, to receive back his own word as an answer to his question—"Thou knowest the τοῦτο, this, which corresponds to your first τί, what; then cease to ask the question, and begin the doing! Thus thou shalt live, even as Moses and the prophets say (comp. our remarks on Matt. xix. 17, and add the passage there quoted from the Pentateuch, Neh. ix. 29; Ezek. xx. 11). God first answers man according to the question he puts; thus tempting him to good by the law (Exod. xx. 20), that he may be prepared for the word of mercy by repentance. He who does not begin with earnest and honest dealings with the law, never can or will understand and enjoy the Gospel. Is the physician to say to him, who imagines himself to be in health, Come, friend, let me heal thee? If he says to the lame man, Walk and run! he is not deceiving or blinding him, for his object and intention is to help him to health. Do this and live, are inseparably connected, it is true, and Moses is corroborated and ratified by Christ; the only question is how it is possible for us poor sinners to attain to that doing, which gives life and is life—whether by our own impotent endeavors, or by the Fulfiller who has come to us (Matt. v. 17, 18).

Does the lawyer feel it to be right that the truth of the assertion, easy enough to pronounce with the lips, "I love God with all my heart," should be tested by his love to his neighbor; and that he himself is far from truly loving every neighbor? He does not know it clearly, he does not feel it with submissive conviction; but he must have felt something of an accusation directed against him, because he endeavors to justify himself. Yes, he must have perceived something at least in the earnest and doubtful tone in which Christ surely spoke the words: "Do this—if thou art able! Thou hast not met thy obligation, thou hast not done it!" But according to human depravity he resists the confession of repentance, which begins to move in his heart, by the cunning of his lips and by the refractoriness of his reason; seeking excuses and evasions in order that he may remain a just man, by giving a different exposition of the commandments. The lie, which is brought forward as a cover and cloak, and which lies at the root of his question, is very well expressed by Meyer: "With regard to love to God—I, strict observer of the ceremonial law, am not defective; and with regard to love to my neighbor, neighbor means Jew or good friend—hence, as we interpret the law, have I not kept it? Or dost thou wish to give another, a new interpretation? Canst thou think of referring it to him who hates me, whom I admit I hate in return—or to any stranger, in whom I feel no interest?" Indeed, the lawyer must have had a presentiment of such an explanation of the command; else he would not have fortified and defended himself against it by the question, which has the appearance of a wish for further information, but in reality shows his wounded sensibility and desire to resist. Καὶ τίς, ecquis vero, and indeed who then is my neighbor? This is a new question; dost thou know any thing concerning this different from our teaching?

O how blind is the poor man, and how hidden from his eyes the true meaning of the great words, uttered by his own lips, ver. 27! How ignorant is he of the true "love, which begins with God, passes over to the neighbor, and ends in ourselves!" (Dräseke). God, as all-sufficient to himself, does not stand in need of thee; but as the all-loving, who loves all his creatures as himself, he gives thee fellow-men instead of himself, that thou mayest show to them thy love! To love God entirely is to love our neighbor; to love our neighbor with the heart is to love God. Such is the key which the introduction furnishes to the understanding of the subsequent parable; in which the Lord leads us into the heart of real life by a sketch which we cannot too carefully examine. Besides the chief object of his teaching, the very smallest feature and detail is executed in the most striking and suggestive manner. The parable goes into real life—it is not abstract moralizing, which leaves the heart cold; it is not premature teaching of dogmatics, which cannot open the eyes of the self-righteous blind. What Christ teaches in this manner is (to refute Harms again) as full of genuine Christian character as is his new commandment of love; it accords manifestly with his first and last sayings (Matt. v. 43–48, and xxv. 34–40). But the Christian Pharisee cannot see his own heart (or the face of his birth, James i. 23) even in this clear mirror. They prove their transcendently wilful blindness, when, joining the general, fashionable, lamentable misconception, they take the good Samaritan as the Shibboleth of their insipid hypocrisy-morality, of their "doing" in which there is neither doing nor life—and besides of their pseudo-toleration, which puts aside faith.

The whole Gospel lesson which contains this parable, may be thoroughly explained by the three questions occurring in it. The second of these questions, most characteristic of the narrative, Who is my neighbor? does not require an answer; for the word of the law, which speaks about the neighbor, contains the answer in the addition as thyself; according to Matt. vii. 12. As no one is to do any evil to me, so I am to do evil to none; as every one is to love me, so I ought to love every one. Consequently the question proceeds from an evil heart, which is not willing to know; and it is as foolish and perverse as it would be to ask, And what is meant by the word love? What is implied by the "whole heart?" What can be meant by the expression "as myself;" of course not as much as myself, but always after and subordinate to my dear self? The preceding counterquestion of the Lord, What is written in the law? is intended not merely to refer us to the law, as if the Gospel was not necessary, but to lead us to a knowledge of our sins by the law. How readest thou the law? As a special pleader, looking for evasions and backdoors; or as a faithful subject in sincerity before God? If the latter, thou wilt likewise hear the promise; thou wilt read as a beggar reads the letter, in which he is acquitted of his debt; as the appointed heir reads the will. Finally, the first question at the head of the whole, "What shall I do, to inherit eternal life?" contains the answer in the very expressions of the question—"Receive the inheritance offered, take hold of eternal life by faith in God's mercy; then shalt thou live and do!" But, moreover, the second question, which follows naturally after the first, receives hereby its answer; when the believer continues to ask—What am I to do now, while I am living upon earth, in order to inherit certainly and fully eternal life? the answer is—Thou must advance in doing; and prove and manifest thy life of faith by thy love. In this sense, doing is indeed the only and final test. (The fourth question: Who has done this? is, through the blindness of Christians of our days, in many ways not willing to see it—its own answer: This man hath done it, even should he be, or be called, a Samaritan, or any thing else as regards his religion and dogmatics! Call not such a one an unbeliever, though thou canst not see his faith! If his love is genuine love—this remains always the necessary supposition—he must have also faith before God, even true faith, which lives in works and brings forth life.)

Verse 30. A certain man; some one or other—the very first word gives the complete answer, and shows who is our neighbor; while it is intended to call forth our sympathy, "alas! poor man!" There is no mention made of nation, tribe, rank, character, or the like—as men we are related and owe love to one another. The Israelite smote his neighbor, Exod. ii. 13; and afterwards every man borrowed of his Egyptian neighbor, Exod. xi. 2. The stranger, that dwelleth with you, shall be with you as one born among you; and thou shalt love him as thyself, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt, Lev. xviii. 34.* The parable may have been a true story, as the names Jerusalem and Jericho seem to suggest. (Similarly Lazarus, chap. xvi. 20.) The road between the two places was indeed infested by robbers, and notoriously dangerous; however, there is no reason to suppose with Jerome that the wilderness Adummim was so called from this circumstance (or מַעֲלֵה אֲדֻמִּים, the bloody road), because the height had this name even in the time of Joshua (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17). Samaritans did not travel here frequently; hence, as ver. 33 is meant as a contrast, the certain man is probably a Jew; this follows as a matter of course, as he is said to come down from Jerusalem. At least such must have been the most natural supposition for the priest and Levite who afterwards passed; though we cannot (as Lange does) assert this positively. Others have said, though with much less reason, that he was probably a heathen, for the priests would not have passed by a Jew—thus mistaking the very pith of the narrative! But what he was is quite indifferent, and therefore remains unmentioned; nothing was to be seen in the man stripped of his raiment but a man lying in his blood. Thieves and murderers (comp. our remarks on Matt. xxi. 13)—alas! such men, who do such things to men, exist upon earth; they were in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, even as now in and around Rome. Out of the heart proceed hatred and murder, Matt. xv. 19: another most important hint at the very outset. The murderers were also doers according to their craft: καὶ ἐκδύσαντες αὐτόν, they stripped him; and because he probably defended himself a little, they struck him in anger, as if this in him had been injustice, and wounded him in sheer wanton cruelty. (Ἐπιθέντες not exactly adding yet this, but simply as in Acts xvi. 23.) Thus they departed and left him, ἡμιθανῆ, that is in the act of dying, who would surely have died had no help come; they do not even show him the robber's mercy of shortening his anguish. If the pious hearer of this narrative is disposed to bless himself inwardly at this stage, and say in his heart, "O, wicked sinners! neither such things, nor any thing in the least resembling them, have I ever committed; I have never transgressed the commandment in trespassing against the body and life of a human being"—behold two other and very different men appear on the stage, to shake somewhat this high opinion of himself. For, in Christ's catechism, to do no harm or injury to our neighbor includes the offering of help and assistance in all distress.*

Verses 31, 32. It is probable that many priests and Levites travelled between Jerusalem and Jericho, the city of priests,† on account of the weekly service, which was taken by them in turns; but, that a priest passed just in the moment, when it was still possible to save the dying man, was κατὰ συγκυρίαν, by a coincidence, as we commonly say. When the Lord uses this expression (it is his pleasure to make use of all words of human language, so far as they may be reduced to a pure meaning)—he means vividly to represent that this external event proceeded not from a directly expressed intention of God or of men. The miserable man was not brought before the door of the priest. Here, holy man, is a work of compassion and mercy; take him and nurse him! Not only he who is thus brought to me, or who himself appeals and cries to me for help (this poor man could not do so, but his lying on the road cried the louder to every human heart), has a claim on my active love: the occasions and calls for active love appear often to be accidental; but God directs it so, and will require it of me, if my heart did not recognize in faith and love his leading and his hand in the coincidence. If the miserable man had been still able to see at that moment, he would have entertained some hope. But the priest, who had performed his temple servi-,

* Hence do not oppress the Jews at present, ver. 33. But do not make them, before they are truly emancipated by Christ, judges in Christendom, any more than the Israelites did the Ammonites and Moabites. This against the "good Samaritan-toleration" of the Rhenish Landtag. (Some readers will know what this note of the first edition referred to.)

* [Alluding to Luther's exposition of the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill!" (Kleiner Katechismus.)—Tr.]

and who was in no hurry (for it says κατέβαινεν, "came down,") sees indeed the naked wounded man, but does not do according to Isaiah lviii. 7. If thou meet even an ox or an ass going astray, if thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, thou art not to forbear to help him—thus Moses commanded, Exod. xxiii. 4; Deut. xxii. 1–4. How much better is a man than ox or an ass? But the priest, who would perhaps have kept those commandments literally, forbears to help his own flesh; because he does not regard his neighbor, as the same Moses commanded him to regard him, as himself, but thought only of his own flesh. He does not care to know whether it is a stranger or enemy, or perhaps even a friend or brother; he is satisfied with the first glance. "This is a dangerous place!" is his first thought; the second follows soon, "God be praised that it did not happen to me!" Not so bad a thought, indeed, if he had only continued, "And what if it had happened to me and somebody was to go past as I am doing! Let me help him, as I in such a case ought to be helped." But he passed by. Did he "calculate in his loveless mind, that the sufferer was possibly not his neighbor?" It is not likely that he followed out such a long train of reasoning; for excuses always belong to to the latter date of theorizing. Practice in the present has quite other motives. "It is required, it is seen, by nobody"—God is nobody in the eyes of this priest—all their works they do for to be seen of men (Matt. xxiii. 5). If it would have made an eclat he would have done it; not as a work of mercy, but as an abomination of hypocrisy. If a thought of compassion stirs in his heart, he finds counter-considerations enough to stifle it. "He is too far gone, help is too late! What can I, single-handed, do with him?" (Indeed the priestly robe might have lost somewhat of its beauty and purity!) "What I ought to do is to make haste, lest I also fall a victim to these robbers"—and thus he passes by, and tells people afterwards, "I saw on my way a poor man lying on the ground; alas I could not help him, I thanked God for my escape, lifted up a fervent intercession for his poor soul, prayed and hoped that some one would come after me on the frequented road and help him!" That other one came, indeed, but he thought, "If the first one did not help, he who is a priest, why should I do it, who am only a Levite, of whom it cannot be expected with even as much right as of my superior?" He was not only at the place, but came near;* possibly felt a little more compassion than the former; but he also only looked on him and passed by on the other side.† A human being on the brink of eternity—what a sight for these two, whose duty it was to bring help even to the soul, and hence also first to the body! But Priest and Levite had become like the robbers; by their omitting to offer help, they completed as much as was in them the work of murder; if a third one had not passed by chance they would have sent the half-dead man into perfect death. Such were the men in Israel, who passed over the love of God and mercy to their neighbor (Luke xi. 42; Matt. xxiii. 23); and thus forsook the fear of the Almighty (Job vi. 14). Would you also be such a one in such a case? This is the question which Christ here presents to him, who questioned first. Thou hast the words of the commandment in thy mouth, and art seeking in thy sophistical thoughts to find out who is thy neighbor; but when he lies before thee on thy path, thou art neither able nor willing to find him! It is not knowledge, not dignity of any kind, not external worship, but only love, which is doing; and to omit the doing of good is doing evil—and herein alas! many become like evil doers. Ὁμοίως δὲ καὶ Λευίτης, "In like manner also a Levite"—the one gives the example to the other in doing, or rather not doing! Such are they who teach the law and minister in the sanctuary; and what if they, who preach the Gospel, and talk sentimentally about the good Samaritan, act in the same manner? All they whom you passed by here upon earth will lie in your way there, before the throne of the Judge.

Verses 33–35. The active love of the Samaritan forms a significant contrast in every respect. The priest knows the sacred letter; he comes from the sanctuary and—has no heart! The Samaritan travels in affairs of business or something of that sort, but it does not fill up his soul. His love, which he finds at once time and inclination to follow out, is described by few but most powerful strokes, and forms a complete speaking picture. Moved with pity as to the past, help for the present, considerate care for the future. If any one had witnessed it, he would have said, They surely are brothers! and, in truth, the Samaritan saw in the man, without asking who he was, his brother. How glad the half-dead man must have been, that then—a Samaritan, perhaps despised by him at other times, recognized in him a neighbor and fellow-man! It was good for James and John to hear this narrative (comp. ix. 54). If the history had not actually taken place, it must yet have been a possible event; it was possible that even a Samaritan, even a heathen, would act thus, and put to shame thereby the Jews. The Lord, however, purposely did not choose a heathen; partly not to offend his hearers

*Ἐλθών seems to be the right reading, and denotes progression; perhaps it contains also the delicate feature, that the Levite, more accustomed to external service than the Priest, examines more closely than the latter.

†Ἀντιπαρέρχομαι means, like ἀντιπάρειμι, in the first place, ex adverso prætereo; hence Grotius understands it in contradistinction to καταβαίνειν contrario itinere to Jerusalem. Others say: Turning away to the other side, in order not to see him any longer or better. But in both cases we have ἀντιπαρῆλθεν; hence the intensified compound means passed by.

too much, partly to castigate the national hatred against the Samaritans, who were, after all, partakers of the law of Moses and the hope of the Messiah. The Samaritan journeyed, whether from or to Jerusalem, or only across the road, is not told; because the emphasis lies on the circumstance that he came there in the course of a journey of urgent necessity.* He had compassion on him; though similar feelings may have stirred in the hearts of the priest and Levite, yet it is only in his case that this feeling is thought worthy of mention; natural spontaneous compassion is of no avail, it increases the guilt if it prompts us to go out of the sight of misery. True sympathy ripens into act and help; this man forgets danger, business, every thing, and thinks only of the wretched man before his eyes. The robbers, he thinks, may not come again; the short delay—short, for he helps without delay—can easily be made up afterwards. "Where can I get in this wilderness physician or medicine?" This question does not trouble him much. According to the custom of the country (Gen. xxviii. 18), he carries oil and wine with him. Oil especially is good for healing wounds (comp. Isaiah i. 6).† In general, we ought to think that the most essential necessaries for works of love are easily obtainable, wherever there is the earnest will. Without hypersensitive disgust he binds up the wounds and molifies them. Soon the poor fainting man is so far restored that he could set him on his own beast (τὸ ἴδιον κτῆνος, on which he rode, sacrificing his own comfort to that of his neighbor); thus he leads him into the next πανδοχεῖον (this is the only sure instance of public inns occurring in the New Testament, comp. the Talmudic בונדק formed after this Greek work, and בינדקי from πανδοχεύς). The inference to be drawn from this is not that the poor man was a heathen, because these inns were chiefly intended for such strangers, who did not meet with hospitality in Jewish houses; but, evidently, that he did not expect or wish to demand from any of his friends to receive his charge. There was no other house, where he would have been received, except the public inn, where every one is admitted for money. There he took care of him—out of love, not for the sake of reward, only for the sweet reward of love; one cannot tell who of the two had greater joy. Now, dear reader, be as sentimental as thou wilt; but only in doing and not without it. The next day he must continue his journey; so we must suppose, and thus this feature of the picture shows the boundary lines of different duties: it was not required of him to delay his journey altogether; for he had done what he could. Where there is no other friend or not even a host, we commit the completion of the work to the Lord as the Supreme Helper and Healer. But in this case there was a host, and he said to him—Take care of him; even as it is said of himself before, he took care of him. Thus he gave him first an example, before he asks it of him; not as people, who only throw open their purse, saying, I will pay him who helps here. And at the same time he does not demand of the host to continue the work of love freely and for nothing; he lays no burden on the shoulder of another, because he had preceded with a good example: but pays in advance two denarii, ample wages for two days' labor (Matt. xx. 2), though the host would probably not be occupied the whole day in tending the sick man. And, moreover, love makes him so prudent and wise, that, though possessed of such strong love himself, he pre-supposes nothing in the other but self-interest, specially in a host, who only calculates, How much? and who is introduced here as a man receiving pay for works of mercy, thus completing the picture of contrasting heartlessness. The Samaritan anticipates every possible scruple and objection that the expenses required by tending the sick might exceed the money given; and, lest any thing should be withheld from the poor sick man, he promises—and after what he had done the host could depend on his word—"and whatsoever thou spendest more I will repay thee, as if it was for myself, when I come again." Thus we ought, and thus we may exercise love, if we have a willing love; it is perfectly compatible to go on on one's own journey and yet not pass by the needy.

Verse 36. These three—viz., three men—thus the Lord comprehends without difference under this name the holy magnates of Israel and the Samaritan, as opposed to the fourth man, fallen among thieves (whom he leaves to themselves and the judgment awaiting them). And now he puts a counter-question as an answer to ver. 29; but very significantly the converse of that "who?" not, Who of them thought the poor man his neighbor? but, Who was neighbor unto him? Thus we are to put the question, in order to arrive always at the answer: Am I this man's neighbor? that is, ought he to help me, if I were in his place and he in mine? "Neighbor" designates a reciprocal relation; for it is said "as thyself," Matt. vii. 12. The egotistic motto, "I am my nearest neighbor," is to be interpreted in the following manner: "Put thyself in the place of the other, and see whether thou wouldst like to be thy own neighbor—exchange places with him, in order to love him as thyself!" Thus we may obtain in every case the rule of love from our very self-love; and thus the question of ver. 26 may be put likewise. "What is written in thy own heart and conscience? who else is thy neighbor, but he, whose neighbor thou art, that is, every one?"

Verse 37. The lawyer, put to shame, finds

* Braune thinks that he was coming from Jerusalem, where he had again experienced how the Jews despised the Samaritans. This is, however, only a secondary thought.

† Oil relieves pain, wine stops bleeding. Wetstein cites a passage from Galen, in which oil and wine are mentioned as remedies in the case of wounds.

it impossible in his annoyance to say expressly, The Samaritan. But this makes his answer the more striking and to the point. He that showed mercy on him. That is, he whose compassion ripened into deed and truth; who did not merely feel a compassion which he got rid of by an inward act of a positively evil character; who did not merely talk of his feeling of pity (ah! there lay a poor wretched man on the road; how it went to my heart that I had to pass him and was not able to help him!)—no, but who showed mercy. Without works there is no truth of love (1 John iii. 18); but without love of the heart no truth of works. If the robbers had seized the Samaritan before he was able to accomplish his design, his work would have been accomplished in the sight of God—and if the priest and Levite had given help on account of approaching spectators, it would have had no value. Dives may pay for the tending and nursing of fifty Lazaruses, or himself lick his sores a la Xavier, and "have his reward." Whereas if poor Lazarus sighed in his heart—"If thou, proud Dives, wast lying before my door, I would surely not leave thee lying there"—his will is accounted to him as if he had performed it. But if thou art willing in thy heart, then go and do καὶ σύ, also thou likewise, as now and then a Samaritan did; not as the passers by, who had time and opportunity (Gal. vi. 10), but no heart. Thus the questioner, by his first question, What shall I do? himself prepared the last answer now given him, Do! The Lord says ὁμοίως, as he used the same word in ver. 32. In the former case (ver. 32) there were two, in the present only one; the first likewise, alas! is of more frequent occurrence than the latter. "Go!" There lies in this word something repelling; as if he had said, "Go away from me; I have shown you now that you knew well enough the answer to the question which you put to tempt me; learn a lesson from this, and know yourself differently from what you do now, and then come, to seek my mercy for your sinful heart." This is implied in the word for the lawyer. But for us, who know the Lord's mercy, it implies more. "Go!" Whither? Every where on our path of life; wherever our journey leads us, our neighbors throng upon us to demand our love; so that there is no need to go far to find them. Especially they who are wounded in their soul, who are dying spiritually; for truly to help man means more than to help and nurse the bodily life. Whatever rescues in this way, deserves to be called asylum; whoever shows such compassion, shows that true and real and perfect full mercy, of which many a "sister of charity" knows only the proselytizing caricature.

But he alone knows this who has himself experienced the mercy of him who appears, as we said in the beginning, though only in the background of the whole parable, as the true compassionate Helper. As certainly as Dives and Lazarus are types of other persons (this will be shown subsequently) the good Samaritan is figurative of him who shows mercy to fainting and dying man. Oil and wine and wounds were intended to remind us of Isa. i. 5, 6, and the whole description of Ezek. xvi. 6, and similar passages. It is true that an attempt to interpret allegorically the individual details—as, for example, the difference between oil and wine, the beast, the inn, the host, the two pence—may easily degenerate into trifling; but spiritual Christians of all times have not been able to resist seeing in the whole parable a picture of man lying in sin and misery, whom neither law nor Levitical institutions can help, and to whom the mercy of Christ comes—whom they angrily called a Samaritan. Luther and Melancthon cannot refrain from such a view; the former goes even into details, contrary to his usual principle. Only let us not argue falsely against this mystical import of the parable, which is dimly though really contained in its depths. This has been done with great warmth by Heinrich Müller (Erquickstunden, ed. Nusswurm, No. 214), who says that from such a view it would follow, that Adam was only weakened, but did not become altogether dead, by the fall;* that the law of Moses was to be blamed as not being willing to help; that Christ was justly called a Samaritan; that the lawyer could, if he liked, have done likewise, that is, could have been a Saviour and Redeemer of the world! Indeed, such ὑπόνοια (occultism) is never amenable to so very rigid a criticism; but when we say, Active mercy to him, who would be lost without it! we have stated the simple tertium comparationis. The Lord could scarcely do otherwise than wrap up in the truth required for the occasion, and which in its first aspect is repelling, also the whole and full truth. Thou shalt—love! This perfect antithesis of the law, which as law cannot help us from death, becomes in Christ vitalizing truth, giving life to the faint spark of life. For, the only way in which it can be imagined that the word "thou shalt love" can produce an effect in him who is without love, is when I love him first in such a manner that he is ashamed, overpowered, and awakened to return my love. Now this is what the Lord does to us; and, after having done this, he gives his disciples the new commandment, "Go and do to others as I have done to thee!"†

* Luther also says, "Wir zappeln noch ein wenig," "we still trip a little;" and Calvin (as Richter remarks on this passage) uses the expression semimortuus. And this is just as true as the "altogether νεκρός;" each in its own place. Calvin speaks of a revival of the semimortui, not only in connection with Isaiah lvii. 16, but in his Institutes; referring to our parable he says of the natural man, semivivus.

† Valerius Herberger treats the whole Gospel of the thirteenth Sunday after Trinity, as follows: "The outer court—Who are most blessed? they who see and hear Jesus. The sanctuary—Which are the holiest works? to do God's commandments without ἐθελοθρησκεία. Finally, the Holy of holies, our Friend and merciful Redeemer, who helps us to such works, and covers all our deficiencies."

MARTHA AND MARY—ONE THING IS NEEDFUL.

(Luke x. 41, 42.)

The simple reader of the Gospel will naturally suppose that the two sisters mentioned here are the sisters of Bethany, and not, as even Bengel was inclined to suppose in his Harmony of the Gospels, another pair of sisters who had accidentally the same names. Besides this, a closer investigation of John xi. and xii. discovers the same differences of character in the two sisters; and this short account of Luke harmonizes exactly in all its suppositions and deductions with the narrative of John. That the certain village, where Martha received on that occasion the Lord in her house, must have been Bethany, follows necessarily from John xi. 1—thus excluding the supposition (which occurs in a work as late as that of Greswell), that the sisters had another domicile in Galilee. But the opinion that the short incident narrated by Luke belongs to that stay of Christ at Bethany which is mentioned in John xi., seems to me perfectly untenable; partly, because in that case Luke would necessarily say something about Lazarus; partly, and this is of greater importance, because the whole scene, described here as a calm visit, does not correspond to the state of things which afterwards arose in consequence of the death and resurrection of Lazarus. But how are we to account for our Lord's being ἐν τῷ πορεύεσθαι—that is, in the journey which Luke is now speaking of—so suddenly in the neighborhood of Jerusalem in Bethany, and then far away again in Samaria and Galilee? We know that Luke does not narrate details in strict succession; in his so-called journey-narrative he inserts sometimes also other events. He has thus inserted here this affecting and important occurrence, which may have happened, if not at the very close, yet at some other time when the Lord at the end of a journey to a feast had entered the house at Bethany.* And why here? Certainly on account of some real dogmatic connection; with the intention of giving a pendant and contrast to the question, "What shall I do," which had found its answer in the story of the Samaritan. Thus much seems certain to exegesis; but what is the intended meaning of the parallel must be decided by the individual perception and taste. For our part, we see something significant in the general contrast between the self-exalting lawyer and the reverent women; but do not regard the narrative, "as an actual exemplification of heart-felt love to God and hidden life in him," corresponding to the doctrine concerning this highest duty, as given in ver. 27 (because the centre of the preceding Gospel-lesson is not this word in the mouth of the νομικός, but the "doing" in the parable of Jesus). We would rather regard it as the intention of the Evangelist to guard by this deep contrast, in its juxtaposition with the preceding parable, against the misconception which even to this day clings to people's view of the good Samaritan. Have not many believers, who wish to follow Christ's admonition, and offer to him the loving service of many works of charity, lost themselves, on the other side, in a Christian πολυπραγμοσύνη, in an unquiet, self-troubled spirit which prevents the calm reception of grace? And is not the in most fundamental thought of the word directed to busy Martha—a warning against such a tendency? Do! was the word of the Lord in the parable; but now he says, Rest! Do not forget the "Seeing and Hearing" in thy much doing.

Martha, perhaps a widowed, at all events the older sister, to whom the house belonged, received him into her house, and felt great joy in being the hostess of such a guest. But her sister Mary did what was better; she also (καί—in this word Luke at once sketches the whole situation) sate at Jesus' feet, to listen to his words, and to rejoice in her guest; thus truly and wholly receiving him who had not merely come into their house, but had also come to bring the bread of life to their heart. Opposed to this quiet παρακαθίζειν is the περιεσπᾶτο of Martha; the thought-scattering, busy going about to serve the highly honored guest with as many things as possible. Περὶ πολλὴν διακονίαν, "with much serving;" the article τήν is left out purposely, for she did not wish to be busy about things that were not necessary. But in the midst of her work, which she began with good intention, she feels an indistinct presentiment that her sister was enjoying more than herself the presence of Jesus (that she had the better part). But instead of turning from this feeling to a knowledge of her own fault, she envies and unjustly blames her sister. Martha also would prefer sitting at the feet of Jesus; but she counteracts this deep impulse of the Holy Spirit by her own spirit, which has chosen meritorious works in preparing and offering many things, and is unwilling to desist. She has a vague feeling of what would be right; but the opposition in her heart against this feeling only heightens her zeal, which breaks forth most artlessly in her words, of which every one lays bare the inward work-

* Much may be said in favor of Lange's supposition, according to which this quiet visit of the Lord to Bethany took place about the second Passover Feast. [The author here is but pursuing his habitual depreciation of Luke's historical accuracy, which in point of fact exceeds that of Matthew. There is no reason for disturbing the order of the Evangelist in the chronological position of this incident.—Am. Ed.]

ings of her soul. Because she herself had no quiet and repose, Mary likewise must have none; what she herself has chosen must be the right, and Mary must be very wrong. So she takes at least so much time as to leave her work, and interrupt the Lord and her sister. Lord—so she begins reverently, but soon becomes uncourteous, and afterwards actually rude to her great guest. Dost thou not care? (οὐ μέλει σοι, as Mark iv. 38, the strongest emotion of distress)—thus she would ungraciously draw Jesus himself into her trouble and restlessness; pre-supposing in him an interest in the many good things with which she intends to show him hospitality. "That my sister, whose duty it doubtless is to assist me, hath left me alone to serve?—to serve thee?" What proud boasting is there in this κατέλιπε, viz., that she had begun and had performed the greater share of the work; she confesses that her sister assisted her in the beginning, but blames her in the injurious assertion that she is not doing any thing at present, and that herself alone fulfilled the incumbent duties. Was then the Lord to be left sitting alone waiting their preparations, as if he had come only for the sake of their food? Martha cannot call away her sister quietly, for Jesus was speaking to her; therefore she must interrupt him in order to set Mary at liberty. She does this boldly; speaks, in his very presence, as if it was then a culpable waste of time to listen to him; nay, she even corrects the Lord's want of the proper μέλει or "care," and dictates to him what he ought to say. Bid her, therefore (instead of speaking to her these words of edification, by which thou keepest her unseasonably from her work), speak to her that she help me with my preparations! Are we doing injustice to Martha by this interpretation? Her intention was good, but she was as confused and disturbed as we describe it—and all this is a consequence of the unquiet of a soul which has much to do only about him and his cause.

Martha, Martha! By this reiterated call he awakens and alarms her out of her busy confusion; and then addresses her in words so incomparably deep and penetrating that they have been inexhaustibly efficacious for all such souls as hers in every age—containing that truth which is able to save them from their error. "Without need thou causest thyself trouble and care for many things; on this occasion for more than is required." The μεριμνᾶν or "carefulness" is the first and inward fault; it necessarily produces the external τυρβάζεσθαι or "being troubled," the restless hurrying hither and thither. "I see that thou art losing all collectedness and calmness of thought in the zeal which scatters itself over πολλά, "many things;" thou art thus spoiling thy good work, and losing the blessing of my visit." (Comp. Jes. Sirach xi. 9–11 in the original.) The Lord then adds ἑνὸς δέ ἐστι χρεία, "but one thing is needful;" and ex vi oppositi it cannot be denied that, in the first place, the ἕν or "one thing" forms a contrast to πολλοῖς or "many things" which are not necessary, and that it implies, therefore, a kind declining of the πολλὴ διακονία, "much serving;" quite in the sense of the old gloss, which, however, is wrong in not going beyond this first meaning: ὀλίγων or ὀλίγων ἢ ἑνός (few things, or few things or one thing). Good Michaelis (it is necessary that there should be such exegetes, in order to counteract the hastily spiritualizing and vague interpreters) is in the right, with his "single simple dish which the Lord finds sufficient;" as he is in the case of the temple-tribute and that of Cæsar. Even Basil, in one of his homilies, understands the word of the Lord as parabolically taken from the emblem of food. Bengel remarks correctly, "Unum (ἕν, not τὸ ἕν) ad necessitatem victus, sine apparatu distrahente. Si referas ad frugalitatem hospitii, uberior, non modo non tenuior fit doctrina totius periochae" (one thing for the needful food, without a distracting apparatus. By referring it to frugality of hospitality, the doctrine of the whole passage becomes richer rather than jejune). We also think that the sublime saying is torn from the root—out of which it grows, according to that condescending wisdom of the Lord which transfigures the external into a direct symbol of the internal—that the whole is divested of the familiar character and touching delicacy which contrasts so forcibly with Martha's impetuosity—if we do not see in the Lord's words this primary meaning, "Why are so many things necessary, good Martha, to welcome me into your house?" Thus Martha most probably understood the words at first, till she heard what followed. For the sentence, "One thing is needful," stands between two sentences, the first of which proceeds from the many dishes, whereas the second evidently passes over to the spiritual application, and the middle sentence forms thus the medium of comparison, being applicable in both senses. That the Lord gave merely "a true, but at the same time, courteous answer, according to most delicate politeness," viz., that he was satisfied with few things, and even with one thing; and that Luke wrote down under the influence of the Holy Spirit such a saying—can only be imagined by Michaelis and such commentators; and a Paulus may picture it out complacently.* Meyer's† answer is not so much witty as natural and sensible: "If this be the only and true meaning, then to be consistent we must understand in the subsequent sentence (altogether overlooked by Michaelis) that Mary had chosen the best dish." Ἡ ἀγαθὴ μέρις, "that good part" (now the article is used and is significant), does not mean the better occupation, but indeed the true food which is need- ful; for this expression stands likewise in connection with the image suggested by the occasion. But the Lord appeals hereby parabolically and suddenly to the heart; and because Mary is willing to receive of him, he says, "This is the food necessary for all human beings, also for thee, O Martha—which I give (John vi. 27). Did I come into thy house to be ministered unto or to minister?" (Matt. xx. 28). At this stage the expression πολλά and ἕν are seen in their real meaning, contained implicitly in the parabolic use; and Heb. xiii. 9 may be compared as an illustration of the whole. Observe, moreover, that the Lord does not reject the πολλά, for he accepts willingly that love which manifests itself in many things. Often many things pertaining to outward διακονία are required by the Lord, and it is praiseworthy to be dilligent and careful in such labors (Rom. xvi. 6, 12)—but, notwithstanding, this thing, which is needful, always is and remains the one thing; what is superfluous belongs to the too "many things;" and what is of chief importance, what is blamed and reproved here is not the much labor and service, but the μεριμνᾶν καὶ τυρβάζεσθαι.* Finally, as the Berlenburg Bible beautifully expresses it, "whenever spiritual things and temporal things are compared, temporal things cease altogether to be necessary." "That the soul be quiet and calm before me, and listen to me, and receive from me that which gives and increases such quietness of spirit—this is the one thing, the good part; Mary, in sitting here at my feet, hath chosen this; thou hast not done so, at least not at present, but hast neglected it and deprived thyself of it!" Thus the Lord, sheltering Mary, gives back the accusation to the accuser, and deservedly; and in conclusion, summing up all, opposes the strange desire expressed by Martha that her sister should be sent to join her, by the comprehensive word, "and this shall not be taken away from her." "Neither at present, as you would have it, nor at any other future time; neither from her, nor from any other who has chosen it; it shall not be taken from any, so long as they keep it and hold it fast." Whereas, the Martha-portion is a part "that can be taken away from us in a thousand ways, by poverty, sickness, old age, weakness, and who can enumerate them all?"† Nay more, in the end all who delight in working, and are happy in doing many things, must enter into quietness, though it be not congenial to them! It is also a correct remark, that μερίδα, "part," and ἐξελέξατο, "hath chosen," are placed together, denoting the communicated grace of God and the free appropriating act of faith. Likewise notice the great love and kindness of the Lord in offering himself, and being so willing to be chosen (for spiritual communion with him, receiving from him, who gives himself to us, is in reality that One Thing, which the One and only Jesus brings us); and observe that he blames only from pure love those who to their own loss move round about and near him, instead of seeking, laying hold of, and enjoying himself.

This may suffice as direct exposition. But in this case the reader may expect a fuller consideration and practical application of a word which in the course of centuries has proved of such importance to so many souls; and which has been so much quoted, justly or unjustly, for consolation and for blame. Who is meant by Martha, and who by Mary? The warning which is addressed to Martha has been sometimes also applied to the natural man, who, in the restlessness of earthly pursuits and worldly-mindedness, in the multiplicity of creature concerns, has much trouble and unnecessary turmoil, instead of seeking and finding the one thing needful, the salvation of his soul in believing and humbly following the Saviour Jesus Christ. This first application (to which the beautiful hymn of Schröder confines itself)* is by no means to be altogether rejected; for this application is indeed implied in the "one thing." But this is merely on the surface of the word, something which is indeed pre-supposed in it; this application, however, does not penetrate into the peculiar and real meaning of the passage. Martha and Mary are both disciples and followers of Jesus; and although it is not in the original of Luke's Gospel, yet the translation† has rightly interpreted, "Martha was cumbered about much serving him." Jesus loved also Martha, as one of his believers (John xi. 5); for to take trouble about and in connection with him is much better and more valuable than all the restless activity, or all the apparently peaceful slothfulness, of the children of this world. But it is not enough to be cumbered about much serving him; among Christians themselves Mary is distinguished from Martha.

Here also let us begin with the external. Like Martha are all those souls who, though they have come to know and love Christ, and even wish to have him, yet do not take the right way of obtaining the good part. Busy with a zeal in which self-righteousness insinuates itself or is even predominant, they wish to receive Christ according to their own manner; that is, to prepare themselves many things for him, thus serving Christ chiefly according to the manner of their former conversation—their soul is wanting in that calmness without which it is impossible to obtain the full enjoyment and blessing which our Redeemer brings us. They get books, learned or devotional; they seek out works and services of many kinds; they try to obtain it by spiritual exercises, in communion and fellowships here and there. This also is one of the ways, and, alas! a necessary beginning for many, who, as we usually say, are sincere in their desire. But it is to such that Tersteegen says, in the spirit of these words of Christ: "Do not bind thyself so much to forms and outward methods. We must not always be seeking God, we must also find him. So long as we are still seeking, there is much running and working: he who has found him enjoys and works quietly!" So long as they do not give up the πολλά of their running and working, their own seeking will stand in the way of their finding; so long as they are busy round about him, they cannot come to rest with and in him —a rest which many a Mary enjoys, who, with deeper wisdom, chose from the outset the better part, and which is obtained by many a weary Martha, who, meekly receiving the exhortation of the Lord, joins Mary and sits at his feet (as, perhaps, was the case of Martha of Bethany). Thus, many a Separatist is still seeking with trouble and labor what the hidden flock is enjoying in that "Babylon" which he so much despises; many a one, running impetuously, finds fault with the quiet people of God, the meek ones of the earth; and yet they are in advance of himself, enjoying in a childlike heart that "one thing," receiving Jesus not only into the house of their outer life, walk, and works, but also into the home of their heart.

* Lange says truly, If you find the thing needful, and live for it, you have found thereby and live for the one thing. The converse holds equally true, and is the primary meaning, of the verse: The one central point is the only thing needful.

But we proceed to ask: Are we not all to be active; are we not to work both as regards ourselves and others; especially are we not to abound in works of mercy; that is, to serve the Lord Jesus, feed the Lord Jesus in feeding our neighbor who is his brother? Or, are some at liberty to sit down inactively with Mary in order to enjoy, while others are appointed to be Marthas, offering that service in many things which is likewise required?* It has been the opinion of some that both sisters had equal rights beside each other, as persons who had received different callings. So preached Dräseke, in the year 1824 (in after years he would not have expressed himself thus): "Each loves in a different way; but each loves aright, that is, according to her best understanding and capacity. The Saviour is pleased with both. Both desire, both possess, the one thing needful. Both desire, both possess, him. He might have likewise added the converse, and said to Mary, 'Honor the busy housemother. Martha also has her good part. She serves me out of love; even as thou, out of love, sittest at my feet, listening to my words.' Jesus recognizes among his disciples every natural peculiarity and gift." Justly was this sermon criticized at the time in Schwartz's Jahrbücher. Yet there is some truth in the preacher's remark, as will be shown subsequently; although taken in this definite form it is exegetically altogether false. The Saviour does not approve both, does not attribute to Martha likewise the good part. She would have freed herself from the blame—which refers not merely to her calling Mary away, but to her own conduct itself—only if, understanding the reproof of the Lord and humbly accepting it, she had left that one thing which she had prepared for her guest's refreshment, and had sat down at that table and feast which he had come to bring to her.

Who then is Martha whom the Lord blames? Such active, working, and laboring Christians as form a species between the self-righteous outside the pale of believers and the true disciples; in their active interest for the kingdom of God, using and urging all manner of organizations, machinery, and agencies—that is if they engage in all this with unquiet care and restlessness. Every Martha, whom God has called to be busy about many things, should, as Tersteegen says, do her work calmly and quietly; in order that the husbandman that laboreth be first partaker and enjoyer of the fruits, 2 Tim. ii. 6. Every Mary should have, not only the good part, but also her portion of active work; for—"Quietism is not of itself Mary's spirit" (Richter). Paul working more than all the other apostles, sits also and at the same time at Christ's feet; contemplative John is not inactive, but an energetic apostle; "Christ, who constantly demands of us to be active in the kingdom of God, would not have approved an exclusively contemplative life" (Neander). From which it is clear that Martha and Mary should go hand in hand as true sisters; but so that Mary's spirit is the foundation common to both. "If understood aright, Martha had cause indeed to ask Mary's assistance, in order, namely, that her labor and works be sanctified" (Berl. Bib.).

Alas! it is here that we are so deficient. The new man is not able to continue always in the spirit of Mary. In our active works, even in our studying and learning, in our conflicts, and in our very prayers, the temptation insinuates itself to fall into the restlessness of the old man, and to substitute self-made things for gifts bestowed from God. How are we to put an end to this constant conflict between Mary and Martha? Some propose as a remedy to distribute the two elements into different seasons. Thus, for example, it is said by them, when Christ came to Bethany to bless them, it was a Lord's-day for their house, and it was wrong to deprive themselves of this privilege by household cares and troubles. In like manner, Sabbath-days and work-days, Mary-hours and Martha-hours, alternate in our lives. "The Lord's words to Mary have this purport: Know the right point of time; and do not devote that which is set apart for learning the

* As the man who came to the abbot Sylvanus on Mount Sinai, boasting that he differed from the brethren who worked, "Mary had chosen the good part." He sat in his cell with his book, and was not called to dinner. divine word to earthly pursuits. I have come to teach you what is needful for you, and, instead of listening, you are troubled about the meal!" (Chrysostom). This is not without its truth on account of our infirmity; but it does not detect the real sting of Christ's words, whose blame of Martha does not refer merely to the time chosen by her for her work. We are not to remain in a state of soul, constantly ebbing and flowing from Sabbath rest to the unquiet of works. Is it right, then, to say—Martha without, Mary within? The beautiful Moravian hymn on the subject is spoiled by the introduction of the common-place phrase that Martha is only the body, Mary the spirit. No, this can never lead to any thing good: the spirit must be in a living vigorous body; the outward hand and the inward heart must not be separated in our doing. In short, strictly speaking, all Christians should have not the Martha-spirit (which is blamed, and must ever be blamed), but the Mary-spirit, and it alone in their heart of hearts; and even, though this be difficult, in the midst of Martha-work, and under all our obligations to being cumbered about "many things." Heinrich Müller (in his Erquickstunden) is anxious to rescue Martha, and therefore says: "Mary is faith clinging to Jesus, but active Martha is love." But by the erroneous title given to his essay, "Always at rest, and never at rest," he has himself shown that his exegesis is at fault, and has attached an incorrect meaning to the word at rest. Not her active work, but her restless unquiet mind, is what the Lord blames in Martha; love also must always be calm and at rest; for only that love is genuine, through which faith is active. And, therefore, always and to the very end, it is Mary who surrenders herself from her inmost heart to Christ, loses herself, so to speak, in humble, undisturbed, child-like simplicity in him, depends on him for all and receives all from him. She alone chooses, possesses, and retains that good part which is lost by Martha as soon as she begins her unquiet labor. But how difficult is it to be Mary! And into what depths of our spiritual life does this one word of our Lord reach!

If the severity of the word fills us with fear, let us descend from this culminating point of the meaning of the passage to find consolation in a secondary application, which has also its truth for us poor men in our actual state of frailty. It is evident that there was such a difference in character and natural disposition between the two sisters; that Martha could never become altogether like Mary. Consequently our Lord did not demand this of her, and would have accepted kindly the many offerings of her hospitality. But what the Lord reproves in the first instance, is her demanding that Mary should become like her; and her thinking that her way was the only right and true way of serving him. Apart from this the Lord loves her; and leads her, accommodating himself to her way, to choose at length thoroughly and entirely the good part, which, after all, she had not altogether lost, since she loved Jesus. Love is speaking, ruling, and deciding the conflict in Bethany; but it is the love and truth of the Lord, condemning the Martha-spirit, and yet not rejecting Martha. Mary never thinks of reproaching her sister, except it were absolutely necessary. She leaves it to the Lord. Ye, who are brothers and sisters before him, prescribe not to the Lord what he is to say to such as differ from you! He does not require our dictation, but will say what is right in his own wisdom; what he says to thee, hear and accept; and in hearing and accepting it thou becomest a Mary—even though he had before called thee, Martha! Martha!

THE LORD TEACHES US TO PRAY, WHAT AND HOW—THE HEAVENLY FRIEND AND FATHER.

(Luke xi. 2–13 [Matt. vi. 9–13, vii. 7–11].)

In a certain place—in a village—on his journey; such expressions show that Luke pays more regard in this whole section to a material (real) connection than to that of chronology or of any other kind. It does not fall properly within the task of the present work to investigate the plan and order of this Gospel, of which we gave a specimen in the preceding narrative. Jesus himself had been praying; and, moreover, as is evident from the whole connection of the terms (ἐγένετο, ἐν τόπῳ, ὡς ἐπαύσατο), in the hearing of his disciples—one of whom has the courage to give utterance to a desire, which was doubtless shared by others (comp. p. 86). "What words of prayer flow from the lips of our divine Master, when he begins—so that it is necessary to wait till he ceases! We also ought, and we indeed would pray much and often, as he frequently exhorts us to do, but we are poor in words. Oh that we, his disciples, also had from our Master one or more forms of prayer, put by him into our mouth, even as John taught his disciples!" Such is manifestly the meaning simply expressed by them: Lord teach us to pray. And this request, as it really corresponds to a general want felt by all his disciples, is mercifully granted by him. The present mouth-piece of the future Church does indeed attach too much importance to the outward word, as if in this way he could be taught to pray (a most important part of teaching, which had been neither forgotten nor neglected by the Great Teacher)—but when the Spirit was given, then the Church felt what is written in Rom. viii. 26. We require not only to be taught what to pray, or the subject-matter and contents of prayer, such as would be acceptable to God, and in conformity to his will, which want is supplied by the form of prayer and promise given; but much more the καθὸ δεῖ, "as we ought," in addition to the τί, "what," the manner pleasing to God—the true understanding, and right disposition of prayer. For this reason, the Lord answers the request of his disciples, as usual, above what they could ask or think; and gives them not merely the former, but adds also the latter, warning, as was absolutely necessary, against abuse and misconception. We need not suppose that the disciple who asks the Lord had not heard the Sermon on the Mount; to how many things had the disciples listened, without either understanding it according to their Master's intention, or keeping it in their mind and applying it. But the Lord, who, according to Luke (and partly also as we saw according to Matthew), repeated, specially in the latter days of his prophetic career, many things taught by him on former occasions—and, as was natural, particularly from the Sermon of the Mount, that short compendium of his doctrine, delivered at the outset of his teaching—refers here with purpose and great significance to his former words, and illustrates and develops them only by a newly added parable.*

He teaches his disciples to pray after this manner. First, he tells them what they are to say, because they are in want, and whenever they are in want, of words;† that is, he tells them both what they may and ought to pray, and what are the best and simplest expressions for such petitions. Thus he repeats what he had given before; and appoints it on this occasion as a standing form of prayer.‡ But what is even the Lord's Prayer as uttered by the lips, if the heart does not pray it really, confidently, and with all assurance, even as dear children speak to their Father? Therefore the Lord proceeds to teach us, as much as this can be taught by words explaining words, the chief condition to be observed in using the formula: believing perseverance on the ground of the divine promise, that he gives to him that asks much more certainly and willingly than any man, friend, or father. This is the second repetition from the Sermon on the Mount, vers. 9–13; which is preceded, however, by a new parable, and is applied and used as an exhortation to pray to the heavenly Father; thus giving new force and effect to the words of the prayer itself.

Verses 2—4. With regard to the omissions and abbreviations which we find in Luke as compared with Matthew, it is impossible to assume that every thing which is wanting in the MSS. was left out by the Lord himself on that occasion. In general we agree with Tholuck's remark: "As he had given the prayer as a model of a short prayer in contradistinction to the 'much speaking' reprehended before, it is unnatural to think that he inserted unnecessarily the three sentences, which are wanting in Luke, and that he afterwards thought a rectification necessary."*

However, we do not apply this to all the three, or rather four omitted sentences; but draw an essential distinction between the introduction and conclusion on the one side, and the complete enumeration of the sacred seven petitions on the other. A certain variation in the expressions (which does not consist in abbreviation, but in change of words; compare the fourth and fifth petitions) corresponds to the whole character of Christ's teaching; and is intended to prevent any false cleaving to the letter of the form. We can understand why he might have omitted in the beginning the words ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, "who art in heaven," or even the ἡμῶν, "our;" he wished from the outset to lay all the emphasis on our saying, with all our heart, "Father," as being the essential and deepest truth of this prayer, even as he concludes the whole section with this word (ver. 13). The reason why, in ver. 4, τὰς ἁμαρτίας, "our sins," is put instead of τὰ ὀφειλήματα, "our debts," was mentioned in our remarks on Matt. vi. (p. 91); here we must observe that, with delicate accuracy, the expression ἁμαρτία or "sin" is not used again in the second clause, treating of man trespassing against man. With regard to the doxology (concerning the genuineness of which compare our remarks on Matt.), the reason why it is omitted here is partly because, according to the ideas of that time, it belonged, as a matter of course, to a complete form of

* We cannot but regret that even orthodox preachers repeat from their pulpits the opinion advanced in theological science, that the request of the disciple was the occasion of the words spoken, Matt. vi. (for example, Steinmeyer, Beiträge zum Schriftverständniss, i. 119). [What more natural than such an opinion, since Luke expressly sanctions it?—Am. Ed.]

† But this is not to be stated, as Braune does, "He made them pray this glorious prayer after him." (Comp. i. 170.)

‡ Von Gerlach thinks this repetition improbable, "because in this case the prayer would have become a standing form for the disciples." We argue exactly in the converse way; Christ repeats the prayer, because he wishes to satisfy the right desire for a standing form. For, considering this want as felt by all saints, specially for their public services and fellowship, we must think that it was indeed Christ's object to give "a literal repetition of the prayer" for our sake. "If the apostolic Church did not use the Lord's prayer literally," Alford remarks, "at what point of time did this custom commence, which we find in every Liturgy known to us?" [There is certainly no trace of the use of this form in the New Testament, or in any writings of the apostolic age. The supposition of such a liturgical view of the prayer by the disciples is wholly gratuitous.—Am. Ed.]

prayer; and partly because the confidence expressed in it is taught in the succeeding parable, which thus takes its place, and, as it were, calls it forth afresh from their memory. So far the whole is clear; but the Lord certainly did not omit in the repetition of the seven petitions any one; he did not take out any link of the perfect chain; hence, he did not leave out the third petition, which is a summary of all obedience, to be attained on the path of prayer, or the seventh, which is a summary of the redemption of the sanctified, and thus a condensation of the whole prayer.* However, they are omitted generally (and in the Vulgate); but are we to infer from this that "the reporter, whom Luke consulted," did not communicate the words of Christ completely? We do not think so. For in like manner as Luke knew well that Martha and Mary lived in Bethany, but did not wish purposely to mention it, so it is much more probable that, as a disciple of Christ, he knew the Lord's prayer in its complete form, when he wrote the Gospel; and it is impossible that he should have have had any reason or purpose for leaving out what is so essential. Nor was he a dependent copyist of what he found in any ἀπομνημόνευμα or memorandum, which he consulted; but the true and last authority and reporter in all these consultations was always the Holy Ghost. Hence we conclude that Luke wrote originally the seven petitions completely; and the reasons why the two petitions mentioned were omitted so generally, and at so early a date, may form a subject for the critics to exercise their ingenuity to their hearts' content. Such is our mature opinion. If any one knows better, let him bring forward his arguments; but they must be more satisfactory than any which have been adduced hitherto.

Verses 5, 6. A new commentary on the subsequent, "If ye then being evil—how much more God" See in the subsequent verses the clearest comment, if such be still required, on these parables which—in merciful condescension, and with a truthfulness which conceals nothing—represent the highest love of the heavenly Father even in that (evil) yielding of man to importunity of requests. Comp. chap. xviii. 2. "Who among you has a friend (not to speak of any nearer relationship) whom he thinks and believes to be such, and will not use him and request his aid in time of distress?" This is the first question, to which is added the second: "And do you think that this friend will keep his door shut in such a case against his importunity and much asking?" The Lord himself gives the answer, "Though he should not yield to the request out of friendship, yet he will do so, overcome by the urgent and importunate appeal to his friendship. Hence, what happiness—to have a friend!" This thought by itself is calculated to call forth in the disciples' heart the thought of prayer. "We have a friend and Father, a Hearer of prayer, a Redeemer, and deliverer from evil—in God in heaven! Are not men great unbelievers, who boast of this—and yet make so little or no use of it? To be willing to pray—this is of itself something; to be able to pray, to find true words of prayer, to find in one's heart to pray (2 Sam. vii. 27)—how difficult and hard is this! Are we so suspicious even towards fellow-men (who are yet evil)? The Lord in his wisdom describes a time of sudden and unexpected distress, which drives the one to ask, to the great inconvenience of him who is to give. About midnight, when the Orientals like to travel in the coolness of the night, a friend arrives late from his journey, and hungry; his friend and host has nothing in his house wherewith to refresh him, but he has his friend and neighbor, who must have something to help him, To him he goes; and, without many apologies, knocks loudly at the door, with the word φίλε: "Thou art my friend, and if thou dost not help me out of this present difficulty, I cannot believe that thou art my friend." He speaks as if the other must help him, without delay or hesitation; specially because he requests a favor not so much for himself as for one who is again his friend. Ἐπειδὴ φίλος παρεγένετο, "for a friend has come," probably without μοῦ, "my" (or with it, supposing it to be a genuine reading)—thus appeals to the community of friendship: "It is for a common friend, for my friends must necessarily be also thine! Therefore, come now and give me, though it be midnight, three loaves (the Jews baked flat loaves, probably each was sufficient for one person). For, I must offer him one; I must, as is customary, eat one with him, or, at least, break it; and I must also have a third, for propriety's sake, and in case he should be very hungry."

Verse 7. He from within—that is, in the warm comfortable repose of the first sound sleep, in which doubtless one likes least to be interrupted—refuses at first in an unfriendly manner, as happens not rarely among men. He gives him short reason for refusing the request so shortly worded; does not prefix a kind φίλε, "friend!" but instead of it, a cross and angry, "Trouble me not at midnight, thou intruder! The door is already shut (to unbolt the bars was not so easily or quickly done in those days); my little children are with me in bed; I certainly ought not to neglect them, or waken them, in order to help such impertinent night-disturbing friends; that, indeed, would be too much to ask of any one!" Παιδία, "children," cannot mean, as some understand it, servants and domestics: "they also are asleep, there is nobody in the house to get up on your account!" Also κοίτη does not mean chamber, but bed; "I have brought them to bed with all the necessary care and trouble, I do not wish to have any more κόπους, or pains, I am glad they are all asleep." In passing, the Lord thus throws a kind glance into the details of domestic life.* "In short, I can-

* Bengel, in his Gnomon, for once passes over the question in a superficial manner.

* Alford observes beautifully that the mother does not get up again to go to thee; that is, of course, I do not wish to do it; here is the limit to our friendship." This, in general, and all the circumstantial features form a contrast to the Friend in heaven, who never gives such an answer (though it may at first seem so to unbelief). God does not sleep, he never shuts his door against us; he has no favorite children who divert his attention from us; he does not think it a trouble to hear and to grant, and though man sometimes is really not able to help, yet God is always both willing and able.

Verse 8 But even evil men, thus the Lord returns to the object of his teaching, are inclined and yield in the end (almost against their will), when continued perseverance in asking overcomes them. He pre-supposes that the man without continues his request with importunity, and does not allow himself to be refused; herein consists the ἀναιδεία or boldness which asks and urges, till the person asked is ashamed (2 Kings ii. 17, עַד־בּוֹשׁ). Though he was not willing to give—rising out of friendship; yet he will now rise and give on account of the importunity of the asker; and if he is once up, will give all that is necessary for his friend.

Thus it is between us and God, who is so well pleased with importunity of prayer, that he encourages us to it; and that importunity he evokes by at first refusing. But who is meant by the third person in the parable, the friend from the journey? Primarily, doubtless, my fellow-man; for, the parable indicates by this delicate feature that all our prayer is to be and may be likewise intercession for others, according to the desire of charity. It is in this manner that Chrysostom applies the parable: "If a weary friend, who is not able to find truth, comes to thee and asks thee questions, and thou hast no answer for his hungering soul, then, even though thou shouldst be satisfied with thy simple faith, search the Scriptures and pray to the Lord on his behalf." But yet since immediately afterwards, in vers. 9–13, reference is made to the wants of the person himself who is praying, it is clear that, according to the real and deeper significance of the friend, the friend for whom I am to pray is myself. In the parable it renders the request, so to say, more noble and worthy of being granted, that it refers not to the petitioner himself; that he gives trouble not on his own account; thus suggesting to the friend he importunes what he himself would do in a similar case for his friend. But with God such distinction is not necessary; he is pleased and satisfied that we should consider ourselves as the first and nearest subject of our prayers. Thus Meyer remarks very beautifully and correctly: "When the heart, which has been away on a journey, returns suddenly at midnight (in the time of greatest darkness and distress) home to us, that is, comes to itself and feels hunger, and we have nothing wherewith to satisfy it,* God requires of us bold importunate faith." True, if we were not poor sinners, who have forfeited all our rights, who have no claims to bring forward, but justly deserve to be rejected by God—then indeed there would be no mention of being ashamed or not ashamed to ask; and moreover let us bear in mind that Christ tells us to pray, not to put forward claims. Whenever we look on ourselves and our merit, we must feel ashamed, but whenever we look to God and his mercy in Christ, then we need not feel ashamed.

Thus, we also belong to the children within; and, resting on the sure ground of the divine promise we are not merely to ask, but to knock without ceasing, till the door is opened and the gift bestowed. The Son has thus commanded us in the Father's name (κἀγὼ λέγω ὑμῖν); and he who remains behind and is ashamed, after such a command—he is the bold and daring man with his unbelief and disobedience! God would blame us for this in truth and faithfulness; just as the friend might have said with partial truth, if the other had not come to him, "Why did you not apply to me in your difficulty? Did you doubt my friendship, or think that it lasted only during the day?"

Verses 9, 10. Thus asking helps in the end—frequently even in the case of men, who are evil—but always and certainly with our heavenly Father. This yielding of God to our importunity is not an anthropomorphism, as the learned people say; for in that case our praying also would be no reality. But it is a reality in the relation subsisting between a living God and his free creatures. "That a stone is inexorable, and that a free being is placable, are things which it is possible to prove or to refute by experience, thus putting an end to all philosophical counter-arguments; though, in spite, or rather to the rectification, of our Sophia, it is certainly always in favor of our Philo-sophia" (Pfenninger). Therefore our duty is to give no rest to the Lord, as all Scripture exhorts us and encourges us by innumerable examples. In the ninth verse already is contained, though not explicitly, "Thus ask God my Father and your Father!" and in the thirteenth verse the application is expressed distinctly. Hereby we are also taught that the Lord designed this parable to be applied in this manner; not indeed that we should go and without discrimination act upon it in our intercourse with friends, quoting this instance and saying that friends are to importune their friends. This parable, as all others, only takes what happens in real life and makes use of it, without praise or recommendation. It is possible that the man, to not appear, in order to preserve the dignity of the parable; and points out that, in the parables which place the husband before us, the bride in a similar way does not appear.

whom the guest came at midnight, could have baked himself a few cakes instead of disturbing the other in his night's rest; at least this would have been more considerate. But if you go to the right door when you are in distress, you will learn not to annoy poor mortals by your loud knocking. However, we would not express it so strongly as Meyer does: "Christ rather wished to castigate a mode of conduct which is allowable in our spiritual relation to God, but not in our earthly relations to our fellow-men," as if Christ intended here to reprove the inconsiderate troubling and importuning of our friends and brethren, robbing them of their time and rest, not considering whether or not the friend has children with him to take care of, etc. No; importunity is represented here, in the first instance, as something praiseworthy; thus furnishing the point of comparison, viz., trust in our friend. But, at the same time, and as a secondary point, it is represented that he who is within has as much right to think his friend importunate and disturbing, as the other has to knock at the door. And this is the result: the more we seek God and knock at his door with earnest faith, the more we shall lose that impetuosity, which seeks only the help of man; the mere apt shall we be to bear in mind considerately and prudently, that a poor and sinful man cannot give and help, except God gives it to him for us.

Verses 11—13. Father is more than friend; and yet even an earthly father, among us who are evil, is infinitely less than than what the great God is willing to be, and really is to his children. This is the new connection in which the word (which we explained in our remarks on the Sermon on the Mount) appears in this passage. The thought is expressed with greater force in the additional illustration of the egg, which, compared with necessary food, is something superfluous, and is asked, perhaps playfully, in the full and hearty confidence of the child; and to which the scorpion (referring possibly to chap. x. 19), resembling the fish outwardly (not hidden in it), forms the strongest contrast. In the one case ἀγαθὰ (δόματα), "good things (gifts)"—here the Holy Spirit, as the gift of gifts, the best of all gifts, with very clear allusion to the proper object of our asking from God.* For God gives, while in the parable the man is represented only as lending. This is the gift of the true bread, on which man properly lives, most truly interpreted in the "give" of the fourth petition (ver. 3). If any feel inclined to play with the words of wisdom, they may imagine that here are the three breads of the three following petitions; although this is not to be called exegesis. Ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ, "your heavenly Father;" this refers back to the preceding address, ver. 2, supplying what was there omitted;† and conveys to the hearts of the disciples the assurance, "Ye are not like the children; can ye not pray?" In the transition to what alone remains, as spiritual need, the limit is also pointed out where an apparent denial is the best answer to our prayers for earthly objects.

* We do not, however, by any means, understand that the scope and connection positively demand something definite, corresponding to the figure—the Holy Spirit as the food of the soul; and consequently that the indefinite expression ἀγαθά at Matt. vii. is a generalizing of the original expression, as Neander supposes. We rather find a prayer for the Holy Spirit to be in accordance with a later period, and not in harmony with the Sermon on the Mount.

† Here observe: When we address God he is ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, and, when he answers us, he is ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ (Alford).

THE BENEDICTION PRONOUNCED UPON HIS MOTHER TRANSFERRED TO ALL.

(Luke xi. 28.)

We have already given our opinion upon the harmonistic relation of the entire section, ch. xi. 17–36, to Matt. xii. 25–45; expressing upon this latter passage our conviction that they record one and the same discourse, founded upon one and the same incident—whether the point of time, not definitely marked in either of the three Evangelists, be determined by Matthew or by Luke. Adhering, however, to our firm principle, we give the preference to Matthew's arrangement of our Lord's discourses; when, therefore, Luke interrupts, in vers. 27, 28, by an interjected word, the general discourse, the conclusion of which he had already given us before, we must necessarily assume that this apostrophe of the woman, and our Lord's answer, had occurred in the meantime. But, whether in the midst of the discourse itself (Matthew's extract gives us no appropriate point of connection for it) or at its close, parallel with what is related in Matt. xii. 46–50, Mark iii. 31–35, and what Luke himself has already recorded in ch. viii. 19–21—who shall determine? We manifestly see that the otherwise so well-informed Luke is indistinct in the chronology of these things generally. The ἐν τῷ λέγειν ταῦτα, "while he said these things," ver. 27, may refer to the immediately preceding words, and to that supposition we prefer to adhere; but they may also refer to the entire discourse, the order of which was different from that given by him.

It is remarkable that in close succession, or in direct connection, the Lord took a double occasion to decline for his mother any distinctive honor—once in respect to her own person, and once in respect to the woman who blessed her in the crowd. It is very natural that his answer should be on both occasions alike. It has been said that the well-meaning outcry of the woman "stands here very affectionately between the malicious blasphemy and the less malicious demand of a sign." It does, indeed, so stand here, but Matthew shows that this was not the historical sequence of the circumstance. And was the outcry affectionate? That would be the case only if it sprang from an earnest feeling and deep understanding; but we doubt this very much, and for our own part see in it, not indeed a wickedly intended, but still a most artlessly unintelligent, outcry of mere womanly feeling.* Thus it would be better to say—How serenely the Lord here stands betwixt malicious vituperation on the one hand, and unenlightened empty praise on the other! The woman's "devout attention" to the Lord's solemn discourse had apprehended no more than that this man can speak, and teach, and preach with most wonderful force and interest; and she gives this idle commendation, moreover, to his mere human personality, for she, like a true woman, pronounces the mother blessed who had borne and bred a son like this.* "O how must thy mother rejoice over thee—would that I were she!" What a mournful contrast to the entirely opposite feeling which, according to Mark iii. 20, 21, at this very time filled the mind of that mother of Jesus!

The Lord's answer hardly refers to that, but rather to the point, that his mother as such had no preeminent sanctity or blessedness; and it is the impulse of the Spirit which prompts him to take every occasion to rebuke prospectively that future Mariolatry, the innocent germ of which was heard in such an apostrophe as this woman's. By the μενοῦνγε, "yea, rather," standing first, he concedes all that is true and right—that to have borne him was indeed her honor; but at the same time he corrects the false distinction. Only because Mary had received the word of God with such entire and unhesitating faith, had she received that honor. "Blessed are they who rightly hear the word of God; and not as thou hearest it, O woman, who fallest so readily from the solemn matter spoken to the mother of him who speaks it!" In repudiating the praise, and repelling all consideration for his human person as such, he does not say—My word; but only testifies that he speaks the word of God, in the comprehensiveness of meaning which includes all that had ever been spoken in human ears, and all that would yet be revealed for man's salvation. "My mother," he will say, "is only on that account blessed, because she has heard, and treasured up in faith, the word spoken to herself;" see Luke i. 45; ii. 19, 51. The keeping God's word is partly the test of true hearing; partly its fruit and consequence, which must never be wanting; first, however, the "providence treasuring up of deep words" of God, which, though not fully understood then, will be better understood afterwards, as we see in the case of Mary herself; but then, also, the actual fruit-bearing after receiving the seed, the doing which must follow the hearing of the word, Luke viii. 15, 21. The entire saying is itself in its universal comprehensiveness given for the hearing, pondering, and keeping. What the conception and bringing forth of Jesus was, in the case of Mary, the Lord shows in its spiritual and essential fulfilment in all who receive his word for the new birth of their souls, and in this sense become like his mother (Luke viii. 21). This apparently slight circumstance is a genuine type of what has, alas! been realised in after times; bearing in itself the germ of that which is typified. Instead of doing like Mary, and becoming like Mary, the Church turning away (in secret self-pleasing) from the word of God to the human Child who was brought forth, deifies the lowly one, and dishonors her lowliness by the unseemly and unbefitting θεότοκος, Mother of God. What is the preaching of the Reformation, as opposed to this, more than the word which the Lord here speaks? In their council of Trent they heard not that voice, but repelled it with anathema—for a Maranatha to themselves!

* No "child-like devotion" of this "affectionate woman"—no such "expression of a simple love" as the Lord would approve (Braune).

* Not the nurse in addition, as Thiess inferred from the words.

AN EARLIER WOE TO THE PHARISEES AND SCRIBES.

(Luke xi. 39–52 [Matt. xxiii. 2–39.])

That which the Lord uttered against the Scribes and Pharisees in his solemn final condemnation, had been prepared long before; for, while many of his longer discourses originated in the circumstances of the moment, many of them, on the other hand, were from time to time collected by himself, and by degrees prepared and reserved for final and most weighty utterance. We have here a remarkable testimony and example of this latter; the Lord speaks, in a narrower circle and in a more restricted manner, a great part of what was afterwards spoken in a more extended connection. These judgment-formulas were formed and shaped, as it were, within his soul; and an occasion from without calls them, in all their preliminary and prospective solemnity, readily to his lips. Thus it were better for us to say, that he now anticipates this impending farewell of these fools and blind, than that he repeats later what had earlier been spoken.

A Pharisee invited him to a meal,* and, undoubtedly, with a false heart, as at ch. xiv. 1, and vii. 36. They watch him invidiously, to see how he will demean and express himself; and with all the less restraint on that account, yea, with a deportment which was immediately offensive, like a challenge in their own house, he εἰσελθὼν ἀνέπεσεν, "went in and sat down to meat," without further ado, designedly omitting the Pharisaical washing (see on Matt. xv. 2). While the Pharisee wondered at such boldness, the Lord's searching answer would anticipate his thoughts before they found utterance.† As to the perfectly justified "divine dispensing with civilities," which the Lord exhibits, who is Lord, even while he is guest, Ebrard has well said, in reply to the unjustified censure of the critic—"I will warrant the worthy Strauss, that if the Lord were at his table in the present day, He would be just as uncivil!" Everything has its time, the cutting severity and the patient benignity; and the Lord knew full well what was on this occasion seasonable. There must, indeed, have been assembled around this ἄριστον, or "dinner," a company that held themselves select and purified; and the Lord only expressed to them in his word and act, what their secret guiltiness had already prepared for them in his heart.

The discourse divides itself into two parts, each of which embraces three woes, ordered thus in precise and solemn number, though not like the perfected seven of the later enumeration. The first portion is directed against the hypocrisy of the Pharisees; but as a lawyer (νομικός is, as ver. 53 shows, almost the same as the former, but indicating more definitely the office) expressly vindicates his own caste, the second is directed against the conduct of the lawyers particularly, in whom was especially concentrated the guilt of the general unbelief of the people, and its condemnation.* At the outset, hypocrisy, which cleanses the outside instead of the inward part, is, without a woe and half in irony, rebuked—the immediate occasion being found in the washings upon which the Pharisees laid such stress, but at the same time, making that the type of their own proper character and conduct, vers. 39–41. (Afterwards in Matt. xxiii. this is the middle one of the three subsequent and final woes.) The three woes, which are the first here, follow for the more definite description of the Pharisaic spirit—their petty externality in the fulfilment of the law instead of minding its essential substance; the

* And, indeed, ἐν δὲ τῷ λαλῆσαι, which, without ταῦτα, appears to have reference to what had immediately preceded—"while He was engaged in this conversation;" but, as this can hardly be reconciled with harmonistic considerations, especially when the mass of matter connected together in Luke is taken into account, we may translate with Ebrard—When on one occasion He was thus speaking.

† Schleiermacher's useless refinement imagined that our Lord would have washed at a δεῖπνον, and that the Pharisee took it ill that his ἄριστον was not equally honored. These two words are not to be so rigorously distinguished; as we have already remarked.

* The man means to say—That touches us with them (a soft way of saying—particularly), for we furnish the Pharisees with their theory, which it is our office to sustain. Is all our glorious learning naught, or of evil? The Lord answers at first by merely placing them also on a level with the others; but then in ver. 52 follows the specific portion for these theorists.

proud lust of honor and rank connected with this; although under the covering of their hypocrisy nothing existed but spiritual death! (Afterwards in Matt. xxiii. 23, 27, this becomes the fifth and seventh woe, but the intermediate one here is there singled out in vers. 6, 7.) We see that the whole has its own connection and orderly procedure here, though a different one from that other; for, it is the wonderful nature of these pregnant utterances of the Lord that they may be strung on a variety of threads. Now, when the bold lawyer appropriated to himself what had been said, although the Lord had only named the Pharisees—a marvellously daring acknowledgment of a smitten conscience, which straightway complains that this charge inculpates us also—these lawyers receive their portion over and above, still heavier than the former, though not exempting them from the application of that likewise. We see that the wisdom of God in Jesus (ver. 49) finds it now reasonable and right to cast down the presumptuous wickedness of sinners with especial severity; in order to deprive them of every reason for thinking that he did not penetrate their hearts, or was afraid before them. And our critical prudence should also rest contented with that. The Pharisees, as such, had been previously described in themselves, according to their own spirit and character; the νομικοί, on the other hand, the teachers of others, receive their three woes on account of their dealing with the people. First we have, once more, the universal and comparatively gentle description—Laying burdens upon others, which themselves not even touched! ver. 46 (Matt. xxiii. 4). And, as this would instantly place them in humiliating comparison with the ancient prophets, therefore the holy and anointed messengers of God, vers. 47, 48, quickly pursue the topic, and with words which in Matt. xxiii. constitute the summing up of the seven woes into an eighth. Similarly, the charge against the generation, and its condemnation, follow in vers. 49–51, just as they follow there in vers. 34–36. But then, as these words are not a concluding and farewell discourse, it is quite natural (we might say, necessary) that the close here should turn back as we find it does—the third woe, ver. 52 (analogous to the first, ver. 46; there, however, concerning the law, but now also concerning the way of penitence and salvation in order to the εἰσέρχεσθαι or "entrance" into the kingdom of heaven), first describes in all its enormity the character of these lawyers, as being fatal to their own well-being, and ruinous to others. This last woe of our present discourse becomes afterwards in Matt. xxiii. the first: for the Lord seems to recall then his former words, and, beginning again what is in part the same discourse, commences at the point where he had ended before.

Verses 39–41. The νῦν, "now" at the beginning can scarcely be made to indicate, as many think, that this is a fragment of a longer discourse unskilfully extracted, the true commencement of which is not given: it is much more in keeping to regard it as a הִנֵּה, or "Behold," which makes an ironical allusion to what was then just occurring.* The Lord sets out from that which met his eyes at the repast, beginning at once—"I mark, indeed, that ye Pharisees are very zealous in washing the outside, whether of the cups and platters or the hands of your own persons; alas, that ye should forget the inward part, which is the main concern, the purification of the heart and life!" The connection of his words with the washing of hands, which here gives rise to all, makes it evident that τὸ ἔσωθεν ὑμῶν, "your inward part," hastening as it does to its great object, refers to the individual persons of the Pharisees themselves, who deal with themselves as with their cups and platters (and even the singular here derives significance from this). (The τὰ ἐνόντα, afterwards has a quite different meaning; and τῷ ἔσωθεν ὑμῶν instead of αὐτῶν can neither be explained by—"the contents of the vessels belonging to you," nor "the manner and way in which they are handled and used in the house.") The following verse is very commonly regarded as a question, ὁ ποιήσας, "he that made," being referred to God; so Meyer corrects the Luth. version—"Did not He that made that which is without, make that which is within also?" The inference drawn from this—Is not this also to be purified before Him who is the Creator of the soul or the inner man? seems to us to be very inapplicable here. We cannot see how the observation, which holds good of every possible thing, and of much that is different within and without, that the inward and outward part originate from the same Creator, should be supposed to lead to the conclusion—that therefore they necessarily belong together! Still less can we understand why just here the reference to the ποιήσας should be introduced as a reason, since He most certainly did not create the unclean inner man as such; and we think Luther's original text more conformable to the sense, although he uses a paraphrase which gives up the literal words. The significant parallel, Matt. xxiii. 26, which runs—Cleanse first that which is within, that the outside may be clean also! shows us that ποιεῖν here signifies purgare, a meaning which is very suitable and alone gives the sense in its simplicity. The lexicographers vindicate this use of the word, which is found also in later languages; deducing it from the placing any thing in a certain condition, making it what it should be, thus, according to circumstances, cleansing, putting right, etc. Wahl and Schöttgen cite, particularly, 2 Sam. xix. 24. Thus the clause is a simple statement, telling these fools the plain truth which they had altogether forgotten—that He who has done all to, or purified that which is without, has not thereby put to rights or made clean that which is within; but has that much harder work yet to do.* As it respects ver. 41, we can, again, scarcely understand why most expositors are so earnest in protesting against the supposition of an ironical meaning (Erasmus so understood it, and many afterwards, among whom we may mention Lightfoot and Kuinoel); for we find it impossible, as Schleiermacher also does, to understand it otherwise.† Is not the severity of scorn perfectly in harmony with the tone of the whole discourse, and does not this re-appear most decidedly in vers. 47, 48? Can we suppose that here, confronting these Pharisees, the Lord would positively lay down this clause concerning the meritoriousness of almsgiving, which, however correctly to be understood in itself, ever presupposes a right spirit of apprehension, or else is fatally abused? This would be the only explicit doctrine and exhortation in the whole discourse, which else contains nothing but condemnation—and this is reason enough, in fact, for understanding it otherwise. The Pharisees assuredly gave away alms enough, as we know, and might, consequently, have been altogether unable to understand the Lord. But, in fact, they understood him much better than his modern expositors; for, the giving alms of the contents of their platters,‡ and then saying "All is now pure, all is right!" was just their way. This the Lord can only be regarded as now reproving; it is impossible that he could be recommending it in earnest to them, for they would have mocked him with the answer—O Master, we give, indeed, diligently and plentifully enough! It would be like saying to the feasters at our modern free-mason and other feasts—Let the poor have a collection, and the matter is pure and sanctified! No, the Lord would here say to the Pharisees—Your custom to purify robbery by almsgiving, touches only that which is outward, as ye hypocrites well know! He expresses this scornfully in the Imperative (which should not be advanced as an argument against the ironical sense), and his well known application is—Do this as much as ye may, ye will not thereby avoid the woe! The καὶ ἰδού, "and behold" (corresponding with the νῦν at the beginning), speaks also for this view; as well as the καθαρὰ ὑμῖν ἐστι, "are clean unto you;" which indicates the condemned, facile mode of their cleansing everything in their conduct—before your eyes; with which, finally, as a final evidence, the following Ἀλλ' οὐαὶ ὑμῖν, "But woe unto you," comes into sharp contrast. This ἀλλά would have, indeed, no meaning, if the previous clause did not refer to a false justification on the part of the Pharisees. Neander says correctly—"You cannot with this mock piety satisfy the law of God, and escape His judgments; but woe unto you!" Therefore we have not here, as in Matt. xxiii. 23, express mention of their passing over the exhibition of the ἔλεος, or mercy, towards their neighbors.

Verse 49. The remainder of the discourse has been already explained upon Matt. xxiii., save that "the words of the wisdom of God" in this verse demand some comment. Hereafter the Lord places himself, at his public and solemn concluding discourse in the temple, openly before them thus—Behold I send! placing himself in the stead of the God who gave them prophets and preachers; but now, at the table of a Pharisee, such dignified majesty in his words would have been unsuitable: he therefore veils it, as it were, in the spirit which we have before exhibited as the significant distinction between the earlier and the later discourse. It scarcely needs proof that this entire sentence, which continues through vers. 50, 51, and closes with Λέγω ὑμῖν, "I say unto you," can be no quotation of any passage in Scripture—though this strange opinion had been advanced, and Morus speculates on a lost book with this title. The Lord refers, immediately and first, to the wisdom of God, who sends that wisdom which manifested itself in its messengers, and which was justified in its believing children against all unbelievers; and probably not without allusion to ch. vii. 35.* He then places this wisdom, which sendeth the genuine prophets and messengers from age to age with the simple truth, in marked contrast with the blind scribes who boast themselves in their useless and unused key of knowledge.† But, finally, it is very plain (as the parallel in Matt. xxiii., which must be retrospectively brought to explain this, shows) that he signifies himself in the undertone of this name; for not merely in him is the wisdom of God to be heard in a higher sense than in Solomon (ver. 31, in this chapter); but he is himself, as all true Scribes in Israel might understand, the only-begotten Son of God, the personal, hypostatical Wisdom, which speaketh in all the

* Alford wonders that I adopt this view, which gives "the most frigid sense imaginable;" but our taste here differs—the reference to the Creator seems to me indefinitely general and almost meaningless.

† Even Neander inclines to the ironical meaning: "But, on the other hand, where Christ employs this mode of teaching (giving a specific instead of a general precept), the peculiar kind of special injunction that he gives is always determined by the character of his hearers; and almsgiving would have been an inapt injunction to Pharisees, who, as we learn from the Sermon on the Mount, made great show and display thereof." "If the words were not spoken ironically, it must seem strange that Christ, whose design was to aim at the disposition of the heart, should have laid down anything so easily perverted into opus operatum." And in this we quite concur.

‡ Τὰ ἐνόντα (Vulg. quod superest) is obviously no more than ἐκ τῶν ἐνόντων; it requires no explanation, that all was not to be given. Morus adds—quantum fieri potest. We cannot understand how this ἐνόντα (as Neander thinks) should be applied, like ἔσωθεν previously (as contrasted with ἔξωθεν, ver. 39), to the inner being of the man.

* This view, even if we look no further, sufficiently explains the expression on our Lord's lips. With any transformation of the "citation" according to subsequent Christian phraseology (Twesten and Neander) we can have nothing to do.

† We have already shown, on Matt. xxiii. 13, that the knowledge is itself the key.

prophets and in all the bearers of Divine revelation—see Prov. i. 20; viii. 1, 12, 22–31. Thus does the Lord "utter his eternal dicta in the style of an ancient prophecy," as Von Gerlach says, holding fast the truth.* One might almost say that the Lord in his passing use of this expression would give the true key for understanding the Book of Wisdom, developed as it is from canonical elements, containing the purest gnosis of Israelitish faith, and stretching forth, as it does, in its principles, towards the New Testament revelation. But this we would only throw out in passing, and not for captious application.

THE DISCIPLES WARNED AGAINST HYPOCRISY, FEAR OF MAN, AND LITTLENESS OF FAITH.

(Luke xii. 1–12 [Matt. xvi. 6; x. 26–33; xii. 31, 32; x. 19, 20].)

All of these are sayings which were uttered, according to Matthew, on an earlier occasion, and in another connection, some of which also appear again in Luke's Gospel, as ch. viii. 17; xxi. 14, 15. The Evangelist here binds them together as a connected discourse spoken in immediate connection with the preceding. The people had in the meantime crowded together in unwonted numbers;† whether surrounding the Lord for his protection, as it were, against the excited and wrathful Scribes and Pharisees, ch. xi. 53, 54—or waiting without in eager anxiety for the breaking up of the repast—or, if that be preferred, accidentally gathered together. In the hearing of these the Lord now utters a discourse, strictly related to that immediately preceding, the condemnatory spirit of which it still retains. It is directed to his disciples, indeed, yet evidently with a view to its being heard and pondered by the people at large and the Pharisees. He goes on to teach these latter that he feared not to rebuke publicly before the people without, as he had rebuked secretly at their table, the hypocrisy which the light of his truth detected (and in which they had invited him and listened to his words); the poor deceived people, so far as they were disposed to come over to his discipleship, he warns against false masters; and, finally, he solaces his disciples' minds in the prospect of the enmity which might be excited against them, reminding them of most appropriate sayings which they had already heard, though they had not yet learned them fully—to wit, that they themselves were called to sustain the same testimony to the truth which he sustained, and with equal warfare and opposition of man. Only guard yourselves against hypocrisy, by contemplating the judgment which will finally make all things manifest, as also by keeping in mind the ever-increasing publicity which will speedily be given to the preaching of all truth! vers. 1–3. "As my followers, friends, and companions in the office of this testimony, fear not men, but fear that true enemy and murderer of souls (see on Matt. x. 28); trusting in your God and Father, who numbereth the hairs of your head!" vers. 4–7. "In order to the compensation in the judgment, the confessing me before men, and not denying, is the great essential; he who commits an offence against me may find forgiveness, but he who withstands and contradicts the Holy Ghost in His full testimony—ye know what I said once before to these Pharisees concerning that!" vers. 8–10. (See on Matt. xii. 31.) "Therefore do ye, in the time to come, in direct opposition to the sin against the Holy Ghost, place your absolute reliance upon the promised aid which ye shall receive from Him," vers. 11, 12.

Thus far the connection is clear. But when many, after the interruption, vers. 13–21, find in the paragraph of vers. 22–59 a continuation of the same connection—that is, of this present warning and instruction to the disciples, we must demur. For, the whole has in itself too general a meaning; nor will the recurrence of such correlative thoughts as we find in ver. 32, Fear not! ver. 56, ye hypocrites! ver. 51, divisions, dispose us to determine that the whole was but one discourse. Thus much, however, remains certain, that our Lord turns once more to his disciples again, while, in ver. 54, he appeals to the people at large, reproving their Pharisaic thoughts. For the rest, the section vers. 1–12 has for its leading theme hypocrisy and the fear of man. But ver. 15 begins a distinctive warning of another kind, making prominent the difference between earthly and heavenly thought; care for the body and this life, and seeking treasure in heaven; Christian prudence in regard to the future recompense.

The details have already been expounded. It appears to us certain that πρῶτον, "first," in ver. 1, belongs to προσέχετε, Beware, and not to λέγειν, to say; for this was not the first warning against the Pharisees and their leaven, and any distinction here between a first time now, and a second time to the disciples in ver. 22, seems quite inappropriate. But that sincerity might be called the first thing of all, and, consequently, that the warning against hypocrisy might be introduced with a πρῶτον προσέχετε, first beware, is abundantly clear. On vers. 2, 3,

* The allusion to 2 Chron. xxiv. 19, which Alford lays so much stress upon, seems to us forced and inapplicable, since the question is still about the wisdom.

† The καταπατεῖν, ver. 1, is hyperbolical; not intimating that they actually trode one upon another.

consult page 182 on the parallel passage, where there are some specific remarks on this of Luke; and on the speaking in closets compare 2 Kings vi. 12. Further, it is to be observed on ver. 4, that the Lord designedly says, in special confidence and with universal invitation—you, my friends! Ver. 10 is so strictly connected with vers. 8, 9, that it tends to mitigate the threatening against denial of himself, and limits the utmost severity of retribution to the final persistency in self-willed and inveterate sin. In vers. 11, 12, there is opposed to this the simple, unfearing, confident obedience under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost; intermediate thoughts may have been omitted, since the record only makes prominent the significant sayings as they recurred here on a specific occasion.

THE PEOPLE AND THE DISCIPLES WARNED AGAINST VARIOUS FOLLY: COVETOUSNESS, AND EARTHLINESS OF MIND; LACK OF WATCHFULNESS AND FIDELITY IN THE DISCIPLES; FOLLY OF THE PEOPLE IN NOT OBSERVING THE PRESENT DAY OF GRACE, AND THINKING OF THE COMING JUDGMENT.

(Luke xii. 14–59 [Matt. vi. 25–33, vi. 19–21, xxiv. 42–51, x. 34–36, xvi. 2, 3, v. 25, 26].)

After a specific parable, occasioned by an inopportune and foolish appeal, we have here various sayings which, with some few additions, had been either spoken earlier, or were subsequently repeated. Not that Luke or his "reporter" has inserted a portion of the Sermon on the Mount; nor that Matthew, in ch. xxiv. and in his Sermon, borrowed various sayings from this place. These parallels between the two Evangelists should simply impress upon our minds the conviction that our Lord ofttimes did what every diligent teacher of unapt scholars must constantly do—repeat in his condescending patience the words which only by incessant repetition could be eternally imprinted on the minds of those who heard them. We cannot see, for our own part, why this could not have been the case in "longer discourses, which correspond word for word"—for those longer discourses would, of course, be less likely to be understood, at one hearing, than the shorter proverbial sayings; and precisely such, therefore, we should expect to find repeated. The idea which lies at the root of all such critical suspicion is this, that the Lord must necessarily have been more solicitous about the originality of his own teaching than the benefit of those whom he taught.* This may be the case with us presumptuous mortals, but with respect to him let it be for ever rejected as utterly unworthy; and let every man reflect how, in his own experience, the most profoundly pondered thoughts adhere longest to the memory in the very words which expressed them first. All these difficulties will then vanish.

The man in the company, ver. 13, had been a foolish listener; and while our Lord had been speaking of matters infinitely momentous, and finally, concerning the Holy Spirit, he had been thinking of his own, and not the heavenly, inheritance. He now breaks out into an interruption concerning a strife between himself and another, touching matters of personal property. The man of God had shown himself so fearless and impartial in his contest with the Pharisees, that this injured person feels disposed to select him for an arbitrator between himself and his elder brother, who, being in possession and in administration, refused to give his younger brother his rightful portion.* Now this singular and inopportune appeal itself betrayed the improper zeal of his πλεονεξία, or "covetousness," in a matter which might indeed be just; the Lord therefore condemns—and this was his own only function—both the man in particular and the people in general, for the folly of such entire devotion to worldly good. When he turns in ver. 22 to the disciples again, he does not take up the interrupted thread of his former discourse where ver. 12 left it; but adheres to the subject which this interruption had introduced, though not without retaining some echoes of what he had before been saying. The fundamental idea, which binds all together down to ver. 59, lies in the Ἄφρον, thou fool! of ver. 20. The Lord rebukes the folly of the mind which fixes its thoughts upon the earthly instead of the heavenly, upon the present life instead of the future and its concomitant reckoning before God; warning the people as well as the disciples against it with profound earnestness. First comes the people's warning against covetousness, with a reference to being rich towards God, vers. 15–21. Then follows a warning to the disciples, arising out of the former, against heathenish worldly thought and care; a warning which in their case would naturally lead to more specific inculcation of the heavenly spirituality of mind which became their character, and of that watchfulness and fidelity which was demanded of them in the dispensation and use of the gifts of grace intrusted to them, vers. 22–53. (How the concluding words from ver. 49 are connected with this, we shall see in the sequel.) Finally, our Lord returns to the people, and addresses to them a warning which adheres to the fundamental idea, cautioning them against the folly (learned of their misleaders, ver. 1) of abusing and neglecting the day of grace; of forgetting and putting from them the consideration of the judgment; and of failing to avert that condemnation which it was still in their power to avert, vers. 54–59. Thus, the whole discourse sets out from the wretched folly of men in thinking to fill the soul with great store of abundance; proceeding to the corresponding folly among his poor disciples, in neglecting the kingdom of God in their care for food and clothing; penetrating still deeper in the exhibition of that last folly of the servants in not preparing for their Lord's judgment; and turning back again to the most universal ground-folly underlying all, viz.: the refusing to mark, in spite of reason and conscience, what God is now offering to man's soul for its satisfaction, and what He will one day require of that soul. Disciples and people are thus interchangeably addressed; they are distinguished one from the other, and yet so fundamentally blended that each party shall hear only the same things said, according to its own specific point of view.

* [The reasons assigned by those who maintain the non-repetition of our Lord's discourses are, rather: first, the improbability on the part of One who was so terse, varied, and fertile in his teachings; and secondly, the fact that impromptu speakers rarely repeat their remarks in the same form, much less in the same words.—Am. Ed.]

* Brauno thinks it probable that he wanted to share equally with his elder brother; but we see no reason for this.

Verse 14. Assuredly it is not without reproving indignation that the ἄνθρωπε, Man! suddenly begins; yet not repelling him as a stranger who concerned him not, for he gives him much better than he asks. Its meaning is—"This appeal of thine is altogether human in its earthliness of spirit! Art thou bent upon going to law with thy brother about mammon—in relation to that I can help neither thee nor any other man, for to this end I did not come into the world, and have not been commissioned of my Father. Dost thou not yet know him better, whom thou namest διδάσκαλος, Master? I am not appointed by God or man to be a δικαστής in general (judge or arbiter, Acts vii. 27, 35), or a μεριστής, divider, in particular; my kingdom is not of this world, and I meddle not with any earthly judgment or temporal business, so that the enemies of the truth to which I bear witness can never say of me what was there said of Moses." (The form of the expression evidently points to that passage, [Exod. ii. 14,] which Stephen afterwards referred to.) While the Lord thus declines what did not befit his mission, he acknowledges, at the same time, by his κατέστησε, "made," the just prerogative of those who were appointed to that end. The word and the example of the Master is of perpetual obligation upon his servants too, warning them ever against injuring the efficiency of their spiritual function by mixing up with it things quite foreign to its character; for the rest, however, 1 Cor. vi. 1–6, is by no means here contradicted, for that which did not become our Lord in relation to "men" without, for whom he had matter of quite different judgment, does strictly and absolutely become brethren in relation one to another. If Peter and Andrew had not yet left all, but had been at contention about some portion of their possessions (which he might have permitted them still to retain), he would in such a case—unimaginable, however, in itself—have rebuked the contention, and have interposed between "his friends," instead of referring them to any court of human judicature. The ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, over you, must be strongly emphasized in strict connection with the ἄνθρωπε, man.

Verse 15. And he said unto them; that is, not simply to the two brethren (for who can tell if the other was present?), but to all the people. He includes all who were held by the same carnal mind as this one; and administering his office, involving a much more weighty condemnation, he warns them against covetousness; employing a popular parable, which, preceded by the most definite expression of his teaching (ver. 15), is followed by the most definite expression of his warning (ver. 21). But the instruction at the first stands only as the ground of a warning; while the concluding warning points also to a correlative promise. Take heed and beware (parallel with κρίνετε ἀφ' ἑαυτων afterwards, ver. 57) of that πλεονεξία, or covetousness, which, alas! adheres to and endangers all; that foolish lust of having much, and of having more—that evil spirit and disposition which reduces all your otherwise lawful vindication of your right and of your property, to mere unrighteousness! This is the beginning; and at the end we have reference to the being rich in God, without which no earthly possessions can save the soul from destruction. The doctrine, which gives the reason for the ὁρᾶτε, "take heed," in the ὅτι, "for," is by no means the utterance of an entirely new truth; it is no more than the simplest expression of a conviction entertained by all men everywhere, established both by external and internal experience; the misapprehension and perversion of which, therefore, can only be condemned as wilful blindness, and sinful folly. The concise expression of the German Bible—Niemand lebt davon, dass er viele Güter hat! (Nobody lives from having many good things), perfectly exhibits the obvious meaning, but does not correspond with the more profound order of the original words. That order has been found a difficulty (literally, for not in the abounding to any one his life is from his possessions); and some have adopted another reading,* while others have darkened the thought by a perverted construction. It appears to us inconceivable that ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων, from the things which he possesseth; should belong to περισσεύειν, abundance, from which it is so far separated—partly on account of the strangeness of the construction, and partly because of the Infinitive followed by ἐκ with its object; and therefore it is wrong to translate—His life doth not consist in this, that a man hath a superabundance of or in his goods. Schleiermacher's view (following the interpolation of Michaelis, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῶν ὑπαρχόντων, "but of the possessions"): "Assuredly, a man must live of the goods or of the bread which he now hath, but the περισσεύειν, the having more than is absolutely necessary, is of no avail to him"—is equally incorrect as it regards the text, and very much more so as it regards the matter; indeed, it altogether distorts and ruins the profound doctrine taught. Most certainly our Lord, who uttered the great truth of Matt. iv. 4, could not have designed to teach anything so doubtful as that anything creaturely is necessary to a man, whereof his life must consist: what he here teaches is essentially the same as his word in the wilderness. But he proceeds from what is altogether evident, that man does not live of superfluity, and strengthens that assertion by further denying that a man's life consists in anything that he may have already; so that instead of the ἀλλά, but, which they would interpolate, "not even," would be more appropriately supplied. This alone seems to bring out the fulness of meaning: The life of a man does not depend upon his having abundance, upon (so that it might be said to come from) the good things which he already possesseth. Compare the warning of Ecclus. v. 1 (followed as it is by a saying which our Lord here refers to)—Set not thine heart upon thy χρήματα, or property, and say not, αὐτάρκη μοι ἐστι, "it is sufficient for me." The thorough understanding of the sentiment is developed in a triple progression. Let the abundance be first emphasized; and we are constrained to confess that the having superfluity is not the life, since the man cannot consume all that is in his barns. Then it must be noted, that we do not, properly speaking, live of that which we have, be it little or much;* thou dost not live one day longer, because thou hast bread for another day (vers. 19, 20), but rather thou must continue in life if thy bread is to be eaten by thee. Finally, let us seize the full truth which is intimated in ἡ ζωή—God alone gives and sustains man's life in every sense; as his lower, bodily life, so also the true life of his soul, its rest, its confidence, the satisfaction of its every need, now and for ever. That this is the essential undertone of our Lord's instruction, its exposition in the parable will most clearly show.

Verses 16, 17. A man, a rich man, to whom the περισσεύειν or abundance is not wanting, must miserably die, and perish in the sudden horror of night; his foolish security fails to assure his life; he has more than he can well take care of, but will hold fast all, and solace his soul in the thought of ample provision for the future. But how awfully is the case reversed! He is rich already, and is ever becoming richer; his great field (χώρα instead of χωρίον, a strictly classical distinction) has yielded largely in a year of blessing and fruitfulness. The Lord selects the most innocent method of acquiring riches, that which most obviously tended to lead the mind constantly to thankful acknowledgment of God; and thus makes this wretched harvest-joy all the more frightful, and all the more impressive a warning to every man. He thus designedly varies the expression of Ecclus. xi. 18, where an example is given of one who was πλουτῶν ἀπὸ προσοχῆς καὶ φιγγίας αὐτοῦ, rich by strenuous pains and parsimony. The fruits of the earth furnish also the most striking and apposite illustration of the truth which our Saviour enforces, since it is most obvious that the man cannot eat the whole himself. But this the fool in his infatuation does not mark; his τὶ ποιήσω, "what shall I do?" with its unhappy answer, is much worse than that of the worldling who was at least wise in his generation, Luke xvi. 3, 4. He does not say with an earnest meaning—What should I do? but—What shall I do? At best it was—What should, what can I do with it—to store it up in the most effectual manner for myself? Possibly his neighbor's land had not borne with equal plenteousness; certainly there were landless people enough around him who in their poverty would have eased him of his care for the superabundance, and would have well known where to bestow it. The law of Moses, too, reminded him of these by all its provisions for the poor in connection with the gleaning, the sabbath-year, and so forth. But it does not occur to this man that his own belly was too small for all his abundance; instead of that he only thinks of his insufficient barns; and the only aim of all his prudent craft is—to collect together, and bestow safely, my fruits, all which has been produced for me in my land! This is a man like a hamster.

Verses 18, 19. His riches now cause him much care and disquietude, before his soul can peacefully eat and drink and take content (Psa. xxxix. 6). As he knows only the pains of gathering, nothing of the joy of giving; as he is only troubled about the ποῦ, "where," and ἐκεῖ, "there," of a stately and secure place of heaping up; his abundant harvest only brings him much vain expense of time and money. Καθελῶ, I will pull down! This is the schemo of his prudence; and the great work begins with the destruction and pulling down of all his ἀποθῆκαι, or barns (not merely caves, therefore). If any one spoke to him about it, he would probably in hypocrisy and thanklessness say something about the "blessing of God;" but what he said to himself runs quite differently. He calls it τὰ γενήματά μου, my fruits, thinks only of the field and its produce instead of thinking on God; rests in the μοῦ (the Ger. trans. is quite correct—mir gewachsen, grown unto me) with-

* That ὑπάρχοντα is always superfluous possession, as Richter's Hausbibel says, we cannot admit; but in most passages plain evidence is found that it is the general idea for the property which a man has. But comp. ver. 33, and then, e.g., Matt. xix. 21; Acts iv. 32; Luke xiv. 33, xix. 8; Heb. x. 34. The expression which most fully corresponds to it is provision, without direct reference to little or much: comp. τὰ παρόντα, Heb. xiii. 5.

out any thought of his neighbor. As Göthe says: "Im Frühling denkt gleich der steife Philister: Das ist für mich und meine Geschwister; Unser Herrgott is so gnädig heuer, Hätt' ich's doch schon in Fach und Scheuer!" (In the spring thinks too the sturdy Philistine: That is for me and my brethren; our Lord is so gracious this year, I have it well nigh in shock and barn.) Then will he say—These are my goods! Twice, in designed irony, ἀγαθά, goods: not merely as a general term like ἀποθῆκαι, barns; but this deeper word is used instead of χρήματα, ὑπάρχοντα, property, possessions, and the like, in order to intimate more expressly the unspeakable folly which takes no account of the true ἀγαθόν, or good. And then, when the building is done? Now shall his soul find rest: ἀναπαύου, take thine ease, points to leisure and repose—φάγε, πίε, eat, drink, to ample enjoyment, not without luxury—εὐφραίνου, be merry, finally, not simply to content and merriment again, but to abiding repose in false confidence, as Luther has it—Be of good cheer, there is no more need! The ease he might have much more easily obtained before; and, whether rich or not rich, might have eaten and drunken. If we go on to ask him, once and again—and then? When the years have all revolved, and time with thee is ended?—what follows? So far onwards he will not carry his thought, and the foolish colloquy with his own soul dispels and banishes all such reflections. "Soul, thou hast"—is it really and truly having? Much goods—true goods indeed?—Laid up—actually insured against robbery, fire, and what else? For many years—but hast thou a store of years, too, laid up in thy barns? His folly was fourfold: he forgot the Giver; appropriated all to himself; counted these things the food of his soul; and thought not of the daily possibility of death. Thus did his soul repose in mammon, as if that was the security of his life! But his poor soul is not at rest, and is not full of confidence; hence he must exhort and encourage it. The Lord makes evident reference in these piercing sayings to Ecclus. xi. 17–19* (see in the Greek), which entire passage lays the foundation of this parable. Such people think of their souls in the spirit of Wisd. ii. 1–9, indeed scarcely going so far; but they shall to their terror find out what the soul of a man really is and must ever be.

Verse 20. God said—how impressively is this contrasted with his words just before spoken to himself! And unto him! which was either a forewarning presentiment of coming death, or may only mean—God said unto him by the fact, God's decree was—Thou must die! Both harmonise together; for the reference to this night (instead of the many years) intimates the former, while the ἀπαιτοῦσιν, "shall be required" (literally, they demand), brings death into the immediate present. That which God says, is done! "O thou fool, who didst forget both Me and thyself, with all the wisdom of thy thrifty plans!" Comp. Psa. xlix. 11 and Jer. xvii. 11. Thy soul is required—not by a gracious summons; but God, the Lord and Judge of thy life, plucks it from thee, and hurries it away. (Job xxvii. 8, יִשָּׂא which does not stand there for יִשְׂאֵל.) But God sendeth to that end His messengers, ἀπαιτοῦσιν being, in a passage so significant, scarcely to be taken impersonally (comp. ver. 48)—they, whom thou, O fool, also wert ignorant of, My ministers appointed to that end; see Job xxxiii. 22. We are taught again in Luke xvi. 22 that angels have to do with the dying of mortals. They require thy soul of thee, that soul which thou didst shut up in thy barns, which thou didst think happy, and which, belonging to Me and not to thee, thou hast corrupted and ruined! Thou art responsible to Me for it; comp. once more, the expression of Wisd. xv. 8, τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ἀπαιτηθεὶς χρέος, "when his life which was lent him shall be demanded." The curtain falls upon that other "life" which awaits such a soul; and the discourse returns to the goods and possessions, in all their insufficiency to help—"which thou hast provided; provided, indeed, and collected together, but not for thyself, even as thy fruits did not grow for thee. Whose shall they be, in opposition to all the I, and the my, and the having, of thy vain words?"

Verse 21. Most highly emphatic is the fearful reference to eternity in—So is it! expressed by a simple οὕτως. The following words resolve themselves into a twofold contrast. The mere θησαυρίζειν or treasuring implies a labor and a care which after all leaves the gathered goods in the barn out of myself; πλουτεῖν, being rich, on the contrary, is an actual condition and possession of good; and the ordinary phrase πλούσιος, rich, used to designate this man in the beginning is now corrected—he was not in a true sense πλουτῶν, or wealthy. He who is truly rich, has his life from and in that which he possesses—and what kind of possession is that? The δόσις κυρίου or gift of God which remaineth with the godly, according to the profound parallel which Ecclus. xi. 17 once more affords. A man, however, can possess his God, strictly speaking, only when God possesses the soul which belongs to Himself, surrounds it, pervades it, and takes it into His own fulness; hence it is very significantly said πλουτῶν εἰς θεόν. "rich toward God;" not to be merely translated by erga, or as if the gathering for God were spoken of. The true πλουτῶν or rich man, believes, lives, loves, loses, and prays himself into his God, and thus he most superabundingly finds himself again; but he who heaps up treasures ἑαυτῷ, "for himself," obtains nothing whatever for himself; and more than that, loses himself and his soul to his rigid creditor. Thus die and perish many in the midst of their great possessions, instead of deriving from them life! Observe how profoundly the second contrast, between ἑαυτῷ and εἰς θεόν, brings out the difference between the real and the specious riches. And, finally, we should carry our thoughts beyond the external application of the parable, which remains in itself a similitude, and understand it of the self-seeking appropriation and heaping up of wise spiritual goods, stores of knowledge, virtue, and godliness (in which even the experiences of regeneration may again wither away). This truth, however, only hovers over our Lord's words, to be discerned by our thoughtful pondering; it was scarcely intended to be taught in the present connection, and will be further enforced at chap. xvi. 19.

Verses 22–30. How appositely does the Lord now repeat to his disciples this section of the Sermon on the Mount! He perfectly well knew what he had then said, but the μαθηταί or disciples who now surrounded him (never the Twelve merely, or any fixed and permanent circle), had probably not heard it from his lips —and wherefore should we hesitate to think that he would trouble himself to repeat it in their hearing? The great contrast—the heaping up treasures, and not being rich in God—leads by immediate transition to the exhortation, "Take heed, ye my disciples; ye should be rich in God, and not heap up treasures; that is, ye cannot serve God and Mammon!" Thus was Matt. vi. 24, brought to remembrance; but as most of our Lord's disciples were poor and not rich, here follows, as there, the warning against anxious care about the sustentation of life, and the clothing of the body. For it is the self-same heathenish worldly spirit which is both in covetousness and in care; it presents in both cases the same contrast with a believing contentment in what the Lord gives now, and will continue to give. Μὴ μεριμνᾶτε τῇ ψυχῇ ὑμῶν, "Take no thought for your life"—here at first the lower meaning of ψυχή and ζωή, soul and life, is taken up; but it does not therefore follow that in the previous parable only this meaning was intended. This time the ravens are mentioned, ver. 24; not so much as being birds of prey, useless and despised of men, but because of the proverbial use to which they had been put—God caring for their forsaken young (Job xxxviii. 41; Psa. cxlvii. 9). We have already noted that ἡλικία, vers. 25, 26, can refer only to the length of life; and this is confirmed here by the reference to the fool who was compelled to depart the self-same night. Τὰ λοιπά, "the rest," indicates everything besides this ἐλάχιστον, "least;" if it is not in our power to retain the spirit when God taketh it away (Eccles. viii. 8), even for a a span of time, assuredly it is not in our power to provide for the entire necessity of life, in its clothing and nourishment (τὰ πάντα, Acts xvii. 25), which is to be understood as necessarily to be provided by Him who gave the life itself. (See on p. 103, our comment on the μετεωρίζεσθε, which here responds to the ἀναπαύου of ver. 19.) Even the heathen can recognize it as a naturally evident truth, that man doth not live of that which is in his hand, and that the life is more than meat; but the believing appeal to the Father who knoweth and who supplieth their need, and their seeking His kingdom, gives a new and higher assurance and ground of argument to the children of God.

Verses 31, 32. These consequently receive, from this point onwards, directions as to the disposition of mind which becomes them; in contradistinction to the covetousness and care against which the Lord had warned them. That disposition is heavenly-mindedness, which fixes the eye and the heart only upon the kingdom of God, the gift of the Father (vers. 31–34)—watchfulness as the true prudence and care, to preserve this inheritance and gift (vers. 35–40) —consequently fidelity in the dispensation of the intrusted possessions of grace (increasing by being dispersed), which forms the final and perfect contrast with the συνάγειν τὰ ἀγαθὰ εἰς ἀποθήκας, bestowing goods in barns (vers. 42–48), persisting in unwearied warfare with the world (vers. 49–53). Down to ver. 34 we have still repetitions of the Sermon; although altering the connection of the words as they are found there, and adding a sentence, ver. 32, which so aptly completes the meaning of ver. 31, that we could not avoid observing, in p. 105, that probably Matthew had omitted it there. It is, at any rate, a retrospective allusion to ver. 4. Will He whose merciful good pleasure intends to give the kingdom—deny to its heirs their daily bread, and leave His little flock to hunger? This expression obviously points to nourishment and sustentation; but the μὴ φοβοῦ, fear not, extends further, and reminds them of the enemies who threatened their life, the wolves of ver. 4. The Lord in his majesty assumes the same tone to his people as Jehovah in the Old Testament, see e.g., Isa. xli. 10–14; but in that he calls it a little flock we have the New Testament assurance added—I am thy true, thy good Shepherd! Ποίμνιον or ποιμένιον, "flock," is not in itself a diminutive (as many incorrectly say); but the μικρόν, "little," is added, for it remains a truth, the remembrance of which should be mingled with all our assurance, that the number of those who aspire to the kingdom of heaven is few in comparison of the many (Matt. vii. 13, 14). Not the entire people, called by the name of Israel, receiveth the kingdom, but the little company, now oppressed in its midst! These few are, further, weak and defenceless in themselves, conquering by patience, exalted before God through their humility alone, and reckoned among His people—hence in Jer. l. 45 (where also עֲנִיַּת יְהוֹיָה previously) they are called צְעִירֵי הַצֹּאן, "the least of the flock," and in Zech. xiii. 7, הַצְּעִירִים, "the little ones." It may indeed be assumed that our Lord, alluding to these passages, intended further to intimate by the μικρόν, "little," that they are simply μικροί, or little ones, to whom the great δοῦναι ὑμῖν, "give you," remains an eternal promise. The ζητεῖν, "seek," ver. 31, is no fearful, and restlessly careful pursuit of the kingdom (like the ἐπιζητεῖν of the Gentiles, ver. 30), but the childlike acceptance of the kingdom already given of the Father: not forgetting with this, however, that it must be our entire and absolute good pleasure to give Him our whole heart; and, for the sake of the treasure in heaven, to renounce and forsake everything earthly, on which the heart's affections might hang.

Vers. 33, 34. That which, in Matt. vi. 19, was merely the prohibition of θησαυρίζειν, laying up treasure, appears here more emphatically as a commandment to sell τὰ ὑπάρχοντα, "what ye have," (ver. 15). As to the meaning of this requirement, see on Matt. xix. 21. We have often seen that selling, and giving alms of the produce, is, under certain circumstances, and always according to the measure of superfluity, a duty which must be literally fulfilled; having its deepest meaning, however, in the release of the heart from the devotion to worldly good, and in the subordination of all our substance to the purposes and services of love. The treasure in the heavens is the better capital which accumulates through good works wrought in faith and love, as is fundamentally explained in 1 Tim. vi. 17–19; the title of citizenship, and its actual possession in the heavenly kingdom. This is our sure and certain personal treasure, (ver. 34), in contradistinction to all earthly goods, lent for a season, and in due time to be taken away.

Verses 35–38. Further and further does the Lord proceed beyond the occasion which gave rise to his discourse; in order to show to his disciples what habit of mind must ever be cultivated by them, if they would attain unto life—anticipating parables, which, as Matthew gives them to us, have their most appropriate place at the conclusion of all his discourses. The preliminary general exhortation, vers. 35, 36, he here grounds upon a promise to the faithful, vers. 37, 38, and warning to those who forget the end and aim of all, vers. 39, 40. The essential requisites are watching and working, both in their union and mutual influence. The burning lights (a slight prelude of Matt. xxv. 1) are the hearts or eyes fixed in the simplicity of love and faith upon the Lord; the clear and unqualified aim of the whole soul, in the light of life, which thinks of nothing but eternal life: see further on Matt. vi. 22, 23.* The girded loins correspond here to the whole body or conversation there; pointing to zeal and diligence in good works, in connection with simplicity of the inward spirit—a figure very natural and frequent where flowing garments were worn, as e. g., Jer. i. 17; and referred also to the inner man, 1 Pet. i. 13, Eph. vi. 14.† But here the burning of the lights, and the girding of the loins for action, are already presupposed; and the exhortation runs—Relax not the girdle of your diligence, suffer not your lights to be extinguished, until your Lord cometh! And now there is a transition from the Father in heaven to Christ, who is the Shepherd of his flock, the Lord of his servants, the Bridegroom of his faithful ones—preparing for them a marriage-feast in the bliss of eternal fellowship with himself. All these several presentations and aspects of the same truth are concisely blended together, one running into the other in a manner which presupposed among his immediate disciples a prepared intelligence; and that the Lord himself is speaking out of the amplitude and depth of his stores of instruction for his chosen people. Therefore the ἀναλύειν ἐκ τῶν γάμων, "return from the wedding," must be understood of a feast generally, after which the Lord requires the attendance and service of his servants; yet not without an intimation in the background to the effect that it is no less than a marriage-feast. The ἐκ, "from," which is here in apparent contrast with Matt. xxv., maintains its specific significance, when we remember that this marriage-feast begins in its glorious preparation long before the consummation of its perfect joy; that it is, in a certain sense, celebrated already in heaven, from which the Lord comes back to his waiting servants. He would only find them waiting and watching; having sustained the test, they shall be servants no longer, but shall all together be translated into the wedding-guests of the superabundantly merciful Lord; and then, more than that, become the Bride of his love and his joy! Yet does the majesty and the holy righteousness of their Lord require that they approve their worthiness, by faithfully watching awhile for him, that when he cometh and knocketh, they may εὐθέως, "immediately," open; for when the hour of decision has come, be it in the second or the third watch (he seems as if waiting himself!), he waits not a moment longer, not even while the garments are being set in order, or the lights trimmed. Thus those servants only are blessed, whom their Lord shall find watching in longing and patience;* but they shall be transcendently and inconceivably honored by their Lord! With a solemn Ἀμὴν λέγω ὑμῖν, "Verily, I say unto you," he gives them a promise which we may compare with that glorious one in Rev. iii. 21, scarcely knowing which of them is the greater; and concerning which some one has said—Let no man contemplate it but when clothed in the profoundest humility. As among men a bridegroom might, among his assembled guests, in the fulness of his joy, do them more than the honor absolutely required; and as in the heathen Saturnalia the masters were wont to minister to their servants, so will Christ in his own person wait upon us at his heavenly table! If our waiting for his coming has required us in any degree to fast, what abundant compensation for every abstinence is this eating and drinking in the kingdom of God! The Lord will, as a servant, gird himself (ver. 35, chap. xvii. 8), will come forth to them in the zeal of his all-devoting love; just as Stephen saw him standing up from his throne to welcome his first beloved martyr. He hath already served us, ever since he took upon him the form of a servant; he is continually serving us in long-forbearance, putting on our garments and washing our feet —else should we find it hard to believe what he here saith. But then at length he will most perfectly serve us, pouring out all the long-restrained fulness of his heart's affection, and giving us the final and most unreserved proofs of his love to his own, as our Shepherd and our Host; παρελθών, "come forth," too, that is, turning to each in the great company, devoting himself entirely to every individual one. The washing of the feet in John xiii. was a type and earnest of this; even as every renewal of his holy supper is a prelude and prophecy of that heavenly feast (Rev. iii. 20; xix. 9) whereof it is said—Eat, O friends, drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved! Cant. v. 1.

* The plural lights, which simply belongs to the plural address, has been made by Braune to indicate "the several energies of body and soul;" but this is a very inapposite idea, for each individual has but one light—one aim, one eye, one heart.

† Lisco's negative idea, that of removing all obstacles, is very impoverished. There is in the expression the strong positive notion of readiness for all earnest work.

* Braune beautifully says: Patience makes longing mighty, gives it strength, and saves it from being overstrained; longing makes patience watchful, and saves it from growing torpid. Without this longing, patience would enervate the servant; without the patience, his longing would fret and corrode him.

Verses 39, 40. See Matt. xxiv. 43, 44. Olshausen very needlessly and incorrectly refers the οἰκοδεσπότης, "good man of the house," to the representative of all unbelievers, the ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, "ruler of this world;" for this warning, too, is addressed to the called and believing servants of Christ. The servant, as being installed under-lord or οἰκονόμος, "steward," ver. 42, is at the same time master of the house in his own appointed domain: this is the obvious reason for the change in the expression. The gracious Lord and Bridegroom represents himself as coming like a thief upon the possessor of all false and unwarranted goods, upon him who holds his natural or spiritual possessions in unrighteousness: taking away from the unfaithful and corrupt servants that which he had given them.* This it imports you to know—such is the fundamental idea of the whole saying as it warns his servants against all ἀφροσύνη, or thoughtlessness.†

And now Peter interrupts the Lord by asking him, whether he spoke these things to them as disciples, or to the whole of the people, as being the covetous sinners upon whom the Judge would come as a thief. Many think that he intended to make a distinction between the Twelve and the rest of the disciples, announcing that the honor promised in ver. 37 could only be the prerogative of the Apostles. However, even if τὴν παραβολὴν ταύτην, "this parable," refers to the entire discourse, and Peter is thinking of a distinction and preference, yet the essential difficulty which occasioned his question could only apply to the last-mentioned and doubtful threatening of vers. 39, 40 (involving a new similitude of the thief); and the distinction between πρὸς ἡμᾶς, "to us," and πρὸς πάντας, "to all," may most simply be referred to the several applications of the Lord's words to the disciples or to the people, as obviously exhibited in vers. 1, 15, 22, 24. Peter deems the threatening of instant judgment too strong for disciples who had once been made true believers, at least as they seem to be addressed to them pre-eminently or even exclusively as servants; hence he only ventures to ask—Or even, or also, to all?

Verses 42–48. The Lord answers only indirectly, giving back the question, and leaving the reply to the consciousness which every one of them had of his own position and state—"Who then is such?" On the repetition of the whole discourse in Matt. xxiv. 45—51, this same formula is retained in their remembrance, and that deep meaning in it brought out which indeed is not undiscernible here—"Who then is such?" This is the true and supremely important question; and not every one even of you, my disciples, can give the joyful response —"I am he, the faithful and prudent steward!" The Lord grants to his Apostles that there is a distinction among his servants, that there are many who are set over others; but in the case of all such he only makes their responsibility the more rigorous. We cannot admit, with Braune, that, on account of the people, and to obviate misunderstanding, our Lord only indefinitely explained himself upon this premature question: to us the indirect answer seems definite enough. On the double notion of faithful and wise, see in Matthew, where the οἰκονόμος, "steward," is called only a δοῦλος, "servant;" but here we must regard the οἰκονόμος as the true intermediate idea between the Lord, ver. 39, and the servant, ver. 37. He who is faithful knows and keeps it well in mind, that he is, as a steward, only a more responsible servant, that he must diligently execute all his Lord's commission with respect to his house; the unfaithful steward, on the contrary, plays the master himself. Further, in Matt. xxiv. 48, that wicked servant is another than the faithful and wise one; but here, in order to answer the somewhat over-confident question of Peter by a more severe warning, he is the same who has apostatised into a wicked character; for ἐκεῖνος, "that," ver. 45, cannot possibly refer back to the οἰκοδεσπότης, "good-man of the house," of ver. 39, but indicates him who had been set over the men-servants and maidens, over the θεραπεία. Upon the διχοτομεῖν, "cutting in sunder," as upon all the rest, see our remarks upon Matthew—it is obvious that the ἄπιστοι, "unbelievers," here are those who have been unfaithful, but with an intimation that they are to be similarly punished, at least, as those who have been from the beginning unbelievers. This is the first answer to the question; then immediately follows a second, more severe—If ye, my servants and stewards, should prove unfaithful, ye shall be punished not merely like all those who have been called but have refused to obey the call; your punishment shall be all the more severe on account of the graces and gifts which ye have received! This additional clause is peculiar here, and demands a few words of

* Thus ver. 39 belongs appropriately here; and is not, as Schleiermacher thinks, an incorrect interpolation.

† Not as Von Gerlach would correct the German Trans.—Das aber wisset ihr ja—ye know it, but look well to it. We must admit that the Lord may come to his servants even as a thief.

explanation. It is the reverse side of the benediction pronounced in John xiii. 17. The distinction between knowing and not knowing refers, primarily, like the question, ver. 41, to that between the disciples and the people; then, prophetically, to that between Christians and Heathen; further, to Christian teachers more highly instructed and so-called common and ignorant people; and finally, with more and more restriction, to all relations to which it may be applied.* Ἑτοιμάσας, "prepared," without ἑαυτόν, "himself," appears to point back to the parable, where those who waited for their Lord were required to have all things ready for him; but in its strict meaning it indicates the preparation of the heart, the readiness of the individual himself (comp. ver. 40, γίνεσθε ἕτοιμοι). Δαρήσεται πολλάς or ὀλίγας (suppl. πληγάς, according to classical usage as pointed out by Grotius), "shall be beaten with many, few stripes," refers to the law of Moses, Deut. xxv. 2, where it was appointed, with typical allusion to a deeper meaning, that the offender should be beaten according to his fault—כְּפִי רִשְׁעָתוֹ בְּמִסְפָּר. The offender also who, μὴ γνούς, "knew not," is yet not dismissed without punishment, but receives the ὀλίγας, "few stripes;" his ignorance being not without its own lesser guilt, is also pretypified in the law of Moses, Lev. v. 17. Just as every natural man should know, even of himself, the righteous requirements of God (see afterwards ver. 57, and comp. Rom. i. 19, 20, 32, ii. 14, 15, as also Prov. xxiv. 12); so especially must there be presumed in the case of every servant called, a certain knowledge of the will of his Lord. If any one has received this in a higher measure than another, and yet has lost it again through the folly of unfaithfulness, or the idleness of neglect, it will not avail him to plead μὴ γνούς, "knew not," before the judgment; that which was given will be rigidly required, of that which was intrusted to him a strict account will be demanded. The position of not knowing, may be attributed to one who has failed through lack of investigation and prayer; though he also is relatively guilty, since the perfect knowledge of his Master's will was within his reach. But it most literally applies in the case of him who knew not, and not through any fault of his own, the specially revealed will of the Lord; who, however, knew enough of it to bring him within the range of responsibility. Hence, to embrace this case with the rest, it is not assumed simply in his guilt that he did not according to his Lord's will, but—that he did commit things worthy of stripes. The concluding sentence assures us generally, that in the preliminary times of doom and severance which will precede the final judgment, the Divine righteousness will admeasure condemnation as well as blessedness, in degrees strictly corresponding to desert.

And now, after having warningly exhorted his own to heavenly-mindedness, watchfulness, and fidelity, the Lord proceeds to establish the grounds of this last, in words which he places in close connection with the earlier discourse, vers. 1–4. He refers to the impending conflict between his disciples, followers, and confessors, and the opposing world; in order definitely to point out to them how absolutely needful their fidelity would be. He first exhibits his own example; his own course through a baptism of sufferings in order to the kindling of the living and life-giving fire; that thus his followers may encourage and strengthen themselves in him, upon whom so heavy a burden had been laid. He then repeats some part of the instructions given to the Apostles, Matt. x. 34–36; thus taking up the thread of discourse where it had been broken off at ver. 9.

Verses 49, 50. The meaning of this profound utterance of our Saviour's heart has been almost universally missed, and its force destroyed, by the unwarranted connection which has been established between the fire and the contention and division mentioned afterwards. That which our Lord declares to be the most essential, unconditional design of his coming, before he makes reference to the restraint yet imposed upon him until it was accomplished; that end which he elsewhere always declares to be to save the world, and which he here so intensely desires to hasten, must necessarily be something essentially good and unmixed with evil, which was to be brought down from heaven to the earth—an intimation this last which must have its force. He places this heavenly fire in full contrast with, and opposition to, the waters of his overpowering sufferings which would engulf him in anguish and death; that fire, consequently, is in itself—just as the Lord longs to see it kindled—by no means "a fire of disquietude, alarm, contention, and great change," not a "distinction of the old, that the new might be established on its ashes"—indeed the separating and purifying influence of fire (Isa. iv. 4) is certainly not here the first and fundamental idea. The εἰ, "if," must certainly be understood as utinam, as a particle of desire, like the Heb. אִם; comp. Gen. xix. 42, xxii. 42, and often in the Old Test., e.g. Josh. vii. 7, Sept. for לוּ.* Consequently, this fire, which our Lord would so gladly see burning over all the earth, was

* It seems more natural thus to regard the proposition as proceeding from the universal, and applying itself in a more and more restricted sense, than conversely, as Alford says; who regards the saying as in its highest sense applicable to his Apostles and ministers, and having its application gradationally downwards. But the essential truth remains in both cases the same.

* Not with Schleiermacher (and the Eng. and Dutch Bibles)—"And what will I rather, if it be already kindled? Can I change or hinder the necessary course of things?" Neander similarly—"What more do I desire, if it burns? The aim of my operation upon earth is so far attained!" Euthymius: "τὶ πλεῖον θέλω ἐὰν ἀνηφθῇ; τὶ πλεῖον ἀναμένω ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ. But all this is inapplicable; for the Lord, in ver. 50, tells us that this fire does not yet burn, he has yet to endure much in order to it. Anxiety before it, and desire for it, are the complement of each other.

not yet burning; his baptism must first be consummated. Contention and persecution of the truth, however, already amply abounded; and that belonged, both in the case of the Forerunner and of his followers, rather to the baptism. What remained, then, to be waited for? What was this fire? The "all-quickening fire," as Novalis correctly says, which is opposed to the waters of death; the fire of the Spirit with which, according to the Baptist's early word, he was to baptize unto a new life; the Pentecostal fire in the pure sense of that word. That is the "fire of divine love which the Holy Ghost kindles in the hearts of all believers," the first traces of which are seen in Luke xxiv. 32, but the flame of which bursts forth in Acts ii.; according to the sentiment of Fricker's precious hymn, which sets the expositors right—"O dass doch bald dein Feuer brennte, du unaussprechlich Liebender!" (O that already thy fire burned, thou inexpressible Lover!) Most assuredly, when the light of truth becomes the quickening fire of love, it must approve itself to be a purifying, separating element, condemning and putting an end to all false life. But this condition of its operation is brought forward first in ver. 51; the discordant separation is by no means itself the fire, it is only the inevitable method and concomitant of its kindling and spreading; until "his sacred flame enlightens the whole of his father's house; the whole wide world being quickened, illumined, warmed, and set on fire of love; all souls universally glowing with the holy influence." The fire of life and love bursts forth out of the deep waters of the Redeemer's bitter crucifixion-baptism! (see on Matt. xx. 22). Here, as there, the Lord speaks of it as a sacred, mysterious counsel of the Father, to which he himself, for the sake of the world's salvation, must be subjected; but now there is mingled with it the utterance of a presentient foretaste of the final suffering, of that anxiety, now already begun, which was to be consummated in such profound anguish. This is a most impressive testimony, not only to a passio inchoata before the passio extrema, but also to the actual harmony and concurrence of both in the great, essentially one, redeeming passion. We must not allow this undeniable cry of lamentation, extorted from the human weakness of the God-man,* to be taken away by an incorrect translation, such as would make πῶς συνέχομαι mean —How am I pressed towards it, how greatly I long for it! For, the ordinary signification of συνέχεσθαι is altogether against this, indicating a pressure and disturbance of spirit,† an intense suffering on some account (from fear, hunger, sickness; see in the New Testament, Matt. iv. 24: Luke iv. 38, viii. 37; Acts xxviii. 8; and, indeed, Phil. i. 23); moreover, the whole sentence would then be a mere repetition of the former wish; and, finally and conclusively, the συνέχεσθαι or straitening by means of the τελεσθῇ, "be accomplished," is in itself indicated as a beginning of the βάπτισμα or baptism. Most appropriately does the Lord here utter an intimation, which, spoken aloud before all the people, would be in any degree intelligible to his nearest disciples only as concerning his own already inwardly beginning sufferings—just at this point, when he is inculcating the persistent stedfastness of all his followers against the enmity of the entire world.

Verses 51–53. The full explanation of this has been given in Matt. x. Where the fire of Divine love is kindled, and peace seeks to come down from above to the earth, this can only take effect, first of all, in connection with divisions, caused by the opposition of unbelieving men;* the Lord foresaw all this, and it was indeed his own will, since his peace could be attained only by means of this warfare. Let them cry out against the fire of the Holy Ghost, and bring the same water to quench it which they poured upon his own head—they will not succeed in extinguishing the work of God generally upon earth, nor will they do any other harm to the faithful, who abide in the fellowship of Christ, than to bring them through their cross, Matt. x. 38, to a resurrection unto victory.

Verses 54–57. The Lord had now been speaking many things to his disciples, his words stretching far onwards to the final day of account when he should come back for his servants (after the departure therein presupposed); and he had further indicated the present time, since he had come now first, and in which the διαμερισμός, or division, between his disciples and his enemies was beginning to take effect (not without appeal to the people's decision)—as the beginning of the ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν, from henceforth, of a continuous conflict. All this the μυριάδες (myriads), ver. 1, might have heard, and something of it understood; but at the conclusion he naturally returns to this people again, and gives them, on their part, the result of the whole warning and exhortation, as it affected themselves. Concerning the wisdom of remaining stedfastly faithful to the end, and thus avoiding condemnation, he could speak only to his disciples and servants; but concerning the same wisdom, in thinking of that future condemnation, and thus, by pondering, avoiding it, the wisdom which would at least effect the beginning of a separation for the kingdom of God, he can speak to all the people. Whosoever only will, may and should come over from the multitude into the little flock; may discern the signs of that time in which the kingdom had made its first entrance; and in his own con-

* This Neander acknowledges as "the first trace of Christ's soul-conflict in the near approach to his death."

† It is even the technical word for constriction in breathing. Schleiermacher has "oppression."

* The number five in ver. 52, or rather the division into two against three (with majority on the one side), has a proverbial character. But we cannot hold, with Sepp, that the five is alluded to as the number of imprecation in the East (for they are not all five placed under a malediction); nor find a prophetic reference, with Lange, to the five confessions in the household of the church.

science so voluntarily judge himself as to see the necessity of seeking grace while it was offered. Thus we clearly perceive the internal connection of this concluding word with all that had been spoken before. There are repetitions which the Lord utters according to his own deep-laid plan, for purposes of specific conviction. First, we have a reference to the signs of the time; taken, with variation in the expression, from Matt. xvi. 2, 3, where ver. 6, the Lord warned the disciples, as here ver. 1, against the leaven of the Pharisees: we thus see that he, at the same time, carries back his discourse to its original strain, before the appeal about the inheritance had interrupted it. "In earthly things ye are wise and prudent enough; wherefore do ye not also of yourselves judge (without arbiters, taking good note whence the life of man truly comes) what it would be right for you to do in this great time of grace?" That is, in order to obtain their rights in another process, and one infinitely more momentous than any concerning earthly inheritance—against the adversary; and thus to escape the impending arrest of the divine justice!

When the people in Judæa saw the cloud, according to its usual course, coming up from the west or from the sea (1 Kings xviii. 44), they might safely predict that a shower was coming: when the first traces of the south wind were felt, they could prognosticate heat (Job xxxvii. 17), and so it came to pass. The Lord now, as in Matt. xvi. 3, grounds an appeal to the hypocrites upon this: they could seize and rightly interpret the external appearances of earth and heaven, but their profound insincerity of heart, and wilful misapprehension of divine things, permitted them not to mark the signs of the time which his coming had introduced! The parallel with Matthew, the reference to ver. 1 of this chapter, and the uniformly consistent meaning of ὑποκριτής, "hypocrite," throughout the New Testament (see again chap. xiii. 15), alike forbid us to accept the refinement which would on this special occasion adopt the fundamental meaning of the word, as it occurs in Lucian's ὑποκριτὴς ὀνείρων—as if our Lord would half-ironically say, "Ye critical judges and discriminators of signs!" Hypocrisy is ever, indeed, the first leaven, the πρῶτον ψεῦδος, or initial falsehood, which stands in the way of man's perception and acknowledgment of the truth. The Lord had only taken his illustration from the clouds and winds of heaven (already as similitudes of the tempest of judgment and heat of tribulation); but now he makes his words more general, and adds the (yet more obvious, and therefore first mentioned) face or appearance of the earth—in connection with which we may refer to the reckoning of the harvest weeks, John iv. 35, and the like. "Ye know how to test these things; how or wherefore are ye so foolish as not to discriminate and test this time? Why but because ye are hypocrites, and will not!" This time, the time of God's gracious visitation (ch. xix. 44); the manifest tokens of which have constrained the people's voices to join with the voice of God, in crying—God hath visited His people! chap. vii. 16, i. 68. The Lord points further, to all those signs of the time, concerning which see on Matt. xvi.; but especially here to the βιάζεσθαι, or forcing, of the kingdom of God, which was made manifest in the warfare that had broken out, and mentioned just before, vers. 51–53. Can, then, the natural understanding, for the sufficiency of which this text has been strangely enough cited, test these things, and discern what is right? Assuredly—but, first of all, only when a revelation of God in its signs lies obviously before it (for that is the question here); and, secondly? Alas! it might and it should, indeed; but it cannot and it will not, for the most part, because of other reasons which the Lord here bewails, discloses, and rebukes; it does not draw the simple and necessary deduction from the plainest and most indubitable premises, because—the sinner does not conscientiously use his reason, and will not of and in himself judge that which is right! This is the profound, and appropriate meaning of the following verse as it is uttered in this connection. Ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν (by no means merely, as Lange thinks—from your own private relations) obviously means, first of all, of yourselves, as in chap. xxi. 30, so that not even signs and wonders should have been needful; but the reason why I of myself should discern and judge myself aright, lies only in this, that I have in myself, in the protest of my conscience against my sin, the standard of divine truth; the herald of repentance when repentance is required of me, the announcer of grace when grace is preached to me. Thus the deep truth is just as Luther's gloss gives it—"Can you see how it goes with the creatures, and why do you not see what is wanting in yourselves?" Alas! indeed, he who sees that, and desires to see it without hypocrisy, is (as Oetinger says) "the true philosopher, who learns that which is right in his own person." Only take note (ver. 15); admit the great need of your own poor souls, which can derive life from no other possession than the proffered grace, which, when laid hold of in faith, makes it rich towards God! Take note, before all things, that ye have actually no right before God; so that ye may, while in the way with him, and before hell closes your course, obtain justification and peace.

Verses 58, 59. Here we find the confirmation of what we have before remarked upon this saying as it is reproduced here from the Sermon on the Mount—that it is here generalised beyond its specific meaning there, and, as it were, spiritually explained. The mere reference to placability as towards a brother with whom I may have matter of litigation, would not be a distinctive conclusion of this discourse—albeit it was occasioned by the contention of the brothers about their inheritance—and would be an inexplicable subsidence of the strain of it into a matter quite foreign to vers. 55–57. But the here intensified judicial expressions (the Latinism δὸς ἐργασίαν, da operam, probably a Roman legal formula; as also κατασύρειν and πράκτωρ, the officer, executor), induce us to suppose that the Lord designs to exemplify, by the complainant against his fellow-creature in the court of law, the guilt of want of love generally which cries out against the sinner before the presence of God. Thus is exhibited in this ἀντίδικος, "adversary," the accusing Moses or the law, which "often personally, as it were, comes forward in the heart of man" (Braune); and the Lord stringently urges upon all the necessity of seeking the mediation of grace to interpose and prevent the impending condemnation, before the time runs out, and nothing remains but that eternal prison-house in which all the loveless, covetous, contentious parties alike come to everlasting harm.* With respect to this comparison and relation between God and men, the Father hath appointed his Son to be arbiter and mediator: happy they who make their appeal to him, knowing in themselves what they themselves come short in!

THREATENING APPEAL TO THE IMPENITENT, OCCASIONED BY THE REPORT OF PILATE'S INJUSTICE.

(Luke xiii. 2–9.)

There were present* at that time some who had failed to mark what in themselves demanded their own judgment and condemnation; and thus came into collision with our Lord, like that covetous man, ch. xii. 13, or that woman, ch. xi. 27. Such were the hearers who listened to his words! These had in their thoughts an occurrence which had recently taken place, and had been much talked of, in Jerusalem (as the article περὶ τῶν shows); and when the Lord ends his discourse by the threatening of the eternal prison of condemnation, they begin their hasty account of a fearful crime which the abominable Pilate had once more committed. It is probable that they did not relate this as a mere novelty (to come to something new); but they told him, presuming that he knew it not, and as in some sort connected with his word just spoken as they had interpreted it, how the governor of Judæa (ch. iii. 1) had caused the blood of certain Galilæans to be miserably and shamefully shed in the midst of their sacrifices; they not being under his jurisdiction (see ch. xxiii. 7–12), and the act being in express contravention of the stipulations which forbade him to bring soldiers into the temple. By this they would say—"Dost thou call that a δίκαιον, or "right" act, or should we not condemn such an atrocity? Is not that a sign of this time, in which the oppressed people of God suffer so many things from the Gentiles? And what sayest thou to this, thou who assertest thyself to be the Messiah and the Redeemer of God's people from the hand of their enemies?" What he has to say, is very different from what they supposed or desired. He avoids all interference with political matters, now as he had ever done, with as much strictness as he had declined all intermeddling with matters of inheritance; for he is set, not to be the Judge of the Romans, but the Judge of the sins of Israel. He does not even take the sacrifices into consideration, so as to enter into the question of Pilate's terrific desecration of holy things, and of his guilt in mingling the blood of the victims of his own tyranny with the blood of the victims offered to God. He immediately seizes this account of the lamentable murder, or rather execution, in the temple, as occasion for that which concerned his office; he turns it to a threatening summons to all the impenitent, to whom such events as this should be no more than appeals for penitence, and types of coming judgment. His answer has two complementary parts. First, a plain and literal threatening of general destruction to all who do not repent; connecting this for Galilee with the report they had brought (vers. 2, 3)—and reminding them himself of another similar for Jerusalem (vers. 4, 5). But then graciously follows in his condescension a new challenge to the repentance which alone can save—in an affecting parable, which exhibits long-suffering as an argument to humiliation, and which makes the transition from the people as a whole to every individual (vers. 6–9).

Verses 2, 3. Suppose ye! Thus does he assail in his first word the foolish hearts of the narrators, specifically humbling and casting them down; suddenly passing from all that they calculated on hearing, to the piercing application to themselves. It was their will that Pilate alone should have received our Lord's condemnation; they had not considered whether, and how far, these Galilæans themselves had sinned against others; and whether they, on the other hand, had not offered themselves as victims of tyranny, and made themselves martyrs of God's service.†

* For that is the meaning of παρῆσαν here, and not "came thither," like προσῆλθον, ver. 31. Further, the ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ καιρῷ (which is different from ἐκείνῳ, Matt. xii. 1, xiv. 1) in connection with this expression, is not to be taken in so "indefinite" a sense as such formulæ generally are. Alford thinks my connection too fine-drawn, but I can retract nothing here. He has no proper ground for his own remark, that there is no such connection at all.

* Neander's interpretation, "the Messiah would appear against them as a complainant," forgets the declaration of John v. 45.

† Braune misses the meaning when he assumes that these narrators of the outrage themselves concluded the specific guilt of these Galilæans, and

But the Lord's severe and convincing language presupposes against their will what they, according to their own style of arguing, should have thought of—that these Galilæans (in the general turbulent spirit of their whole community) must necessarily have committed some outrage themselves, or involved themselves in some outbreak, which gave occasion to Pilate's wrathful command that they should be slain wherever they might be found, even though in the act of sacrificing in the temple. Thus, looked at externally, they might appear to have been sinners beyond others whom these things befell not; but even this supposition of their guilt instead of Pilate's, though more correct in itself, he does not admit as right; but tells them instead —Such are ye all, fundamentally! This is a holy example of the manner in which the blinded world should ever be answered, and its condemnatory rates of others' judgments be applied to itself. Being sinners and suffering according to desert—this is the great point which all alike must attend to, which must be eternally and unwearyiedly held up to their averted eyes. Although the Lord desires that at every time, and in every particular case, proportionate punishment should be inflicted on specific guilt; yet he maintains in all cases the connection of suffering with sin. Consequently—"If ye repent not, ye will all suffer what your sins deserve, that is, in like manner, proportionately, perish! This is what I, your righteous Judge and compassionate Saviour, have to say to you impenitent sinners, on your way to judgment, if ye must have my sentence upon these things —nothing more than that ancient word μετανοεῖν, repent, which you are so unwilling to hear." They knew very well what this meant —these hypocrites, who would not, in this time of mingled ruin and salvation, judge ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν, of themselves, this δίκαιον, or "right" thing; just as afterwards in Hades it is enforced from the conscience of the rich, luxurious son of Abraham. "If ye be not converted, the sword of God and not merely Pilate's is at hand"—see Psa. vii. 13, and the like preaching in all the prophets. The Lord also speaks as a Prophet, when he says ὡσαύτως, likewise—this not being, as many think, stronger than ὁμοίως, in like manner, in ver. 5, but the reverse; by this latter expression he afterwards makes prominent the similarity of the judgment impending over all in its external manifestation, while ὡσαύτως belongs more generally to the strongly emphasized ἀπολεῖσθε (ye shall suffer your punishment like these), not however without pointing prospectively to what subsequently happened. The Galilæan people were also destroyed by the Roman sword, and, in consequence of their persistent obstinate spirit of insubordination, for the most part during the passover sacrifices at Jerusalem.

were disposed to condemn them rigorously; for such an assumption is highly improbable, when we take into account the tendency at that time to regard with favor every insurrection against the Romans.

Verses 4, 5. "Not Pilate, whose tyranny ye protest against, did those things which ye suffer, but God, who in manifold ways warns sinners by types and earnests of coming judgment." This is the meaning of what our Lord now himself relates, or brings to their remembrance—the well-known falling of that tower upon the wretched eighteen, whom it slew. This means to say—The one is just like the other, whether Pilate or a falling edifice, the hand of man or so-called accident, all is by the hand of God (Amos iii. 6). However various in the kind and degree of their guilt these eighteen might be, yet are they hurried away with an equal doom of the Divine judgment, the depths of which, as dealing with individual men, man cannot penetrate. Thus much is certain—they were guilty before God; but now beware of thinking that the special doom or suffering of these eighteen indicates a specific and greater guilt! (Comp. now, what is incorrectly quoted upon the former instance, John ix. 2, 3.) It has already been remarked that the Lord now turns from the Galilæan people to the dwellers in Jerusalem. We know no more what kind of building this πύργος or "tower" was,* than we know of the particulars of this downfall: if we bring the wall of the pool שִׁלֹחַ, Neh. iii. 15 (which is the same, indeed, with שִׁלֹחִ) into comparison (both rendered "Siloah") we might regard it as a proper tower, and admit the probability of the assumption that those imprisoned by the Sanhedrim were confined there. This, at least, furnishes an apt parallel with the case of the Galilæans: in both instances they were liable to punishment; in the former they had fallen under the sword of the government, in this they were overtaken by the anticipating judgment of God, reinforcing the judgments of men. Ὀφειλέται (debtors), too, instead of ἁμαρτωλοί (sinners), seems to point the same way, if it does not merely contain an allusion to ch. xii. 58, 59. The ὁμοίως, likewise, in this latter case, was yet more strikingly fulfilled in history: the inhabitants of Jerusalem perished under the downfall of the temple and the city together upon the whole mass of the guilty (see Amos ix. 1); their Babel-tower slew those who were lusting after a false freedom, as the guilty prisoners of God's justice; even as finally the fabric of the universe will fall around mankind, and in his death the tabernacle of his body falls upon every individual man.

Verses 6–9. "But ye have not all thus perished yet; ye live by the longsuffering of God, which leadeth you to conversion; your Lord yet leaves you a term of grace wherein He waiteth for the fruits of repentance." The fig-tree has been generally, and without sufficient examination, made to correspond with the πάντες, "all," the entire people of Israel; and to this view Matt. xxi. 19, and xxiv. 32 have seemed to conspire. But it is not difficult to reconcile all these passages, by supposing Matthew's predominant reference to have been to the people generally, and here to the individual as involved in that. We are disposed to admit that the Lord takes his allusion from the figure employed for Israel in Joel i. 7; that this originated the specific fig-tree, and that in a certain sense he does include the whole nation, as the three years' coming and seeking (about which more hereafter) indicates. But withal we must maintain that the whole is only represented by the individual, and that the Lord thus makes a transition to every ἁμαρτωλός, sinner, and ὀφειλέτης, debtor, among the people, thus more severely singling them out. This alone seems adequately to respond to the awakening and heart-searching tendency and scope of the whole discourse, from the very beginning of which these yet living are opposed, as individually impenitent to those already condemned and cut down; the specialising eighteen, too, tending in the same direction. Moreover, it might fairly be asked what the vineyard would be, if the one fig-tree were in itself the whole of the nation. It cannot be alleged that the entire earth is represented here as the Lord's vineyard (although in Matt. xiii. 38, it is the field which is to be sown); and to regard this feature of the parable as only intimating that the fig-tree, the nation, was not standing in an open unsheltered waste, but abundantly cared for and protected, is too violent an outrage upon the uniform prophetical phraseology to be admitted. Then the vineyard is Israel, but the fig-tree (uniting the two prophetical symbols) is every individual example and illustration of the character of the whole; for as in another parable the one man not having on a wedding garment does not imply that all the rest had it, so does the singling out this unfruitful tree by no means intimate that all the other trees or vines were fruitful. The Lord so orders his words, that every man may immediately think of himself; and passes in his discourse from the cutting down of the unfruitful tree to the Sermon on the Mount and the Baptist's preaching.

* The word itself indicates any high building, like מִגְדָּל, see Matt. xxi. 33, and especially Luke xiv. 28; it might, therefore, be a "garden-house of some great man," in which a merry company were assembled—or anything else, for the expression in itself is quite indefinite. The description ἐν τῷ Σιλωάμ is highly obscure in consequence of the ἐν, but probably refers to a district or field, so called from the brook [like the modern village Selwân—Am. Ed.].

The other very usual error in the exposition of this parable, especially in the practical exposition of it, is that of regarding the dresser of the vineyard as being necessarily Christ, the interceding Mediator at the right hand of the righteous Father.* But in most of the parables which precede and which follow this, having the same character, Christ is the Lord; and is it not, similarly, He who is the certain man that had a fig-tree, in His vineyard? He is, indeed, the Lord whose coming is spoken of, who seeketh fruit, and whom the dresser appeals to with Κύριε, "Lord," as deeming the cutting down and condemning things altogether beyond his own province. Even if the three years are only regarded as a proverbial notation of any definite time (or, possibly, with some latent reference to the fact that after three years a tree would give certain indication whether or not it would ever bear fruit), yet even then the coming must refer to Christ alone; but, for our own part, we see no reason to deny the reference discerned by Bengel and others to the three years' teaching of Christ, the third year of which was now elapsing—and hence we find it said ἔρχομαι, "come," and not ἦλθον, came. That the intercession only required this one year to be waited for, while Israel had forty years of suspended judgment, does not affect the matter in the least, for the longsuffering here exhibited in its threatening limitation can now, as ever, surpass its own limits. Who then is the dresser of the vineyard? The definite article attached to this should not be taken as denoting any one single laborer in the whole vineyard, but simply associates with one tree one who cares especially for it: and we are firmly convinced that the Lord here, as in Matt. xxi. 33, means the guides and leaders set over the people; a view which brings out a very much overlooked precision and fulness in the parable. Thus it embraces the two ideas; that of the responsibility of every man for his own individual soul, and that of the responsibility of those appointed to watch over the souls of others. Their office is thus exhibited as in a glass to the pastors of the people; and in a manner all the more humbling to them, inasmuch as it exhibits, in the assumption of what this dresser had done, what it was their duty to have done to the souls committed to their care. Sore judgments falling upon sinners, such as those before alluded to, and hurrying them away without repentance, most significantly preach to the preachers, and say—Did they perish through your neglect? Have you done all that it was your duty to do to them? Thus the parable cries now as then—Seek, with all the earnestness of your souls, to save yourselves, and to save others, from coming judgment! He who would have less cause to be anxious about his own salvation, let him supplicate and labor for the souls entrusted to his care!* Finally, in the deepest undertone of this most pregnant figure, the meaning is evolved—Let every man be the keeper of his own soul, let every man pray for the extension of his own term of grace, that in it he may more diligently labor! If any man complains—"No man careth for my soul, to convert and do me good," it says to him—On that very account

* Many refer it even to the Holy Ghost (Lange in this agrees with Alford, who regards it as quite clear)—but this appears to us, in a parable so simple, addressed to the people, too hidden an allusion.

* I must hold to this interpretation, in spite of all protest. It is not irreconcilable with this, that the Lord elsewhere announces to the husbandmen their own coming condemnation; he here only humbles them by the exhibition of what should be the duty and diligence of a husbandman or dresser of his vineyard.

convert and mend thyself, labor as the dresser of thine own tree, which should be so precious in thy charge! This last lies deep in the urgency of the intercession, this unprofitable tree pressing heavily upon the heart, as well as in the application of the subsequent words—How can I myself cut it down, that is not for me to do.

This idea, however, is only in the background; the final ἐκκόψεις, "thou shalt cut down," (mark, not ἐκκόψω, I will cut down) is obviously the admission, enforced from the impenitent soul, of the Divine righteousness. The tree stands, like every one which is planted in God's vineyard, in its own good place, and has been abundantly cared for hitherto (at least by God himself through the abundant means of grace in his very fruitful hill, Isa. v. 1); on that account fruit is sought on it, the Lord asks concerning this tree which he has in his vineyard. If he says—I find none! it will avail nothing that we ourselves, or others, have held the leaves for fruit. But we must not prematurely refer this to the fruits of good works, before that first fruit of repentance is yielded, without which all other fruit is worthless. We see plainly that this first command to cut it down, against which intercession avails, is designed only to convince of guilt and to threaten deserved punishment—it is that laying of the axe to the root of the tree. Although unfruitfulness in itself is sufficient cause for cutting it down, the guilt of this unfruitfulness is increased by the significant remark that the barren tree absorbs uselessly the good of the land, is in the way of others' good—a theme ample in profit for the preacher. The digging about and dunging embrace all that may be done externally in God's appointed way by patient fidelity; the issue depends upon the internal good or evil nature of the tree itself; hence Luther's translation excellently advances to the interpretation—"Ob er wolle Frucht bringen," whether it will bear fruit—though this is not in the text. But if not—then even the voice of love can object nothing more to its being cut down.* It must not be overlooked, in our interpretation of this, that it is, indeed, only the voice of divine love and patience which is placed in the heart and upon the lips of the intercessor; just as it is only the grace of God which digs and dungs in the labor of his servants. It is a testimony of the Lord's patience, that the laborers thus intercede, that that they can thus in faithful anxiety interfere. But this very same love and fidelity deems at the end the cutting down righteous and necessary. Thus the loving-kindness which was exhibited after the severity of vers. 2–5, returns into severity again; indeed it is very significant that the parable ends with this warning tone, the Lord making no answer of assurance. That loving-kindness was plainly exhibited in vers. 3 and 5, and is not revoked; but as it regards the individual, whether or not a long year of grace might be supposed for the people, the thought must have arisen—Dost thou know how long thy day of grace will last? Hast thou received an answer, if thou shalt not this day be cut down?

The writer has been accustomed from the beginning of his ministry to adopt this section, Luke xiii. 1–9, as the Gospel for the annual fast-day (Rom. ii. 1–11 being the Epistle). In fact, the whole of the Gospels could not furnish one more appropriate for such a day; and we shall review it in this light, that we may mark the inexhaustible fulness of its contents, each particular of which, as it rises prominently before the mind, might be a yearly penitential subject. Everything is involved in it which a mission of repentance to a people demands: the turning away from political relations to the real amendment of the inner man in the sight of God; the rejection of all false lust of freedom which seeks man's good in external things, or would restlessly seek to help itself that way; the judgment pronounced upon all improper condemnation of others, and comparison between sinners, while all are guilty alike and will without repentance perish, though with repentance all may with equal certainty be saved; the subordination of all judicial inflictions of God and all calamities by him permitted, to the preaching of repentance to all who behold them; the reference to the people of the land as a whole, as also to every individual sinner counting as one in it; the solemn prospective glance at the doom of Israel as foreshadowing and typifying the judgments of Christendom; the plain and the parabolical words, the gentleness and the severity of God, the long-suffering tolerance (how many times already had it been said—Cut it down!), and the limits of the prescribed period of grace; the duty and the blessing of the cure of souls; the care for others imposed upon every one both as laborer and intercessor; and all the other gracious truths which will be found by every man's thoughts who shall diligently seek them.

* We must not add ἔτος once more to the εἰς τὸ μέλλον; the meaning is simply in posterum, like 1 Tim. vi. 19.

HEALING ON THE SABBATH; THE DAUGHTER OF ABRAHAM LOOSED FROM THE BONDS OF SATAN.

(Luke xiii. 12, 15, 16.)

There were, in the midst of the mass of the impenitent Jews, pious souls. This poor woman is probably one of them: for the Lord can hardly be regarded as calling her a daughter of Abraham simply in the carnal sense, or as one of the chosen people; and he says nothing to her about the forgiveness of her sins, or of her sinning no more. Further, the zeal of her devotion led her to the synagogue on the sabbath day; and, when her health was restored to her, she immediately before all the assembly glorified God with a full heart. Yet was she plagued of Satan, like Job, not for her punishment but for gracious test and discipline; there is not in the entire New Testament a single syllable which sanctions the idea that possession of the devil, or a delivery to a harmful power of Satan, must necessarily have been the result of specific guilt on the part of the sufferer.* On the contrary, many of those who are healed are at once right in their hearts with God; while those who are in a state of frenzy so-called, are often found on the retirement of the malady to have been by it and in it inwardly advanced. Her affliction was great, for the εἰς τὸ παντελές, "in no wise" (comp. Heb. vii. 25), notwithstanding its anomalous position, scarcely means to say that she could only not entirely lift herself and look up, but that she was so entirely bent down as not to be able to look up at all; and consequently, that in all probability she did not perceive the presence of Jesus. Therefore does he at once regard her with compassion, calls her to himself and heals her on the sabbath, doing the works of God from the unrestrained impulse of the love of God. With most majestic simplicity he only announces at first the fact—"Poor woman thou art loosed from thine infirmity, thine eighteen years are now ended—lift up thyself, for thou canst!" But, because her faith still required some instrumentality in the miraculous work, he lays his hands upon her—for that reason, and not for the sake of the act itself.

And now the ἀρχισυνάγωγος, "ruler of the synagogue," is indignant, for he is under the necessity of beholding once more that stereotyped matter of offence perpetrated before his eyes—the healing on the sabbath! Yet what can he do to show his vexation, full as he is of the spirit of caste and official dignity, though devoid of all sympathy with a good deed? He does not venture to address Jesus;* nor indeed the woman, for her glorious sabbath-thanksgiving to God repressed his direct indignation against her, by appealing to the latent good feeling of his nature. He therefore does as all men do who make indirect and covert attacks, avoiding the right object, and never venturing on the right word; he turns, in a manner almost ridiculous, to the whole innocent multitude, and preaches to them, though they had nothing at all to do with the matter, a strange, inconclusive, and most self-stultifying sermon. He begins, indeed, in a very stately manner, with an almost literal quotation from Exod. xx. 9, 10; but loses all sense of propriety at once, and knows not what he is saying afterwards. "In the six working-days come"—hither then, if they were sick? Thus the sick must rather on the sabbath day remain at home, and not come to the synagogue where the power of God might perchance give them healing? What then had the poor woman done, that he forbids all others to do the like in future? She did nothing on her own part, uttered no one word of supplication; she did no more than come forward at the Lord's bidding, and lift herself up, when she felt that she could. One hardly knows how to understand that wonderful imperative—On the sabbath day μὴ θεραπεύεσθε! whether—Be not made whole, or what? Thus the woman would be in duty bound to reply—No, Lord, this is the sabbath day, I am not yet loosed, tomorrow I shall be able to lift myself up, and praise the Lord! We see that the man has become, in his blind zeal, a very fool; he is constrained in his bitterness to allow the θεραπεύειν or "healing" of the wonderful power of Jesus, as ready to be exerted all other days of the week for all kinds of afflicted; but yet forbids to the people their θεραπεύεσθαι, or being healed, that is, their reception of God's grace, on the ground of its being an ἐργάζεσθαι or work!

It is on this account that the Lord spares him in the answer which he, though unaddressed, is constrained to give. He applies to him personally the epithet which befitted his whole class, ὑποκριτά, "hypocrite"†—but immediately extends his words (as in the former case) to all people generally in the synagogue, who shared the ruler's feeling. Consult what has been already said on Matt. xii. 11, 12 (Luke vi. 9), and compare Luke xiv. 5 ensuing; from which it will appear that in Luke alone we have three similar incidents, and analogous answers. But each of the three is characteristic and individual; the Lord in the present case naturally says nothing about the falling into a ditch, but merely refers to the loosing and leading away their cattle to watering; showing them that not one of those rigorous censors would deny to his own property, the cattle, the care which was daily necessary, because it was the sabbath; though even these two simple operations were much more like working than his laying a hand upon the sick, or than the θεραπεύεσθαι, being healed, on the part of the people. Closely and specifically laying hold of their common life and its customs, he casts down the folly of the ruler's reply by the reasonableness of his own; he justifies them in what they do to their cattle, not indeed on account of the self-interest which impelled these hypocrites so to act towards them, but because the law of God did not actually design that an ox or an ass should suffer thirst on the sabbath, after having been fed in its stall. These hypocrites might indeed, if they had been so rigorously in earnest about preserving the rest of the sabbath, have allowed their beast to wait, without endangering its life, till the first of the six days; or with a little trouble might have previously provided in another way for its watering. But such earnestness was not in their spirit. He therefore puts them to shame for their want of love towards man, and that their hearts were sealed against his Divine ἀγαθοποιῆσαι, or doing good. And in speaking of a daughter of Abraham (for he sees before his eyes an Israelitess indeed), he sets before them the strongest contrast with a mere animal; for such a prerogative, when a reality in the sight of God, was a very high dignity, comp. chap. xix. 9 and John i. 47. He knows at once, not without a divine intuition into all the circumstances, all that was here to be known, and all that it was right for him to say: the piety of the woman was obviously to be seen and heard of all; by a profounder knowledge he attributes the ἀσθένεια or "infirmity," by which the woman had become contracted or grown together, to a πνεῦμα or spirit, consequently to Satan in its ultimate cause;* and, finally, of the eighteen years he had been informed by no man. (The ἰδού contemplating the whole, comp. previously ver. 7, ἰδοὺ, τρία ἔτη, corresponds in the Sept. with the Heb. הִנֵּה, e.g., Deut. viii. 4; and brings out the years prominently, as well known to him, or as if they were written on the woman's person.) "Could it be forbidden to loose, if one could, a woman so frightfully bound, on the sabbath day? Do ye then acknowledge no necessities of charity besides the necessities of interest? Here is in very deed a work of necessity and a work of love!" He designedly and calmly concedes to their folly that his ἀπολέλυσαι, loosing, and the laying on of his hands, was a work; in order that he may thereby make his own acts of healing, thus placed in common with human actions generally under the law, types of all works of love which his followers may ever perform. The cold over-saintly ones might say, If she has been bound these eighteen years, surely she might wait yet one day longer! But that very circumstance he makes an argument of the contrary, for he who loves his neighbor as himself would rather say—Not one moment longer must she suffer, if help can be afforded her! Could it be forbidden thus to help? Οὐκ ἐδει, ought not, catechetically answers, in infinite condescension, the inconsiderate, proud, and unintelligent δεῖ, "ought," of ver. 14. Men ought was the theme there; so now the ought is abundantly returned—Ought not, must not she, according to the law of love, which specially ordains God's works for the sabbath as man's labor for the remaining days, be loosed from this misery? But when our Lord so specifically mentions the bond with which Satan had bound this woman, we think that the reason must not be merely sought in the comparison with the unbound cattle; but (as the Lord embraced all things in his penetrating glance, and ever contemplated man's spiritual relations to God) we apprehend that he secretly beheld in this συγκύπτειν, bent, and ἀνακύπτειν, made straight, a type of spiritual conditions. Satan, verily, has bound wretched man like an animal to his stall, so that he looks down to the earth; but Christ looses the bond, and lifts up man's face to praise his God once more. Happy is he who, after being loosed, needs no further leading; but spontaneously goes to the water of life for the abiding refreshment of his soul!*

* As we may constantly read now-a-days. Even Neander assumes that such conditions always proceeded from some moral disorder. But at the foundation of all this there lies a denial of the objective power of Satan, and a disposition to carry these cases as much as possible into the region of human physical nature.

* Schleiermacher—"He would seem as if he took no account of Jesus in what he says." This is not enough, or rather is saying too much.

† We do not prefer, with Bengel and others, ὑποκριταί, as if the ruler had not deserved the express designation. This plural might very easily have been a correction added to the ὑμῶν: the Peshito gives it in the singular—ܠܟ̇ ܒܪ̈ܝܫܐ; and we must suppose that the speaker, on the present occasion, would have one word, at least, immediately addressed to him.

* We pass over altogether what follows, Luke xiii. 18–21; since we cannot find any connection here for the repetition of these two parables, comp. p. 269. Schleiermacher agrees with Storr in referring this Ἔλεγε δέ to the preceding, as if the Lord thus continued to speak to the synagogue; but we confess that we perceive no connection. And it is hard to understand how this is an interpolation "giving the Evangelist's view;" that he is commenting upon the narrative of the healing, in these parables, and by way of appendix (as Lange thinks), appears to us a very artificial supposition. We would rather say—if the non liquet is thought inadmissible—that vers. 18–21 are an introduction to the following ver. 22: Thus did the Lord continue (after these his earlier parables) to sow the seed, and to hide his leaven. But even this does not satisfy us.

ANSWER TO THE QUESTION WHETHER THERE ARE FEW THAT BE SAVED: THE STRAIT GATE AND SHUTTING OUT OF MANY.

(Luke xiii. 24–30 [Matt. vii. 13, 14, 21–23, viii. 11, 12, xx. 16].)

This solemn question, addressed to our Lord while on his way to suffer for the salvation of man, may be proposed to him by men, with three various designs, and in a threefold spirit. It may be objected haughtily or wantonly, with different degrees of pride, down to the scornful contradiction of the word which had already declared that there were few; it may be uttered good-naturedly, the hard saying being rendered light by defect of apprehension, and with vague good wishes and hopes on behalf of self and others; or proposed despondingly, in a more or less disheartened spirit; almost despairing, if the Lord meant strictly "few," but a little in doubt upon that point. In all these three inspiring motives, the question is really asked, Is it assuredly so? but it is only the desponding spirit which asks in true earnest, longing for an answer, while doubting in the very slightest degree whether any other will be given than that which already was latent in the question. The haughty questioner knows himself better, and contradicts in the form of a question. The easy-tempered spirit hopes confidently enough for an answer which will set him at rest. We gather, however, from the manner in which he here publicly accosts the Lord in the way, and still more, from the answer, inspiring fear rather than consolation, which he receives, that this questioner, so indefinitely introduced by Luke,* is not a man who has been sorely tested and disheartened; but neither is he an altogether frivolous mocker, for the Lord enforces upon him immediately the duty of earnest striving; consequently we must regard his tone of mind as the result of the mixture of good-natured doubt with something of Jewish bigotry and loftiness.† Luther's translation of the concise expression in which Luke gives the question, hits its meaning precisely—Lord, dost thou actually intend to say, is it thy literal and earnest meaning, that few are saved? The man had either heard with his own ears, or been told by others, what the Lord had uttered in the Sermon on the Mount, and probably, also, the often recurring declaration of Matt. xx. 16, there is so much earnestness in his disposition, that he can not altogether shake off the impression; it followed him and allowed him no rest. The objection, however, which his question implies, rests upon his Jewish supposition that of course all the Jews will be safe, and consequently that there must be essentially many to be saved. This we are given to understand by the answer, which with its "Ye" down to verse 28, embraces the Jews who stood around at the time.

Instead of an open and explicit answer, the Lord at first evades the question in ver. 24; while, at the same time, he reasserts his former word concerning the strait gate, demanding of every one earnest and strenuous diligence for himself. On this follows immediately the reason of it, giving the real answer in a twofold way: Every man may be saved, but many will not through their own fault. He speaks further with For: many will not enter in, though they desired it after a certain manner, and thought themselves secure (vers. 24–28)—others (in themselves many) will enter in, though ye suppose otherwise, ver. 29. Finally, in ver. 30, the warning conclusion is deduced—Thus will the first and the last change places; returning back to the first note—Therefore strive!

Verse 24. "Question not much—strive rather!" This is the first key-note of the reply; and it is applicable to all such and similar questions which man's curiosity may presume to throw out for the gratification of his curiosity, while his own soul's interests are not fundamentally cared for. The question in itself involved a double error: first, the supposition that it cannot possibly be so hard a case, since all Israel must necessarily sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom; and then, that the σώζεσθαι, or being saved, was a thing altogether taken for granted in his own case, the question being asked only for the sake of others. Both these delusions are answered by the Lord's single first word—ἀγωνίζεσθε: for its full and pregnant meaning is, Strive—ye! First of all, and preëminently, this referred, as we have said, to the Jews (verses 28, 29 show this), but then more extensively to all men, as sinners and needing a σώζεσθαι, or salvation—in opposition to whom, as eternally contradistinguished from them, stands this one sinless Son of Man, whose sublime discourse never adopts the word we when the sinful condition of man is the theme! To enter through the strait gate—that is now and ever the great concernment! Without sufficient grounds, Griesbach reads θύρας, door, here also at the beginning instead of πύλης, gate: but the variation of the phrase in the next verse is founded upon as good reason as the literal reference to the earlier utterance in this. Both words are pertinently chosen as related to each other: not, however, that πύλη is an external gate and θύρα an inner door behind it; but πύλη gives the comprehensive idea of an entering generally (an open way for passage, a door or pass unlocked, hence here quite parallel with the whole of the narrow way), while θύρα gives more definitely the distinctive idea of admission or exclusion, when the discourse reaches the shutting of the door. Thus, in as far as πύλη here of itself may be regarded as designating a free and broad gate, the στενὴ πύλη, strait gate, of Matt. vii. 13, contained in it an ὀξύμωρον, (oxymoron). Yet was it there as here—a gate, nevertheless, which stands open for εἰσελθεῖν, or entrance, and that to every man, who seeks it in the right way and truly finds it. Strive, struggle with all earnestness, and with self-denying determination, throughout all the impediments of the whole course* — then shall ye be able! Thus, this word most decisively repudiates the idea of any hidden divine decree which from the beginning excluded any man, and by which actual ὀλίγοι, or few, are determined; and refers the whole matter to ourselves, of whom the εἰσέρχεσθαι, entering, and ἰσχύειν, being able, are predicated—a word before which the whole brood of human and conventional methods of evading and denying its force should retire into annihilation.

* For all persons besides Christ retire into the back-ground; their history being recorded not for the sake of its reference to them, but for its application to us, and as introducing the Lord's words addressed to us all.

† Schleiermacher is certainly wrong in thinking that "Jesus had been accustomed to send forward messengers who should announce his coming, and every one might observe their little success; consequently the question was assenting—Is it not true, that there are only few?" This is quite inconsistent with the answer. If we must thus seek motives, it would be more obvious to say that the man would think—So many follow thee in thy journeyings; in what sense wouldst thou speak of few?

But though most assuredly all might, and all could, if they would, enter in, yet this true and perfect willing, even to the final end and entrance, is a great and glorious and therefore rare thing. The Lord does not merely confirm, he strengthens also his former utterance, and makes the gate more strait than it first appeared in the former declaration. Then the contrast was with the many who naturally walk in the broad way; but now, even among those few who care for the kingdom of God, and actually strive after salvation — there are many who strive in vain! This is indeed a hard saying, and there is much that is highly critical involved in it.† And first, it may be said with strict propriety that ζητεῖν, seeking, is not ἀγωνίζεσθαι, striving; and that the Lord here, according to ver. 28, refers to that perverted endeavor of Israel described in Rom. ix. 31–33, which passes by the strait gate, knocks in vain at a false door, and by no means can establish a righteousness of its own, or discover a broader way than that of regeneration through faith in Christ. For in connection with the second εἰσελθεῖν, "enter," we do not find διὰ τῆς στενῆς πύλης, "through the strait gate," and hence we may understand it as meaning that many will seek to enter, by other ways broader than this, into the kingdom of God and its salvation. But the meaning penetrates deeper, and, according to the strict and emphatic connection of the entire discourse, includes the idea that there are many who even run for a time in the right course of the narrow way (1 Cor. ix. 24), eager to contend for the crown through the "strait gate"—but they neither run nor strive lawfully (2 Tim. ii. 5). What then is that ζητεῖν, or seeking, which is false, or which avails not to the final entering in; which, however it may resemble the lawful striving, only engenders a false confidence, which will be undeceived at last? It may be replied that the many do not, properly speaking, strive, their earnestness and zeal are not sufficiently intense,* and that may well be: but we must add—what is, alas! too commonly forgotten—that many there are who strive only too much, that is, who secretly introduce into the good fight of faith self-righteousness in its deepest disguise, would enforce their salvation by the ζητεῖν, or seeking, of their own personal energy, working and will, forgetting all the time that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy (Rom. ix. 16). This declaration is the necessary complement for the right apprehension of the meaning of our Lord's words—or we may take for that purpose words of his own on another occasion, Matt. xviii. 3, xix. 14, Mark x. 15, spoken for our encouragement under the form of stern requirement. The final οὐκ ἰσχύσουσι, "shall not be able," makes it manifest that he is pointing, not merely to a lack of energy applied, but also to an excess of the wrong kind of energy—They shall not accomplish their purpose by all their own might, to renounce which, indeed, is the true warfare of self-denial, and the only method of attaining to that simplicity and poverty of spirit which can alone enter through the strait gate of grace.†

Verses 25–27. Hitherto the gate has been only strait, now at length the door is shut. The Lord dilates his warning declaration, predicting —first, the impending rejection of the many; as exhibited in a similitude wherein a renewed rejection of those who revolt against the first is solemnly asserted—and then, in ver. 28, the misery of those who are thus irreversibly thrust out. The τότε, "then," of ver. 26 answers to the ἀφ' οὗ, "when once," of ver. 25, and in it lies the emphasis of the whole. This has immediate reference to their exclusion at the first period of judgment in the kingdom established upon

* In this expression of our Lord, we have the germ of Paul's subsequent phraseology, in which the idea of the athlete and the contest, with and without figure, so habitually occurs.

† "A more direct contradiction to the destructive error of the final restoration of all the fallen than these words contain, can scarcely be imagined." So says Von Gerlach, and we unite with him in protesting against the error; but this discourse of our Lord, properly understood, is not one of the strongest protestations against it.

* According to Roos—Would enter with "slothful wishes;" or Von Gerlach—Seek it "in a certain external sense."

† The unqualified translation of this passage which the generally penetrating "Kalender für Zeit und Ewigkeit" (Villingen in Schwarzwald, 1843. Romanist alas!) gives us—"They shall not be able, because they do not apply force enough"—is certainly biassed, one-sided, and false.

earth (ver. 28), and not to the day of final condemnation. Compare on this what was said on Matt. xxiv. 48–51. Ver. 27 does, indeed, extend forward its threatening, for the several judgments stand in close connection; but the being excluded is not yet, as such, eternal torment.* The Master of the house is risen up, after long and patient waiting, to bring in the first concluding period of his kingdom's revelation for all who have been made worthy; they who regarded themselves as having the prerogative to enter, and who unexpectedly find themselves without when the door is suddenly shut, begin to utter most earnestly their "Lord, Lord," and will not submit to his first rejection, for they flatter themselves they have been in fellowship with him, and that he must, in spite of every appearance, know and acknowledge them. We shall find it hard here to include in this prescription all Israel, seeking the kingdom independently of Christ, unless we firmly hold fast the principle that in such widely-comprehensive representations as this, we are not to expect that every circumstance will precisely harmonise. In the present case the accompanying ὄχλοι, multitudes, are most obviously in our Saviour's view, and the discourse connects itself with, and springs from, them—then figuratively extending its range further. The eating and drinking in the Lord's presence (note—only ἐνώπιον without any internal communion) suggests to us immediately the miraculous feedings; but the καὶ πίνειν, "and drank," includes a reference to the fulfilment of that wilderness type, 1 Cor. x. 3, 4, in the Christian sacrament; the general fundamental idea remains—"Yet were we admitted guests at the some-time table of thy kingdom and grace, where thou wast so compassionate and patient! Thou hast taught in our streets, among our houses and towns, giving thy public instruction to us as most frequent and attentive hearers"—as was abundantly the case at this very time,† and will ever be the case with many who place their sole confidence in this, down to the final shutting of the door. But although these objectors mean to say—Who, if not ourselves, shall enter in to thee? yet have they never purely and essentially done his will; and they receive as a whole and in common (though not without degrees of difference) that fearful word spoken before in Matt. vii. 23; they remain without as evil-doers, and through their own personal fault.*

Verses 28–30. Without disparagement to the much wider and deeper significance of the first warning, the Lord now turns the immediate application of his word to Israel not seeking the kingdom of God, or if seeking it, seeking it otherwise than in the true way. That which he thus predicts is a repetition from Matt. viii. 11, 12. Thus, moreover, they are not few who shall sit down at the table (see the popular notion, Luke xiv. 15, as it is rightly to be interpreted)—this, though intimated (and asserted in Matt. viii. in connection with these words), is by design not expressly uttered here.† The excluded now first see ("to their intolerable vexation"—Roos thinks) the blessedness of those who are admitted—compare afterwards chap. xvi. 23. The coming, entering in, and sitting down in enjoyment, is the antithesis of the mere ζητεῖν, "seek," previously used. Whether, as Bengel suggests, the successive order of the four quarters prospectively hints at the process of the Gospel's missionary history, which began with the East and now rests in the South, we would leave undecided: however it may offend some, the thing itself is certain. The Lord probably takes his last saying, ver. 30 (here uttered with a strictly corresponding εἰσίν, are, and ἔσονται, shall be), from an earlier declaration which had been spoken in full as we find it in Matt. xx. 16; thereby referring the answer here given to both those places in which he had spoken of the "few." It is still remarkable, in regard to the prophetical allusion just mentioned, that in fact, and on the whole, the Oriental first Christians have become the last, and that the late comers from the South to all appearance may become the first. Thus much is certain, amid these doubtful applications, that the word of the Spirit often embraces, as we see in this discourse of our Lord, and generally elsewhere, the most specific fulfilments of its meaning in individual cases and in internal things, in immediate connection with its typical exhibition in the general progress of his kingdom: for the history of that kingdom is so ordered by his hand as to be the counterpart of all his other wonderful works (Psa. lxxviii. 2).

* And so far this is not literally one of the strongest texts to establish the definite loss of salvation in the case of the many—though the final judgment lies threateningly in the back-ground of the former.

† Which adjunct idea Schleiermacher makes prominent: "This word was spoken in Galilee, where many thus heard, and ate and drank with him." This is correct enough as the point of connection for the whole figurative discourse, but we cannot admit what follows—"and stood in the relation of guests to Jesus!" For this is inappropriate and untrue: who was a guest of Jesus? This word is therefore figurative, and reaches much further.

* It is most striking that ἐργάται stands here solitarily in Luke, which always designates laborers in the hire and service of another. We never find פֹּעֲלֵי אָוֶן so translated in the Old Testament: but in 1 Macc. iii. 6 the expression is thus found. We have already referred to this in our Andeutungen fur gl. Schriftv. ii. Sammlung, among the allusions to passages in the Apocrypha. Compare, moreover, Xenoph. Memor. ii. 1. 27.—τῶν καλῶν καὶ σεμνῶν ἐργάτην.

† Miserably deficient is the narrow interpretation of Schleiermacher, that "only to the Palestine Jews was it so preëminently hard, to find this first entrance; the others, not a few, but very many, might enter in, from all places and ends of the earth!"

REPLY TO THE HYPOCRITICAL WARNING AGAINST HEROD: THE FOX AND THE PROPHET-MURDERESS; PROPHETIC DEPARTURE FROM JERUSALEM.

(Luke xiii. 32–35 [Matt. xxiii. 37–39]).

Our Lord's long last journey to Jerusalem, as recorded by Luke, will always retain some measure of obscurity for the harmonists. Two things, however, are sufficiently plain: first, that he mentions individual occurrences without strict regard to chronology, even repeating and intercalating some things elsewhere recorded; and, secondly, that in his account of the entire journey, the emphasis is laid upon the Lord's going to encounter his closely impending sufferings and death. We cannot concur with Wieseler's recent scheme;* and think it very doubtful whether Luke xiii. 22 indicates the setting out towards Bethany of John xi. 1; to us it seems more like an intimation of a continuous onward course after chap. ix. 51. And here in chap. xiii. 31 the same day cannot signify a definite day of departure, for that would not consist with verse 22. We mention this now preparatorily, as it will be found of moment for the interpretation of the three days.

Another preliminary question before we enter on the subject is this, What was the meaning of the warning against the snares of Herod, on the part of the Pharisees? or, Did the information that Herod sought to kill Jesus rest upon any foundation of truth? It is scarcely imaginable in itself that the Pharisees would warn the Lord with a sincere and honest intention, and the idea is contradicted by the severe reply which they received; but it is almost equally obvious that the entire story was no more than a false report. That Herod, after the beheading of John the Baptist, should have ventured to conceive an attack upon Jesus, accords neither with his character nor with the simple account of Luke ix. 7–9, which represents him as greatly desirous to see the Saviour, a desire, too, which chap. xxiii. 8 once more exhibits as having been permanent. Thus these two passages of the same evangelist forbid us to assume that Herod wished to frighten Jesus away from his territory, and employed these Pharisees to that end. It were better to say, that, if they did not actually invent the θέλει σε ἀποκτεῖναι, "will kill thee" (which, again, seems unconformable with their craftiness of character), yet they had taken up some groundless report and brought it to the Lord—in order that they might put an end to his too long wandering about and evasion, and thus hypocritically hasten him to Jerusalem, with the design, further, of testing whether he would be accessible to fear.* This very probable supposition best harmonizes with the otherwise very obscure answer of Jesus; which certainly does not, as has been said, "make it very plain that the words of the Pharisees were no falsehood."

Verse 32. We can now altogether agree with Ebrard, that the Lord, penetrating their cunning device, replied to them ironically—"Tell this Herod, who, according to your representation, is so crafty." "That he terms Herod crafty, as if he believed them; and that he further commissions them to go to this Herod, whom they thus complain of to him—both these things, taken together, intimate plainly that he perceives their craftiness."† Herod and yourselves are altogether in concert and alike—this is the fundamental idea for our understanding of the word. They had begun—ἔξελθε καὶ πορεύου, "get thee out and depart"; and he now, in his first πορευθέντες, "go," immediately gives them back their dismissal. Now, although the designation "that fox" very aptly describes one who had acquired and maintained dominion, less by energetic vigor than by subtle intrigues, and might very probably have been an expression in common use which the Lord thus gave them to understand that he knew; and although such a comparison "in its ancient sense and use" might, as has been said, contain a less offensive allusion than in our times; yet we cannot believe that our Lord would directly and in earnest have spoken in such a manner of the ruler of his country, and with the possibility of their going and saying—He called thee a fox! This would have been unexampled in the whole tenor of our Lord's deportment, who so scrupulously maintained decorum towards the existing powers of the land; always diverting the question both from Herod and Pilate

* And particularly in his assumption that Luke ix. 51 corresponds with the coming to the feast of Tabernacles, John vii. 10; for this would be too early, being half a year before, for the ἀνάλημψις now approaching (a word which we must not explain away); besides which, such a public journeying towards Jerusalem very ill harmonizes with the ὡς ἐν κρυπτῷ of John.

* "They make Herod's murderous character their pretence; he had already caused the Baptist to be put to death. That was a crafty scheme, if it had succeeded. Jesus, in exhibiting fear, would elevate the courage of his enemies, and, more than that, would have destroyed his own reputation among the people, thus making himself an easy prey" (Braune).

† Neander thinks it would have been unworthy of our Lord, to rebuke the Pharisees through Herod, and that he would have told them plainly that he penetrated their craftiness. But it appears to us that he does let them know it, though in their own tone, and in a manner which they would well understand. Yet Neander himself says, just as we have said, that these Pharisees probably acted from motives of their own, using for their own purposes a report probably untrue.

when occasion arose for speaking against them, and for deep reasons not even using in all its rigor his own prophetic prerogative of inveighing against rulers. That he does call Herod a fox, however, remains certain after all; but the case is very much altered, and does not transgress the limits of propriety to be preserved, if, as Olshausen says, "this word is in reality aimed only at themselves, under the name of Herod—that that fox, of whom they idly reported, existed nowhere else than in their own hearts." In fact this seems to express itself in the ironical tone of the ταύτῃ, that, itself. How closely compacted are you and your Herod in cunning against me! The merely bestial, that is, equally stupid and weak, the despicable fox-cunning seems to form a contrast with the more intensely evil enmity of Jerusalem, the public murderess of the prophets, springing as it did from human malignity, or indeed from the roaring lion of hell: but both are quite in concert if we understand it thus—"Now will ye as foxes concert with the fox to affright me away, and speed me to the place where more violent attacks and indignities await me." Suffice it that the Lord gives them to see that he penetrates their hearts' design: tells them himself what they might go and repeat, "I regard not your wiles or your power; I go my way, without any respect to your Depart hence! Behold, what evil am I doing, that I should fear death from the ruler of the land? My works, as you see them, are altogether unpolitical and without harm—I cast out devils (which is your stumbling-block, but which Herod the Sadducee will not believe), and do cures as my useful occupation!" He designedly omits to say anything here of his doctrine, which indeed did not concern or trouble Herod, in order to adapt his words still to the ironical fiction; he does not allude to his preaching the kingdom of heaven—but the Pharisees well know what his works signify and what they attest. These works I do to-day and to-morrow—we can find in these words only a proverbial expression: As long as it pleases me, as long as it is appointed to me; and also to-morrow, instead of departing hence to-day according to your will. For it is just as plain that the σήμερον, to-day, in verses 32 and 33 are the same, as that the expression for the third day is varied in order to show that the proverbial, and not the literal sense, is intended. Thus we are not to think of three literal days of journeying from here to Bethany or Jerusalem,* nor can we admit the explanation that on the third day the Lord would leave Galilee, would end his work there; but the expression is perfectly parallel with John xi. 9, 10, and says—I have my appointed time, in which I can continue to walk and to act, fearless and undisturbed. Here, however, we must add—A time which is fast running out, only three days, that is, a few days left to run.† Some have been disposed to interpret the τελειοῦμαι, "I shall be perfected," in strict harmony with the ἐπιτελῶ, I finish ("I do"); although the very form of the word shows that it was intended to indicate something different and contrasted. It has even been taken transitively, and therefore tautologically—I finish all these works; or in an indefinite middle sense (De Wette's translation—vollende ich—I perfect), applying it to the journeying as not to-day, but on the day after the morrow, or when it pleases me.* But how superficial is this meaning, how contradictory to the following verse, where the Lord assumes for the following day merely the same πορεύεσθαι, "walk," as to-day and to-morrow, and by no means a τελειοῦν, τελειοῦσθαι, finishing, or anything like a ceasing, and removal elsewhere. We see that the days are not to be taken literally; but the τελειοῦμαι, "I shall be perfected," on an already appointed third day, that is, a day no longer in the distance, must mean something distinctive. Had not his being killed been spoken of, and must not the Lord be supposed to have given a reply to that? Does he not in the parallel clause (verse 33), speak forthwith of ἀπολέσθαι, perishing, the place and time of which were well known to him? But if the τελειοῦσθαι refers to this, we must give up every idea of a literal reckoning of the days, which would at best only reach as far as the entrance into Jerusalem. We have, then, good grounds for understanding the Lord to say—I die indeed, but not through the artifice of the fox Herod, ye more than foxes; and not yet to-day or to-morrow! This is the only reply of the Lord to these cunning ones, which corresponds with the situation of the case, and harmonizes with every other consideration: "I do my duty, and undergo my destiny; I distribute life—and go to my death." But the Lord designedly employs a word which certainly does not in itself signify dying; the expression is a pregnant one, which embraces at once life or death. We understand it less as saying—Then come I to the end, than as rather saying—I am perfected, that is, I finish my course, attain my goal, accomplishing perfectly by my death the great task of my redeeming life. Thus Phil. iii. 12 is to be understood, according to the phraseology of the race-course; comp. Acts xx. 24. (On the other hand, we venture not to penetrate so far as to the meaning of Heb. v. 9, ii. 10.)

Verse 33. The connection is now very clear and precise: "On a third day (which will not come before it should come and must) I shall

* We cannot certainly, with Sepp, who is ever ready to find similitudes and mystic allusions, discern in these three days' journeying a figure of the three years' ministry.

† Alford does not concede this, because of the positive use of the three days in an affirmative sentence—of which no instance can be brought where the proverbial meaning is implied; but we think that it is in itself highly natural, and is attested in this case decidedly by the whole context.

* Schleiermacher, in an oral delivery which I penned down—"On the day after the morrow I will go quietly on my way, without either haste or fear, without any constraint of Herod." Almost like Dr. Paulus—"I have yet some days in which to effect certain cures, but will bring them to a close on the third day, and then voluntarily go on my way."

arrive at the end of my life and its work; but till then (that is, yet a few days, for I mean not literally the third day) I must walk, or even journey.* Thus it is not according to your direction, but as the Father hath appointed unto me." Further—"I shall not indeed remain here, whence ye would have me depart (πορεύεσθαι, as in verse 31), but assuredly go unto Jerusalem, not however to escape danger from Herod, but—to fall into your and your fellows' murderous hands. Do ye suppose that I know not this? Or that the thought of this would affright me?" For one moment the tone of irony, keenly touching their secret, is heard, before the sad lamentation of slighted love bursts forth and absorbs all else. "Jerusalem the holy city, in which Satan also has his course, may not lose that honor which has been her appropriate prerogative from the beginning; to her belongs the preëminence, and she shall keep it; there have the enemies of God's kingdom their seat, and all those who plot against my doctrine, consentient with that of all the prophets, concerning that kingdom; it would to others be unsuitable, it cannot be (οὐκ ἐνδέχεται, comp. ch. xvii. 1) otherwise, than that a prophet (even every one) must perish there, and not elsewhere!" It is to be observed that as the Lord had in Nazareth involved his own lot with that of all the rejected prophets, so now he assumes the same position at the close—partly in humility, partly in love, which would thus, as it were, conceal the heavier guilt of their putting himself to death, as the Messiah and the Son; but it also infolds that truth to which, as the ground of his future teaching, his own lips must bear witness, that before his death he occupied preëminently the prophetic office to testify concerning himself, in order to consummate and close the prophetic position and function. If it be asked why the Lord did not think of John, the prophet whom Herod had put to death out of Jerusalem, the answer is at hand, that he does thus remind them of this recent exception, as if he should say: "Herod has indeed put the Baptist to death, anticipating and preventing your appropriate act, but that was a specific case, against the will and course of things, an exception which will not affect my fate; the rule will be exemplified in my person at Jerusalem."

Verses 34, 35. We have already given our opinion upon the light and venial doubt which has been raised, as to whether or not the Evangelist Luke merely incorporated these words—which in Matthew form the final and solemn farewell of our Lord—because of the connection of their subject with the present.† But now more directly considering the words, we are led to decide, more explicitly than before that the Lord did at this earlier time actually utter these words. Can we suppose that Luke did not indeed know to what place they belonged, or that the guidance of the Holy Spirit would not have shown him the impropriety of placing them here, if the Lord only spake them once, and at the solemn close? We can, in deed, perfectly well understand how Jesus contemplating in his prophetic glance all tha impended over him in Jerusalem, should have broken out in such a cry as this, a cry which afterwards, when its sad presentiment was fulfilled, was once more uttered and recorded.* The sense remains on the whole the same as we have expounded it in Matthew; and the comprehensive glance over all the prophetic missions and invitations down to this last and greatest, makes its connection with the preceding verse very plain.† But the latter clause, concerning the house left, and the seeing him again, must naturally have a modified sense here, receiving afterwards its new meaning; and there are many examples of such wider application of earlier sayings. It is admitted by most that ἔρημος, "desolate," which would indeed only suit that future farewell and departure, is not here the true reading; the omission of this here is as significant as the absence likewise of ἀπ' ἄρτι, "henceforth." The Lord now only says—Your house, around which the children of Jerusalem were gathering for the feast, but not gathering around me, who have so often there taught and solicited them‡—behold, I leave it to you, that is, soon to receive its full doom, but now for the present I come not today or to-morrow into the temple. Consequently, further—Ye shall, for this time, see me and hear me first in your midst at the feast. It is wrong, however, to forget that the whole of verses 34, 35 is an address to the inhabitants of Jerusalem in common; and thence to refer the last ye again to these Pharisees—"Ye shall first see me, when we meet once more at the feast." That is a very inadequate explanation of the great Hosanna-cry, which neither these nor any other Pharisees uplifted to greet him; it is rather the Lord's purpose to predict here his final entrance, which he had in Zechariah before his eyes: "O Jerusalem, thou wilt receive me once more, for it is so decreed, as him that cometh (of whom all the prophets have spoken); thou must festally and solemnly receive, as sent unto thee in the highest sense—and then crucify, me!" The prospective allusion to this joyful greeting in the far distant futurity, in the same expression as Matthew's

* That is, "on the way of my work." Thus it is not necessary to insert, with the Peshito, an ἐργάζεσθαι after αὔριον—as Neander thinks the complete sense requires.

† Hence many decide, without further ado, that the words belong not here, as, e.g., Grotius, Meyer, De Wette, Schleiermacher, Neander.

* This meets Schleiermacher's objection, that such an address to Jerusalem would be unlikely in Galilee.

† But we must be on our guard against the trifling which sometimes connects the fox and the hen.

‡ For οἶκος is obviously here the temple—and does not, as Stein most whimsically interprets, signify "all which pertains to the happiness of family and public life."

repetition uses, is assuredly based upon its type in this first Hosanna.

And now let the whole reply be glanced over again, in all its richness of meaning: how the Lord exhibits in few words his own perfect knowledge of man, instantly detecting the true fox—the precision and boldness of his instantaneous rejoinder—the scorn which meets the cunning, the brief severity with which he treats the hypocrites—the holy serenity which pervades the whole, undisturbed in his firm prosecution of his conscious way—the piercing energy of this denunciation, in connection with the tenderness of his lamenting love, preserved down to the very end of his toiling, long-suffering life—finally, the sublimity of that prophetic glance, with which he surveys as well the history of the past, as the process of his own life and death, and in verse 35 anticipates the last and most glorious scenes of all.

A SECOND SABBATH-HEALING.

(Luke xiv. 3, 5 [Matt. xii. 10, 11]).

Whether this second conflict of our Lord with the Pharisees on occasion of his healing on the Sabbath, a conflict which exhibits a deportment on his part very similar to that maintained on other occasions, but which bears essential marks of being a distinct occurrence, is to be placed in chronological sequence after the denunciatory discourses of chaps. xi. and xii., is a question still open to discussion. The mere position of the account does not enable us to determine positively in the affirmative; though the section cannot be assigned to a later period of the last journey (similarly with the whole of chaps. xiv.–xvi.), for the Lord appears now to have leisure for visiting houses and imparting instruction. Grotius assumes, entirely without foundation, that the host was a member of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem; Luke simply describes him as an ἄρχων, a ruler (of some sort), who, like most such, was of the sect of the Pharisees.* Even after such rigorous denunciations, so rigorous that they might have seemed to be an anticipation of his final renunciation of them all, the Lord is seen to be still ready to accept the invitations of these worse than Publicans to their tables; and when they exhibit their malignity he can all the more unrestrainedly confront and correct them with the simplicity of truth and love. If we bind closely together vers. 1 and 2, it might be thought probable that the sick man was brought by the Pharisees for the express purpose that they might test the Lord—see what he would do on the Sabbath day, or possibly whether his power was equal to the curing of this dropsical man. In such a case, the kindness of the Physician towards a man who suffered himself to be thus misused, comes out into still greater prominence. But the ἦν ἔμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ, "there was before him," does not indicate of itself anything more than a coincidence; and thus the Lord, notwithstanding the παρατηρεῖν, "watching," of which he was well aware, at once heals the sick man who appeared in his presence. The καὶ ἦν, "and there was," disproves Pfenninger's notion that the man had been brought in consequence of a sympathising inquiry; it is much more natural to suppose that before the sitting down (ver. 7), at the approach and in the act of coming into the house (ver. 1), the sick man had presented himself as a petitioner in the forecourt. We must then regard the παρατηρούμενοι or watchers as surrounding and observing him from the very beginning. Suffice it that Luke designs to tell us that even here, as soon as a sick man comes before him, the Lord is ready to help. On this occasion he anticipates the polemical question which had so often been put, just in the way in which, e.g., Matt. xii. 10, his enemies had put it to him; and in the manner in which he simply proposes the question it is already answered. There are many such questions, the mere proposal of which puts all gainsayers to silence, which we ourselves need only to propose, if we have also the simplicity of victorious truth on our side.

The illustration of an ox fallen into a pit or well might be thought to have some correspondence with the malady by which this man was perishing, just as before the binding and loosing the animal might have been chosen with reference to the woman's being bound; but the circumstance in itself was of general proverbial significance. The reading υἱός, son, which Rettig defends in Stud. u. Krit. (1838–4), and which, if genuine, would require ἢ βοῦς, "or ox," to be regarded as a spurious and unapt addition, is, in itself, despite all critical authority, so inappropriate that we cannot admit it; we cannot suppose that Jesus would require it of these heartless Pharisees, without any qualification, that they should treat every stranger to them with the same love which they would feel towards their own children! That would be quite discordant with his constant custom, which was to enter into the position and adapt himself to the character of those with whom he contended, for their keen conviction; and Olshausen is right in saying that we must assume here the same conclusion a minori ad majus from an animal to a man, which holds good in analogous sayings. The strange juxtaposition of "son and ox" Rettig himself cannot admit;* on the other hand that of "ox or ass" is warranted by Exod. xxi. 33, which appears to be the essential foundation of such a proverbial expression as found also in the Talmud, comp. Deut. xxii. 4. Should it not be as lawful to do that in love to a poor man which selfishness would do for these two most useful beasts—as lawful as to provide entertainment and receive guests on the Sabbath day? Is not this rather commanded by the very nature of the Sabbath, instituted as it was by God's love, for the cure of man's whole nature? Before, they kept silence, because they would not give any answer; but now it is yet more emphatic—They could not! No man among them was shameless or irrational enough to reply—I would not do even that, but rather let my ox or my ass remain! or—That would be a very much more important matter, the case of a most useful beast! or even—That would be less an act of labor than this of thy healing!

* Or as a Pharisee who at the same time was an ἄρχων. Thus only can we translate it, and in no case regard των φαρισαίων as rigidly dependent upon ἀρχων; for the Pharisees, as such, had no official leaders, or heads, none at least who are called ἀρχοντες in the New Testament.

THE UNGROUNDED PRETENSIONS OF PROUD PHARISEES AND UNREFLECTING FOLLOWERS REPELLED. THREE PARABLES TWICE OVER: THE BEING INVITED, OUR OWN INVITING, AND THE REFUSING GUESTS; THE REQUIREMENTS OF DISCIPLESHIP; THE TRUE ABILITY BOTH FOR BUILDING AND WARFARE.

(Luke xiv. 8–35 [Matt. xxiii. 12, xxii. 2–9, x. 37, 38]).

Here, too, we have not merely a real, but also a chronological connection: chap. xv. 1 first introduces a new scene, without stricter definition of time. The formula συνεπορεύοντο δὲ αὐτῷ ὄχλοι πολλοί, "and there went great multitudes with him," might indeed be taken as beginning anew with the same indefiniteness as ἦσαν δὲ ἐγγίζοντες αὐτῷ,† "then drew near unto him," chap. xv. 1, but the matter of his sayings, when viewed by a correct spirit of exposition, forbids us to assume any such loose connection. The Lord evidently continues to speak to the people in the same strain which he had begun at the meal just left; he repels, in ver. 26, those who thoughtlessly followed him, just as he had before repelled the unwarranted claim to "eat bread in the kingdom of God." We, therefore, do well to embrace the whole section, as including all that was said both within and without the house, under the one concise theme—Rejection of unfounded pretensions, see ver. 15, in the middle of the whole. The Lord abases proud Pharisees, who were unjustifiably confident of the kingdom of God; and also thoughtless adherents from among the people, who regarded his discipleship as an unwarrantably light matter. This gives us two co-ordinate portions of the discourse, which correspond in their plan and treatment. We have three parables for the abasement of the Pharisees in connection with the feast, and then again three parables for the warning repulsion of the unthinking crowds, spoken on leaving the feast. And we can hardly think that it was Luke only who thus blended them in such symmetry.

Still more precisely, in each case we perceive two conjunct similitudes in connection with a third. In the former part there are two preparatory lessons (so to speak) given in similitudes which spring directly from the feast, and afterwards the consummating third similitude, which is evoked by the direct expression given to the unfounded pretensions in ver. 15. The first parable of all, springing directly from an obvious occasion given, and already seizing the ultimate principle which gave it here its force, is directed against the pride of the invited, and therefore spoken to the guests. The counsels here given, seeming as they do to exhibit common prudential maxims of life—Be not proud, lest thou be put to shame! Be rather lowly, so shalt thou be honored! are suddenly, in the more wide-extended concluding lesson of ver. 11, so deepened and spiritualised, that they in themselves appear obviously to condemn the Pharisaical pride of the Jews in relation to the kingdom of God, just as in Matt. xxiii. 12. The second parable, vers. 12–14, is then added, without any external challenge, and as a counterpart of the former; directed against selfishness in the party inviting, and, therefore, addressed to him who bade him and the other guests—Bid not with selfish aims, but in the spirit of active benevolence, and with reference to the future recompense! In this is condemned by a figure the selfishness of the Jews with regard to love of their neighbor, springing from their practical ignorance of the mercy of God; and its conclusion, ver. 14, gives it plainly to be understood that only the righteous, and not all the Jews as such, will attain a happy resurrection. When, at this point, the idly-devout cry of ver. 15, interrupts his words, softening down if not directly opposing their intensely earnest application, with a tacit assumption that the eating bread in the kingdom of God would be the prerogative of all Israelites, and preëminently of all the Pharisees—the Lord proceeds, according to his wont, to make this stone of stumbling thrown in his way a foundation for a further, and still more explicit, declaration. Hence the third parable, vers. 16–24. "Verily, ye are all bidden to the supper of God; but because those who were bidden cling to self and the world, instead of truly coming in the prescribed way of repentance and faith, therefore they will not taste the bread of the kingdom of God, but others in their place!" The concluding lesson, ver. 24, passes directly to the undisguised interpretation of the whole.

* Sepp, indeed, quotes (ii. 337) in favor of this reading, a similar saying from the Baba Kama, 5, 6. (If an ox or ass, son or daughter, man-servant or maid, fall into a well)—but even there the pair is not so coupled precisely, and if it were, we have no right to insert into the New Testament a later Jewish tradition.

† As Scheibel argues, who denies any connection throughout chaps. xiv.–xvi. (Das Abendmahl des Herrn, p. 118).

The Lord has gone out, and the crowding multitudes, the ὄχλοι πολλοί, seem to say that they were disposed to receive the invitation aright, and come to the supper as required. But he sees through them; and, continuing the same train of thought, once more begins to utter the language of repulsion, humbling and teaching those who throng to him from the people. We have, again, two yet more general preparatory similitudes teaching the great requirements of his discipleship; the third then supplements them, as a warning against that apostasy which is the certain issue of such spurious or half discipleship. In this case the instruction, as we might have expected, comes first in unfigurative words—In order to be my disciples, it is requisite that the dearest objects should be renounced, ver. 26, and the Divine discipline voluntarily submitted to, ver. 27. Both these lessons are illustrated in two coordinate parables concerning building and warfare, which do not by any means (as our exposition will show) mean one and the same thing, but have a progressive idea in their signification. In the building of conversion, the only true counting of the cost is—that a man should see his own absolute incompetence and emptiness (or renounce everything); the retaining of any by-love, such as would hinder its completion, being a humiliating and disgraceful half-work, vers. 28–30. In the conflict, inseparable from a continuance in discipleship—with God who layeth his "cross" upon us, in order to our furtherance and preservation, the only wise condition of peace with the Almighty One is—that a man should see his own feebleness, and voluntarily submit, vers. 31, 32. That all this may be perfectly understood, ver. 33 follows, with a plain lesson at the close like that at the beginning—To renounce all that a man hath is the material for building, to pray for peace is the real might in warfare! Finally, in vers. 34, 35 we have the third, conclusive similitude of the worthless salt, which cannot be made good again, and is fit for nothing but—to be cast out (and trodden under foot); and this concludes by the strongest utterance of that fundamental idea of humiliation and disgrace which has pervaded our Lord's warnings from ver. 8 downwards.

Verses 8, 10. With the malignant παρατηρεῖν, watching, of the Pharisees, corresponds the gracious ἐπέχειν, marking, of the Redeemer and Physician of souls to all that comes before his attention: he pays special attention to the deportment of the guests in taking their places, wherein was most plainly brought to light the deplorable baseness of their spirit. After, as we may suppose, a long and beautiful grace, a most petty contention arises about their several seats and dignity; for the excellent custom of assigning beforehand to guests their respective places had not yet been established. Thus unworthily to be seeking their own honor on the Sabbath day, and that, too, in the presence of the Holy One of God, whom it had been their design to entrap and abase, at once lays these crafty assailants open to his censure, exhibits their character precisely as he denounced it in chap. xx. 46, and gives him a vantage-ground for beginning the attack in a manner which would be likely to disconcert their plans. The Lord avoids the appearance of assuming an unseasonable tone, and uttering lessons designedly prepared for the assembly: he simply lays hold of the circumstances of the moment, according to his custom ever to seize humanity in its external exhibition of itself, and to illustrate and pass sentence upon the internal dispositions which the external act betrays.* Luke introduces the Lord's word at the outset as a παραβολή, or "parable," the form which would best correspond with the decorous instruction of a guest at a feast, and this at the same time hints at the profound spiritual application which comes out so impressively at the conclusion, ver. 11; one might almost say that the Saviour now essays to heal that far worse than bodily dropsy, the inflation of pride, the dropsy of the heart, in these miserable men.†

When thou art bidden—simply the ordinary form of speech, which does not involve the necessity of embarrassing the subject by insignificant inquiries as to the individual person addressed. Did he speak to him who stood nearest, or to the chief person present, in direct

* Schleiermacher: "The dignity of these words appears in this, that without any appearance of profoundness or severity, they lay bare the secret disposition lying at the foundation of the external behavior which they condemn."

† Kleuker: "The morbid and restless desire of the creature in his vanity for the better place." To what lengths this drove the later Jewish scribes, many evidences show. Simeon Ben Shetach, invited by King Jannæus, placed himself between the king and the queen. Being asked why he did so, his reply was that it was written—Wisdom maketh him to sit among great men (Eccles. xi. 1, comp. Prov. iv. 8). This circumstance is found in Hieros Berachoth, fol. ii. 2.

condemnation; or conversely to one who modestly remained below for his encouragement? Nothing of the kind, but as Luke correctly and plainly writes—πρὸς τοὺς κεκλημένους, πρὸς αὐτούς, "to those that were bidden," "to them." The scriptural foundation of this מָשָׁל, or "parable," which is not limited to the Jews or to the East (it even appears in Baron Von Knigge, and in Alberti's Komplimentirbuch), but which our Lord has illustrated in its profoundest meaning, is Prov. xxv. 6, 7; comp. in Ecclus. i. 29, though the son of Sirach elsewhere omitted this among the rules of his guests. The warning, however, places the evil in the strongest light by addressing the least modest, who at once took possession of τὴν πρωτοκλισίαν, the one pre-eminent seat, with which afterwards τὸν ἔσχατον τόπον, "the lowest place," is strictly parallel. When, therefore, some more honorable personage comes in at a later hour—for here also the most eminent ones seem to regard it as dignified to come in last—he who bade not only thee with thy pride, but him also, will naturally say, and without much circumlocution (without even the prefatory φίλε, "friend," which greets the humble man)—Make place for this man, as it is fit! and as of course it is not to be supposed that the whole company would rise and make a general movement downward, nothing remains but that thou take the lowest place as the result of thy impropriety, and that, too, very properly, with shame and disgrace. The shame which does not attach to the mere sitting below, falls upon him who is sent down from a higher place; and that is finely intimated in the ἄρξῃ, "begin." If it is thy aim to have honor in the the presence of the company, it should be thy prudence so to act as to be sent upwards rather—thus would thy aim be better secured. This might seem at first to be a mere common rule of discretion, which approves and confirms the desire for honorable place; but it appears so only until we mark the application of the parable to the final and essential allotment of our place in the supper of the kingdom of God—for the third parable, ver. 16, is thus really prepared for in this first. And it is also quite right when rightly understood—though the ἵνα, "that," in the application must not be overmuch pressed—to abase the κενοδοξία (vain glory) by seeking the true δόξα (glory)—If thou wilt be the first, then be the last! The Lord's gracious wisdom reminds us poor mortals of those frequent humiliations which arise in the external relations of our early life, as if for types and warnings. How often is something similar to this occurring; one who thinks himself great meeting with one still greater of whom he thought not, and before whom he must recede: but how ineffectual generally are these humiliations in abasing pride, which still seeks other methods of exaltation, masked with yet finer subtility! Our polished guests, under similar circumstances, act very differently from those grovelling Pharisees, ver. 7; they adopt, in their sense, the Lord's counsel, and seek for honor with hypocritical humility. How often is this seen even in the ordinances of religion, even at the holy supper of the Lord; the same spirit being exhibited under a disguised expression, which, in a thousand forms shows, in daily life, its undissembled eagerness to obtain the πρωτοκλισία or chief seat. And the sentence with which our Lord closes is ever receiving a manifold fulfilment.

Verse 11. The exaltation of self was at that time the essential spirit of the Pharisees, and of the whole people with them; as it is of all men generally under the influence of their inborn pride. This foolish, unprofitable, and disappointed striving is exhibited everywhere in human affairs before the presence of men: every one desires naturally the uppermost place, at least relatively to others seeking τὰς πρωτοκλισίας "the chief seats," and forgetting in that passion the rights of this or that ἐντιμότερος, "more honorable person" than himself. Although the Lord, speaking directly of these external things, does not intend to be understood as levelling all distinction, but rather confirms the outward proprieties of higher and lower in human life; yet does he take occasion to denounce the blinded folly which seeks in such externalities a vain honor instead of the true, and in such a frivolous and contemptible way as to need no deprivation of its object to put it to shame. But fundamentally all place, and position, and title are alike petty and external. As, however, man's internal pride is manifested in these things before man, so is it more emphatically before God; he knows the abject ones who cringe before their fellows, and the indolent who care nothing about higher or lower, provided only they have their share, both alike utterly regardless of their abasement before the Supreme. He knows every publican and sinner who exalts himself above other publicans and sinners worse than himself, and it is to this that the closing saying of the parable points; that profound declaration which we have already contemplated on Matt. xxiii. 12, and which we shall soon hear again in a most impressive connection (chap. xviii. 14). That he who presses forward is repelled, he who humbly retires is advanced; that pride is abased, and humility exalted; is one great antithetical fact, which is pretypified in ten thousand ways in human life, and will have its eternal consummation in every soul at the last day. On the one side stands the Lord Jesus Christ,* according to Phil. ii. 8, 9; and on the other that first of all sons of pride, in whom, according to Isa. xiv. 13–15, this parable had its first and most awful fulfilment. Choose then, O man, between the way of Christ and the way of Satan!

Verses 12–14. The excellent John Newton† condemned most vehemently the vain parties and feasts of Christian people; appealing to Luke xiv. 12–14 as a passage of Scripture which

* To whom no man assigned in this feast the seat of honor. He waits calmly to occupy the place which will be his, and meanwhile speaks in the midst of their tumultuous striving a few words of penetrating truth.

† In his very edifying letters, several times issued in German.

few seemed to regard as a portion of holy writ, and which was more neglected than any other: but such sentiments rest upon a very superficial exposition of the letter. More perverted, however, were the theory and practice of the enthusiastic Müller of Bristol,* who for more than thirteen years acted literally on the injunction of Rom. xiii. 8, and thought that every man who willed to perform the commandments of God, according to John vii. 17, would be inwardly convinced that every injunction in the Sermon on the Mount must be understood literally, in the strictest sense. But, after all, this is in any case the least which our Lord designed to say here—that we should rather invite the poor and the maimed than our own friends, neighbors, and relatives to our feasts; indeed, the rigid literal fulfilment of this parabolical commandment, given to be understood by us in its spirit, would involve an unjust contravention of the instincts of love and propriety—just as we have had occasion to see on several earlier occasions. Schleiermacher, therefore, has something like right when he says—"this would be to subvert the natural procedure of all social life!" Bengel's remark is simple and excellent—"Jesus invitationes ex necessitudine naturali et civili quasi suo loco relinquit, ipse meliores præcipit. Humanitatis officia non plane tollit," (Jesus leaves to their own place, as it were, invitations of natural or civil necessity, his own precepts relate to those of a better kind. He evidently does not destroy the offices of humanity). The "not" of the text may here, as often, be taken as signifying not so much, not only; and, generally speaking, the whole form of expression has a proverbial character, pointing to the internal disposition with the illustration of a striking example (see the right interpretation on Matt. v. 46, 47; Luke vi. 32–34). Nor can we agree with Ebrard, that there is no blame here intended to the host, but only to the guests as intending to return the entertainment; and that the entertainer had bidden Jesus with a good intention, and without any relative or neighbor. Ver. 1 makes this very questionable; the Lord graciously leaves uninvestigated the design in which he himself was bidden, but we must assuredly assume from the whole character of the feast that the host required such an exhortation as he received, to expend in a better manner his hospitality and generosity. There must have been friends and kinsfolk in abundance, or otherwise the Lord's address would have been altogether unseasonable and misapplied; and indeed the general claim laid to the best seats proves of itself that rich and distinguished neighbors were not wanting there.

The Lord designedly sets out with the double designation ἄριστον ἢ δεῖπνον, "a dinner or a supper," including them both afterwards under the general δοχή, "feast," of any kind; and the φίλους, "friends," connects itself strikingly with the φίλε, "friend," of the previous parable. There it was assumed as the common rule, that the giver of a feast should have his friends for guests; but now the discourse reaches suddenly beyond—"But properly these should not, so much as the poor and needy, be bidden." The gradation of the guests, as, alas! they are generally invited and present, proceeds from the nearest outwards. The φίλοι, "friends," are partly to be taken as a general comprehensive designation, and partly as rightly taking precedence of relatives; ἀδελφοί, "brethren," indicates a nearer relationship than συγγενεῖς, "kinsmen;" but finally come the neighbors, yet (nota bene) only if they are rich. It has been thought desirable—though with some violence to the diction, since the τοὺς and the σοῦ, "they," are wanting in connection with γείτονας, "neighbors"—to refer πλουσίους, "rich," to the whole series together, since to bid the poor relations, and thus acknowledge the rights of their kinship, could not but be an excellent thing. But the general tone of the whole discourse forbids us thus to press its individual words. It was no harm in Tobit that he said to his son—"Go and bring what poor man soever thou shalt find out of our brethren, who is mindful of the Lord" (or in the Greek ὃν ἂν εὕρῃς τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἡμῶν ἐνδεῆ). The Lord condemns here only the selfish disposition, which has the expected return in view; and estimating the φίλους or friends by that standard, counts many to be such who are altogether without love. He therefore refers to the laws of Moses, with all their inculcation of charity in festal feasts and rejoicings; such as Deut. xiv. 28, 29, xvi. 11, xxvi. 11–13, comp. Heb. viii. 10, and the saying constructed from them, in Ecclus. xiv. 14. The motive of our Lord's counsel explains at once its true meaning—Lest they also bid thee again, and thou shouldst thus seek to possess thy wrong recompense! This μήποτε, "lest," is precisely the same as in ver. 8. For the temporal recompense is to be feared and avoided similarly with the humiliation in the former case. "Metus mundo ignotus" (a fear unknown to the world), as Bengel ironically adds. Ἀντικαλεῖν, "bid thee again," appears to be the term which corresponds to our reciprocation of favor; but he who has the ability and the disposition to spread a table for others should not remain within the circle which selfish calculation prescribes, Matt. v. 46, but remember that infinitely better recompense, which is held forth not indeed as a mere ἀνταπόδομα, "recompense," but in the high declaration—μακάριος ἔσῃ, "thou shalt be blessed."* The reference to eternal recompense is lawful and right; we may not say (with Schleiermacher) that there is a gleam of irony passing from ver. 12 into the ἀνταποδοθήσεται, "thou shalt be recompensed," of ver. 14, for the Lord's words are here sublimely real and earnest, when he finally points forwards to the resurrection, he declares what is the goal of honor and reward to which he had referred from the beginning, using the orthodox and current language of the people, and of the Pharisees. But when the "resurrection of the just" is appealed to as evidence of his confirmation of the doctrine of a first resurrection,* we must demur; that is not the immediate meaning of his words, they contain merely an intimation that only the righteous will rise to a blessed resurrection of recompense; as we understand also in John v. 29 the resurrection of life. Comp. on Luke xx. 35.

And now interposes a guest with his interesting saying, ver. 15. We hesitate to admit that he was actually much impressed (as Bengel understands the ἀκούσας—audiens, eoque tactus); or (as Braune thinks) that his "elevated feeling, sensible of the incongruities and follies of the prevalent customs, is susceptible only to the blessedness and freedom of the children of God;" or that he uttered (as Olshausen has it) his "joyful enthusiasm;" for the Lord would not then have replied so severely to the well-intended utterance of his earnest emotion as we find he did: we must gather the internal meaning of such a word spoken to Jesus from the answer which he immediately made to this man himself, as appropriate to his own case. The man was disposed rather, as we prefer to think, to purify the atmosphere, overcharged by the two former parables; and to say something edifying which would not give offence to any party. His aim was partly to redeem the rest of the company from their utter silence; and partly to put an end to the too intense spirit of moralizing, by something benignant of his own. His words, however piously they sound, contain a threefold latent impropriety: first, his sensual conception of the resurrection of the just, the φαγεῖν ἄρτον, "eating bread," in the kingdom of God being used without any qualification, just as the Evangelist in ver. 1 had used it to describe the present meal;† then the confident assurance of his pretensions to eat it as a Pharisee and an Israelite, knowing nothing of ch. xiii. 28, 29, overlooking or pretermitting the little word δικαίων, "just," in ver. 14; finally, his indolent, contented remission of the matter into distant futurity, thus bringing the too rigorous and critical exhortation to a close. He sits complacently at his kinsman's feast, and prattles about the heavenly table. The Lord says—Blessed wilt thou be, rather, if thou doest good to the poor; and the man immediately appropriates the words, and gives them another turn in his pious way of talking—Yea, verily, we shall all be happy indeed, when we have once entered there! (Meanwhile let us enjoy ourselves here without too much of such discourse.) The cry, indeed, uttered with a better meaning and higher intelligence is perfectly correct, and fundamentally in harmony with Rev. xix. 9. Hence Joh. Von Müller, himself genuinely m ovd by it, remarks—"What blessedness, even to feel this!" It is a foretaste of that future blessedness, to be able thus to anticipate it.

Ver e 16, 17. But since this pious spokesman of the whole company is, alas! far from uttering a well-grounded claim to the participation of the supper of God, the Lord makes his words the foundation of a yet more severe continuation of his own discourse, instead of being silenced by them. As to the relation of this parable to its later variation, Matt. xxii. 2–14, we have said what was necessary there. The Lord speaks here, throughout the parable as a whole, more gently and in a more concealed tone, than in Matthew; but the conclusion in ver. 24 is all the more plain, emphatic, and piercing. The one servant, who here carries the invitation, represents in a certain sense all the invitations of God in general and as one whole, and is, so to speak, the calling voice of God in itself, as uttered through all his messengers;* but yet it is conclusively the Son, the Messiah himself, calling men to the kingdom of heaven; it is he himself who now speaks, as is plainly shown in the expression—at the hour of supper. The great essential is coming in penitence, faith, and good works, when the invitation is given; the being invited is nothing in itself. The point is to come now, and not with spurious devotion to talk about a future blessedness; for the hour, the time of coming, and entering, and eating, is already now. He who will not come now, will then be left without; the keen point of the word of invitation lies in the hasty summons—All things are now ready! The gracious host tarries not, admits no question whether he will be pleased to wait till to-morrow or the next day. Finally, what boundless matter of exposition and preaching in the all things which the Lord had made ready for those whom he calls.

Verse 18–20. All began with one consent to excuse themselves from obeying the gracious and earnest—Come! None of those who were bidden came; hence again at the close—None of them shall taste of my supper. Consequently it is manifest that the πολλοί, "many," who were called according to ver. 16, are only those of whom this can be said; not, therefore, as elsewhere, all Israel, or the collective number of all who were to be called throughout the world: this more restricted view which pervades the parable is to be carefully observed. Its ἀνδρες ἐκεῖνοι οἱ κεκλημένοι, "those men which were bidden," are such as were specifically and preëminently, primo loco and in preference to others, the called of the kingdom of heaven; such as, in virtue of their position, endowments, understanding, and responsibilities, occupied the same relation to the people of Israel which these occupied to the heathen—the Scribes, Pharisees, and Rulers, as the leaders and representatives of the people at large. We might say without much danger of error—"the representatives of the theocracy," of whom not one believed on Jesus, according to John vii. 48. We must not, however, overlook the other side of the question, which, in reference to the relation between ver. 14 and ver. 15, should be made very prominent—that these rep esentatives and leaders regard themselves as the "just" and as righteous, the rich and the whole in contrast with the poor and the maimed, as we shall see on ver. 21. These have gladly accepted the invitation which is presupposed, ver. 16, as having preceded; they have prided themselves on being the certain and honored guests, and have acted as if they expected nothing better than the final happy summons to the enjoyment of the feast: and yet they come not! It now happens just as they themselves avow in John vii. 48, and as the Lord here announces as well-known—they began (and continued steadfast to the end, from the first to the last) to excuse themselves ἀπὸ μιᾶς (understand γνώμης or φωνῆς), with one mind and one voice. Not merely ἀπὸ μιᾶς παραιτήσεως, pariter et simul; but it is intimated also, that with all the variety of their apologies as they now follow, their refusal is one and the same, as if they had all concerted it. And wherefore so? The true meaning, the innermost principle of the preaching which invited them to come, and which is here only represented in its gracious aspect as the gospel of good tidings, is implied and understood, though unexpressed, to be—Repentance and Conversion; and this is what they unanimously decline. They know this well, they understand the prophets' שׁוּבוּ אֶל־יְהוָה, "Return unto Jehovah," and the Baptist's and Christ's μετανοεῖτε, "Repent," well enough to turn from them: therefore nothing more explicit needed to be said to these wise ones.

We must now further inquire into the specific meaning and specific distinction intended to be expressed by the threefold refusal; and it is melancholy to observe how seldom in sermons or in expositions the distinctive significance of the three answers is retained, well-known and almost proverbial as the section is in Christendom. This much in general is clear at the outset, that the ground of the first is opposed to the heavenly inheritance, as a whole, while the oxen of the second are contrasted with the attainment and possession of better substance in detail; and that the marriage joy of the third is intended to be set in opposition to the true eternal happiness of God's kingdom and God's supper. Thus we have most obviously a dichotomy presented to us—the good things and the enjoyments of the world, its riches and its pleasure, are the things which withhold those from coming who are dependent upon them. The earthly mind will not part with the morsel in the mouth out of regard to that which is promised of God; prefers the flesh-pots of Egypt to the manna pledged in abundance; the husks which now fill the belly to the ample provision of bread which abounds even for the servants in the Father's house; counts the pottage of lentils of more worth, as pacifying the present appetite, than the first-born prerogative which must wait for an inheritance in the future. Now-a-days men speak loftily of "material interests;" and the endless schemes of invention and industry, by which arts are improved or wealth is gained, allow but little time or inclination for seeking reconciliation with God, or the way to heaven. Similarly, in this parable the two former recusants have the appearance of something like laudable occupation to plead—such respectable men of business must forsooth be excused when God summons, for this world demands their most sedulous attention and most thrifty devotion of time, in its manifold exactions.* So also the learned, and even the learned in divinity, have their profoundly important investigations in hand, their intricate questions which they must go to prove. Alas, poor sinner! investigate, prove, and test thy own heart, rather than thy fields, thy oxen, thy documents ancient or new! Ponder in thy soul the fact that thou art thyself, with all thy effort and toil, only as an ox bearing the hard yoke, so long as the answer given to the great invitation is—I must do this or that, I must and can do no other! But to both these, who thus have the excuse of something to do, is opposed now the other who has something to enjoy as his apology—he has married a wife, and in her he finds his field and oxen, and everything; independently of her he knows, thinks of, and cares for, nothing just now. Probably it was but for one object that he married at all; without having any piece of land of his own, without knowing or caring how any family might be provided for after his marriage;† but that troubles him not now, he is without disquiet and perfectly content. Such are the thorough men of the world, from the highest in rank down to the most squalid, who are bending all their energies to attain the pleasure (or the pain!) of the moment; and are ready with their irritable I cannot! whenever the servant of God brings home to them the instant appeal. To the one the wide world is his bride, in whose broad arms he thinks himself happy; while the other weds his little fragment. Why dost thou not come with thy wife, if susceptible of heavenly things; or, if she is not, without her?

This gives us the twofold refusal, as it obviously lies before us; but three are specifically mentioned—how, then, are the two former distinguished? First of all, we find on a calm and simple inspection of the whole, that there is a

* Are we to regard the ground bought without being seen as an indication of covetousness, Isa. v. 8? We doubt it, and would rather regard the purchase as a conditional one—the ἰδεῖν being equivalent to δοκιμάσαι. But we would not positively decide.

† The question here is not of hindrance through marriage generally (I am married!), but of the first tumult of wedded passion as the type of all carnal enjoyment. This man did not lose his freedom through his wife, save as it was his strong will to lose it.

progression of contradiction and refusal to accept the invitation—each being more decisive and infatuated than the former. The first speaks in the most courteous manner, and, so far as the gentle request to be excused goes, is mechanically followed by the second in a tone far too common and too dangerous; his ἔχω ἀνάγκην, "I must needs," is set against the careful ἀναγκάζειν, "compel," of the servant (ver. 23, which is not the case with regard to the first rejecters), and thus his ἐρωτῶ σε, "I pray thee," has at least some specious foundation, although with great impropriety and with resolute selfwill he prefers to follow his own ἀνάγκη, or "need," never intending any other. The second dispatches the invitation somewhat more curtly—I am going now on my urgent way, and may not permit myself to be hindered; there rest my security and my pleasure; let that suffice. But the third, whose οὐ δύναμαι, "I cannot," has only the specious sound of courtesy, says this essentially in a half mocking tone—I have a wedding and festal merriment of my own; no other is of any import to me; thou seest how it is, and mayest leave me content! For the Jews this would point back to the law of Moses, Deut. xxiv. 5; and the διὰ τοῦτο, "therefore," suggests an apparent reason which rendered the request to be excused unnecessary. And with this general view accords on the whole what an anonymous writer in the Kirchenfreund für das nördliche Deutschland (1839, No. 71) has suggested upon this exegetical problem; viz., that the distinguishing element of the three answers lies in the words which express the inward disposition of those who excuse themselves. So regarded, it is an external circumstance which imposes a necessity upon the first to decline; he allows himself to be ruled by this necessity, and it may be expected of him that, when the pressure of circumstances is withdrawn, he will yet come: the second yields with more readiness and complacency to the restraining difficulty, and does not feel disposed to surmount it: while the third, and most wilful, utters his scornful and harsh—I cannot do otherwise! There is a certain truth in this, but not the whole truth, nor does it do full justice to the text: for the last οὐ δύναμαι, "I cannot," is not so fundamentally to be distinguished from the first ἔχω ἀνάγκην, "I must needs," as the expression of inner disposition, both resolving themselves into the middle term Tel est mon plaisir (Such is my pleasure); and further, this essay is wrong and one-sided in finding the difference only in this, and in declaring that it is not to be sought, where it is commonly sought, in the distinctive circumstances which restrained the three parties. We have plainly seen that the possessions and the pleasures of the world are here distinguished; but there must also be a certain distinction between the two things which unite in expressing the former, for the Lord did not make this difference without a purpose.

Finally, then, how are the piece of ground, and the oxen, as they together significantly exemplify the former, to be regarded in their dichotomy? This has long been, and still is, the question; and most marvellous have been the perversions of preachers and expositors in their dealing with it. Luther himself strangely erred when he regarded the former as the priests and spiritual guides, who say—We must cultivate the land, that is, govern the people; while the latter cling to worldly honor and consideration, bulls or oxen being in Psa. xxii. the earthly rulers among men! Others have reversed the order, and referring the three subjects to the three relations, civil, spiritual, and household, have made the oxen (though their yokes belong certainly to husbandry) animals destined to sacrificial purposes! The ingenious Herberger involves himself in the snare of his own ingenuity, when he is deluded into saying —"The Lord Jesus, without doubt, referred to three most eminent sects—the Essenes, who cultivated the land; the Pharisees, who were proud, despotic, violent oxen; and the Sadducees, who were altogether and obscenely carnal." These are specimens of error in the exposition which will dispose the reader to forego any further enumeration of them. And yet the true exposition lies palpably at hand. We have already shown that the piece of ground indicates possessions in this world generally and in mass, while the oxen correspond with individual property in detail—and this of itself might well satisfy the requirements of the subject. But this is not the only point in these full and pregnant similitudes—what then is the most essential and fundamental distinction? The Lord himself, as his own expositor, mentions it when he repeats the parable, Matt. xxii. 5, and places ἀγρός, "field," and ἐμπορία, "merchandise," in connection with one another—why then has not this been used as the key to the obscurity of our present passage? The second of the two has also his own piece of ground, and indeed that not a small one, for he can employ upon it no less than five yoke of oxen; the distinction, therefore, in the process of development in human life lies in this, that the former settles down contentedly in his estate, while the latter uses his heritage like a thrifty economist. Hence the full and significant classification which the Lord makes of the people of the world, refusing to come to the feast, by dividing them into—first, those who rest in property, or rather, in this case, acquired possessions in the secure and joyful first feeling of possession;* then, such as are absorbed in commerce or business, for the increase of their property and its revenue; and, finally, those who, possibly without any possessions or anxiety about them, are enjoying themselves in inactive pleasure, simply as such. And with this well agrees the circumstance not remarked at first, that eager activity is first made prominent in the case of the second, in the πορεύομαι, "I go," which does not brook being hindered, and in the laudable prudence of the δοκιμάσαι, "to prove."

* Which would decide what we left undecided before, that the ἰδεῖν is not equivalent to δοκιμάζειν, but is the joyous beholding of his own landed property now obtained, the first joy of possession. Sepp, however, goes astray when he speaks of the three impediments as—pleasure (in the country-seat bought for that purpose!), industry, and sensuality.

Finally, that we may not omit any trait in the parables, the requests to be excused depict in a very striking manner the half hypocritical, half wilful spirit of the two recusants of the former class, who use the same conventional form of speech in their refusal. On the one hand they admit, from their own internal feeling (and therein differing from the third), that their grounds of excuse are not in themselves essentially valid; therefore each says ἔχε με παρητημένον, treat me obligingly this time, let me pass as excused. On the other hand, such a style of speaking as the response to so glorious a summons to the feast of the King of heaven, betrays a certain tincture of scornfulness, almost as if it ran—I thank thee most obediently for thy offer of blessedness! Now, however affectionately the servants of God may execute their commission, and yield to the honest utterance of every sincere heart, it is beyond their instructions and their prerogative to grant such a prayer; the servant cannot have any one excused—all that he can do is, as we shall see, to tell his Lord what has been said to him.

Verses 21-23. The fundamental ideas which are exhibited in the sudden turn which the words now take, and according to which the anger of the great Host against the despisers, passes over into boundless benevolence towards others in their stead, have been observed upon already at Matt. xxii.; but the distinctive characteristic element in the present parable consists in this, that substitutes are twice introduced here instead of those who were first called. Those who enter in, ver. 21, are not the heathens among the Jews, for the city is still, according to Matt. xxii. 7, Jerusalem and Israel,* but those among the people of Israel who were outside the circle of those self-complacent, satisfied, vainly-invited men; that is, the publicans and sinners of chap. xv. 1, see Matt. xxi. 31. Their figurative description points back with verbal precision to ver. 13, in order thus to bind together the two similitudes, and in the third to give a retrospective hint for the interpretation of the second—Exercise benevolence towards the desolate and needy, even as God himself does in the administration of his kingdom! Previously, the poor, generally, had been opposed to the rich neighbors; and then (in the place of the dear friends and kinsmen) in specie the halt, and lame, and blind, the wretched and the despised, whom a dignified great man would hardly like to place at his table; but the repetition of these expressions now, as borrowed from the former similitude, requires the explanation of a spiritual meaning—the spiritually poor and spiritually rich, who gladly and at once obey the call of God. Nor is the specific contrast with those other despisers, which is involved in the words, to be altogether rejected as trifling—The poor have not bought land or oxen to demand their care, the blind cannot go to see and prove anything, the lame cannot go so eagerly and intently here or there; finally, the maimed have no inducement and no ability to assist at the merriment of weddings. Such poor and wretched ones, or rather all such people who are to be found (τοὺς πτωχοὺς κ.τ.λ.), the servant brings in according to the commandment of his lord, finding them in all parts of the city where they are to be found (ῥύμαι are the smaller, narrower passages and alleys, where such people most abound: comp. Isa. xv. 3, where we have the same word in connection with πλατείαις). They come without any refusal, and the servant reports joyfully of his message accomplished; but he observes, and confidentially reports to his master, that yet there is room. The feast and the house are both on a great scale—and here we may think of the many empty places of the absent many, for whom all things had been ready; and still more of the large and liberal benevolence of the great Host. A precious expression is this ἔτι τόπος ἐστι for the riches of the compassion of God—especially when we note the point too often overlooked, that it is not the Lord himself who utters it, but the servant, who knows his master's mind and his master's house full well, gives the assurance first, and his lord approving his words confirms them by repeating—that my house may be filled! "Nec natura nec gratia patitur vacuum" (neither nature nor grace suffers a vacuum)—remarks most beautifully the good Bengel once more. Oh that the proud Jews could have conceived of this amplitude of provision in the kingdom of God for all people! Those who are now called, ver. 23, are actually the heathen; and this only does Matthew adduce. These are yet more wretched in their need, who lie homeless (in the sense of Eph. ii. 12) in the highways around the city, having their miserable lodgment under the shadow of the hedges (Bengel—"sepes mendicorum parietes"). The poverty and abasement of these may forbid them to believe, and their ruined abandonment might disincline them to accept the good tidings, that such as they are invited to the high feast—therefore they must be compelled to come in. Observe the significant progression in the character of the three invitations: to the first called it is only simply said that the time was come, for more than that would be inappropriate after their long earlier calling; the poor and the infirm are graciously taken by the hand and brought in, this being absolutely needful in the case of the maimed, and halt, and blind, who would come, but hardly could; finally, there is the ἀναγκάζειν, "compel," for all who were found without, in which the invitation now supplementary triumphs over every false ἔχω ἀνάγκην,

* Still less may we understand vers. 21 and 23 of a twofold calling of the Gentiles, as if first those who were nearer, and already shone upon by the light of revelation, were called; and then afterwards those who were further removed, locally and morally! (Von Gerlach). So Roos: First the Romans and Greeks, then the Barbarians. But the text does not harmonise with this view.

"I must needs" (ver. 18) that might arise among those without. The perversion of this saying both in the theory and the practice of the church since Augustine explained and justified the compelle intrare by the incorrect and subtile thought—"Foris inveniatur necessitas, ut intus nascatur voluntas" (without let there be found a necessity, that within be born the will). This willingness to come is not to be effected by any external and actual compulsion; nor does the Lord's saying speak of any such, for, according to ver. 17, he would receive only those who come and come voluntarily (Matt. xxii. 3). As those who were brought in came in at the same time of themselves, so now, also, the invariable and indispensable εἰσελθεῖν, "to come in," is connected with the ἀνάγκαζον, "compel," in order to obviate any perversion. We must understand the word in the same sense as the παραβιάζεσθαι, "constrain," of Luke xxiv. 29, Acts xvi. 15, that is, of the urgent appeal and supplication which will not take refusal.* Where there is no proud and refractory refusal, but only, on the contrary, an excess of self-abasement, and the unbelief which that engenders, saying, "I am not worthy, nor can it be truth that I am invited, I cannot go in my beggar-garments to that high table—and even though this fundamental thought should be overlaid by the abject feeling which prefers the free living of the mendicant to the table of a king, the servant's reply is—"I cannot admit thy excuse, I cannot carry back such a message to my Lord, thou shouldst and thou must come! Thy misery must be no hindrance, such as thou art was I to bring! That thou abidest so complacently in thy misery, makes the matter much worse; but to such as thou art must I tell the whole unqualified truth!" This is the true ἀναγκάζειν or "compelling" of evangelical preaching, as it admits not of being applied in the case of those depicted in vers. 18–20. For the rest, that on the whole and in mass there is assumed here in the case of the Gentiles such a compelling of the predisposed mind, followed by such a believing and acceptance of the call, is in strict harmony (exceptions on both sides being allowed for) with the record of the first transitional history of the Gospel: hence the language of Acts xxviii. 28; Rom. ix. 30, and other passages. It is of the call which went forth at the hour of the supper that the parable primarily speaks—and from that time it goes forth more and more mightily (vi semper majore pensans moram), with progressively greater vehemence; for the ἤδη ἕτοιμα, "now ready," gives a fervent impulse to the bounty of the Lord, and makes him long that his house may be filled. Hence, in ver. 21, ἐξελθε ταχέως, "go out quickly," which in the similitude would simply mean—before the feast has grown cold, so that this richly spread table of grace may not be prepared in vain!

Verse 24. It has been strangely insisted upon that this concluding word must belong to the parable; but it obviously does not harmonise with it, and is added to it by our Lord in his own name, as he often closes his similitudes by passing over into their open interpretation. How could such a sentence be appropriately uttered by the master of the house, and reconciled with all that had preceded? It is said that in the ὑμῖν, "to you," the one servant is addressed as the representative of many; but the connection between vers. 23 and 24 renders such a change in the form of address intolerable, not to say that the simple cast of the whole is grievously hurt by this sudden substitution of many before unmentioned servants. To avoid this harshness, some (as Bengel) have supposed that the master is addressing the already introduced poor of ver. 21. But we cannot discern what point or force such a saying of the entertainer would have just at this moment, whether spoken to the servant or to the guests; it would introduce at the close of all something which, to our feeling, would be slightly discordant. What does it concern the servant just now, when he is sent forth to herald a new and more urgent invitation, that those first invited will not taste of the feast? Such an assurance is not only at this point discordant, but it is altogether unnecessary, for the servant know that doubtless already, since he had come back after an unaccomplished errand, and was commanded to go and invite others in the stead of those who refused—he certainly needed not any solemn λέγω γὰρ ὑμῖν, "for I say unto you." And as it respects the poor who have come in, are they to be lifted up, as it were, and have their joy increased by a side-glance at those who had lost what they were to enjoy? How inharmonious a close would this be, of a parable constructed with such tender graciousness throughout! On the other hand, when it is placed in the lips of the true Lord, and regarded as his intimation of the significance of his parable, it assumes all its appropriate impressiveness and power. First comes his ordinary λέγω γάρ, "for I say," with its well-known emphasis, and then by the ὑμῖν, "to you," the application of the lesson, hitherto addressed to one, is extended to all the guests at that feast of the Pharisees.* Further, the majestic turn given to the words at once reveals his meaning—My supper, to which I not only invite you, but which I as the Son, with the Father, have myself prepared for you! Similarly, the recurrence in the γεύσεται, "shall taste," to the confident expression of ver. 15, has its significance, as giving a decisive answer to the false confidence of that apostrophe: "Assuredly ye are all called; if not the only such, yet the first and most preëminent; ye are as truly called to eat bread in the kingdom of God as to eat bread to-day at this table—but ye are only invited, and ye are invited in vain, for ye come not! Verily I say unto you in this parable, and if ye will not understand that, I say unto you over and above this parable, that others, hitherto not called, shall enter instead of you and taste of God's supper and mine." The transition from the ὑμῖν, "to you," to the third person, the ἐκείνων, "those," of the parable, is thought to be inconsistent with this view (Olshausen regards it as decisive against it), but we cannot help thinking that this gives a still keener edge and delicacy of precision to the Lord's words, which thus with a kind of irony half openly and half covertly address the present company. I say unto you (who were intended in them) that none of those who were bidden in this narrative (ye know now full well that they are yourselves) shall sit at my table in heaven. Thus the ἐκείνων is, first, a conclusive reference to the main figure of the parable as exhibiting themselves; with an additional undertone (not unfrequent in his word) of depreciation and turning away on his part; and thus forming a somewhat ironical contrast with the dignified ἀνδρῶν, "men." For these scorners, however much they may assume to be genuine men in rank, consideration, understanding and consistent behavior, are alas! men also in excusing themselves and turning away; although they pride themselves, in their contempt of the poor within and without, in that first invitation which they nevertheless reject.

* Hence the current "nöthigen" (press), in the sense of einladen (invite), which remarkably elucidates the idea.

* The γάρ by no means requires us to assume this to be a continuation of the words of the κύριος; it rather joins on to the former καὶ εἶπεν, and means to say—So will God hereafter rather call in the Gentiles to fill his house, than pursue you who scorn it, with useless grace. The parable is ended, and it all comes to this—For ye are, by your own full determination, those who remain without!

Verses 26, 27. Although the συνεπορεύοντο, "there went with him," of the Evangelist points to the circumstance that he is relating occurrences which took place in the great final journey of our Lord, and, consequently, ver. 25 may be regarded as the formula of a new commencement; yet the subject of the following discourse shows, as we have already said, that there is an immediate connection between it and the preceding, and therefore this πορεύεσθαι or journey of Jesus must at least be assumed to have followed immediately on the breaking up of the feast.* I say unto you—the great requisite is, to come, and eat of my supper! This we have just heard, and now the Lord proceeds almost as if continuing the same discourse—If any man cometh to me, and will be my disciple! The true acceptance of the invitation at the time of supper, is to come to him, to receive what he saith, to yield to his requirements, and follow his teaching. Is this a mere "loose coincidence;" the unity of the whole being fortuitous, or the mere result of the Evangelist's art? We think that these discourses were thus uttered by our Lord in immediate sequence; just as we often find, and shall especially in chs. xv. and xvi., that the Lord continues for a considerable space to dilate upon the same train of thoughts, until they are brought to their full conclusion: and may not this be regarded as no slight argument of the historical certainty and authenticity of the evangelical records?* The essential meaning of these two utterances, so often repeated in various forms, we have developed upon Matt. x. 37, 38. This was his hard saying, concerning which it might have been said by many—"He capriciously repels, instead of attracting, the people!" But in what sense the keen and rigorous expression of "hating,"† here only (besides John xii. 25) used, is to be understood, and how it is not to be understood, every unbiassed reader may apprehend at once—for to hate parents, wife, and children is in itself (as Grotius says) an impium, an ungodly thing; and to hate one's self an ἀδύνατον, impossibility, Eph. v. 29. In this place let the significant ἔτι δὲ καί, "yea and also," have its significant prominence, the meaning of which Rieger so excellently brings out: "Every thing without us derives its power of harm from the love of our own life; for all external objects blow upon this latent spark, and derive their agreeableness and fascination from their pretensions to sustain our own life and happiness." Consequently, he who hates and forsakes all things else, without hating and renouncing his own life in them, hates and renounces them all in vain. Thus much at the outset, at least as the ground and foundation of a sincere intention, belongs to the first coming, and to the first conditions of discipleship: in the subsequent following of the Lord, the cross laid upon him by God, becomes more and more understood by the disciple.

Verses 28–30. This figure will naturally carry us back to Matt. vii. 24–27,‡ but we must not confound the distinctive reference of the two. There, the laying of a firm foundation is made prominent as the great essential, here the

* Schleiermacher thinks it necessary to the style of the Evangelist, that in that case the end of the meal should be expressly mentioned. In any case the real connection of the subject would fall into the scheme of Luke's plan; we cannot but think it more probable, however, that the Lord himself continued the ideas on which he had been dwelling.

* To what was prefatorily said upon this entire section, vers. 8–35, we may add the remarks of Braune, which almost exactly hit the point: "The Lord saw now in the people a vague and indistinct inclination towards himself, as in the Pharisee he had seen a vague and indistinct aversion," only that these words scarcely describe the inclination and aversion in both cases so rash and unthinking, and in which all humbleness was wanting.

† Lange thinks it "well worthy of observation that these rigorous words in their most rigorous expression occur just in the gospel of the Christian humanity"—and asks, "was it the Evangelist Luke who was bound to the Hebraism hate?" prosecution of the building is spoken of, which has its own peculiar difficulties. It might appear there, that the sure foundation would secure everything, and that all the rest depended upon that; but now the Lord continues the figure and adds its complement to what was before a general and introductory saying: He tells us that any man, even after having laid the foundation, may nevertheless be put to confusion. Let no one fail to note this, who would rightly understand the whole. What, then, is in this case the building? Not so much the first coming to the Lord as such (which is rather presupposed in the θέλειν οἰκοδομῆσαι, "intending to build"), but the following of Christ in his full discipleship, the μαθητὴς εἶναι, "being a disciple," with all that pertains to that expression. Nitzsch, in a sermon on this text,* says, "It is easier to throw life away, than to lead it in a Christian manner." The great end is not to be gained with swift dispatch, but we must build, and continue to build, till the ἐκτελέσαι, "finishing," is attained; the perfection of discipleship is, again to quote Nitzsch, "the great design, and the great prospect, which we all have ever before us." The expression πύργος, "tower," signifies any high building, but it seems to be selected with some slight allusion to that old, but ever renewed, history of Babel; for the children of God must not build as those children of men did; their building is not to remain unachieved, it must finally in a right sense reach unto and reach into heaven. But all half-Christianity becomes a Babel in the end.† The sitting down first, and considering well from the very beginning all that is involved in the continuing and finishing, is to commence with deep thoughtfulness, not rashly and superficially, in contrast with that unconsidering and thoughtless running after him, which was witnessed at this time, and which the Lord intends to humble and repel. The bare, precipitate resolution is very far from accomplishing all that is necessary at the outset; we cannot thus build from above downwards, as if we were already in heaven, as children begin to paint their houses from the roof. Nor do the walls, staircases, and doors complete the perfect dwelling-house; the ἐκτελεῖν or finishing embraces much, even down to the last and smallest nail and bolt which pertains πρὸς ἀπαρτισμόν, that is, to the garnishing and furnishing (not to say the decoration) of the house. How many builders of houses deceive themselves still in this counting of the cost, as well in the actual fact as in that which it here illustrates! A building left unfinished provokes men to mockery, as does every abortive effort of will without power, betraying a lack of prudence in planning for the accomplishment of its plans; and it is on this, alas! universal, fact that the Lord bases his parable, but only that he may extend and vary its application. In some human undertakings, indeed, intelligent men would regard it as honorable in a man to desist from a project rather than to persist in its accomplishment through all kinds of unjustifiable means; there are great ruins in our land which need not fear mockery. But in the building of God's discipleship, the completion may be righteously demanded and expected of all who have begun; in this case the not continuing brings its own fitting disgrace in the sight of God and man. It is only the complete and decided Christian who enforces the respect of the world; but the world is quick to indemnify itself upon those who are only half-Christians, and who visibly give up the object which they profess to aim at: the savorless salt is trodden under their feet. Indeed, it is a different case if they only see and are constrained to admit, that a man, though he has not finished his building, is industrious and unwearied in his efforts, and that however slowly he proceeds, he is likely with such zeal and earnestness to accomplish his enterprise at last. But when they actually see the building at a stand, or falling down, after it had been begun (indeed, if they sometimes only think they see it), the man's name, οὗτος ὁ ἄνθρωπος, "this man," becomes a reproach and a proverb. Thus the world readily anticipates and takes upon itself the judgment upon a disgraceful incompleteness in religion; that condemnation of a beginning without finishing, which belongs only to God, but which is foreshadowed and pre-announced in the true though maliciously meant condemnation passed by sinful men. Or if it should come to pass (though the rule here takes no account of such an unusual exception) that under some circumstances the children of the world should praise me for having become rational again, and having given up the foolish rigor of piety—then will the devil in his time take their place, and finish the mockery in his own way.

‡ This parallel is simple and obvious enough; and there is no necessity for Sepp's subtle reference to the unfortunate building of Pilate (or the tower of Siloam!) any more than for the allusion found in the next parable to the unfortunate campaign of Herod against Aretas. Most inappropriate is all such learned trifling.

When it thus happens to one who has actually laid the foundation, we may strictly speaking say (and this reconciles our parable with Matt. vii. 24, comp. Matt. xiii. 20, 21) that the foundation itself was wanting, that is, that a well-considered decided beginning was not made in order to a thorough completion; for the hasty laying of a foundation without due counting of the cost is itself, as it were, a foundation without foundation. This is in the meaning of our Lord, since the subsequent incompetence springs from an original lack, from a love of the world and of his own life, which the builder has not thoroughly renounced but retained. Therefore sit down before and reckon aright, whether thou hast sufficient! But how then? Are we to finish this building from the resources of our own providing? Far be that from us, we cannot even begin it from them. We have not wherewith, we are not to build with our own: to know this, to cast away all our own materials as useless, and to venture in perfect self-consecration upon the ground of grace, is the essential requirement, as ver. 26 has told us.* There is consequently a concealed irony in the εἰ ἔχει, "whether he have," which points forcibly to our own poverty; and the true counting of the cost which the Lord requires, is to set out with the determination to renounce ourselves and build upon the fast foundation of grace. Lest the first parable should be misunderstood, and this great truth not be perceived in it, a second now follows, which more plainly brings out this essential relation of the case.

* Whose sermons have so much profound exegetical value, that we cannot but lament his not writing direct exposition.

† The disciple, however, must build, fundamentally and loftily build. Alford's view, that the man's wishing to build the tower is itself a vain idea, is assuredly incorrect: not a syllable in the parable warrants that thought; it is opposed to the essential meaning of the two similitudes in their connection (building and warfare), and is not in harmony with the phraseology of our Lord and Scripture generally.

Verses 31, 32. Dost thou, that is, think thou hadst and still hast sufficient, then does the Lord, in the process of discipleship, apply to thee his rigid tests, and proves to thee that he is too mighty for thee; he will fight against thee with his sanctifying power and discipline, so that thine impotence as opposed to him, shall become manifest to thyself—well for thee if, after that, thou seekest peace with him, in order to a new and genuine beginning. The building, before, looked rather back to the commencement (ἤρξατο οἰκοδομεῖν, "he began to build"); but now the warfare exhibits, properly speaking, the finishing unto victory, the winning and maintaining our great object. This similitude is often entirely misunderstood by those who, despite the connection directly established between ver. 33 and ver. 32 by the οὕτως, "so," interpret the desiring conditions of peace of a disgraceful discontinuance of the war and relapse into the world, as if it meant—If he has not power, he should not have undertaken the war any more than the building, or should now make peace again. Whatever analogy may seem to lead to this mischievous exposition, it is altogether opposed to the true analogy of both these parables; for the Lord, who had just before given up the leaving off midway to its appropriate scorn, could not with such a tone as this in any sense counsel such discontinuance of the war; and τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην, "conditions of peace," clearly corresponds to τὰ πρὸς ἀπαρτιαμόν, "sufficient to finish," as does εἰ δύνατός ἐστιν, "whether he be able," to εἰ ἔχει, "whether he have," this being the object which it should be in both cases a man's wisdom to secure.† We would rather say that the second parable continues and expounds the former in another aspect of the matter; bringing out, to speak more correctly, the inner meaning of the previous ἔχειν, "have," inasmuch as it can only come from the sense of want, and consequent seeking of grace, from the sense of powerlessness and consequent seeking for peace. War, as the Lord here intends it, can only be where there is already a beginning of discipleship: man naturally is at peace with the world and its prince, and does not seek conditions of peace with God. Consequently, that other king, with whom this conflict has to do, can by no means be the prince of this world or the devil;* but no other than God, the disciple's Lord, opposing himself as an apparent enemy to his children, because his sacred and sanctifying power and discipline must ever be in conflict with all their independent life and will, until it be extinguished. We must understand it in the sense of such passages as Job ix. 19, 32, 33, xv. 24; comp. Judith xvi. 16. God comes with twenty thousand against our ten thousand, that is, with always twice our power, be we strong and well armed as we may.† Our ten thousand have been already received and acquired in our previous discipleship; it is the strength which we have, and which seems so adequate, and which we are tempted to count our own, and use against the further disciplinary power of God. This is a foolish and melancholy declension into the old, not yet wholly uprooted error, which assumes that we are, or have, or can do, anything of ourselves in the presence of Him to whom all power belongs—and it is ironically exhibited in the relation between man and God being set forth as the going out of one king against another king! We must begin and achieve the building, but never as in conflict with him, who alone has, and imparts the power and resources requisite. In this matter all proceeds from beginning to end only in peace, in peace sued for. Not that men deliberately and consciously purpose to fight against God, any more than they duly considered, in the former case, that they could not finish the building; they simply value themselves upon the power they have as their own, even while piously attributing it to the "rich grace of God." It is not merely before the commencement of conversion and the first suing for peace, that proud man thus exalts himself, rashly declaring, when God opposes him with his law—that he will keep it with all his heart, practise all virtues and avoid all vices; when God threatens him with temptation—that he will soon pass through it, resolute not to fall; when God speaks of solemn tests and Christ speaks of his cross—that he is ready, with fixed decision, to bear and encounter all! But here the Lord refers to that worse folly—against which the first supplication for peace should insure the disciple for

* Olshausen refers to Augustin, Conf. viii. 6, speaking of two disciples—Et ambo jam tui, ædificabant turrim sumtu idoneo, relinquendi omnia sua et sequendi te.

† Alford here agrees with me, and speaks of the ordinary misinterpretation—which destroys all the sense.

* Braune, alas! still holds to this; and Lange, too, who interprets it of the "prince of darkness."

† There is probably a subtle significance in the change of ἐν and μετὰ. Man is, even in authority, as it were only one person among (בְּתוֹךְ) his fellows, but God comes in kingly majesty with his ministering hosts. Or better, with Alford: "Can I, with (ἐν, with all that I have, all my instruments of war) my ten thousand, stand the charge of him who cometh against me with (μετά, being only as many as he pleases to bring with him for the purpose—see Psa. lxviii, 17, E. V.) twenty thousand?"

ever—viz., that those who, when converted, afterwards turn the grace which they have received and their little kingly power against the King of kings, instead of continuing for ever to seek, in yet more perfect self-renunciation and holiness, fresh accessions of grace. Be thou ever so well equipped with excellencies—he will make them sins to thee; be thou ever so full of good resolves—his tests will break them; regard thyself as ever so well furnished and armed to appear and stand before him at his coming—he will at last, in death and judgment, remain mightier than thou.

To the previous disgrace of the building unaccomplished should now, properly speaking, correspond the disgrace of going forth to the battle in impotence and being overcome; this aspect of the case is, however, pretermitted now as being sufficiently understood from the preceding. On the other hand, nothing is said in ver. 32 (let it be well noted!) of scorn or shame, since to pray for peace in the presence of the more mighty one involves no disgrace, is rather the most praiseworthy prudence that man can exhibit. To send an ambassage, is voluntarily and humbly to take up the cross with which the Lord opposes us, and to bear it in self-sacrificing devotion before our essential and true crucifixion. He who is refractory against the cross, as well as he who recoils before it (for the fleeing before the other king is also in vain), appears here a θεομάχος, a fighter against God; he who takes up the cross submits. Thus the two similitudes are, when accurately regarded, parallel with the two utterances of vers. 26, 27; to hate the world and our own life, is essential to the first coming, else the cost has not been justly counted; the cross of discipline, test and trial in order to confirmation of faith, comes against those who are following Christ, and to sue for peace is ever the only strength in this warfare. The latter applies the test to ascertain whether the former has been genuinely and fundamentally done. Thus from beginning to end the cost of being a Christian is great; and yet it is not too great for such as are poor and humble in spirit. Peace with God ever renewed, graciously assured and confirmed by the seeming opposition of his grace, confirmed in obedient submission to his guidance, reception of his sanctifying influence, enjoyment of all his infused gifts and energizing power—this is finally, and in the highest sense, the consummation of discipleship under the cross.

Verse 33. By this emphatic reiteration the Lord would ask—Have ye truly understood all these things? The οὕτως, "so," which must not be superficially passed over, gives the express and formal interpretation, not only of the sueing for peace in the second similitude, but also of the counting of the cost in the first; for the renunciation of all this is ours, is the common foundation and central idea of both; the ὑπάρχοντα, "what one hath," are not only the cost of the building, but the strength also for the war.* Thus it is a self-renunciation, the sincere and humble acknowledgment of our abiding poverty and helplessness; such as in relation to God truth and right alike demand from us all through. He who submits to be brought to this condition by the salt of truth, and the discipline of God in the teaching and guidance of Christ, has thereby himself become salt, for the riches of God's grace and the power of his spirit then enter into the needy and empty soul.

Verses 34, 35. This saying concerning salt the Lord here utters for the third time; let the exposition, therefore, be consulted upon Matt. v. 13 and Mark ix. 50, where it will be seen how pointedly the latter passage especially coincides with the connection of our present place. There it was made prominent at the close, how the salt of humility and self-denial is bound up with the true peace one with another; here it is similarly represented, after ver. 32, as bound up with the prayed for and experienced peace with God. There are those who would here interpret the ἐν τίνι ἀρτυθήσεται—wherewith, then, will the food be seasoned? or again—in quo cibo eo (scil. sale) utetur, in what shall it be used as seasoning? But both these interpretations are incorrect, and the saying is assuredly the same in all three passages (as the ἐν τίνι ἁλισθήσεται of Matt. v. is decisively expounded by the ἐν τίνι αὐτὸ ἀρτύσετε of Mark ix.). It is the savorless salt itself which is spoken of here down to the final αὐτό, "it;" εἰς γῆν, "for the land," also is not the same with εἰς κοπρίαν, "for the dunghill," for the οὔτε, "nor," forbids that; it is good neither as laid upon ground (or arable land), nor as mixed with manure†—in brief εἰς οὐδὲν ἰσχύει ἔτι, εἰ μὴ βληθῆναι ἔξω, it has no longer any virtue or goodness for anything. Thus, finally, the disciple who has utterly apostatized from his calling and the beginning of his discipleship is not to be restored; he is abandoned already to the scorn and contempt of men.

* There are passages which we cannot hear and read with too keen inquisition into their words. Τὰ πρὸς ἀπαρτισμόν, "sufficient to finish," we have not, but the great builder, who himself edifies us, affords them to us; τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην, "conditions of peace," he does indeed assure to us who ask them, but in this case our ἐρωτᾶν, "desiring," is made more prominent as the condition, and hence τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην itself designates our prayer.

† Men do not sow on salt (Psa. cvii. 34), nor is salt used as manure, though many strangely so interpret here. (See Deut. xxix. 23; Judg. ix. 45; Psa. cvii. 34; Jer. xvii. 6; Zeph. ii. 9.) If the noble and excellent substance is useless for its own proper function, it is not to be used εἰς ἄλλο γένος.

HIS RECEIVING SINNERS VINDICATED FROM THE CENSURE OF THE SELF-RIGHTEOUS. THE SINNER'S REPENTANCE OR PUNISHMENT, IN A SERIES OF PARABLES.

(Luke xv. 4–xvi. 31.)

We would scarcely affirm, with Ebrard, that the parables of chap. xv. are closely connected with the subject of the previous chapter, as exhibiting in its utmost clearness and force that spiritual poverty and sense of helplessness which Christ requires in those who come to him, and to which alone he assures acceptance; though we are free to admit that in Luke's arrangement the doctrine of Jesus in chap. xiv. is a certain preparation for that of chap. xv. (Ebrard, after joining these two chapters somewhat too closely, makes the connection between chaps. xv. and xvi. much less strict than it really is.) Nor can we accept Olshausen's view of the contrast between the exhibition of compassionate love as now depicted, and the strict severity of what had preceded; thus making the point of junction between these discourses the contrast between our Lord's rejection of some and acceptance of others. For although the Evangelist seems in chap. xv. to make a certain reference to chap. xiv. 25, giving prominence in his present description of the crowd around our Lord's person to the better, humbler element in it, yet the words of ch. xv. 1 themselves have all the appearance of a new commencement generally. In particular, the πάντες, "all" (omitted by the Vulg.) which Luther has groundlessly translated by allerlei (comp. Matt. ix. 10, πολλοί), must not be understood of all the publicans and sinners of this immediate place; it manifestly enlarges the scene to embrace the whole sphere of our Saviour's general teaching. Where and when this now specifically took place, does not affect the question at all; it is the constant and ever-recurring scene, the drawing near of sinners, and the murmuring of the "righteous"—as it is exhibited in Matt. ix. 10, 11, Luke vii. 39, and once more, in this place. Grotius rightly discerns this tone of generality in the form of expression ἦσαν ἐγγίζοντες, were murmuring ("murmured"), and compares chap. iv. 31. And as the concise εἶπε δέ, "and he said," of ver. 11 can only indicate an immediate sequence of discourse (according to Luke's habit of interpolating such remarks to quicken attention); so must the keen discernment of a profound exposition come to the conclusion that the whole of the sixteenth chapter (which closely binds together its own two halves in vers. 14, 15, and hangs ver. 19 on the sentences, vers. 15–18, spoken in connection with ver. 14) belongs to the series of connected discourses begun with chap. xv. 1.* Consequently, chap. xvi. 1 does not introduce a general formula (though the expression might seem to imply as much), but the Lord's address to the disciples corresponds to that addressed to the Pharisees, chap. xv. 3; just as we have once and again seen in chap. xii. 1, 15, 22, 54. Even Schleiermacher found chap. xvi. intelligible only in connection with chap. xv.; and it is very generally allowed, because so obvious, that the disciples referred to in chap. xvi. 1 are those who had just come to Jesus, the publicans who stood at the threshold of discipleship. But it is equally plain that the Pharisees in chap. xvi. 14 are continuing the mockery of chap. xv. 2.

This is the profoundly significant manner of the Evangelists generally, and of Luke in particular, by formulæ apparently indefinite to carry on the most precise and definite narrative, thus leaving something for our intelligent investigation to find out, and accustoming us to understand the same words in different senses in different connections. When we read with the necessary discrimination, keeping this fact in mind, we shall be able to lay a sure foundation for the right understanding of the two parables concerning the unjust judge and the rich man, in their harmony and connection; and to disentangle the former especially from the confusion in which expositors have involved it.

And what a mighty and gracious testimony is that which, in ver. 2, is extorted from the lips of his enemies! Yea, these stony-hearted men are constrained involuntarily to greet the Saviour of sinners with such a Hosanna, and thus unconsciously to fulfil their duty in directing poor sinners, by themselves rejected, to the true source of their salvation.

This is not, indeed, their conscious purpose; their own perversion of mind and wickedness of will in this remarkable utterance is great and manifold. "The sinners!" (or, as without the article, Such sinners as these!) They altogether forget the repentance of these sinners, as coming between their hearing and his receiving; hence it is forcibly set before them in vers. 7 and 10, and affectingly depicted in vers. 17-20. Their infatuated charge—"He receiveth them!"—condemns in him the first intercourse with such sinners, his having anything to do with them at all; leaving out of sight the fact that such sinners might, and would, be brought to repentance Luke records only, ver. 1, that they drew near unto him that they might hear him; why, then, did not these malignants confine their rebukes to that alone, even as in chap. xiii., 14 the ruler of the synagogue had condemned the θεραπεύεσθαι, "being healed," of the people? Should he not, then, heal them and teach them; should he not let them draw near and hear? Hearing is, as teachers to the people should have known, the only true way to the beginning of repentance and faith, and the ceasing to be a sinner. These people came not, as the Evangelist testifies, to see signs, to eat bread, to be delivered from their sicknesses, but only to hear, comp. chap. v. 1. It was the Lord's deep earnestness, that truth of his (as chap. xiv.) so rigorously decided and requiring such rigorous decision, which ever drew to him the souls deeply conscious of need, while it repelled only the idle concourse of the crowd. "If hearts are to be attracted, they must mark something genuine to suit their case. No man tempted and tried would go to a free liver, but to those whose reputation is that of being strict. For from such they hope honorable and just dealing, and more likely cure (Berl. Bib.). The humble hear and learn, they find the seeking and accepting grace of God in the pure truth of his word as issuing from the lips of Jesus; the proud and perverted murmur and condemn, their dark understandings darken the love of God where it would shine most brightly. These did not, indeed, dare to direct their words immediately against the Holy one of God; but they διεγόγγυζον, that is, they murmured among themselves, here and there, yet so that their murmuring should reach his ears—though he would otherwise have known and marked it well.

In this saying of the Pharisees, which we must closely analyse, in order to seize the proper point from which our Lord's long answer proceeds, there are several distinct grounds of error, which we may thus exhibit. First: We are not sinners ourselves! Then—as Luke himself writes in ver. 1, adopting the current phraseology: Only by gross and scandalous sins, e.g., by such unrighteousness as the publican's, does a man become a ἁμαρτωλός, or "sinner." Thirdly: With this they conjoin the uncharitable and irrational condemnation of whole classes of men as such—All publicans are such sinners—while the Evangelist, on the other hand, designedly places between them a note of distiction in his καί, "and." Finally: By such premises—adding to this false major an equally false minor—they arrive at the unscrupulous and malignant conclusion that even he, the Holy Prophet himself, must be a sinner too! "Tell me with whom thou consortest, and I will tell thee what thou art." This ambiguous common-place they apply to him as they would to any other common man—who might have no special vocation to trouble himself about those who need instruction and amendment. And even in such a case their meaning is perverse, for every pious man has in reality and in the end both the obligation entailed upon him, and the ability to discharge it in some sense; the rule of Psa. i. 1, as applicable to ourselves, only requires us to avoid the fellowship of sinners so far as it might be a temptation and a snare; else must we in love and in pity strive to exert a wholesome influence upon them. And is the Lord Jesus alone to be excluded from this? They mark him out by their emphatic οὗτος, "this man," and incautiously betray in this little word the true grounds of their malignant conclusion, which they would not have arrived at in the case of any other man, and which wilfully forgets all that their own eyes must have seen in his conduct and character. "This man, who is contrary to us now and is everywhere in our way (ch. xiii. 18) who receiveth not, and doth not acknowledge us, who doth alienate the people's hearts from our chairs of instruction, and so forth. This man, whose claims we also will not admit, and whom we will not hear, turns on that account to the rabble; it is plain, therefore, that we are quite justified in our action concerning him, for he eateth wherever he can eat, without making any inquiry about the company" (Matt. xi. 19; Luke vii. 34). They omit now any reference to the drinking, because fellowship with the table of the unclean was sufficiently defined and characterised without it, in their accustomed way of speaking—see Acts xi. 3. And all this comes to their minds and their lips, because they know nothing by their own experience of the work of God in calling sinners, and have no illustration in their own hearts of the coming to repentance of those who are called. If they had they would have recognised the great foundation of all Divine revelation from the forfeiture of paradise downwards—that "God receiveth sinners!" and their allegation against the hated οὗτος (like Matt. ix. 3, somewhat more intelligently than here) would have condemned only His presumption in doing what was solely the work of God? But then arose the question, Is it solely and immediately the work of God? Were they not expressly appointed to seek and invite sinners to come to God for acceptance? Ah! if they had known themselves and the heart of God, the grace which preceded and pervaded even the law in the Old Testament, they would have known that the holier a man was, and the more like God, the more gracious and condescending must he be towards sinners. If they had understood the prophecies concerning the Messiah, they would have recognised Jesus by this distinctive token of his Messiahship, and would have hailed him with another οὗτος—Yea, this man is He! See Isa. xlii. 3, l. 4, etc.

Thus the fundamental idea from which our Lord's entire and ample answer—seizing and uprooting their wilful error in its essential principle—proceeds, is no other than this: "What is a sinner? How stands it, how does it go, with him in his sin, and in his repentance in order to God's acceptance of him? Are ye then altogether ignorant as to this? Ye are yourselves truly sinners like these—now these suffer themselves to be sought and found—but is it otherwise with you? Then woe unto you in your impenitence!" Thus the reply given to them is, in its full completeness, to be exhibited under two aspects. On the one hand, penitent sinners are justified in their approach; they are shown to be literally received, even as their objection ran; they are then further instructed for their after discipline. But, on the other hand, it warns sinners who are impenitent in their murmuring pride; but in such a manner as to show them that the love, which arrays before them the punishment threatened, does yet seek them still, if peradventure they may accept instruction and escape from condemnation. This gives us the substance of the whole, down to the final parable concerning the rich man in torment, and further Abraham's lesson of believing! The central theme is this—The sinner's repentance or doom, by which he is either gained and saved, or left and lost; so depicted as to show that the seeking love of God persists despite the stiff-necked opposition of the sinner, and still invites even after the first outbreak of punishment. First, the sinner's repentance. And here it is exhibited to the self-righteous Pharisees, blindly rushing to their own doom—in order to the justification of his own conduct, and if possible to awaken shame in their own hearts—that the grace of the Three-One God seeks to retrieve lost sinners, receives back again the penitent, bears with the perverse, and thereby still seeks them likewise. These are the three parables of ch. xv. Then, as the transitional middle-term between the great alternative before presented—the sinner's prudent wisdom in avoiding punishment. There we find it declared—in the hearing of the Pharisees—to the new disciples, and especially to those who had been publicans, for their encouragement as well as for their necessary warning, that the superabundant grace of God not only permits to the sinner, absolved in the reckoning with Him, the use of the worldly goods which had been the mammon of unrighteousness for all purposes of brotherly kindness, but absolutely requires it; and that fidelity in the dispensation of this love will be rewarded, while the opposite unfaithfulness will only involve and draw after it a new punishment. This we have in ch. xvi. 1–13, a parable of contrast, derived from the prudence of the children of this world, and which therefore the Lord, to obviate all possible misunderstanding, has himself expressly interpreted.* Finally, the sinner's punishment, which falls upon him in the kingdom of the dead when he has persisted in scorning the love of God, which down to the last sought his soul; after he has thereby hardened his heart into unbelief of the extant word of God, and into all unmercifulness against his neighbor. Thus it is once more exhibited to the Pharisees, for their conviction and warning, that presumptuous practical unbelief in God's revelation brings upon self-righteous and hypocritical sinners these torments, which may be the only remaining way—though a severe one—still, if it were possible, to win them. Thus is the last of these parables, placed, as we may hope, in its own clear light; and the express and instructive preparatory address (vers. 15–18), to those who are aimed at, is a kind of index to the true interpretation, just as the previous parable received its explanation at its conclusion, vers. 10–13.

THE SEEKING OF THE LOST, THE JOY OVER THE FOUND: THE LOST SHEEP, AND THE WOMAN'S PIECE OF SILVER.

(Luke xv. 4–10 [Matt. xviii. 12, 13].)

Before we enter more minutely into the exposition of the first two parallel parables, in their significant juxtaposition, we must apprehend the full meaning of the trilogy of the lost and the found again. But first of all we must notice the dichotomy which pervades the whole (and which Luke makes evident in ver. 11): the seeking of the lost comes forward in the two former parables which have a more directly figurative character, though expressly interpreted for us; the acceptance of the penitent, whose coming has been prompted indeed by the seeking, and in conjunction with this the long-suffering forbearance towards the stiff-necked (who is still sought by that forbearance) appear together in the third parable, which is followed by no interpretation, since parable and interpretation almost entirely coincide.* To the penitent "publican and sinner" is opposed the self-righteous Pharisee as a worse sinner than he—making it in the end very plain who the "ninety and nine just persons" are.

But now for the threefold series, and the distinction, also, between the first and the second. Bengel's words, which so profoundly penetrate

* In the two former parables the prominent personality is the seeking love of him who had lost, in the third the sinner himself, as submitting to be found and repenting. Thus it is speaking too indefinitely, to dispatch the two former parables as the mere "introduction to the affecting history of the prodigal son."

* And yet how many have failed to perceive even this, and still more its true connection with what precedes, and with what follows, as the middle point between them. It is by no means the mere "transition from the dogmatic to the moral" (as Ebrard says, and Olshausen too, describing them as "parables concerning the benevolent love of man"), as if the point of connection was the condemnation in a final parable of "a hard-hearted indifference to our neighbor." The deeper fundamental idea is repentance unto new life and new love in faith, in order to escaping from eternal misery and need.

the meaning of the whole, say all that is necessary; we have only to develop and exhibit on all sides his concise hints. "Ovis, drachma, filius perditus: peccator stupidus, sui plane nescius, sciens et voluntarius" (the sheep, the piece of money, the lost son: the stupid sinner, clearly ignorant of himself, knowing and willing). We might take it for granted, in our Lord's discourses, that the two former parables, with all their analogy, are not intended to teach simply the same thing; but that they bear somewhat the same relation to each other as the grain of mustard seed and the leaven, the hid treasure and the pearls, in Matt. xiii. Olshausen, as if he had not on this occasion consulted Bengel, sees the truth afar off, but speaks doubtfully—"The second parable is obscure. For I cannot persuade myself that it contributes no new feature to the general picture presented by the three parables; and that consequently the contrast between γυνή and ἄνθρωπος, between δέκα and ἑκατόν is merely accidental. Yet I have nothing positive to say as to the true explanation, and therefore leave it to those who are more keen-sighted." He then makes a timid reference to the comparison of the kneading woman, Matt. xiii. 33 (the virgins, chap. xxv. 1, are not in point), on which we also took occasion to refer to the present passage. We shall see how well-grounded is the analogy of interpretation between the woman there and the woman here; and how securely we may rely upon Bengel's explanation of the entire trilogy, as we shall develop it, with the consequent distinctive significance of its middle member. Can we suppose that the first and the third would have so distinctive a reference, but the second be without it? Can we regard the Lord as almost repeating, unnecessarily, the very same thing? Be it far from us to think so!

The distinction in that which is lost is so far indicated by Bengel, as to show that such a distinction exists. Consequently we may be assured that there is also a corresponding distinction in the seeker of the several instances. But the person seeking must be God in Christ, that which is lost must be man in his condition as a sinner. In seeking ourselves the contrasts between the lost and the seeker we must first mark the threefold personality of the latter, the reference of which to the Trinity Bengel has also perceived. The woman cannot be primarily and absolutely the church, as in Matt. xiii. For this is itself only a recovered sheep, a piece of silver found. The Lord apprehends the sinner (this was our starting-point) under the threefold aspect of his sin. He first regards him as in the midst of his actual and present course of sin, from that benignant point of view under which he is viewed by the grace which is resolute not to give him up, and in which he is regarded in that inexhaustible normal passage, Isa. liii. 6; then he appears as a foolish and wandering sheep, straying shepherdless in the ways of perdition, peccator stupidus. The Lord afterwards descends and ascends to the result and the first principle of such a condition. The sheep continuing to stray is regarded in the one case as a treasure perfectly lost; and, in the other, the beginning of his error is exhibited, as that of a child consciously and deliberately revolting against his father. The foolish, wandering sheep (as opposed to whom those who know the way might be termed just, if they knew it aright, and walked in it accordingly), are sought again and found by the Son, who is himself the calling word, the wisdom, and the way: hence we see the sheep and its shepherd, whose voice the publicans and sinners even now hear! The sinner lying in the dust, who has, alas! reached the first goal of his evil way (having, however, still the stamp of God upon him, as he once belonged to God's treasured possession—glancing forward to the third)—sui plane nescius, in the עָפָר of φθορά and of θάνατος, the dust of corruption and death (while, on the other hand, a sheep has at least some instinct of pasture, and a kind of remembrance of the shepherd's voice)—is sought again and found by the Spirit, who is the energy of the life and light of God, the breath of life which first removes the dust, the light which dispels the darkness (John i. 4). The Spirit is indeed presented in Scripture, from Gen. i. 1, 2, downwards, as feminine and motherly; but it is as he works, enlightens, and sweeps, by the instrumentality of the church of God upon earth. Thus there is some truth in the observation of Luther, who understands here "the Christian church;" but this woman is not the church in herself, but the Holy Spirit in the church, or the church as the organ of the Spirit. She is, as the bride in humanity, so the mother in God. The Spirit and the Bride say Come!—to the Lord. But the Spirit and the mother speak in invitation to every hearer of their voice—Come and join with us! Rev. xxii. 17. Finally, whence originated this wandering of the sinner, and this lying in the dust? He is, indeed, no sheep, nor is he a piece of money, but he is of divine original. In the beginning of his sin, he can be regarded only as a peccator sciens et voluntarius, a conscious and voluntary sinner. The apostate sinner—such in the origin and in the permanent internal principle of his sin—is first left in his liberty by the Father, the true Creator, the eternal will of love (the ultimate principle in God's relation to us); then borne with by the long suffering which foresees the misery that will drive him back; and, if he, sciens et voluntarius, consciously and voluntarily, returns, graciously received again.

Thus in the first parable are properly opposed the ninety and nine so-called just persons, who ask not for the way, who hearken not to the word, who do not draw near to the Saviour or the Shepherd to hear him—it might be supposed because they are in the right way, but that a doubt arises on account of their very ungodly murmuring against God and the joy of all the angels. In the second parable they are preliminarily left out of the question,* but in the third the abhorred picture of these supposed just ones is exhibited in full by the character of the elder son.

* "The two former parables ended in such a

Verses 4–7. Thus Christ presents himself as the good shepherd, who seeks the lost sheep—according to his humanity assumed to that end; and brings it home when found, with the universal sympathy of the joy of heaven—according to his divinity glorified in the ascension. The subjoined interpretation of ver. 7 with its οὕτως, "so," concurs with the ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, "in heaven," and the distinctive future of ἔσται, "shall be," to lead us at once to such an explanation of the whole; nor could the Pharisees and Scribes fail to discern, as the Lord proceeded and ended his words, this ulterior meaning in parables which had their starting-point in simple human relations. The figure of the good Shepherd, faithfully seeking his lost sheep, which our Lord was well-pleased to recur to again and again, is taken from the centre of the Old Testament, where not only is Jehovah so exhibited in his relations to the people and to individuals, but the future manifestation of his fullness of grace in the Messiah is especially presented in imagery of this kind. We know how he appears there as the one shepherd who is to be raised up, the true David, and so forth; we have already had occasion, upon Matt. xviii.,* to point out the allusions in Ezek. xxxiv.—see vers. 6, 11, 12, 16, and, at the same time, vers. 7–10. Thus does the Lord say plainly to these murmurers: "This, for which you blame me, is my great work, the work of the Messiah; it should also be yours, but ye have shamefully neglected it, and I must supply among the multitudes of the lost in Israel your lack of service, restoring what ye have ruined! Let it be observed, further, how the Lord God who himself was to come in the person of the Messiah, speaks in Ezekiel continually of "my sheep;" and this will help us to feel the profound emphasis of the "having" and "if he lose" as they fall now from our Lord's lips. First of all, it seems to say—What man among you would not do the same? This is not so much—Ye are men yourselves, and will ye in your uncharitableness refuse to trouble yourselves about the lost and the wretched? But we must regard it as the common argument from a poor needy animal to a man (as in the Sabbath-healings); and, more than that, as pointing to natural self-interestedness, influenced by which the covetous man would not lose even one of his hundred sheep.† Thus does the Lord place his own divine, incarnate, and unparalleled action in the most condescending comparison with the most ordinary conduct of men; and there is in that comparison a certain profound truth which must be understood, and before which human folly is repelled. But the words most assuredly penetrate much deeper than that; for, the affectionate shepherd-feeling of ver. 5 indicates much more than the mere care of its own property. In the centre of all lies the profound thought, that in God and Christ love is one with self-interest, and self-interest is one with love; no such contrariety existing between them as is found in the case of man. God loveth men, and all his creatures, for the sake of his own glory which should be reflected in them; but this, again, is no other than pure self-renouncing love, for he who hath not merely a hundred, but ten thousand times ten thousand sheep, and can always create others unlimitedly, nevertheless is unwilling to find one wanting, and counts that as lost, in itself, which he cannot feed, and bless, and save for ever. And so, in a lower degree, but with the mind of God, should the shepherds of Israel, as the servants of God, count the sheep as their own: see John x. 12.

The Lord does not expressly say—"That which I now do, should ye have already done;" nor, on the other hand—"What else doth God with regard to his people, and all mankind?" But he rather says, and more expressively—"I thus indeed act as man, as the Son of Man; and what man in like case (although in another sense than that in which I act) would not do the same?" For the rest, it is plain that the sheep of the Lord Jesus do not here designate, in the sense of the discourses in John, those who are foreseen as believers and elect; although many thus perversely interpret his meaning, and hence find themselves altogether at a loss to account for the ninety and nine. It may be said (with Richter) that all Israel is primarily to be understood; we think, however, that the hundred sheep extend much further than that, and intimate—"All men are my sheep, and therefore even ye unfaithful shepherds are such." Christ is "the Man, whose all men are." Still occupied by his gracious intercourse with the publicans and sinners who had drawn near to hear him, he takes the gentlest view of the apostasy of all mankind from God and from himself; contemplating them under that gracious aspect which has also its truth. "They are indeed wretched and wandering sheep—but ye are (as ye think) in the right way; may I not, then, leave you? This ye willingly consent to; then let me seek the lost, receive those who draw near to me, save those who hear me and repent, though you need it not." It could not be but that this most gracious beginning should immediately assume a tone of gentle or severe irony as it regards these perverse hearers. He does not actually leave any flock without a shepherd in the wilderness, while he goes to seek the one manner, that they could not allege that they were designed to taunt themselves; meanwhile their indignation might somewhat abate" (Berlenb. Bibel).

* Olshausen, however, speaks of this parable having its original place, not in Matt. xviii., but here in Luke xv.—as if it could only have been spoken once. When will the hypothesis, which so much abhors repetitions in the Gospels, disappear from evangelical criticism?

† Lange pursues this thought, and emphasizes it too much; for the idea of the shepherd's solicitude for the completeness of the round number of a hundred is only a subordinate feature in the parable itself; and so of the woman's scanty ten pieces Or must we refer to Anselm's full number?

stray sheep (as Eliab blamed David, 1 Sam. xvii. 28); though the parable in its limitation does not extend to that, nor does the Lord's immediate answer involve that necessity.

But now let us observe in ver. 5 the graciousness of the Shepherd, who is not indeed influenced by the common selfishness of man, but by tender love to the sheep themselves. We would not press the allusion, with Melancthon, who says—"Est suavis significatio inserta passionis Christi; ovem inventam ponit in humeros suos, i.e., ipse onus nostrum transfert in seipsum, fit victima pro nobis," (a gentle allusion to the passion of Christ is introduced; he places the found sheep on his own shoulders, i.e., he transfers our burden to himself, becomes a victim for us): for, the passion of our Lord is rather involved already in the going after, till he find the objects of his love; the retrieved ones are already atoned for. But this figure of the Shepherd with his sheep upon his shoulder, which the early Christians so much delighted in portraying, does most expressively paint the tender and assiduous love which the sinner experiences on his first return by repentance. Oh that poor penitent converts found always such gentle treatment from the proud world, or even from some proud saints! The great and good Shepherd, in the fulness of his love and joy, does not hand over the poor sheep to a servant, who would hurry it home in his hireling way: no, he beareth it himself (see Isa. xl. 11), reminding us of the leading or bringing in of chap. xiv. 21, which falls immeasurably short, and is assigned to the servant. No chastisement for the running away, no driving or whipping back—the poor sheep is weary and languishing enough by reason of its wanderings (Matt. ix. 36); the great object is solicitously to warn and to shelter it against new dangers—"that I may not again lose thee, my beloved and peculiar treasure, which it rejoices me to have found again!"

The coming home of the shepherd precisely corresponds to his going forth, πορεύεσθαι. It was not, indeed, literally said in the parable that there was such a going forth from home (the parallel is καταλείπειν, "leaveth"); but it was actually intended, nevertheless, to indicate the whole human life of our Lord with its great aim, and is therefore to be interpreted by Matt. xviii. 11, comp. Luke xix. 10, where the Son of Man is said to have come to seek and to save that which was lost. Thus he goeth after it, until he find it; that is, not merely (according to Bengel) seeking the sinner even at the table where he sits in his sins, but in the essential truth of his words, seeking till the death of the cross; seeking us by penetrating the depths of our misery and our curse, since only there and only thus we might be found. Consequently, the coming home of the Son of Man, who had gone forth to seek and save the lost children of men, must indicate his return to his own proper house as the Son of God; to the heaven whither he carries back his saved ones. All this is most plainly declared, as we have already said, in the literal words of ver. 7, Likewise—in heaven, and most significantly the ἔσται, "shall be," pointing to futurity. This man, this shepherd, is thus at the same time the Lord from heaven, so transcendently high in himself, yet so condescending towards the objects of his gracious seeking. It is a still further condescension of the great proprietor that he summons others to share his joy; for he who thus speaks to others, places them, as it were, on a level with himself. The joy is in itself so great, that it is as if he is not sufficient for it himself, but increases his gladness and the complacency of his love by the sympathy of others. What depth of divine συγκατάβασις (condescension) in the real truth which is undeniably involved in such figures as these! The man in the parable has friends and neighbors around him, who are his fellows—thus deals the Lord with those who are with him in heaven! Looking at the profound difference between the two parables, we very much doubt whether here also, as in ver. 10, the angels of God only are to be understood. Meyer observes—Among the angels and the blessed; Bengel understands here in the first instance only the spirits of the just made perfect (comparing Rev. xviii. 20), but this is opposed by the circumstance that the φίλοι καὶ γείτονες, "friends and neighbors," are obviously not themselves πρόβατα, sheep. Συγκαλεῖν, "to call together," is the specific expression for an invitation to a feast, and hence the "friends and neighbors" are only parabolically so designated—see ch. xiv. 12. (For the poor and the maimed cannot be invited in heaven.) Moreover, we should not seek a profounder distinction (with Bengel) between the friends in sentiment and will, and the neighbors in dwelling and locality. Such thoughts may very easily be pushed too far, as, for example, the edifying observation—What joy will then arise, when the sinner is brought safely home at last! (Is there joy in heaven at thy conversion, and will there be none at thy glorification? Baxter.) For the Lord regards the converted man here as already fully saved and brought home; embracing all in one comprehensive figure. Oh how graciously does his saying proceed—"My sheep—which was lost—that which was so known to you, the inhabitants of heaven, as well as to me, in whose fate ye share my interest, so that I may call upon you for your sympathy and joy!" The fulness of the meaning of each word has an inexhaustible influence for the heart, even after we have clearly expounded it to our minds. Just as according to that low analogy, which the Lord does not disdain to use, the tenderness of the shepherd-feeling may be exhibited in man as a shepherd towards the animal creation—so does the Lord of heaven look down upon the wretched objects of his compassion upon earth. Just as we ourselves rejoice over the fortunate finding of what it has cost us pains to seek, however trivial a thing it may be in itself—even so is there joy in heaven in the presence of God and his angels, even such is the rejoicing of the Son of God who returneth home with the precious thing that he hath retrieved.

We must not pass over, in our familiarity with the formula, the majestic I say unto you! which forms the sublime transition to the interpretation of this most condescending parable. "I am that Shepherd, and this I say unto you, shepherds of Israel; to you who murmur and blame me I speak, the Son of Man who am come from heaven, and will soon return to heaven again as my home; I, who know full well what passes there (as afterwards, chap. xvi. 23, what passes in hell)—I say unto you that joy shall be in heaven over that which causeth you offence upon earth. Joy, not over the sinner in his sin, but over his repentance; though ye, in your heartless presumption, allow no validity to that repentance, and would not that I should receive such a sinner. I say unto you, that he will be more than received above, whatever ye may vainly say against it. Over one shall there be the joy of all heaven; and even if all who hear me did not repent, if only one of them repented, the joy of finding him would repay all the toil of seeking him. Ye reject all sinners alike in mass; to me every one, for his own sake and for the sake of my love, is inestimably precious and dear." We have already shown on Matt. xviii. that the Saviour's joy in recovering the sinner refutes the notion of any irresistible grace. Not that the sheep seeks the shepherd; unless he were sought and called he would continue lost. But, on the other hand, he may oppose instead of following the recognised voice of the shepherd; not, therefore, all who are lost are found again, or yield themselves to be saved, and this is the reason of the joy which is felt over that one which is recovered. The μετανοεῖν, repentance, is effected by the seeking love of God; but it does not consist entirely and alone in the energy of that love. This is perfectly exemplified in those others who are now brought into contrast; the designation of whom in the parable as "not lost" is now qualified by a tone of lamentation and complaint in the interpretation of the parable. A sinner who repenteth is a sinner no longer, he becometh truly righteous—but what of the ninety and nine just persons? Their true characterisation has been given upon Matt. ix. 12, 13. The gracious severity of the words set out with the assumption that their righteousness was valid; but when they murmur where the inhabitants of heaven rejoice, the question naturally arises whether their righteousness can be genuine.* This is the second condemnation of the Pharisees which is hinted at; the first having been already directed against their neglect of their pastoral duty. This closing sentence, further (which coincides with ch. v. 32), proves assuredly that the one sheep cannot be, in the sense of this parable, the human race as requiring redemption; for the ninety and nine ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ, "in the wilderness," are neither the angels nor the just made perfect in heaven. He who lists may, however, go beyond the limits of the parable, and regard the Lord as having one great flock throughout the universe, to which the human race, lost till he goes after it, is related as the one saved sinner is related to all the others, as the one to the ninety and nine.*

Verses 8–10. We have already exhibited the essential point of this second parable, which alas! is in most sermons and expositions lightly despatched as dependent upon the former, or left altogether unnoticed. It is not the Holy Ghost, as he is a hypostasis in the depths of the Godhead, but as he has built for himself a house upon earth, and obtained for himself a possession. The church as a whole and individual churches—both are, in a certain sense, the same. The Spirit in the church, as the true mother of that house which the great Proprietor possesses not only in heaven but also upon earth, seeks, in like manner, the lost piece of silver, and similarly rejoices over it amid the sympathies of all angels and good spirits. Thus the meaning of our Lord's words, spoken for futurity (Matt. xxiv. 35), goes here, as it often, or, we may say, always does, far beyond the sense which those who heard them first were then capable of putting upon them. Nevertheless, even then an attentive and thoughtful scribe might have been led by the symbolical seeking woman to think of the congregation of the people of God, of the קָהָל (congregation) or עֵדָה (assembly) of the Lord; in the name and as the servant and representative of which, he himself should also have sought the lost. But let it be observed now that the house built upon earth is not introduced till after he who came is gone home again to his house in heaven (ver. 7.) The substitution of the piece of silver as designating the sinner, gives us, in addition to the important meaning which we indicated above, the idea of a progression in his value: a lost animal, a lost piece of money, and finally, a lost son.* For, the more closely we regard and realise the sinner's final misery and his first apostasy as leading to it, the more impressively does his value in himself assert itself. The number hence becomes smaller: at first a hundred, now ten, afterwards reduced to two. This is not designed simply to teach that the enumeration in itself is not to be interpreted; but the ten pieces of silver indicate in passing that the woman is not so rich as to be indifferent to the loss of even one piece; that is, one soul is estimated by the Spirit in the church, not in the proportion which one piece would bear to the hoard of a man with millions, but in its proportion to a scanty store of such a woman as this. The church counts her possessions carefully, is unwilling to give up anything as lost, and speaks of it when lost with all the more emphasis as—my piece! As the Lord also on Matt. xxii. 20, 21 compares man with a piece of money, referring by the image and superscription to the impress of God primarily on Israel, and then generally on humanity in general, so must we not altogether exclude an analogous side-glance in our present passage. The piece of silver lying under the dust in its corner retains its own essential value, but it would remain dead and lost as to purposes of possession (as we speak of dead and useless capital), if it should remain unsought and unfound.† In a more restricted reference the Lord especially intends those who have already belonged to the church and fallen in it; because in them the loss and the ruin is exibited in its most impressive point of view: the discourse afterwards takes a deeper and more retrospective view, and regards every sinner as having been once in the house of God, in the heaven or paradise of innocence —of which more anon.

* The Lord recognizes no just persons who never needed, or even who no longer need, repentance—and every application which involves this is a perversion. Braune, e.g., speaks of the "innocent, who have not yet experienced or become conscious of evil, and who in the simplicity of their hearts are just in the sight of God," as contrasted with "sinners who have passed beyond the line of innocence;" but the former could only be the angels, who however occupy their own quite different place in vers. 7, 10, and are never called just in Scripture, but always holy ones. This would issue in making our Lord preach the doubtful doctrine that "virtue transcends innocence," against which we cannot be too much on our guard, as grazing the confines of the view that man's fall into sin is his line of progress towards maturity. Righteousness in scriptural phraseology is never mere innocence, nor untried and unconfirmed virtue; and as the "just persons" in ver. 7 are upon earth (for should not the angels in heaven rejoice over themselves as righteous?) it follows that it is here only a preliminary hypothesis which is assumed, with an underlying tone of irony.

* "Should not that great and glorious shepherd whose millions of bright sheep fill the universe, leave these millions in order to seek the slightest, poorest, most infirm of those who need his care, and without that care would utterly perish; does not his boundless love require him to go after it?" (Kurz, Bibel u. Astronomie, p. 220). This is a thought quite permissible in itself, but as an exposition of what eternal wisdom has spoken it is not valid.

Lighting, sweeping, seeking: three critical points which are not without significance, and which point to the true signification of the γυνή or woman. We cannot seek in the dark, because we cannot see. Then the lamp of preaching must first be kindled in the Gospel; and the voice of preaching is the voice, continued upon earth, of him who is gone into heaven: it is the Spirit who testifies in that preaching; but yet the church lights these lamps, by selecting and appointing her own true witnesses, chosen from her midst, and exercising their functions in her name. As to individual churches, this light may in some cases altogether disappear, but in the church never; she, that is, the Holy Spirit in her, continues ever to kindle them anew. However much the disguising dust, in its various kinds, may itself glisten or shine—it is, and can be no other than darkness and death; the true light must shine upon, and disperse it utterly. For with this light is associated, and in absolutely necessary union, the sweeping of the house in all the further ordinances and regulations of the ecclesiastical economy, administration of discipline, and exercise of supervision; the removal out of the way of all hindrances and offences, of all hypocritical pretexts and concealments, so as to leave no corner unvisited by the light, and nothing hidden in the dust: and all this is done by the true energy of life accompanying the true light. This sweeping does indeed at first seem to create dust where dust was not before, exciting it throughout the house for the sake of the object lost; and even so this work of the Spirit in the church is complained against as unpleasantly disturbing the deceitful course of death, and interfering with the false peace and amenity of the house. Finally, the end and aim of all this lighting and sweeping is the real and thorough seeking for souls. We may further say that the first is preëminently assigned to the minister of the word as such, the second to his helpers and elders, and the coöperation in the great work of seeking to the whole church generally. When this proceeds in all its vigor, the church is filled with life; and, thus living, will not indolently suffer her treasures to be lost, but seeking and finding them will edify herself in the Holy Ghost.

Nothing is said here in ver. 9 of coming home, for the woman who seeks is already in her own house: the Spirit abides in the church. Hence also in ver. 10 (though this is generally overlooked) not the "angels in heaven" are mentioned; any more than the Future ἔσται, "shall be," which now becomes the Present γίνεται, "is." The angels of God, although they always behold the face of the Father in heaven, are at the same time coöperant upon earth in the seeking and preservation of those who are to be, and are, the heirs of salvation; they are present in the church (1 Cor. xi. 10); everywhere, and here especially, there is a close connection and fellowship between heaven and earth. The friends and the neighbors who run together after the manner of women (very much as if to rejoice over the birth of a child, see Ruth iv. 14, 17; Luke i. 58), must not be regarded simply as a necessary appendage of the figure; for, in this wondrous series of parables, there is not the slightest touch which does not yield its meaning. Bengel's remark upon the distinction between the angels as "foris, habitu virili, bellis apto," (abroad—in male attire, adapted to warfare); and "domi, habitu pacifico et feminino," (at home—in pacific and feminine attire), may be justly deemed far-fetched; but it will much better correspond with the truth if we refer to the hosts, or, as it were the congregation of spirits.* Suffice it, that in each case there is joy in the presence of the angels of God when a sinner begins his conversion, and opens his heart for the birth of his Saviour, even as there was angel's joy in Bethlehem; yea, there is joy over the beginning of every new creation, like that first joy over creation when the light sprung forth from the darkness (Job xxxviii. 7. See Eph. iii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12). This world is the nursery of that world; and every little plant is greeted as a new accession to the glory of God, to the joy of all who are saved in him, and to his joy, as the Saviour, in them.

* Not therefore conversely in anti-climax, as we find in Stein—Not only a sheep, which has a sensitive enjoyment of its life, but even an insignificant piece of money. The tenth part of her little store is not insignificant to the woman.

† This view, which is quite in harmony with our present passage, and with the comparison between man and the tribute money, has no affinity with the strange and inappropriate question of Back—"What makes the money false or genuine? Not the external brilliance, or the stamp upon it, but the false or genuine metal of its substance."

THE SEEKING, RECEIVING, FORBEARING LOVE OF THE FATHER TOWARDS THE PENITENT AND THE SELF-WILLED, THE OPEN AND THE CONCEALED SINNER: THE TWO SONS.

(Luke xv. 11–32.)

If it were allowable to introduce here the distinctions applicable to human things, we might term this parable the crown and the pearl of all our Lord's parables. How many words would it require to express all the feelings of reverent astonishment with which we ever contemplate and study it! How simple, yet how profound; how transparently artless as a chapter of human life, and yet how full of mystery as a revelation of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; how perfectly natural is the picture as a whole, and yet how full of significance down to the slightest and minutest features and touches; how eternally riveted on the memory are the words, how inexhaustibly to be explored their ever new evolutions of meaning; with what dramatic life is all related, so that every fresh clause suggests in itself a whole history, which each one is involuntarily constrained to pursue for himself; and, again, with what force does every word arrest the conscience, and point to the parabolical application of the whole; in short, to sum all in one word, how divinely human is this parable of the God-man! So individually characteristic is it, that no other is its fellow; while so universally comprehensive, that "we all must find ourselves reproduced in this parable in some sense, either as we have become, or as we have ever been, or as we are hoping and endeavoring to be!"† And we cannot but remark how the blessed Lord, almost in opposition to his usual manner, speaks and points so movingly to the sentiment and feelings; as if his affectionate love aims to affect and to break, if that might be, even the hardest hearts. That this parable, which Lange beautifully terms "a gospel within the Gospel," this universal text for preaching about the lost and recovered sons of our heavenly Father (and the first-born hopelessly lost in the midst of the rich possessions of the house), should be wanting in the pericopæ of the Sunday calendar, is an omission which is utterly unjustifiable on any ground whatever; it is not compensated by the insertion of the previous similitudes, and it is of itself ample reason for that reformation of the calendar which Palmer desires.

We shall not repeat what has been already said as to the position and significance of this parable in connection with the whole, but proceed to develop its individual meaning. We are called to regard the Lord's complete answer to the Pharisees, in the double picture so impressively contrasted, and which yet preaches the one love of God—how the manifestly apostate sinner (with honesty, at least, in his sin), coming in penitence, is received again; how the secretly apostate sinner (to which is added hypocrisy), even while he is wilfully revolting against his father and his brother, is borne with in mercy, is graciously intreated, and even still sought!

Verse 11. A hundred sheep—ten pieces of silver—and now two sons: this last introduces a having of a very different kind, and consequently, a very different, and now first perfect joy, in the recovery after losing! The limitation in number to two concentrates the attention upon the contrast, exhibited in vers. 7 and 10, between the lost and what was preliminarily assumed to be not lost; bringing out that contrast now into sharp prominence, as a main element in all these parables. A certain man had two sons, that is, he was the father of both! To understand Christ himself as this father, is contrary to the sacred propriety of all his habitual speech, whether parabolical or otherwise, in which he never forgets that he himself is the true Son; and, as we have said, is decisively confuted by a profounder investigation of the whole. God, as the Father or great Creator, has sons, self-conscious, endowed with will, begotten in his likeness—and these are not so much all intelligent creatures, though this is sometimes assumed, as men created in Adam after the image of God; for, "Adam was the son of God," ch. iii. 38. To say that God is originally the "Father of all his intelligent creatures," presents us only with a half-truth; but to say that he is and remains the Father of men, even in their apostasy, is a whole truth, James ii. 9; Acts xvii. 28, 29·

* Let it be remembered that the collective idea in Hebrew is expressed by the feminine.

† Nitzsch, in his sermons (first selection, Bonn 1833), constructed for academical and educated hearers, but full of the very marrow of exegesis—from which we shall take leave to extract much more.

Eph. iii. 15.* Every "sinner" was once, in his first beginning and going forth from God (even if only in Adam), a child in the house (created in the Son); every "righteous person," who comes forward into contrast as thinking himself such, will also in that house declare and prove himself to be a yet greater sinner himself. The universal paternal grace extends to the vilest as consequent upon that first essential birth, while the universal ruin of sin extends to the most honorable as consequent upon actual birth in time; thus the two parties are exhibited in these two sons, whose history is now depicted, and to whom the Lord now speaks, as being originally and fundamentally alike before God.

Now first is the so-called sinner placed in the true light which divine love sheds upon him; and we have here depicted to us: his sin, vers. 12 to 16; his repentance, vers. 17–20; his reception back again, vers. 20–24. We have now, more definitely than in the two former parables, "the grades of development in the departure from God, and the return to him by repentance and faith;" the profoundest and inmost beginning and end both of sin and of return, with all that in both cases lies intermediate. First of all, and this is the distinctive starting point of the parable, we have sin as such and in its essential self—its origin (ver. 12), development or process (ver. 13, in the way indicated by the lost sheep), and consummation (also ver. 13, having reached the goal indicated by the lost money). But then is immediately adjoined the misery which follows on sin, and is inseparably one with it; this also is viewed in its threefold critical aspect: the beginning of want, ver. 14, which is the first consciousness and realization of distance and estrangement; the recourse to false help, ver. 15, which is only the continuation and confirmation of apostasy; and finally the aggravated and intenser want, ver. 16, which lays bare the whole depth of the misery which it has drawn after it.

Verses 12, 13. It is because the Lord will preserve to this "righteous" one in the figure the preëminence of the prerogative of the firstborn, that the younger is introduced as the unfilial and lost son; nor need we look for any other reason—such as a relative apology for his folly in his youth, which was also in its time true of the other also. By this figure of a grown-up son, who will be a "young man before his time, and will not endure and wait for his inheritance till his father dies," who is furiously urged by the lust for freedom, the Lord's wisdom, which always contemplates the fundamental principles below the surface, would exhibit to us the innermost essence of all sin in its original source. The son breaks loose from his father; is no longer satisfied with the common enjoyment of all his goods, because he cannot longer tolerate the fellowship of his righteous father, whose authority had so long constrained him to obedience; his will is to live independently and for himself, to carry away his own goods as a spoil, to seek his miserable happiness by infatuated wisdom of his own in the enjoyments of a free life: and in this we see the punctum saliens in all our apostasy from the living God, our Creator, and our Father. His own good things in unholy appropriation preponderate, in the mind of this son, over the favor of his father enjoyed in filial love; he confronts that father with a selfish demand, which seems to possess reason, yet is in reality utterly without it: and in this we see the speedily resulting, and apparently entire death and extinction of all filial sentiment, the root of all and every sin, more exceeding sinful in this its albeit secret and deeply latent principle than in all the subsequent wanderings and riotous abandonment to evil which necessarily springs from it. And even if we go no further than the external possessions of which chap. xvi. 1–13 will speak (though the words go much deeper), yet we must regard the Lord as explaining and condemning prospectively the root of ἀδικία, or unrighteousness, which clings to all mammon—the improper appropriation of that which should be alien to us, in contempt of our true possessions in the fellowship of God. Δός μοι, "give me"—seems, indeed, to be the supplication of the son as following the Πάτερ, "Father," of invocation; but the μοί, "me," itself presents him as making a demand, and it is followed by a juristical formula which seems to regard himself and his father as equal persons, with equal rights. Τὸ ἐπιβάλλον μέρος, "the portion that falleth to me," is genuine Greek (as Grotius shows), and is used also with reference to inheritance in Tob. vi. 12, as also to the taxes imposed on a dependent people, 1 Macc. x. 30. The son stands upon his right, therefore, just as men think that they have a right as creatures to expect from the Creator an ἄρτος ἐπιούσιος, "daily bread" (and forsooth, the whole befitting μέρος, or "portion," which their ordinary life requires); yet is he constrained, at the outset of his wandering, to pay an involuntary tribute to the truth, for his prayer is—Give me now that which will one day be my just portion (as if the father had not the right, as long as he lived, to disinherit disobedient children!). "I ask that my portion be given me"—in which the demand at the close preponderates over the petition at the beginning.* But this is not the sudden im-

* On this last passage, comp. my Epheserbrief, especially vol. i. p. 497.

* The Lord exhibits here in its ground and beginning that which, however, is immeasurably surpassed in its subsequent developments in the world at large, when the proud sinners of the last times demand from their so-called God, now and in this life, all that they care nothing about in another. Yet the Lord speaks prophetically for this last secular manifestation of the evil principles of that apostate, selfish sin which would wrest all that the future has for the present time. Communism lyingly speaks about equal distribution among many brethren: we know full well that such liberalism means all for self in reality, and in any case goes far beyond the ἐπιβάλλον μέρος in its demands.

pulse of desire in an evil hour, which might be reasoned with; it is the resolved and steadfast disposition which the father had seen growing till the period of this outbreak, and which itself silently proclaimed the sad severance of the internal bond. Therefore the father does not place himself in opposition, resting upon his rightful prerogative; he does not become to this unfilial child a despotic and restraining master, but remains his father still: for a father even among men is unwilling to find a servant in a son (comp. ver. 19 afterwards), and would rather let that son take his freedom, when he knows that all his representations and prayers would be fruitless in keeping his child. That our heavenly Father dismisses us with our freedom, when we would depart from him, is the result at once of his holy righteousness (averse from all merely external compulsion), and of that mercy also which does not leave us, but ever seeks our return. For while, on the one hand, he bestows upon the son who forsakes his house an actual inheritance, it is foreseen, on the other, that in his estrangement it will be consumed, and that distress must in due time recall the wanderer. He who suffers us to go our way has already taken care that it shall be hedged in with thorns (Hos. ii. 6). Thus, if this third parable makes it appear at first (as Roos says), "that the father took no more thought about his lost son," that semblance is soon all the more impressively removed.

And he divided unto them the inheritance. In the parable, primarily, the elder (as firstborn) obtained, or was secured in the prerogative of the landed possession, the proper paternal inheritance; while the younger had in compensation his μέρος, or "portion," dealt out to him. Thus, all else that belonged to the father remained to the elder; yet as a son in the house with his father, so that he could yet dispose of it at his pleasure, ver. 31. It might have appeared, indeed, that he who was emancipated according to his own desire had more enjoyment of freedom; but that was only a delusion of the unfilial mind. And let the distinction—never sufficiently noted—between the οὐσία, substance, and βίος, living, be carefully observed; for the Evangelist, under the direction of the Holy Ghost, gives every little word its distinct and accurate place. The idea of the former goes deeper than that of the latter. The son will have the very substantia of his estate, that which properly belonged to his essential personality and existence; without knowing that his words involve (according to the moral relation between personality and possession) something very different from that which a man may eat and drink, spend and consume: of the father it is only said that he gave up τὸν βίον (as far, consequently, as the son wished) to his discretion to be wasted. That was to this foolish spendthrift his οὐσία (ver. 13); and it was this which he squandered utterly, after having converted it all into money, and gathered all together into a compact transportable form (as Prov. xxiii. 21 xxi. 17, pave the way for our parable): but we shall see that something very different remained for him in the depths of his father's heart. Indeed, no sooner has this fool obtained his own, than he makes haste to show why he had demanded it: μετ' οὐ πολλὰς ἡμέρας, "not many days after," he appropriates all, and goes to another land (properly, into a certain other country), into his own freedom and the freedom of his own, to become a young master on his own account, anything so as to be out of his father's house and beyond his discipline And if the μακράν, "far," here belongs to the χώραν, "country" (comp. chap. xix. 12, Prov. vii. 19), and does not as in ver. 20 stand adverbially, then it adds an emphasis of its own—as far as possible away! In this emphatic and most pregnant μακράν, which significantly combines with the last hypocritical πάτερ, "father" (used by the younger as by the elder son), the spirit of apostasy and departure from God is exhibited as the full consummation of sin. The neighborhood of the father is irksome to the fallen child and urges him to widen his distance, until Augustin's word seems to be fulfilled: "regio longinqua est oblivio Dei" (the far country is forgetfulness of God). Now lives the sinner in that land a life which he thinks worthy of the name; but then begins and is consummated his death, for his father must bewail him as dead; he lives ἀσώτως, that is, a self-destroying life, without salvation or help—and hence this intense word became the chosen expression to indicate all kinds of external debauchery and recklessness of riot.* The χώρα ἐκείνη, "that land," is wherever such erring children have wandered from their Father, wherever they are dwelling afar from him, wherever they vainly attempt to build a city, like Cain in Nod, the land of unsteady wandering from the face of God, apart from which there is neither life nor salvation. All creature-possession consumes itself in the using (Col. ii. 22); and all wealth must ever turn to poverty, either by its actual dissipation, or in consequence of the folly of covetousness which, the more mammon increases, is the less satisfied by it. Thus man in his sin consumes first of all his earthly goods, so that he can no more find his satisfaction and comfort in them; but then, alas! the true and real possessions which his heavenly Father communicated to him are also consumed, the life derived from God dies out in alienation (Eph. iv. 18)—unless a seasonable repentance saves its last spark. So in the primitive world the first race of men squandered away in mass the original prerogatives of natural possession, as well as the consciousness and heritage of fellowship with God; such, when viewed in its profoundest principle, is the way of every individual soul; thus was it, more particularly (and this lying midway between the two may be regarded as the most immediate application of the parable), with the chosen people of God in their apostasy. Out of an innocent child (whose first creation by God is reflected, at least, in a certain relative guiltlessness), out of a baptized and confirmed Christian, there comes forth one who draws near to say farewell to his Father as in ver. 12; an independent, that is, an apostate, self-destroying, and lost son—such is the whole history of sin! But when the Father first of all punishes this unholy desire by granting it, as at the graves of lust in the wilderness, he nevertheless deals with our inborn freedom in long-suffering as wise as it is merciful; that increate principle of freedom he regards in his children even in its wanderings with a divine paternity which infinitely transcends any figure by which it may be illustrated.

* Ἄσωτος, ὁ δὶ αὐτὸν ἀπολλύμενος (Aristot. Eth. iv. 1). This history is everywhere and perpetually finding its external realization in the lives of the slaves of lust (Eph. iv. 22). When people are "lords of their means, but not lords of their desires"—waste, poverty, and ruin must follow (Zeller).

Verses 14–16. As lightly and swiftly as all had been gathered together is all scattered again, wasted, spent*—such is the general picture here given of the folly which thinks life long, and never regards its end. The misery of want now begins, treading closely on the heels of lawless riot. This keen and pressing want of hunger marks a critical point of the similitude, wherein it must fail adequately to illustrate the truths which were intended; but the Lord so incorporates the expression in the parable that it preserves its appropriate relation to the narrative, while suggesting to the thoughtful mind the deeper truth which it fails entirely to set forth. For, most assuredly, that hunger which is the destitution of the true and only satisfying bread, must be regarded as always existing in that land (as it is twice defined most significantly, after its first mention in ver. 13, and then in the ὧδε of ver. 17 exhibited in its most impressive contrast—as alienated and far from the father's house); but that destitution becomes a necessity or a longing, a manifest λιμός or famine, only when it is keenly felt in the soul. The Lord here goes beyond the parable as revolving round this one son, and obliquely intimates how the ruling grace of God sends visitations of general calamity into the domain of this sinful world, which make the misery felt and salvation an object of desire (comp. Amos viii. 11). This great truth, however is only grazed upon in the broad κατὰ τὴν χώραν ἐκείνην, "in that land;" and the Lord, for his immediate object's sake, places the famine of the land generally in striking connection by its ἐγένετο, "there arose," with the consummated squandering of the substance of him who had wandered into it, as if it had been the simple consequence of his reckless waste. And so it seems as if we are no further to think of this λιμός, famine, than as it respects the spendthrift's participation in it, and impending starvation. How much is shadowed forth, again, in this ὑστερεῖσθαι, "to be in want," as to the deep internal progress of the history of the sinner! To every one this time must come, especially to every one—as in the point of view (of this parable)—who has fallen into the gross wilfulness of outward sin. The time passes merrily for a while, but the pleasure of life soon dies out, the possessions and the strength are lavished away, the relishes of mad joy which once befooled the heart are now untasted—suffice it that that heart, the still existent ἔσω ἄνθρωπος or "inner man," begins now to be in want, to feel the fearful horror of its most bitter emptiness and distress. No matter whether viewed as external or internal—for it must always come at last to the sense of inward want. Thus we can understand the further description of the ensuing misery. Slavery, instead of the independence so madly chosen; detestable humiliation even among the associates of apostasy in this wicked world; and finally, the last vain endeavor to find the sustenance of life in resources which degrade to the level or below the level of the brutes. The colors are strong, laid on unsparingly, but in perfect truth. The heathen land indicated by the swine, signified to the Jews the region of sin and impurity, in the foul shame of which this son of a very different household must sink into a swineherd. The land, indeed, is full of such as he (sinners are many upon earth)—that is the first intimation. But the strong expression which speaks of the citizens of that land means still more, and involves an evident contrast with the immigrant who had not yet become a citizen therein. Those in whom the last filial feeling (ver. 17) is extinct, and who think no longer of any former better home, are the true citizens of this evil world; such as would still return like this son in the parable, are the scattered children of God in their midst (John xi. 52).

First of all, the wretched one beginning to be in want, seeks to help himself, in perverse and blindly persistent apostasy; turning to resources which can only issue in his own worse misery, and thus drive him against his own purposes to that conversion which is the design of God's grace. His heart does not yet and at once say—I will up and go to my father! but before that there is to be another πορευθείς, "he went." Many interpret the ἐκολλήθη, "joined himself," of humble and urgent begging, which fastens itself upon another and will not be gainsayed—Give me something, make me something, even though it be a keeper of swine, only let me not starve and perish! But this seems an incorrect anticipation of the stages of humiliation, as they are stated with precision; this κολλᾶσθαι gives us rather the twofold commencement of misery, as resulting from foolish recourse to self for help. He enters into stricter fellowship with the heathen and sinners of the place (which he had in a sense avoided before, from the remains of shame in him); but this fellowship of attachment of itself can only result in dependence, he gives himself up to bondage, pledges himself wholly to the world. This, then, is the abasement, in which the wretched wages of sin must become loathsome to him as swine's food, while

* Διεσκόρπισε is obviously in ironical contrast with συναγαγών; and then πάντα points again to the previous ἅπαντα, while δαπανᾶν yet more ironically reprobates the spending all—for nothing!

he remembers the bread of heaven. The world, and every one of its citizens, is a hard master, in whose services the most pitiable wages are given, yea, not even food to eat; well for every prodigal who is constrained to realise this, and does realise it! The κεράτια, which Luther has quite correctly popularised into husks,* indicate, according to the predominant reference which the parable involves to sinners of the grossest degree, the last defilement, the bestial turpitude of the foulest fleshy lust—although even this may assume various forms, admits of many degrees, and may be disguised under specious aspects. What the beast is to man, that the carnal man, the natural man generally with his pleasures and needs, is to the nobler part of himself, the spirit to be awakened in conversion; it is not, therefore, an external change, the alteration in objects and manner of life simply, which is needed to turn into husks what before was so sweet and pleasant (Prov. ix. 17, xx. 17). For if the sinner has once reached the point at which the parable here exhibits him, he is constrained by experience to confess the worthlessness and the utter disgracefulness of his sinful life; yet this is so far from being the voluntary conversion of his will, that he might even in this depth despise the call of the living God, and exhort his soul to eat and drink as if at the most excellent table;† and thus, if his most outrageous desires were gratified, arrive at a point in which he should take his place among the other thriving citizens. We see, in this normal type of a penitent sinner, that even he at least for a while desires only to be fed with these husks! The common translation, however, and that which Luther has retained, is incorrect; our feeling would never allow us to admit—And no man gave them unto him! As if, had only the swine's food been supplied to him, he would not have gone back to his father! a feature this which would derange and distort the harmony of the whole picture. It is indeed said in regard to this prevalent interpretation, that in the time of dearth his swine were more important to the citizen than their keeper (but we may ask whether the herdsmen was not necessary for them!), but such a notion introduces an incongruous extravagance quite foreign to the measured character of the whole parable. And further—who could have prevented the swineherd from taking some portion for himself in connection with the animals, on which supposition alone the giving to him would have been needful.‡

The general οὐδείς, "no man," does not suit this view; nor his experience, already alluded to, that these κεράτια, which the swine might eat as their natural and fitting nourishment, could only fill without nourishing and satisfying his hungering belly.* This is, once more, a piercing truth—the pleasures of sin, as those who delight in them must find, fill, but never satisfy; comp. Luke vi. 25; John iv. 13; Eccles. i. 8, and, in the same words as here, Psa. xvii. 14. And here what sin would do, becomes its punishment—the debauched and riotous liver had before filled his belly, while no animal, no swine, eats more than enough, overstepping the limits of nature. In the similar application in Luke xvi. 21, it is supposed that many crumbs fell to Lazarus from the rich man's table, the ἐπιθυμῶν, "desiring," indicating his pious contentment—and here also we must understand that the poor swineherd ate readily of the husks, seized them with avidity, for (as καί often signifies), no man troubled himself about his case, or gave him a just sufficiency for his maintenance; and this absolute use of δίδωμι Alford lays stress upon, concurrently with myself. Thus it is—No man gave him anything else, any human nourishment, any bread. This immediately leads to the περισσεύειν ἄρτον, "bread to spare," in the father's house, of which he at last thinks with a true ἐπιθυμεῖν or desire; and this is said also, in passing, to the hard "just ones," who would with like scorn leave the "publicans and sinners" to their trough, instead of feeling compassion for their trouble.

Verses 17–20. The penitent sinner now stands revealed before our eyes! Penitence, in its fullest meaning, or the voluntary following out of the purpose into the great act, is the actual arising and coming to the father; but before this comes the resolution of repentance, which is developed here with almost systematic completeness as proceeding from the inmost soul. For Jesus explains in this parable how far penitence must, like sin, proceed voluntarily: and in this there is a contrast with the sheep, wandering in stupidity, and in stupidity not coming back of itself; and still more with the lost piece of money. Yet both sides of the question are equally true. Repentance, as a resolution, thus develops itself: in its origin as a return into self and remembrance of the father—in its most essential process as a consciousness of misery, and that as the judicial consequence of sin—and finally in its consummation as a turning round, a confession, and a vow. Or, transferred into systematic phraseology, Repentance is first knowledge and conviction of sin, and then resolution (although in that first knowledge the latent will must coöperate; for it is the inmost principle and root, as of the act so also of the self-knowledge in repentance); but knowledge of misery, as also of the guilt and sin which has produced it—resolution not only to return but to confess. As it respects the third critical point, the promise of work and new obedience, we shall afterwards find something which requires cautious handling in that.

It is well expressed in the translation—When he came to himself—thus not before, but now at last! Thus far was it necessary that it should go with him. This is the rule which has its external exemplification in multitudes of cases. How many must first go on to the most shameful excesses of sin before they come to know that sin! How many find not out their misery until after they have sought their consolation and help in the world by the profoundest humiliation of devotion to it! After they have been sent, as it were, to the swine, the long unheard and overpowered voice within them breaks out—Thou seekest it in the world to no purpose, it is in thyself, thou art a lost son, but still the son of a father! He came to himself—this is more accurate than Luther's popular "in sich schlagen," which incorrectly connects the subsequent act (ch. xviii. 13) with this simple beginning, thereby deranging the delicate connection of the text, as well as losing sight of a reference which it contains to Old Testament phraseology. When he begins to be in want, he goes and joins himself to a citizen; when his want reaches the point of extremest outward need, he goes that better way into himself, there finds he the right πορεύσομαι, "I will go." See in Deut. xxx. 1 the same intimation—When thou shalt call to mind or go into thy heart (תְּשִׁבְתָּ אֶל־לְבָבֶךָ, comp. 1 Kings viii. 47, Isa. xlvi. 8). When the sinner truly goes into himself, he discerns himself by a yet remaining remembrance to be in the deepest reality an apostate son before God. Thus previously and in his sin, he was out of himself, had never contemplated and known himself in the simple truth of his condition and relations. And let the intimation in this similitude for the other and equally true aspect of the matter, be also observed. The voluntary sinner was not altogether and absolutely a voluntary agent (there was in his case a blinding deceitfulness of sin and Satan, by which he had lost the power of entering into self); and further, his repentance was not altogether voluntary, but induced by the grace which sought him through the pressure of need. The first utterance of his heart is an awakening right remembrance of the forsaken father's house. We may for a moment hesitate how to interpret the mention of the hired servants, which the Lord, primarily in conformity with the literal similitude, connects with this remembrance; for we cannot suppose that any feature in the parable is indifferent and without its own proper allusion. We might rest in the general interpretation—How many people still faithfully serving him, industrious laborers, has my father! These would then be "the multitudes of saints whom the Lord of blessedness had received to blessedness, poor sinners whom he had already graciously and hospitably admitted."* But there must still be a difference between such and the μισθίους, "hired servants," here. For while this lost son is occupied in thinking—"There no man suffers want; even the hired servants, such as I am here, are better cared for than I, most miserable μίσθιος without μισθός, yea, even without food, which the meanest hireling is worthy of:" while he is thus meekly instituting comparison with his own present condition, he cannot but bring also into contrast (for he remembers his father as such!) his ἐγώ δέ, "and I," as the son having an original prerogative! To understand the matter aright, we must remember too that no one parable can express everything which is involved in its meaning; and that remembrance which here seems to well up naturally in the penitent's soul, is in the corresponding reality awakened by the call of God, which goes out through all that land not only in the voice of scarcity, but in open and direct preaching—Return again, ye who have revolted! But that preaching exerts its influence only where it excites and kindles the still existing spark—and this is the point of view which we must take in order to understand what is here said—this explains the sinner's understanding that appeal. Thus it is not as if this sinner had now other converted sinners before his eyes; but his reflection signifies—How many orderly men (in comparison of me a reprobate) receive temporal happiness from God!† And here it is undeniable (as in the χώρα and the λιμός), that the parable extends beyond its own limits, that is, arises itself to press towards its interpretation. The hired servants are now before the eyes of the son, even as the father's house is not removed from him by any distance of space.

And I, his son, perish with hunger, am dying the most frightful death! If this ἀπόλλυμαι, perish, becomes a consciousness to the soul, then is there life enough in it to seek and to find the bread of life. Now first is the external turned to an internal wretchedness, and is in contrast felt as misery by the soul. The ὧδε,

* Paulus, Kind-Worte, wodurch man selig werden kann, in fünf Predigten über den verlornen Sohn (Cannstadt, by Richter, 1839). Impressive and awakening sermons, which, however, labor under the defect of neglecting the individualising exposition of the text, and caring only about the ecclesiastical and systematic theology to be evolved from it.

† It were going too far to make the premature distinction—How many merely legally faithful righteous servants, not yet children of God, are fed by his bounty, are more contented and happy than I! Such thoughts have no place here. But the interpretation of Von Gerlach is essentially incorrect, who speaks of "the lower creation of God" contrasted with which "only sinful man feels himself in his restless sin empty and miserable"—thus making "the contemplation of God's creation awaken to repentance!" This is a notion quite alien to the parable, and untrue in itself; for the father's house does not include the animal world and the lower creation, and man does not come to repentance in any other way than by coming to himself.

here, which is unfortunately omitted by Luther (as by the Vulg.), and to the emphasis of which we have already referred, is certainly genuine, and has a distinctive significance in the spirit of the penitent's words—And I, the apostate son, perish here, because I by my own fault am here and not with my father, because I have chosen to leave him! This is my sin and my misery! The experience of misery led first from without inwardly to the knowledge of sin; but now conversely this knowledge speaks first and last of sin as the only cause of misery. Wherefore am I, wherefore remain I here? Thus from this ὧδε springs immediately that transcendently important and impressive Ἀναστὰς πορεύσομαι, "I will arise and go." The ground-tone is—I will arise! for here we have the English distinction—the future I will and not I shall. But there is mingled with this an immediate resolution of instant decision which admits not of being translated—I will do it! for there is no mere θέλω, I will (wish), expressed. In the ἀναστάς (which primarily signifies the rallying from a state of impotent wretched despondency, though not without a gracious though slight pre-intimation of the resurrection of the dead one, ver. 24) Bengel sees the primordia pœnitentiæ, accurate indicata; but we should more accurately look for the true primordia in the earlier ἐλθὼν εἰς ἑαυτόν, "when he came to himself." The arising and the going are again two stages, hence repeated significantly in ver. 20. There is no despair, which would rest in the ἀπόλλυμαι—"All is lost with me, my salvation is impossible, I can no more return to my father!" When now the sinner—in a better sense than before in ver. 13—gathers all together that he has in himself, all that remains in him of the grace of creation, as well as all the influence of awakening, preventing grace already received—then can he do what he will. But he must also in act go, and actually go to the father. How many find this grievous; how many prefer to go to some other citizen of the country who may promise fairer and give more than the former! But in this going to the father there follows of itself the true saying unto him—even if that is only the language of coming itself, which often speaks most loudly.

Even in this "Pater, peccavi"—as popular use has translated our Lord's expression of the sinner's heart's cry to the heart of the all-merciful Father—His shepherd-voice goes out after the wandering sheep, putting that language into the lips of sinful man. And what a word is this single ἥμαρτον, "I have sinned," in this place, the heart-breaking fullness of which the Holy Spirit teaches every penitent sinner from age to age to pour forth in many words! Impossible is it at first to set before God all the details of our life of sinfulness; but this one word is enough for him, if it springs from the depths of earnestness, without any abatement of reservation or apology. The son in the parable alleges nothing in his own justification (youthful inconsideration, false counsellors, or the like), and is far from Adam's ancient defence, Gen. iii. 12, comp. Job xxxi. 33. How fundamental and thorough the meaning of his ἥμαρτον, is shown in the addition, without any unfolding, as it were, of his sin—"I know what that is, I have sinned against heaven and before thee!" Is this to be put to the account of the parable simply, so that the son here may be said to distinguish between heaven and his human father? Primarily it may be so—and, for the purpose of the figure, it may run—"Against God, crying to heaven, has my sin been committed, while I have been offending before thee, and against thee my father; not merely the offence against thee do I feel and confess, but above and before all the sin before God" (comp. Matt. xxi. 25; Ezra ix. 6; 2 Chron. xxviii. 9). But this twofold expression has its distinctive meaning in the interpretation of the parable, inverting the sense just given—"I have sinned against the right and order of heaven, against the obedience of the kingdom of spirits subjected in obedience to law (a supplementary note for ver. 7), in that I have sinned against thee, my Father, and the Father of all spirits!" And so, further—"Not merely before all the angels and holy inhabitants of thy house, preëminently, and first of all in thy sight. I stand here a confessed, and convicted sinner! But I dare to come, and stand before thy holy face." The two sentences—I will arise! I have sinned! were unconditional and decided; but the third follows as hypothetical, and carrying with it the latent spark of something not yet lost. Judas and Cain at once are ready to have nothing more to do with God; but this poor prodigal son has twice in his penitence spoken of his father, ver. 18 (and a third time, if we include ver. 17); and even the being called son, which he could not hope in reply* from him whom he yet ventures to address as "father," has in its undertone the timid and poignant suggestion—Although I am thy son, was once rightly so called. This evidently lies in the backward glance of οὐκέτι, "no more." The prayer descends from the tone of its first confession of absolute guilt, in a way which is as artless as it is justifiable, and uses a μείωσις (meiosis) which expresses the outgoing of the heart of a child towards the heart of a father. Instead of continuing, and prosecuting into all its detail, the ἥμαρτον which he had confessed—"I deserve to be banished from heaven and from thee, to be punished with the severest condemnation!" he takes courage to say no more than—"I am no more worthy to be called thy son;" although this indeed silently says—"Anything rather than this has been my desert!" Had his words ended there they would have been a perfect model for all such sons so coming as he; his appeal would have been such as the "father!" which he had first spoken might have said in its own solitary and profound significance; the conclusion corresponding to that would have been the fitting and permitted supplication of a returning child, more self-abased than words would express—"But father! I pray thee, receive thy penitent son again, call me son once more!"

This repentance dares to hope for, but not to expect, forgiveness; hence scarcely has the son drawn involuntarily so near, than he falls back again in anxiety, ventures not to complete his petition, nor to close it in the way which we have indicated. Nitzsch therefore says too much, if we take him literally, when he preaches on this text of "an arising and coming with the whole trust of repentance, and with the entire repentance of trust." Profound and beautiful, but true only in a further stage, beyond this first return. "My whole spirit cries out—Father, make me anew, I am no more thy son!" But thus does not the son speak as yet; it is another ποίησόν με, "make me," which he brings, of which anon. He feels after acceptance, forgiveness, renewal, but at the same time with a contradiction: this and no more can the natural reason and power attain to—entire confidence is as much an effect of grace received as entire repentance.* The conclusion of reason from natural postulates and premises, the heart's wish and the heart's hope of the contrite sinner returning to a better life, approves the possibility of forgiveness of sins with God, but only the possibility—"not the fact and the actuality, since even the most correct perception of the paternal gracious character does not warrant the lost son to expect forgiveness with perfect assurance, before the wiser father declares himself. If, then, he thus goes, repents and confesses, yet must he ever stand in doubt whether forgiveness will actually be the result. Yea, the same reason (which deemed it possible on many grounds) may deem it now on other grounds altogether uncertain whether it may or can be so—a paradox this! No sooner does God forgive sin than the converted man comes into a new condition of blessedness, rest and peace, as if he had never sinned; the remembrance of the sinful condition is effaced, and it appears as if he had been placed on a level with the holy, sinless creature which had never transgressed God's commandment. Now if the condition of these two is the same, notwithstanding that the reformed sinner must ever be one who has been an actual sinner—then our natural faculties cannot reconcile the forgiveness of sins with justice, that is, with the strictly proportionate goodness of God. Even the Christian who knows and believes in his heart that there will be more joy in heaven over the repenting sinner (Luke xv. 7)—stumbles at this saying if he applies to it his mere reason, and is tempted to attribute to God some sort of injustice against more pious spirits and races of unsinning intelligences. He thinks (viewing the matter merely with his reason), that these may, like the elder son, have some cause to complain against God. And so—it remains to reason at the least an insoluble problem, how God can pardon sinners on repentance simply and yet remain righteous towards the unsinning, placing those on a level with these."* We may here see, by way of anticipation, how the error with its subjective truth of the penitent son's humility has already done justice to the proud pre-eminence of the righteous one, even before he had begun his murmuring.

But what is this error of humility with its subjective truth, the exhibition of which was so needful to the objective truth of this anthropological delineation? No other than the intended petition with which the son would close his appeal to his father, and which is seldom understood in all its depth of meaning. We have good grounds for admitting that "in this awakening return there is a spark of confidence towards the injured father; and thus penitence and faith together concur in that first faint feeling which now respects the formerly despised paternal character" (Berlenb. Bib.). But if in this son awakening to a return, there had been more than this slight spark of confidence in grace; if he had at once thought of being accepted as a son who had never sinned, or had asked for and expected this at the first, then would his penitential humility have been inwardly untrue; and the Saviour would not have been able to describe penitence (as he here however does), in that aspect which presents it as springing from man's capability and determination; it would be in that case a penitence which prematurely anticipates the influence of the positive assurance of grace. The returning son almost dares to put his request, but at the same time retracts it: it is impossible for him to anticipate the reception of ver. 20, still less that which follows in ver. 22; this, however, although right when looked at humanly, is wrong before God. Make me as one of thy hired servants! This is by no means, as well-meaning expositors have unthinkingly said, the appropriate promise or pledge of a new obedience—as if, in omitting it, ver. 21, "his shame had led him astray, and made him forget, like petitioners too often, the best part of his resolution!" It is an error which accompanies his truth, but such an error as seems justified in the reality of man's circumstances and relations, until the Father's superabounding grace removes its grounds. It is of no avail to urge the observation that ποιεῖν ὡς, "to make as," is used as tractare tanquam; the son's ποίησον means more than this, the ὡς used with it has almost (if not, in this conflicting sentence, vibrating between hope and fear, between the trust in mercy and the abasement before justice, altogether) the force of—Make me a hired

* The repetition of the confession, ver. 20, after the father's embrace, is somewhat thus to be viewed.

* Thus spoke some time ago an upright Christian Kantian, whose practical reason approached much nearer to revelation than that of the notorious Hegelians of our time, who will have nothing to do with repentance and with—sin. See Immanuel, ein Buch für Christen und Juden (Berlin, 1805), p. 183 servant! (which would be the perfect antithesis to the above quoted precipitate—Make me anew thy son!) On the one hand this might be regarded as the expression of his humility, of the utmost he can think of; for he means to say that even that is grace, to be regarded as one of the least of thy hired servants—"for I am not a reputable stranger who offers himself to thy service, but a vagabond who deserves not the beggar's penny, a worthless son whom the father's rod should meet at the door." But on the other hand he exhibits here in the background the residual ineradicable self-righteousness, the existence of which no reasoning can deny in the vilest sinner, and which cannot be persuaded that its own efforts must not retrieve the past. "And I will show thee, O father, how I thy sometime son will work as a servant; will merit my morsel of bread (without περισσόν), and it may be in coming years win back my right to the name of son!" It is the same thing which we have found on another occasion in Matt. xviii. 26. So that here lies the concealed transition (in their likeness before God) from the younger to the elder son: in this his most praiseworthy appeal the younger becomes too much like the elder (who had never served but as a servant); and if the fullness of grace, which alone suffices, had not taken away this feeling, he might have developed with time into a proud elder son himself. All this is described by our Lord according to the simple truth of that which is in human nature: it is painted, however, by his sacred gentleness in such a manner as to abate without extenuating the great guilt of self-righteous pride, as it is only the full consummation of that delusion which exists in both and in all sons of the Father; to wit, that between father and son a mutual obligation exists—the same delusion with which the demand of ver. 12 commenced.

And he arose and came to his father: this is the best and most blessed "Said and done!" that can be in heaven and upon earth. For, alas! between this saying, "I should—I might—I will—and again I will," and the actual doing of it, there is in the case of many a long standing still, great thoughts of heart (Judg. v. 15, Heb.); and, in the case of too many, room for irresolution and turning back again.* Take no counsel with thyself, poor sinner, vacillate not! Come, only come, then wilt thou find in thy Father the thoughts of thy heart, concerning thy being son and being made servant, surpassed beyond all thine imaginings and prayers. He came, like the ἐγγίζοντες (those that "drew near") of ver. 1, and this is the pendant and complement of the being sought and found simply, in ver. 4. He came to his father! Most gracious prolepsis of the reception which ensued: he had rightly said (and more rightly than his final words show him to have understood himself), I will arise and go to my father! Oh that every one, in whom there is the germ of this resolution, would put it into instant execution, and become, instead of a stranger in the world, a pilgrim unto God! (1 Pet. ii. 11).

Verses 20–24. He who comes is not cast out, but received with the full joy of his father's heart. And here we have, first, the taking back again of the penitent sinner in itself, as the result of that love in the omniscient and all-merciful God which comes forth to meet his approach, ver. 20. Then this is more specifically detailed: in the son's confession (without any pledge), ver. 21; in the Father's gracious gifts; in the son's justification, full acceptance, and sanctification, being his answer in act to the penitent's appeal, ver. 22; finally, in the joy of the Father's whole household, or heaven, vers. 23, 24. If any one should say: Such a gracious and loving reception, so instant and so full, I never experienced, with all my repentance; we have only to reply—Then must the fault have been with thyself, thou hast not with entire determination of purpose arisen; thy repentance must have been lacking in something, else would the same grace have met thee in the way. Compare such sayings of the Old and New Testament as Jer. iii. 12; James iv. 8. The expression of the grace of God appears here twofold: coming to meet, and consolation; but the ground on which this rests, or the principle from which it springs, is exhibited as combined omniscience and mercy. The ἔτι μακράν,* "yet a great way off," reaches very far back, though this could not be clearly introduced in the case of the figurative human father—not only to the first good resolution of the son, but actually to that first μακράν, ver. 13, which this latter seems to echo. We must push our interpretation beyond the parable, and regard it as being said that the Father had seen the son in all his wanderings and at his utmost distance, having accompanied him everywhere by his unwearied grace. The seeing expresses also the knowing all about his misery and the full earnestness of his return, so far as that feeling was possible in a miserable sinner—what is lacking in it the Father reckons in that wretchedness over which his compassion yearns. It is not impossible that the son might even now, when near his father's house, have remained afar off, without any courage to approach it, if his father had not come forth to meet him. The marvellous seeing of the Father is a drawing too: it excited in this poor son's mind the thought—He sees me, and regards me, as a father! It was as if the atmosphere of paternal love already began to compass him about. Had his father kept stern silence when the son drew near to him—what would then have been the consequence? Might he not have been terrified, have gone away again, or been thrown into despair, or what else we may imagine? But he is a merciful, and fatherly father! Although it was only need that drove back the runaway, although he is far from coming back with a perfect filial trust—with neither of these things does grace upbraid him. The father's heart in the σπλάγχνοις οἰκτιρμοῦ, "bowels of compassion" (Col. iii. 12; Luke i. 78) cries over this son—"He is punished enough, he has punished himself sufficiently, let me run to him and heartily console him!" But this first consolation does not say, or does not yet say, My son! (as afterwards, ver. 24); but first there is the embrace between father and child (as in Gen. xlvi. 29, and 2 Sam. xiv. 33), afterwards the words of explanation. This true and loving father—for we may thus extract the pathetic pith of the parable—does not recoil from the swiny reek, does not draw back with dignity from the tattered or naked beggar, and is not restrained by anything from embracing him in the public way. It is altogether as if he had ever been the most loving child, and had never sinned; and therein without any words all is given in this first outpouring of grace; there have we the full and ineffable answer to the approaching penitent—I regard thee as my dearest and most faithful son! And thus, what the son would say, is anticipated and prevented. The well-meaning efforts which are made to explain the absence of reference to the mediating propitiation of the Son of God, in this instant exhibition of the Father's mercy, are altogether needless; they rest fundamentally upon false dogmatic views of this propitiation, as if there were not existing in the Father's being the same love which is expressed in the Son, as if the Father needed abstractly to be propitiated in order to entertain this love. We are not to seek Christ himself as mediator in the person of this father; nor (though Melancthon has strangely ventured to affirm it), afterwards in the fatted calf, as sacrificially slain. His place here is rather to be sought in his thus authoritatively testifying of the Father's mercy. As Nitzsch excellently says: "If he seems to conceal himself here, he is all the more manifest there, where the Shepherd seeks the lost sheep. For the Son, who is neither an elder nor a younger, the eternal Son of the Father, one with him, his eye and his heart towards the lost, is come into this world, although invisible and unnamed in the parable, to reveal the Father where he had been ever invisible and where no man knew him; and he is, to the children of the law and the curse, not only a living herald of the propitiable—we would rather say, of the already propitiated—Father, but the (that is, our) propitiation itself, and the way whereby every one of us may come back to God." The mediation of Christ is no more denied by this silence, than the seduction by Satan was denied in the sinner's apostasy at the beginning of the parable. We may also say with Von Gerlach, that "the coming out of the father to meet his son here figuratively exhibits the sending of the Son"—and in this coming out to meet him, when fully understood, nothing is said of a "necessary propitiation of his wrath. For God was in Christ reconciling—2 Cor. v. 19."

* Instead of which Bahrdt surreptitiously read an οὐκέτι οὐ μακράν: "when he was no longer far from the place, his father saw him coming—and when he saw him now near, and marked in his pale face," etc. That would have been the record, merely as a human narrative, but the exact opposite is the far-reaching scope of the parable.

The son, received with grace transcending all his thought, fetched home, like an invited guest, through that final portion of the way which would have been so grievous, receives the embrace and the kiss with the profoundest astonishment, his deep reverence forbidding him to refuse them. Now he knows, as he never knew before, what a father is, and what such a father! So much the more piercing becomes the sincere earnestness of his repentance. He does not now begin to think: "Ah, since the good old man takes it so kindly, I might well have spared myself all my anguish and anxiety! Let us avoid for the time to come the folly of plaguing ourselves," etc. Earthly fathers have often, alas! sons who come back to begin again with more cunning their course of extravagance; man in his sinful estate is indeed capable of apostasy, but to turn at once to licentiousness the first full outpouring of grace, would be a Satanic element, in the midst of the human repentance, which involves a direct contradiction. That which the penitent designed, in the trembling resolution of feebly hopeful anxiety, to say to his father, the graciously received son now says in its fullest truth; now first has he experienced a pure repentance and the entire abandonment of himself to naught but grace, and hence his unwise offer of himself to hired service is withheld. This omission of the concluding words of his intended confession, is a feature of the highest significance. Meyer's note—"The father prevented his continuing," is correct only when it is rightly understood. We are not to suppose that between vers. 21 and 22 there intervened an interruption on the part of the father; and that the son in that father's presence still retained the servant in his heart, and still contemplated "some atonement and reinstatement of his own righteousness;"* the father had already, ver. 20, set his heart right upon this matter, and so stopped his mouth that he himself omits the words, as contradictory to his father's kiss of forgiveness.

Thus much for the first scene between father and son; the narrative now concisely hastens with both to the house, where the personages increase around them. The servants of this house, the δοῦλοι, are more than μίσθιοι, or hired servants, as the words of one of them, ver. 27, participating in the Master's sentiments, make plain; we may and we should assuredly think of the angels once more of ver. 10, for they are summoned to sympathetic rejoicing here as well as in vers. 6 and 9. They approve themselves consistently in this interpretation as the doers and ministers of the divine will. This heavenly Father has in the present case (without disparagement to the independent meaning of that type) not merely one blessing, like Isaac, Gen. xxvii. 38, for the faithful son; but the riches of his mercy and of his wisdom providently laid up the second and the best blessing for the son recovered after being lost. "In vers. 22 and 23 every word defines a portion of the plan of salvation and the order of grace" (Richter). The three gifts which the father causes to be brought to the recovered and accepted son, have received almost universally the same interpretation, which is therefore assuredly the right one; they give collectively the second, and perfect answer indeed to the prayer of the son. I still call thee son, thou art and remainest such, thou becomest my son again, thou receivest here all that is wanting to that position: behold, thus make I thee no hired servant, but invest thee before all my servants with thy full honor as my son, and they shall serve thee at my command. In detail, the robe brought for the poor naked one corresponds to the primary justification (Isa. lxi. 10; Rev. iii. 18); the ring (as token of the eminent man, James ii. 2; Gen. xli. 42; that is of one free in contradistinction to slaves) indicates with yet fuller acknowledgment, the Spirit of adoption, sonship and freedom;* the shoes, so strikingly introduced at the close (wanting as a rule to slaves), point most significantly to their spiritual interpretation, as meaning the grace and power of a new life and obedience so absolutely needful in order to an entire restoration. "I will provide for it that thou shalt not walk in the new-found paths of my household with the steps of a slave—thou needest not trouble thyself for that!" Yea, the converted son receives all at once; under the condition, unexpressed in the first superabounding assurance that he will now from henceforth sustain these honors aright and fully meet their obligations. As it had been specifically said—τὴν στολὴν τὴν πρώτην, that is, the well-known, the best robe of honor;† so similarly τὸν μόσχον τὸν σιτευτόν, "the fatted calf," (comp. Judg. vi. 25, Sept.), expressly repeated in vers. 27 and 30, that which had been prepared and reserved for a special festivity.‡ By the calf (the significance of which is more than the mere first refreshment of the hunger-suffering son, as Roos thinks) we are to understand no other than the heavenly-material substratum, the expression of household joy corresponding to such an earthly δαπάνη, a feast. With this is connected the most condescendingly communicative invitation to all the servants and dwellers in the house, in strict parallel with vers. 6 and 9—εὐφρανθῶμεν, "let us rejoice." The Vulg. translates this by epulari, to feast, and is not far wrong, since εὐφραίνεσθαι had become the usual expression for this, with which not only does ch. xvi. 19 well agree, but parallels also in this chapter, εὐφρανθῶ in ver. 29, with the express addition of χαρῆναι in ver. 32. But the great festal hymn the father himself intones in the sublime psalm strain of ver. 24. This is the joy of God over one of his sinful creatures—the full declaration of that supreme love in the Son's loftiest announcement, following and transcending the indefinite expressions—in heaven, and in the presence of the angles of God! Here are the two former parables condensed into one; for the piece of silver in the dust was as dead (as we there rightly interpreted), and the wandering sheep was as lost. But this beggar (so scornfully regarded by many a lately hired servant) was no other than a son to his father's eye; and to the οὗτος, "this," which points him out there is immediately appended the renewed diploma of his prerogative—ὁ υἱός μου, "my son," —which, spoken at the very outset, would secure the prodigal from any future scorn. But because his supreme grace does not act arbitrarily, and because this Father of the household condescends to make known to his servants as his friends (ver. 6) the sacred well-grounded right (the ὅτι) of his act, that they may know and sympathise with the joy of their Lord (John xv. 15)—therefore follows the great word, which, in the record here given by the highest authority of the history of a penitent sinner, loses the remembrance of his former sin in his present repentance and its reinstating consequences, and makes the grand result to the father of such a son a greater and altogether unmingled joy.* "Dead" signifies primarily in the similitude—As my son no better than dead to me his father, being no more with me; and the "lost" which follows is then an epexegetical parallel. But any pious father would in such a case carry his thoughts further; and we must also understand the interpretation of this νεκρός, dead, in the full and profound sense which it bears elsewhere in Scripture (Eph. ii. 1, 5). It then places the strongest expression first in this anticlimax—He had ruined and lost himself, thrown away his true οὐσία, or living, in that he had sinned! But I forgive, and reckon that as only having been a sad loss of my son. And the latter expression presupposes a truth which modifies the concentrated scriptural truth of the former; viz., that the dead son was, notwithstanding, not utterly dead, for he might yet live again. And they began to be merry—what an ἤρξαντο is this, after the former ἤρξατο ὑστερεῖσθαι, including this lost son in the joy! With a heart how full of the highest joy springing out of his deepest abasement does the son now sit in his

* Does it signify at the same time as a seal-ring (Gen. xxxviii. 18; Esth. iii. 12) the Spirit as the confirming pledge and seal of grace? Scarcely, for the possession of the Spirit already contains this assurance.

† Not literally (as the Berlen. Bib. fables; to say nothing of its taking the calf to the old man, the animal, which must die) the first or former robe of righteousness which he had thrown away through his sin! If we need go any further, we should think of the robe of honor hitherto reserved for the first-born—and this would then be an impressive prolepsis exhibiting the father as already penetrating the heart of the elder son.

‡ "It is as if the calf had been fattened for his coming; he has the best kept for him" (Lange).

Verses 25–28. The third narrative might here have ended with the same conclusion as the two former: but it had promised in the commencing words, ver. 11, something more; and the other of the two sons must now come forward. The Pharisees had said at ver. 7, at least in their hearts, "These ninety and nine just persons are ourselves, however!" And again, while hearing of the lost son, "This does not assuredly point to us!" Another mirror is now held up before them—"But here see yourselves!" Apart indeed from any such design, the continuation of the second part is the fit supplement to the narrative of the converted sinner; showing the "reception which the retrieved soul meets with from his fellow-men" in contrast with his reception by the Father; and further, how that gracious Father vindicates his son from their scorn. So far this second part tells those publicans and sinners—Expect nothing else as the result of your conversion; but let your consolation be the love of God, which will be confirmed to you despite all their murmurings! But we still think that, in the scope and cast of the entire parable, our Lord's main design is to make prominent the entreaty as addressed to those proud righteous ones, who as worse sinners are also sought if possible with still greater love. This second word of grace to the secretly and perversely apostate sinners who enviously clamor against his righteousness, is addressed to them as an invitation to repentance, or, since as a rule this result is not to be expected, as a most earnest warning to such as despise it. We behold once more in the clearest light of the truth which the Pharisees perverted, the sin of man (now theirs) and the grace of God as rigidly contrasted. The sin of the elder son before the father (as ver. 18), although hypocritically concealed, suddenly betrays itself, and more than that, assumes its highest manifestation in his anger at his brother's reception. His first inquiry, vers. 25, 26, is most unseasonably unfilial, and the simple correct reply in a clear statement of the circumstances of the case, ver. 27, only provokes his haughty wrath! Then does the father's grace bear long-sufferingly with the outbreaking pride of this sinner too (such as made him, in the worst sense, like the foolish sheep), and seeks to overcome him by love. Mark the anticipating and condescending love which in this case is once more shown (ver. 28); and the pride of the son, which is now by this provoked to the uttermost, putting into his mouth complaints of the neglect shown to himself (ver. 29), and of the favor which his brother had received (ver. 30). Mark, finally, the father's answer, which places all in its last and clearest light, and gives the final lesson, by which the father seeks to convince and win even him (and Jesus the Pharisees)—however certain that he will fail!

The elder son was in the field—does this mean that he was among the servants diligently at work, as his δουλεύω, "I serve," ver. 29, proclaims? It was possibly so intended, but, possibly, it signifies only (or rather probably) as Nitzsch interprets—Those supercilious righteous ones "are not themselves personally at hand when the lost sinner is recovered." Assuredly there is lightly hinted a distance from the father's house and the father's face; in which the laborer (or stroller?), in this ἀγρός, or "field," of his father, is in danger of furnishing a parallel with that other ἐν τοῖς ἀγροῖς, "in the fields," of the far country. "Now his elder son:" this new starting-point of the narrative connects itself immediately with ver. 22, "the father"—just as this ὁ πατήρ again referred back to the beginning, ver. 11. The father of these two sons, the father of the one as well as of the other—this is an immovable principle lying at the base of the whole history. Yet must we observe, again, the commencing contrast of the elder son with the ο ὑ τ ο ς ὁ υἱός μου, "this my son," ver. 24, in which lies concealed the father's grievous trouble about that son, over whom he could not so rejoice. It is only because such is the state of his mind, and the father well knows it, that the elder son is not asked, not simply to his father's councils—that might have been too much—but not even to an expression of sympathy before the εὐφραίνεσθαι or merry-making proceeds. There would have been no interchange of sympathy, but a wicked reception of the prodigal which his father would spare him. If that elder son had been differently minded, the idea of sympathy would have been more appropriate in connection with him than with the servants in a less near relation; but—he is away in the field, and there the father leaves him in his isolation and selfishness. At the punctual meal time he comes back to the house, but hears on this occasion something unusual—music and dancing (or dance-music), for thus without the article as appended by Luther must we interpret it.* He curiously inquires what it is. "This is a very strange incident with us, and something special must be going on! How is it that I know nothing about it? Ah! had this feast been given to me—but to whom else, then, can it have been given?" His vexation because such things go on in the house without him, is the reason why he does not go in and naturally gather the reason for himself; remaining without as an uninvited guest, and summoning imperiously a servant to explain it to him, instead of going at once to his father, the only head of the house. There is no ground whatever for detecting in the servant's reply an evil design;* it is rather in perfect accordance with the father's words, standing between his former and latter declaration, vers. 24 and 32. Nor can we imagine how Lange could discern an invidious spirit in this simple narration of fact, which twice gives the reason with ὅτι (as ver. 24 commenced) for the festal merriment; or describe it as a "faulty and superficial report which would foster the elder brother's unhappy humor." Thy brother cannot mean—The runaway and reprobate, thou knowest who, is come back again in full state, and so forth. No, the solemn reinstatement into his filial place and prerogative from the father's own lips has taught this servant how he should speak; and hence to the elder son he says—Thy brother. "He is come—how he came is not the question now, that is over, it is joy enough that he is here at all. Thus thinks thy father and his, thus does he greet this thy brother, joyful that he is yet alive! (which ὑγιαίνων here indicates—happily and nothing amiss, being alive after all; the servant has no reference to soundness of soul, and his expressions are more common and less comprehensively profound than the father's). Therefore thy father hath caused the fatted calf to be killed (this, again, to the servant's mind is a sufficient notification for the whole feast)—is not that as it should be, for is not the matter one of great joy to all of us in common with our good old master? Or is thy mind as the elder not at one with thy brother and thy father in this matter?" Thus does the servant himself seem to propitiate the bad feeling which the harsh question of his young master had manifested—whose temper and spirit he may have had many opportunities of witnessing in his dealing with the servants in his father's absence. Out of a servant's mouth this blinded son must first hear his reproof, before his gracious father administers it; to his servant, as to any stranger who might ask what was going on, the simple truth that here was indeed an ἔδει χαρῆναι, "it was meet that he should make merry," needed no confirmation or proof. But the brother and son, made blind and unfeeling by pride, is only made wrathful by it, and refuses to go in and occupy his own reserved seat: and this remaining without exhibits yet more strongly the likeness between him and his once wandering brother.

* A note for the Pietists! The Lord speaks just as he had often seen and heard in the dwellings of Galilee; and in adopting this image of joy he does not absolutely condemn festal music as the expression of man's pleasure. He does not make it sin in itself, though its concomitants and ends too often make it such (Exod. xxxii. 18). That gladness which God gives the Gentiles (Acts xiv. 17), and to the natural man who knows of no better, is a pure type of a higher joy. The landlord who utterly abolished ("relata refero") all light music from his village, would prevent the young people from understanding this parable.

Verses 28-30. The essential and wicked anger of selfishness and hatred exists only among us; in God our heavenly Father there is only the principle of sunlike love, which (as Zinzendorff says) shines all the more brightly and cheeringly upon the most miserable and unworthy of its creatures and children—until this very love must become to the wilfully obdurate the fire of divine wrath. The father comes out, interrupting his great joy over the one son for the sake of the other, and just as he had before gone forth to meet the lost one: he does not neglect the misapprehension of the one son while holding fast the other—both deeply concern his soul—both are his sons! (Hence here, as in ver. 20—his father.) The benignant father goes out, because the proud son will not go in; the father entreats the murmuring son, by exhortation and gracious persuasion (see ver. 31, τέκνον): by divine grace there may be human examples of this, though rare; ordinarily no man as a father would do this. But thus does the heavenly Father act, he thus acted at this very time through the gracious preaching of the Son,* through this parable which fell from his lips. And when thou standest in the place of God as his preacher and ambassador, thou must "know how to apply thyself strenuously to entreaty with men of all kinds, until they come to feel the things of grace"†—and more than that, with men who never come to that feeling!

But what of the son who was so overpoweringly solicited of his father? His anger is the more incensed, and breaks through all the bounds of past restraint in his father's presence. Or was this not the first time that he thus wickedly presumed, must other similar scenes be presupposed as having been wont to occur? We think that, conformably with the spirit of the parable, this was a sudden throwing off of the hypocritical mask, occasioned by this circumstance, and his own anger thereon. Suffice that this son (emboldened by his father's entreaty—what hardness of heart!) expostulates with his father as a servant with a master, to say the least; indeed, he reckons like a hired servant, and yet rebukes like that servant's master. We see plainly at once that in his father's house he has utterly lost the filial feeling, even as his brother far away had retained some measure of it: he therefore is, so to speak, the real and more entirely lost son. His father had doubtless called him τέκνον, "son," at the beginning as he now does at the close; but he does not answer with πάτερ, "father;" that word is not uttered before his wrathful and complaining—ἰδού—see what great injustice thou hast inflicted on me! Nitzsch refers to the apparently reasonable complaint which the mere reason of the elder son would urge (let us recall the words of the Kantian in a former page); and he does this in harmony with the Spirit of Christ, through whose voice the heavenly Father would graciously persuade the erring sinner; but the severe truth is soon revealed by the proud son's own words, who reveals and condemns himself, without needing any further testimony. I serve thee! There stands disclosed the perfect Pharisee, the slave concealed in the son betrays himself in this un-

* Berlenb. Bib.: "This is the devil's craft to send in a man's way such as will pour out the right oil upon the fire, and stir up envy and all passions. This is the effect of all such oblique relations, and hence the servant shares in the guilt of the elder son." Most assuredly incorrect, and not so striking in its error as the plain remark made before—"He may have often heard music before, but this heavenly music makes the bear growl!"

filial, because upbraiding δουλεύω; the slave who through τοσαῦτα ἔτη, "these many years," has plagued himself, with what wearisome and harsh service! Not—As I, alas! have been obliged; but as if it had been an opus supererogationis which merited a special reward. "I have remained, although the first-born, and of adult age, under thy paternal control; and have served thee diligently and usefully as thy over-servant in thy house (ordered and driven thy idle servants, and so forth). Could I not have demanded my emancipation like this pure brother; and wouldst thou not have been obliged to give me mine inheritance? Even now thus late am I still diligently employed without in thy service—see that I am so!" A son, who can speak in this slavish style, instead of entering into his commandment of love—Give me, my son, thy heart! is on that very account worse than any μίσθιος or hireling serving for bread: but we are all the two sons of God, the one kind as well as the other. "Neither transgressed I at any time (in so many years!) any one commandment of thine:" here does the Pharisee still more strikingly appear in the mirror which he himself unconsciously holds up.* Not, as Luther gives it—Thy commandment generally; this is very different: this righteous one only knows the multitude of individual ἐντολαί or commands which he here upbraidingly refers to; and before performing any of them it was first necessary that it should be expressly imposed upon him as a duty. In any case in which his father did not positively give his command, there was nothing in the son's heart which would prompt him to go beyond the δουλεύειν or service. "I have not by one false step transgressed, or pretermitted:" thus does his blind and rash self-condemnation run on at the very moment when he is giving proof that the one ἐντολή or command for sons is utterly disregarded by him, when he is at once transgressing the two laws—Thou shalt honor thy father, Thou shalt love thy brother! "I have not at any time transgressed one of thy commandments: thou hast never at any time given me a little joy:" was not this a fearful sound, as if the father was a sinner and a debtor standing before his son and lord with a long and evil reckoning against him? Now are we pushing the interpretation too far; all is thus literally as we read it. If the Lord were disposed for a good reason, and in the most patient benignity, to admit a good sense in this boasting (God's service without transgression from youth up), it would be of no avail; for these holy ones themselves poison all by their murmuring against poor sinners, who receive mercy, and the God who shows it, by their envy and their pride, which convert all their pretensions into crimes, and betray the evil heart that pervades all their apparent good works. But he must describe and paint them as they are. And he does no more than this; the blindest of these blind could not complain and say—This picture does us no justice! What then was wrong in it to them? That the others are received? Wherefore then not? Because their own glory, prerogative and pre-eminence are detracted from thereby? And what does this show? That their whole excellence and righteousness rests upon no actual foundation of truth (else would the increase of the number of the saints be joy to them as it is to God); that their sole glorying over others, is their condemnation. "They would have a Heathenism side by side with their holy Judaism, that so their innate hereditary sanctity might shine all the more brightly by contrast" —or there must be reprobate and rejected sinners, that so the righteous ones might appear all the more conspicuously righteous. "Thus are they essentially untrue; thus they lie in the very face of the law, the fulfilment of which is love; they deny the God of grace, both by their own self-justification, and by the condemnation of their brethren; and unconsciously enter into a league with unconverted sinners against him who repents." And why is all this, and whither does it lead? They believe in no conversion, because they themselves have never experienced it; they mock and traduce the gracious joy of the pardoned sinner, because they, by their own fault and incapacity, have never tasted and felt it themselves.

"Thou never gavest anything to me," might seem to mean but yet cannot—"And I was contented to have it so, willingly continued my unpaid service." For this present upbraiding reproach throws a dark shade over all his lustrous virtue. This word, spoken by the elder, entirely corresponds to the "give me!" of the younger son: in both cases the regard is fixed upon the bestowment of good things alone, instead of upon the father's favor, love, and fellowship. This brother, then, is first of all like the former prodigal; but inasmuch as he has restrained himself, concealed his secret spirit, and played the hypocrite for the sake of the whole inheritance, he is much worse than he; this systematic hypocrisy has so hardened and blinded him that he now retrospectively complains of his father as it regards the distribution, which the other had only made matter of request. "Thou never gavest"—ah, had he but come as a son and in a becoming manner to ask anything his father had! What gave he not? "Not a single kid, that I might make merry with my friends:" does not this make the case worse and worse? Thus the serving his father and being with his father had been no joy to him; all that he had done was a harsh constrained villenage, and the reward which he had lusted for was to enjoy himself in some permitted by-pleasures (inexpressible perverseness!) without his father. Of the joy of forgiveness, such as converted sinners know, he knows nothing; nor any more of the pleasure of keeping the commandments from the spontaneous impulse of love (Psa. xix. 12). And who are the friends, whose society he relishes apart from his father? The same love of sinful pleasure which drove his brother into outward excesses, gave him this suspicious love of independent merriment, and made him feel the want of his forbidden commerce with his proper comrades. These "friends" are opposed to the "harlots" whom he afterwards assigns to his brother; but, under a more decorous name, are no better than they.

* We are very doubtful whether "a Pharisee of a better sort," as Neander says. The common evil belonging to the character of all, even the best, is disclosed, and exhibited in its internal principle.

And now comes the positive injustice of the father in receiving his brother in addition to the negative injustice towards himself—expressed in bitter contrasts. "So many years do I serve in vain"—but now great gifts are ready for him who has come. "And who is this"—the proudest scorn betrays itself in this finger-pointing, in such unconscious contrast with the sublime word of the father, in ver. 24—"and what is he in comparison with myself? Thou mayest acknowledge him as thy son; but I will take care never to say of such an unclean one—my brother. He is come, indeed—but how? Constrained by distress, because he has transformed himself into a miserable beggar." (It is not—is come back, returned again; he has no idea or feeling of that.) He will not even recognise the legitimate distribution of ver. 12 (which had then greatly vexed him), but now retrospectively protests against it. Σοῦ τὸν βίον, "thy living," (the right reading), is an ironical continuation of ὁ υἱός σου, "thy son"—though the narrative admitted that he wasted his own substance. This is the same harsh, and still more harshly pressed, position of right which had been assumed in the younger brother's demand; not now, however, laid claim to for himself, but turned against his brother and his father—"Thou, foolish father, didst then give up thy goods to be wasted! He hath devoured it with harlots" (Prov. xxix. 3; Ecclus. ix. 6)—intensifying the ζῆν ἀσώτως in his own affectionate and brotherly gratuitous assumption. How came he to know that so well? The servant had not told him so, but his own heart tells him what he would have done in his brother's place. "And for him thou hast at once killed the fatted calf, while I never had a little kid which I might slay: thus thou hast not merely made him equal with me (Matt. xx. 12), though that would of itself be against all justice, but thou hast preferred him before me! He is the dear child, and I the neglected and forgotten one; even as now all things are going on without me." Indeed, the wretched returning one should not have turned to his father without his earnest brother's intercession; and the father should not have admitted him without permission of the son and younger master in the house! What would, what will, indeed, this noble brother say, when he sees the robe of honor and all its other appurtenances? He seemed to be for so many years a true and diligent son—but what a brother is he now; consequently what a son before the Father of that brother! In this it is made manifest, (1 John iii. 10), that is, by the lack of brotherly love, that in him there is also no love of God. His conduct ought to have been very different, if not for his brother's yet for his father's sake, whose kindness due respect should have taught him not to malign, and whose joy it should have been his joy as a son not to disturb but to increase by sympathy. Could we suppose him capable of pushing his hypocrisy yet further, and of embracing his brother with a simulated pleasure for the sake of appearances before the father of both? Thus far we are not to suppose human nature even in the Pharisaic character to go; any more than we could suppose, a few verses back, the once profligate sinner able at once to turn to licentiousness the grace which had just redeemed him from the profoundest misery.

Verses 31, 32. The Pharisee, in disclosing, has condemned himself; nevertheless the father, in the similitude, whose closing words coincide with the reality of the true Father's words in Christ, does not yet judge his petulant son, but goes on in gracious exhortation to teach and humble him, if peradventure he might yet be accessible to instruction. Thus does the Father, and he alone, interpose in the great and permanent quarrel between his two sons throughout all the world; yet we also, as his servants and ambassadors, should learn of him those words of patient love, should know from his example how in meekness to instruct those that oppose themselves (2 Tim. ii. 24, 25). The words of the father are uttered in the gentleness of perfect truth: "As it regards thee, my son, all that I have is, as it ever has been, in my fatherly kindness made common to thee, despite that most unchildlike selfish habitual disguisement of feeling which I have long known, and thou hast now avowed. But as it regards this thy brother (such he is and must be, for he is my son, the justifying οὗτος, 'this,' of my love prevails against the contemptuous οὗτος which thou hast let fall), it was meet on most incontrovertible grounds of holy right that all in my house should rejoice over him; it shall be so therefore, and if it please thee not, go without once more and remain without, for only as his brother canst thou continue my son." (And thus the parable as a great whole returns conclusively into its commencement with the two sons.) The affectionate τέκνον, "son," at the outset is not merely the expression of a yet remaining paternal love, moved by his son's foolish words to complaint and supplication, even as an earthly father, half angry and half grieved, might cry—Child, what have I to endure from thee, how canst thou dare to speak to thy father thus? But with our Father, all anthropopathical tenderness of love must be regarded as one with the supreme dignity of righteous truth; hence the final and conclusive reply here given combines strict instruction with all its moving, awakening and humble appeal. Let this be carefully noted, then, in this first mild τέκνον, "son," which responds to the haughty ἰδού, "lo!" of the son. He did not say father, and yet is called in tender rebuke son: that is, speaking to the depths of his heart—"Speakest thou now as son? Think, O my son, come to thyself! Hast thou served me as a son through all these years?" Then follow piercing and convincing contrasts with the spirit and words of his unfilial allegation of such service. "Thou, set aside as thou thinkest, sittest nevertheless in thy prerogative of birthright; and hast enjoyed through my long-suffering the constant recognition of thy supposed fidelity. Πάντοτε, "ever" —in opposition to thy οὐδέποτε, "never"—art thou with me! and I am thy father; hast thou ever been other than a son, was not and is not that more than any of the gifts which thou hast found wanting? Am I not better to thee than ten friends, and a hundred kids? Wherefore hast thou coveted merriment apart from me? Are thy friends nearer to thy heart than thy father? Or seekest thou my goods instead of my grace, mine and not me—now all that is mine is thine! What have thy services had to do with this? Why shouldst thou speak of a kid, if this be so? (Is that instead of the husks to thee?)"

But here arises the much contested question of the expositors: how could this most incomprehensible πάντα τὰ ἐμὰ σά ἐστιν, "all that I have is thine," be applied in good earnest to this hypocrite? However much contested, nothing is more true, in every respect, than this word. The first full meaning which presents itself is this: all is thy ἐπιβάλλον, is due to thee as an inheritance. In this word, as in the τέκνον, "son," before, the pure truth would assume to his evil conscience a tone of keen and reproachful irony. This son was still his father's child through his father's long-suffering, and yet was no longer such in his own heart; his being called so, though unworthy, is a token of all the richer grace. Just so all the paternal goods were his, and yet were not his. "Thou servest me in thy sordidness of spirit for the sake of all that is mine—and I have not hitherto disinherited thee!" Thus, secondly, and in direct earnestness: "Even now all is and shall be actually thine, if thou amendest thy thought and becomest my child in the best sense, responding to my waiting patience. Have not all things always been open and free to thy desire; couldst thou not, wert thou not permitted to ask me for any good gift?" This exhibits the fatherly long-suffering as not yet exhausted; this dissembler is still tolerated in the house, and his right to everything not yet finally withdrawn. But at the same time the τὰ ἐμά, "that is mine," which precedes this, and which, as long as the father lives, holds good, impresses the great truth—there is nothing for thee but the gift of my paternal hand and favor, nothing to be yielded at thy demand.* Finally —though this is unspoken, left to the inference of his own conscience, as it is the evil which he himself challenges—finally, there impends over the wilful sinner the danger of being disinherited and cast out, in contrast with the voluntary departure of the other who was at least honest in his sin. For this Father dies not. The rebel, secret or open, against the supreme will of God's love waits in vain till the Ancient of days (whose existence he must feel while essaying to deny it), till the great Creator of all spirits, but especially of the spirits of Adam's race, shall decease, and give license to the mad heirs of all his universal possessions. At the utmost distance from him, as in his immediate presence; in the depths of the abyss, where devils murmur, as in the heavenly home where all rejoice with God and his angels over grace—everywhere and for ever all creature existence abideth in his hand and power; nor can any with impunity invade his supreme prerogative.

But thou shouldst be kindly and merry—such is Luther's inadequate version of the text; for the father does not expressly utter any complaint or command, he does not retort the upbraiding which he had a thousandfold reason for; all this is latently addressed to his son's conscience. He does not say anything further to qualify the unretracted acknowledgment of ver. 31. Only in the ὁ ἀδελφός σου, "thy brother," there is a slight tone of reproachful appeal—"Thou shouldst have been glad concerning him in common with myself."* But, properly speaking, the simple and elevated ἔδει, it was meet, thus was it right in this house—while it overturns all opposition, contains, as it were, a justification (from the father before his son!)—an apology for what had transpired, as the εὐφρανθῆναι or merry-making placed first seems to indicate.† Ver. 32 replies to the complaint of ver. 30, as ver. 31 to that of ver. 29. The great festal hymn of rejoicing—ὅτι οὗτος νεκρὸς ἦν, κ.τ.λ., "for this—was dead," etc., sounds out once more undisturbed; the brother ought to and must hear it at least from his father's own mouth, in a richer and purer strain than from that of the servant. The glorious ἔδει, "it was meet," of his incontrovertible ὅτι, "for," reaches to the depths of the rectitude of divine mercy and love, having just based itself upon the convincing illustration of the human parable. It is, as it were, that first question repeated—What man is there among you, who as a father would not do the same over a lost and recovered son? This, therefore, is the conclusive word to the Pharisees: "That which ye blame in me, is the love, the paternal love of God; that which the Father doeth, that doeth also the Son, as the good Shepherd before your eyes; that will the Spirit do in his church when he is gone home—even as ye should have done it among the people and in the house of God."

A sound exposition thus sets at rest the concluding question, with which only a perverted expositor would set out—Who is this elder son?

*Thus containing an oblique denunciation of envy at a brother's good, as Calvin expresses it: Nulla est irascendi causa primogenito, dum absque suo damno fratrem humaniter accipi videt. Nothing is taken away from thee, nothing given to him but the calf of the feast, and the joy.

* To this points the striking observation of Nitzsch to these murmurers: "What dost thou lose, if there be more joy communicated than that which is in thee? Might it not tend to the furtherance of thine own?"

† The Peshito expresses it: וְבָא הוּא לָךְ, for us.

Every man who is what he was. First of all, the Pharisees of that time in contradistinction from the penitent and converted publicans and sinners of Israel. Then, according to the never-failing wider outlook, the self-righteous and proud Jews in contrast with the Gentiles received into the kingdom of God—Rom. ix. 4, 5, being the explanation of the father's word in ver. 31. And is there any application beyond? If we only hold fast the fundamental ideas, we can make applications enough for ourselves of a more restricted historical bearing (as Keil does, contrasting the Jews with the Samaritans)—or taking into account the circumstances of our own time (as Petersen, e.g., sees Roman Catholicism and Protestantism in the two sons, Lehre von der Kirche, ii. 244). There is a most marvellous conceit which founds upon the mystery of this parable, the notion of an elder son in heaven, who thus Satanically murmurs at the restoration of the human race as exhibited in the younger son's history! But should it not be—once murmured, since Satan fell before Adam, and cannot murmur there again?* That the sons of God, apart from Adam's race, might seize upon a certain principle of right in their complaint, if their reason were as ours, we have admitted above; but they are more rational than we. The holy angels (whose holiness is not "righteousness" essentially before God, and they are not the just persons who need no repentance), the servants of the great Lord in his many mansions, who reckon as his friends and neighbors, murmur not, but rejoice over his grace to sinners; and the Lord himself thus obviated by his own introductory words every such idle supposition. But instead of these we may, if still seeking further the elder son, think of Christians who pride themselves on a Judaic right; and, indeed, we must so apply the record, for it is not a history adapted to that time only, but spoken to us all.† When we preach to the called but not chosen, who still retain their pride and self-righteousness, we may hold up to them the mirror of vers. 29–31, to give them the knowledge of these three fearful truths: that we may think ourselves to be keeping all the commandments of God, while keeping in our hearts the principle of all transgression; that we may boast of our own righteousness, while committing in the very boast the heaviest sins; that we may live among all the gifts of grace in their actual offer and seeming possession—and yet not possess or receive them at all.

Finally—we have not yet reached the end—let no man forget himself and the probable Pharisee still extant in his own heart, while preaching thus to others; nor forget the laborers in the vineyard. Here we may mention the touching incident (now first printed) connected with the eccentric but most devout and genuine Daniel Krummacher of Elberfield. Being once asked in an assembly of his brethren, discussing this question, who was, in his view, the elder son, he solemnly said—I well know now, for I learned it yesterday. Being asked further, he laconically said—Myself! and then confessed that yesterday it had fretted his heart to find that a very ill-conditioned person had suddenly been enriched with a remarkable visitation of grace. So deep is our corruption; so long, even in the younger son after all his experience of grace, does that evil principle which prompted him to offer himself to hired service, adhere to his soul and reappear in the similitude at least of the elder brother. It is easily stated and laid down in the theory, but hardly reduced to actual practice and established in full experience: "The childlike, believing men may apply their tests to the reprobate returned; may, especially if they have never sinned in like manner and to such a degree, stand mute in thankful astonishment that God has done so great a thing to him; but they cannot count it strange that such should desire to go on with them to the same higher, blessed, and acceptable life; offended they cannot be" (Nitzsch). Take heed, therefore, ye servants in God's house; let the figure of the elder son administer to you often a wholesome fear! Such people must, however, remain without; for even if the all-merciful God would construct a special heaven for them and "their friends" (when satiated with the longed-for kid, the swine with which no stern Moses should any longer forbid, instead of their husks, that they might enjoy themselves)—whence could their blessedness, which makes it heaven, come, without the filial and pure adoration of eternal love and grace? Their εὐφραίνεσθαι, "making merry," must instantly, at the very threshold of eternity, be exchanged for a miserable ὑστερεῖσθαι, "being in want."

The parable breaks off, the admonished son replies no further to his father, and his conversion is not announced. So in the great fulfilment of the parable it is also wanting in actual life; if thou wouldst be an exception, and remain always with thy Father, enjoying and retaining all that is his—then come first to him in the deepest penitence, and pray, "Father, I was called but was not thy son, I have been much less deserving of the name than my brother—make thou me from a shameful hired servant an honorable child—make me in thy highest grace what my brother is!"

* Or will there be a general restoration of the human race, and then a new fall of Satan, stumbling over that stumbling-block? Those who advocate the simple and pure recovery of men and devils are wiser than that. We marvel that Theremin, in a sermon otherwise so beautiful, should graze on the borders of a doctrine which involves such consequences (Predigten, vol. iii., 1823, No. 9).

† It will be perfectly reversed in the last days, when corrupt Christendom will be the elder son, and converted Israel the younger.

THE CONVERTED SINNER'S PRUDENCE IN ESCAPING FROM PUNISHMENT, WHICH YET THREATENS EVEN HIM: THE UNJUST STEWARD; TRUE FIDELITY IN THE USE OF WORLDLY GOODS.

(Luke xvi. 1–13.)

It cannot be expected of us to unravel the fearfully tangled perplexities of the comments which, from the most ancient times down to our own day—with theological or untheological craftiness, with more or less of arrogance, on the one hand, pretending to extract its only true meaning, or, on the other, with the limitation of ability giving it up altogether—have darkened and perplexed and confused this parable of our Lord, so plain in itself and in its fundamental theme. We shall not be expected to do any more than give positive reasons for our own understanding of the subject, with merely an explanatory reference to such misunderstandings as have a foundation of truth in them, and therefore cannot be classed among the ridiculous theories of crack-brained men.* We can regard only those systems of exposition as having any claim to our attention, which are really in earnest in endeavoring to discover the true meaning of our Lord; and we must particularly bear with those which are not led astray by mere superficiality and incapacity to understand exegesis at all, but by an excusable lack of right perception where a false application on the one side or the other is so easily made.

Our exposition can do no more than confirm the traditional predominant interpretation of the church, the rejection of which by so many expositors may be somewhat excused, partly from the fact that the ecclesiastical tradition does not always stand its ground before maturer knowledge even in the domain of exegetics, and partly, by the lack of any exhibition of the fundamental connection of thought, which for the most part pervades the interpretation handed down by antiquity. The grand and profound, though subtle, connection which subsists between chaps. xv. and xvi. has either been altogether denied (thus closing the door beforehand against a right apprehension), or the right connection has not been discerned—we cannot avoid saying, because it has not been sought with sufficient simplicity of mind. The sinner's repentance or punishment. Such is our simple acceptation of the theme of the two chapters, as they set before us the prodigal son and the rich man in opposition at the beginning and end. And the meaning of that which lies between must naturally be sought between those two points, and will be—The prudence (ver. 8) of the sinner, absolved from the first great punishment, converted and received into favor, in avoiding the ruin which may yet impend; his wisdom, as being not dismissed and rejected, but reinstated, in dealing as a faithful steward in the affairs of his own salvation. That the discourse treats specifically of the administration of worldly goods, the possessions already acquired even as a mammon of unrighteousness, is simply to be explained by the condition and circumstances of the Publicans, with whom the Lord has especially to do, in contradistinction to the Pharisees. But the connection of the previous chapter with the present does not consist in this, that in the former faith in the mercy of God, but in the latter the love of our neighbor,* is treated of; the former teaching what the Father doeth for us, and the latter what we should do to our neighbor; but that prudence which, by the gracious permission of God, uses even the ἐλάχιστον, ἀλλότριον, ἄδικον, least, another's, unrighteous, as the materials for the exhibition of fidelity, in order to lay up in eternity the reward of grace—that and nothing else, according to the plain words of vers. 8–12, is the fundamental precept of the parable. How Neander can make the theme the "blending of simplicity and prudence" we cannot discover.

But the unjust steward! Can his unjust and overreaching craft be a pattern for us? Here rises the second reason which has prompted men to adopt other methods of explaining the parable—the excusable, and in itself laudable objection to the assumption that the children of the world are represented as putting to shame the children of light, which, however, stands disertis verbis in ver. 8. A parable can surely never design to inculcate its opposite—it was scarcely necessary for D. Schulz to demonstrate this so argumentatively and to assert it so earnestly. But as certainly as the Lord does not (according to Julian's presumptuous mockery) place the unrighteousness of this steward before us as a pattern, so certainly does he exhibit for our example his prudence as such, apart from his injustice—and this is not the opposite of the parable. It seems so obvious to every unprejudiced mind that (as Heubner says), "much profit may be derived from the most wicked examples, they may often be directly translated from evil to good;" and Luther's good sense has enriched this parable with so many pertinent examples of this, that all these useless objections should have long ago been laid aside.* Moreover, it is admitted that the Lord Jesus has elsewhere given us parables analogous, which no exegesis can explain away. He compares the freely-giving Father in heaven, ever ready to hear, with the friend who, not for friendship's sake, but only because of shameless importunity, gave his friend what he asked; and even with the unjust judge, who at last concedes the poor widow's claim only for his own comfort's sake, and simply to get rid of her: now those instances are much stronger than this, which merely teaches us poor sinners to learn of a thrifty and prudent worldling, and exhorts us as children of light to practise prudence in a good cause, and to be at least as sagacious in prosecuting our religious advantage as the children of the world are in seeking their earthly good. To the πόσῳ μᾶλλον, "how much more," of the former instance the κἀγὼ ὑμῖν λέγω, "and I say unto you," of this parable perfectly corresponds; and not only so, this express explanation of the Lord gives a further ground for the adjusting of all difficulties, inasmuch as in the application of the parable he takes that very thing which constituted the iniquity of the steward's prudence, and makes it an essential duty of all God's stewards; that which was infamous fraud in him becomes to Christ's stewards the distribution of God's possessions in the name of the All-Holy Proprietor of them all. Thus both the unity and the contrast between the parable and its interpretation are precisely preserved. It is sufficiently plain, as C. H. Rieger observes, that this doctrine of our Lord "was not addressed to people of the world, who are always inclined to put a base and shameless construction upon his requirements; but for disciples who had already attained to the gracious beginning of good desires, who had received the assurance of joy in heaven over their penitence upon earth, and having opened their hearts to this gracious truth, were now disposed to disburden themselves of earthly joys and cares, and to lay up their treasures in heavenly habitations."

* In which last class we must reckon that of a certain expositor (whose name we would rather not mention, after the description in the text) who refers the parable to Judas Iscariot—while another is not wanting, who discovers in it Pontius Pilate!

* According to Von Gerlach, we have in chap. xvi. compassion towards men, active charity, that love of our neighbor which necessarily results from the love of God. According to Lange—Imparting love, as the first fundamental characteristic of a developing salvation. But the giving or not giving is certainly not the leading idea in either parable.

Consequently that "certain uneasy feeling," of which Pastor Brauns (Stud. u. Krit. 1842, 4) admits that his mind was conscious, preventing his yielding to the common and correct interpretation, and which he too boldly attributes to the church generally, has no foundation, and is such a fastidious nicety as the accommodation to heavenly kings in those other parables of the Friend and the Judge should have altogether dispelled. The same Brauns makes the Pharisees come forward and object—"Thou preachest a strange morality; such arch-knavery to be viewed as thoughtful provision for the future, is too crude, and will tend rather to help out the Publicans' case, than to edify their souls"—and we think that their ἐκμυκτηρίζειν or murmuring may very well suggest that such thoughts were in their evil hearts, but that they never had the courage to utter such base thoughts aloud. It will be the endeavor of our exposition to show the baselessness of all such imaginations.

The critical Schleiermacher is not disturbed by any such fine moral perception, but understands here an actual counsel given to the Publicans to appropriate the mammon of the Roman power to the utmost possible advantage of the Jewish people; led to this opposite extreme by the dogmatic bluntness of feeling which—in accordance with the fundamental deficiency of all his theology and exegesis—induced him to look for the everlasting habitations in the temporal kingdom of the Messiah. "Ye good Publicans, favor as much as ye can the people as against their capricious and despotic masters, in those matters which ye have in your own province; that so they also may favor you when a new state of things arises." The relation of the Publicans being somewhat unlimited and undefined, as is generally the case with indirect imposts which are farmed, Christ did not charge them to do anything actually unjust, but only to exercise their discretionary latitude of power to the best advantage for the Jewish people. "If ye thus wisely and prudently manage your matters, ye will not be cast out of Israel, when the kingdom of Messiah is introduced." Alas, how political is this—and therefore how far from the meaning of our Lord, who is speaking here to these sinners of a very different continuance, and of a very different reception into abiding habitations! Nevertheless, we cannot deny that this carnal misapprehension connects itself with a fundamental principle of truth; many at that time might so have understood him, discerning something of the meaning of his words, but unable to free themselves from the carnal notions of the Old Testament typical system. But the fundamental deficiency in this view is twofold: in not marking, first, that the αἰώνιοι σκηναί, "everlasting habitations," point to the same future after death (the most essential ἐκλείπειν) which the following parable discloses; and then in not discerning that the parabolical lord of the steward can only be, in the contrasting application, the great God whose is all our substance, since in γάκώ, "and I," ver. 9, Christ requires that to be done righteously, which the κύριος or Lord of the steward was constrained to commend as wisdom.

Olshausen is open to the same charge, for his interpretation (after his fundamental character as a spiritualist), properly speaking, only spiritualises that of Schleiermacher, placing in the stead of the Roman Cæsar the κόσμος or ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου,* the "world" or its "prince."

* It is not, as Weisse thinks, an "oblique parable which does no honor to Christ's wisdom as a Teacher —a style of instruction which would not be tolerated in a village schoolmaster." Alas! these low-minded, little masters; would they but read and learn themselves!

* Lange adopts the above view, and finds in the

"Such an overreaching of the κόσμος or the devil, as Jesus here teaches, is the way to render back to God what rightly belong to him!" Here there must be two Lords in contrast with one another, and the expositor speciously (and it is the only plausible point in this exposition) refers to ver. 13—"he who thus wisely was διασκορπίζων τὰ ὑπάρχοντα τοῦ ἀνθρώπου πλουσίου, wasting the goods of the rich man, truly served the true Lord; he despises the one to belong wholly to the other, and with the possessions of the one labors for the objects of the other." Pity, however, for this exposition that there is nowhere a trace in the parable of that other true Lord, in whose service and for whose ends the steward favored the debtors; pity that when this other Lord does actually enter in and speak, he does not say—Serve me! but—"Make yourselves friends, who will receive you! Be ye equally wise as that steward in his care for himself, but let your wise care be for eternity. Then will I also commend you for doing wisely, even as that lord did." Where is there in all this a single trace of two opposite and contrasted lords? Finally, does the κόσμος or ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου commend the craft which takes away his possessions for the service of God? Is it then the spirit and temper of this world thus to deceive the Prince of this world? Nothing but confusion arises from this, if the word is read just as it stands. The lord in the parable is indeed himself a child of this world, but not on that account in the application the Prince of this world; but in the contrasting application Christ himself incontrovertibly takes his place with his—"I say also unto you."

And who are the stewards over the mammon, that which is least and another man's, which the glorious Lord over all leaves in their hands, overlooking the unrighteousness which still cleaves to it, that they may use it aright in love, that being alone the true use of it for him and for ourselves, that being alone its profitable employment? These we are all; but now first the Lord spoke to the publicans who turned to him, as Luke intimates in the first verse—overlooking this we must go astray throughout. Zyro revives the old interpretation of Vitringa, which regards the Pharisees here described as being appropriators to themselves of the saving elements of the Jewish faith entrusted to them by God, and as being exhorted rather to deal kindly and dutifully with the poor debtors of the Lord, in specie the Publicans; but this, in common with every direct application of the parable to the administration of spiritual gifts and possessions, is excluded by the simple consideration that in his own solution of it, vers. 9–13, the Lord adheres simply and expressly to the mammon proper, and its wise, discreet, and faithful dispensation. There is thus much truth underlying all this, however, that our Lord does actually include the covetous Pharisees as the objects of his address (ver. 14); and knew well from the beginning that they, if they came with the Publicans to him as his disciples, might thus use and apply his instructions.

But let this suffice for the prelusory polemics: let us now approach the text ourselves, first giving our own general view of its simple contents.

I. The parable itself exhibits to us an unjust steward, and in a threefold point of view: first, the account which is demanded of him; then his prudence in extricating himself out of this embarrassment (of such a kind, however, that he is still the unjust steward); and finally the commendation of this prudence, as it is enforced from his similarly unrighteous and selfish lord. But it is here taken for granted, as the teaching of the former parable, that in this threatened reckoning the grace of God absolves the penitents who confess their sins, that they are by no means dismissed and cast away, but rather, as impoverished, are endowed with a new dispensation of goods; and here we may note the transition to that style of contrast in which the parable enforces its teaching. Similarly it is presumed, that the prudence of this steward, thus directed towards God and divine things, is the precise counterpart of chap. xv. 18, 19. Finally, while the commendation of his prudence, bestowed reluctantly by his lord, forms the distinctive close of the whole parable, and without any reference to the involved injustice, our Lord immediately adjoins (as a transition to its interpretation) a corrective estimate of the meaning and value of that praise—"For the children of this world," etc. This he brings into distinct prominence, by his tertium comparationis, the contrast which enters into the application of the parable.

II. The express explanation, which he himself goes on to give, contains, first, the proper interpretation in ver. 9, followed by a further explanatory continuation, to obviate all misunderstanding, of all the fundamental ideas of the parable. This latter goes over naturally and necessarily into a solemn warning against an impending second condemnation, if they who were absolved in the first reckoning should not use the gracious permission and obey the rigorous command, to use the mammon left in their keeping for the good of their souls, faithfully and charitably and prudently employing it as good stewards. First: this fidelity in giving away (the honest prudence of the children of light), such an administration of the lesser earthly goods as is well-pleasing to the true Lord is now a discipline, preparation, and approval for the dispensation and enjoyment of the higher possessions. For fidelity or unfaithrich man "Mammon himself, the allegorical Plutus, the Spirit of gold, the genius of money, the demon of avarice." Most ludicrous, then, is the interpretation of the calling to account and the dismissal—that is, the disagreement arising between the new principles and the old covetous nature, etc. Most strange, however, is the explanation that "Jesus terms this unfaithfulness of the pious as it regards mammon fidelity in that which is least, that is, that this is the least thing which should be expected from a Christian!" The thoughts of Jesus are here utterly perverted; on this view, vers. 9–12 cannot possibly have any fair interpretation.

fulness (mark now the plain and undisguised contrast!) in little things and in great, coincide and are one in their internal principle (ver. 10); the use of earthly property is thus the standard—regulating the entrusting of the greater, essential good, that which is the true riches, even in the present life (ver. 11), and the final bestowment of the same as the original inheritance and actual possession in the next world (ver. 12). In this it is at the same time hinted, that the true riches as merely entrusted may be taken away again, as another man's, from those who are untrue, and unfaithful. Thus the discourse speaks plainly of two kinds of goods; and now, secondly, ver. 13, two masters are also introduced for the first time—for this fidelity requires an undivided heart for God alone, which serves God in the use of his gifts, and turns those earthly goods to his service in the salvation of the soul which idolatry turns into a God instead of using aright.

Verses 1, 2. The ἔλεγε δὲ καί, "and he said also," is elsewhere a general connecting formula, but in this place it is manifest from the process of thought, and especially from the continuation in ch. xvi. 14, 15, of the scene opened up in ch. xv., that a direct sequel to the preceding is here intended. This is so manifest that Zyro, to whom this connection does not approve itself, is obliged critically to set aside both the remark of the Evangelist in ver. 1, and the φιλάργυροι ὑπάρχοντες, "who were covetous," in ver. 14. Our internal criticism, on the contrary, shows us that the καί, "and," in ver. 1 and ver. 14 clearly correspond, and that πρὸς τοὺς μαθητάς, "unto his disciples," stands related to πρὸς αὐτούς, "unto them," ch. xv. 3, consequently the μαθηταί, "disciples," are not this time the Apostles and all the disciples in common, but those newly received, the Publicans who were drawing near and hearing his words, who indeed form the opposite party, in the present concourse of hearers, to the Pharisees. It is a further argument for this, that in ver. 9 these "disciples" are supposed to have worldly goods, and indeed such as were in some way connected with previous unrighteousness: but this is altogether inapplicable to the Apostles who had left all and followed the Lord. It is obvious, however, that the teaching of the parable applied to all his other disciples, so far as they were the possessors of property; as well as that it was designed to pierce the consciences of the covetous Pharisees who heard it (as we remarked before and as ver. 14 shows); the Publicans, however, who must, like Zaccheus, after their conversion have felt the question stirring in their souls as to what they must do with their acquired possessions, were especially referred to in this discourse. Thus, as he had already been graciously justifying the Publicans, speaking in their favor; so now, as Bengel remarks, he solemnly teaches them their new duties as his disciples, after they had through repentance been admitted to mercy. The table at which the Saviour of sinners eateth with them, is not always spread; the feast of rejoicing which celebrated the Prodigal's return must end, and give place to the new duties of a noble fidelity. The ὑπάρχοντα, or "goods," however, which the steward possesses are by no means the same as the goods which the prodigal son had wasted; that parable referred to the resources of life, bodily and spiritual in common; but this, according to our Lord's express explanation, vers. 9–13, gives prominence to Mammon (which involves more than mere money). And with regard to that every man is God's steward, and these Publicans are regarded as under obligation of fidelity in its use, not only to the Roman Cæsar, but to the Great Proprietor of all. What in ch. xv. 31 was said under another point of view, holds good of every man in the great house of the Father, in the inverted sense—All that thou hast, is mine!

But the contrasting parable brings before us, first of all, a narrative of this world, just as things are accustomed to go in it: an unfaithful steward, a lord who as a rich man appears to be very zealous for the conservation and increase of what he has, finally a discovery of the fraud by information. There are never wanting in the world unjust stewards, nor spies and informants, as they are well designated by the indefinite διεβλήθη, "was accused"—for διαβάλλειν does not signify the falsely accusing or slandering, but simply is distinguished, as a secret, envious information, from the open and honorable κατηγορεῖν. "Men always complain against the unjust steward; but just because he is of such notorious ill fame, no one is willing to be the man" (G. R. Rieger). The accusation of others against this one, which in the narrative may be supposed to have originated, after the fashion of the world, in the desire to get his place and do just as he had done, is an intimation and remembrancer to us that in like manner all unfaithfulness is surely known and condemned before God. Ὡς διασκορπίζων, "that he had wasted," is not as the Vulg. has it, "quasi dissipasset," but more correctly with Erasmus—"ut qui dissiparet," he was informed against as now wasting*—which in the German (als hätte er durchgebracht—that he had wasted) does not come into sufficient prominence. The complaint is true; all the expositors who will redeem the steward's honorable character, strangely forget that the man himself on the first notice, ver. 2, of a reckoning being exacted, admits the guilt in his conscience, and resigns himself hopelessly—My lord taketh from me the stewardship! The complaint is literally true as to his διασκορπίζων, for this hitherto reckless and foolish spender,† because necessity made him

† The διασκορπίζειν is indeed an echo of ch. xv. 13, but the wasting of the goods here is viewed in a different and more restricted aspect. As the deep undertone of its meaning rises the thought, that we scatter our goods, so far as they are God's, when we do not husband them for his purposes.

thrifty and cunning, had actually laid by nothing for himself, but had lived from day to day in unthinking extravagance of good living—he thinks of himself as a beggar, if he must give up his office. He has not been totally immethodical and lawless, for there are at least γράμματα, acknowledgments of debt, afterwards forthcoming, though not registered according to strict rules of bookkeeping, and certainly not with their amounts recorded; thus he is a dishonorable man of the middle class—there is a little method and sense of responsibility preserved; for the rest he is thoughtless, and imprudent in his present selfishness, without care for the future. And now his lord, having his attention aroused by many reports, suddenly says to the steward, summoned into his presence—τί τοῦτο ἀκούω περὶ σοῦ; that is, probably, not—Wherefore do I hear? (τί for διατί), but—a construction which seems much more pertinent—"What kind of thing (τί and τοῦτο emphatically together) is this which I am obliged to hear of thee, my steward? Is it true, or canst thou clear thyself from this imputation? I did not, when I made thee οἰκόνομος, and have not had reason while I have continued thee in office, to think that thou wert a διασκορπίζων; but I hear it now from all sides, answer me, whether I have heard aright or not." It is not his lord's purpose in any case to dismiss him, thus making the account demanded merely a surrender: this has been gratuitously inferred, and an impropriety argued from it, in his lord's removing the steward on the evidence of a secret information and without any examination, thus justifying him in the conduct which he afterwards pursued. It is this very investigation which is intended by the ἀπόδος τὸν λόγον: Lay before me thy accounts! We will see—then with a tone of warning on account of the accusation, and with an eager, selfish fear for his endangered property—if they do not agree, if I find that I have heard aright, thou wilt be no longer my steward. (The reading δύνῃ instead of δυνήσῃ has also this meaning).

Verses 3, 4. Now the inconsiderate fool becomes suddenly cunning and wise—this is a significant crisis in the parable which many misapprehend: The children of the world are unrighteous and unfaithful from the beginning, they become crafty when need urges them; certainly, however, then! This sudden, and after its kind, laudable prudence of the steward in forming his decision, is described to us in the three stages of his soliloquy. First, the clear perception of the necessity of his case, the expulsion being inevitable, in which the question becomes—What shall I do? Then the pondering of the various methods of extrication, which only made the case worse—The one I cannot, the other I will not! Finally, the crafty expedient—Now I know (ἔγνων) what I will do, to help myself! Then follows, as an essential part of this shrewd wisdom, the execution of his project, ταχέως, without much delay, vers. 5-7.

The nature of their relations itself requires us to understand, without any express mention in the narrative, that time was allowed the poor man to arrange his account, and that time of course includes the whole account from the third to the seventh verse. When God announces to us our dismissal, whether the final or one preliminary; when the decree goes forth upon us—Thou mayest be no longer steward! Thou must die! there is yet given us ordinarily a time of grace, with the stern though gracious exhortation—Set thine house in order! If the merciful God says—Come and let us reckon with one another, let us settle our account! he yet hears the supplication, and lets mercy triumph over judgment. His hearers must have thought of that, with the history of the prodigal son still echoing in their ears if not moving their hearts, when a similar predicament thus opens before them. But here there is no father and son, here is nothing which could immediately portray the true relation between God and man: this narrative teaches and intimates its warnings by sheer contrasts. Instead of coming truly to himself (as ch. xv. 17, εἰς ἑαυτόν) the steward speaks ἐν ἑαυτῷ, in himself, remains with all his thinking and deliberation the same idle, presumptuous, dishonest man as he was: his straits only teach him to add cunning to his unfaithfulness, or awaken the cunning which was latent in his nature. He declares it twice, at the beginning and at the close, that the lord taketh away from him his office, and with it his livelihood, and that his dismissal is an inexorable resolution. He knows "his lord," and his lord's care of self well enough, to prevent the entertainment of any vain hope; he knew that there would be no room for confession and pleading, and he has no satisfactory accounts to bring. Thus it is scarcely right to interpose here a preaching of condemnation against this man because he does not contemplate a third method in addition to the two which he rejects, that the true tertium datur of acknowledgment and supplication does not occur to his mind amid his evil imaginations. Such thoughts are right in the further application to ourselves—Thou, poor sinner, hast indeed to do with God, with whom there is plentiful forgiveness! Scarcely, however, has he fairly looked steadily at his hard fate, than he sees (with that full and unvarying hardness which we already see to be the wicked ground of his natural cunning), that everything after all is not irretrievably lost. He has heard from his Lord's lips nothing worse than οὐ δυνήσῃ ἔτι οἰκονομεῖν, "thou mayest be no longer steward," nothing about punishment or imprisonment. I am yet then left with a τί ποιήσω; "What shall I do?" and it is for me to devise the answer.* Two prospects rise before him—digging or begging; that is, either to begin now honorably to earn his bread by hard labor, or with a sudden self-abasement to ask it at people's doors. The one he cannot, the other he will not:* the idleness of the effeminate good liver forbade the one; the pride of the great man, who had been hitherto a considerable householder and played the rich lord himself, forbade the other. He might have done the one with honor and decency, but the idleness of the sound man says instantly—I cannot do that, I have never learned to work heartily! As Grotius quotes from Aristophanes, Av. 1432 —σκάπτειν γὰρ οὐκ ἐπίσταμαι (for I know not how to dig)—in which the digging is used proverbially for the most common and menial daily labor: and we may cite as more obviously to the purpose Faust's words—"Ich kann mich nicht bequemen, Den Spaten in die Hand zu nehmen" (I cannot condescend, To take the spade in hand). Then as to the begging? Of this the sometime administrator is altogether ashamed—not with "nimiâ modestiâ" [excessive modesty] (as Bengel says), and not as we have seen in Ecclus. xl. 29–31, from a right principle and honorable feeling—but the whole gives us a finished picture of a child of this world, as he is to be seen everywhere in his thrifty cunning. "Nothing corresponding to the particulars of this pondering consideration can be pointed out in the application, but it is simply part of the parable," says the Schullehrerbibel of Brandt; this time correctly. If, going beyond the parable, we anticipate the application, and spiritualise or generalise this particular feature, then may we say with Jensen (Stud. u. Krit. 1829, 4) that the impossible labor is the helping of self, which, in the case of a man from whom is taken that which he had, appears to be out of the question; and the abhorred begging is the passive dejection in such most miserable circumstances, like the sinner's self-abandonment to ruin and reprobation. Thus may we, in harmony with the Lord's design, further interpret the parabolical words of this man, which, however, in itself is generally an apt proverb, suiting his present condition.

On the other hand, we must regard as impertinent, and as a πάρεργον, (incidental thing) beyond the requirement of strict exegesis, all the endless homilies about working and praying which have been founded upon these words; and all the protests, however good and ingenious in themselves, against the idle and proud refusal of the natural man to put forth his energies for himself, or to abase himself unto prayer. They are impertinent, inasmuch as the application to prayer would require that the dismissed man should have pleaded with his lord, and not have thought of begging at his neighbors' doors; and, further, because in the parable this οὐκ ἰσχύω, "I cannot," and αἰσχύνομαι, "I am ashamed," are admitted to be valid, and placed to the account of the man's crafty prudence which is commended: consequently, upon this application, there would be recommended the laying aside of all labor and prayer, and instead of them the dubious performance of good works towards our neighbors, so far as that might be possible. Again, however striking in itself, it is exegetically inadmissible to place this steward in parallel with the prodigal son, such a parallel, to wit, as G. R. Rieger draws, exhibiting the fundamental contrast between penitence and impenitence: "Both came in trouble and need, both seek to help themselves. The one uses right means, humbles himself, applies himself to prayer, and offers himself to the work of a servant. The other hangs upon his former repute, is ashamed to beg, and thinks himself too weak to labor." This and all similar well-meant preaching is part of that system of inexact and confused realisation of its main points which has more or less perverted even the traditional and correct interpretation; for he who forgets the tendency of the whole in the exposition of the details, must bear the blame if the commendation of shrewdness and wisdom which comes afterwards is found to be obscure and inharmonious.* It is an ingenious use of this isolated expression, though no exposition of it, to make it describe the unwillingness and impotence of the natural man to labor (in a spiritual sense) and to pray: as for example, the Princess Galitzin speaks of the "speculative understanding," as saying—I cannot explore it, and I am ashamed to pray (in the right place!) for what I cannot attain. This, however, has a real point of connection, and falls in at least with the interpretation given to the parable by our Lord, which finds in this helplessness of the steward the ἐκλείπειν, "failing," ver. 9, of death, no time being then left for good works in order to the attainment of everlasting habitations—"where he who could not dig falls himself into the grave, and in the general need all prayer (as Matt. xxv. 8) avails no more.†

No sooner has the man in his straits realised his entire situation, than his suddenly wakening craft discovers a plan—ἔγνων τί ποιήσω, "I am resolved (lit. I know.) what to do." In his joyful haste, and with the speed which he knew to be necessary, he does not wait to propose to himself, or state to us, the resulting decision of his cogitation, but we discover it afterwards in the actual φρονίμως ποιεῖν or "doing wisely."‡ Craft is essentially practical as we

* Luther's mag in the old form, that is, vermag, is misleading as our usage now goes.

* Similarly we read in H. Müller's Erquickstunden, to give one more example out of many: "If thou wilt choose, then choose the first two means! (not the third, which the Lord also recommends?) Beg and dig, pray and work, open mouth, hand ready. Prayer is thy heaven-carriage, labor thy earth-carriage, both bring much blessing to thy house, if they are driven well."

† Thus the artless Hiller, whose life of our Lord Jesus in verse carries out Bengel's exegesis, and will always be well worthy of being read on account of its many ingenious thoughts and turns of expression.

‡ Clearly and accurately (according to Alford) ἔγνων is distinguished from ἔγνωκα. The latter would be—I know, am well aware; but the ἔγνων here see—it asks simply what is to be done, does not disguise its emergency from itself, ponders all possible means of extrication, selects the best, and sets to work at once upon that. All this is formally and relatively laudable; else, and in its true character, the craft of this worldling is as unspeakably infatuated in its forgetfulness of eternity, as that τοῦτο ποιήσω, "this will I do," of the ἄφρων or fool (chap. xii. 18). The ἵνα, "that," and ὅταν, "when," of his self-complacent ἔγνων goes not beyond this life, thinks nothing about that other daily impending and quite different μεταστα θῆναι τῆς οἰκονομίας, "being put out of the stewardship." He thinks that he has hit it well—ἵνα δέξωνταί με, ut sint qui me recipiant—or, looking back upon his own thoughts—"that the people, at whose doors I must otherwise have begged, may be glad to receive me into their houses, which is far better!" Or, as he is now speaking with full consciousness of his plan, he keeps the debtors in view—"that they, whom I will craftily make my friends, may take care of me—I will provide for myself hospitable homes!" To defraud his lord, even now at the last, and to prosecute his injustice even now that it is condemned, does not cause him shame: this, at least, he can do. It is altogether in vain to attempt with all kinds of subtlety to justify this wise οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας ("unjust steward") in himself; all whose cunning εἰς τὴν γενεὰν ἑαυτοῦ, "in his generation," goes only to this, how he may in some way or other carry on his habituated easy life; whose blind infatuation only thinks of man and of this world, yea, whose baseness finds its consummation in this, that he in his sly selfishness reckons upon the return of gratitude, not altogether failing, on the part of others.

Verses 5–7. It is not improbable that he had shown the same kind of good-nature towards poor wretches before, in the squandering of his master's goods; so that it was a very natural expedient—the children of the world at least do thus act towards one another with all their ἀδικία, or injustice. Nothing can be more forced than the misinterpretation which Brauns put so confidently forward, according to which all that is related from ver. 2 to ver. 8 took place on the spur of the moment, rather like an enchanted dream than actual life, and in flat opposition to the scope of all our Lord's parables. "Instantly, and before he left his lord's eye, he conceived his design, had the debtors summoned into his master's presence, paid the accounts thus rewritten out of his own funds, thus with most excellent φρόνησις (wisdom) uniting both restitution and benevolence by one stroke—restitution, inasmuch as the debtors never could have been able to pay anything themselves; and benevolence, inasmuch as these poor people were extricated from great embarrassment. Thus both creditor and debtor were touched to the heart, and their sympathies enlisted in his favor!" This is, in very deed, a master-stroke in the art of reading the direct opposite of what is written. If the steward were then so rich, what made him think of being reduced to beg? where then is the ἐκλείπειν or "failing" which the Lord indicates in ver. 9? and let every unprejudiced person think of all the other rank inconsistencies in this view. This would have been no compensation to his lord, but a mystification in his very presence, which must have excited his anger all the more. We must admit what Niemeyer, Schleiermacher, D. Schulz, Von Gerlach, and others have maintained, that such a reduction of the debts was within the prerogative of an οἰκονόμος or "steward," such as he was at that time—else would the reconstructed bills not have been valid. But this does not assuredly extend to the justification of the steward's conduct. It was in his power and option to do so, as we see, but not in his righteous power; what he here does to his lord's prejudice must always be counted unjust, and is only a continuation in his old practices of this sensualised οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας.

The χρεωφειλέται are not simply contractors (as B. Stein and Grossmann think) whose contracts the lord had already looked into, but debtors for produce furnished and unpaid for. He asks them craftily about the amount of their obligation, though he may be supposed in most cases to have known it already; his object being to stimulate their gratitude for the remission of so much of their debt—Is it not true that thou are rightly indebted for so much? He says boldly, condemning thereby himself—"Owest thou my lord," not me; so that he might not on his own responsibility remit any part of the debt. "Take thy bill, which I now restore to thee—see how merciful I am, much more than my lord, about whom, between ourselves, we need ask no questions—quickly (ταχέως, raptim, furtim, which intimates, too, the lord's absence—before he comes and sees it!) subscribe with thine own hand a lesser amount?" These debtors, like all others, are nothing loth to write a less amount, but, like children of this world, very soon take the share of this advantageous piece of villany. Two examples are recorded, which include, under oil and wheat, all kinds of liquid and dry productions of the soil; and at the end, ver. 7, we may suppose—and thus onwards through all the debtors; for ver. 5 mentions ἕνα ἕκαστον, every one. Nor does he speak to every one apart, but has them altogether at the same desk, as it is critically noted in the σὺ δέ, "and thou," of the second instance. And why so? Because these poor people, in one another's presence, were abashed, and would be terrified into complaisance by the idea of a general settlement of accounts. Why does he not remit to any one the whole debt? Partly, because the lord, when he came to know that this man or that was one of his debtors, might find an account apparently right at hand; and partly, because he would keep the people in a humble frame of mind still, since, if all their debt had been discharged, they would have become puffed up, and forgotten to be thankful.*

implies,—I have just arrived at the knowledge, an idea has just struck me, as it were, εὕρηκα—as we had also remarked above.

ly, on the same principle he remits to the one fifty out of the hundred, and to the other twenty—not (as Olshausen infelicitously here incorporates) for the sake of the application "to a discreet distribution of our benefits according to the present need of their objects;" nor (as Lange says, imputing too much good to the steward) "that he first achieved the most desperate stroke, and then gave way to something like moral prudence." But the man is altogether and throughout wise, he acts with a crafty discretion and arbitrariness, which somewhat propitiates his own pride on being dismissed; thus keeping their obligations in the minds of the debtors—"The great man could do with us as he listed, but he gave everybody something, at least." We should note that he selects cunningly the good-natured, not so cunning as himself, whom he may "despatch, one after the other, with the utmost possible haste."* And it is just from these that he reckons upon an unstipulated gratitude.

Verse 8. It ought never to have been matter of misapprehension, that the narrative of the parable is still going on, and that the commending κύριος, "lord" is not Jesus himself,† but he who had been thus described by the steward in vers. 3 and 5 as his lord. Our lord continues to speak in all that follows down to ἤκουον ταῦτα πάντα, "heard all these things," ver. 14. If the Evangelist were now suddenly interrupting the narrative, how comes it that κἀγὼ λέγω "and I say unto you," so directly follows; and whence the ὅτι, "that," similarly in strict connection—for the only other supposition, that it is an intermediate reflection of Luke, is surely out of the question. It is the I say unto you also—which distinguishes our Lord from the lord of the parable, in whose place Jesus himself now enters. Without such a conclusion one main characteristic in the parable would be wanting, the answer, namely, to the question—What said his lord to such a stroke of artifice? Was it divulged, or not? This last knavery also became known and notorious—the supposition of that was necessary to the tendency and scope of the whole, and to the winding up of the entire parable, and it is merely hinted at as being understood of itself. While the Lord reports the commendation which was bestowed upon the steward, he at the same time, to obviate all misconception, condemns utterly the spirit and fundamental character of this steward, for he calls him again and in a marked way the unjust steward. (To construe ἐπήνεσεν with τῆς ἀδικίας,* as other knavish people have done, is most assuredly incorrect, for the most external glance at the mere phraseology must show that οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας is one phrase, just as in ver. 9 μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδικίας, and in chap. xviii. 6, κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας.) It is altogether monstrous, and opposed to the whole current even of this world's life, which the parable is portraying, that his lord should commend the knavery which had been practised upon himself, the injustice as injustice; enough that he now leaves the ἀδικία out of the question, since he finds, even in this knavery, one object of commendation, which is clearly defined—ὅτι φρονίμως ἐποίησεν, "because he had done wisely." We have pointed out the total consistency of the ἀδικία of this man, in opposition to all the forced endeavors to justify or apologise for him which directly contradict the express declaration of our Lord—what then was there to commend in him? Was it that he did not add murder to his knavery, and kill his lord instead of allowing himself to be dismissed? Then would it be matter of commendation in every sinner, that he is not yet a devil, and has not courage and power to sin worse than he does! Was it that he had some slight method in his business, so that at least γράμματα, "bills," were forthcoming in the case of the debtors? That would be in direct contradiction to the admitted διασκορπίζειν, or, "wasting." Or was it that he had not in past times thought of and provided for himself? So much the worse was the recklessness of his mad administration! Was it that he did not go and act with the debtors as that other wicked servant did in Matt. xviii. 28, in order to scrape together as much as he could? But that would have helped him but little, since the deficit was too great to be made up, and his dismissal was already certain; this knave knows that very well, is far from desirous to show any mercy towards them, and thinks only, as his soliloquy showed us, of helping himself. Thus it is this, and the cunning necessary to it, which, apart from all else, is the subject of commendation. Jesus now relates that his outwitted lord (when he, sooner or later, found it out too late) praised him for that—this appears strange enough in itself, but is quite consistent with the world's ways. For to the children of the world the coming of selfishness triumphs over right; the main thing, and the chief glory of a man is to extricate himself from embarrassment, no matter how; so that in the contemplation of successful and preëminent villany, its injury to their own personal interests may well be for a moment forgotten. Hence the Lord in this case cannot refrain from saying (in his heart or to others, needless to interpose (as Bahrdt does) any stipulation—"For this, as long as I live, let me have the half."

*But not "deceive" as Stein expresses it. He inserts also the stipulation that they should receive him into their dwellings, and explains that now these easy-minded people find themselves out of their reckoning. "It should have been a question to them whether the entertainment of this steward, who had been used to high living, would not cost them more in the long run than the amount he had remitted!" But we should not push our calculating exposition so far!

†It has been said that Luke always uses this word in relation to Jesus. A very strange remark, and worth nothing in this case; against which Stein, however, has very needlessly and unskilfully referred to chap. xii. 46, xiv. 23.

*Even Schleiermacher thinks that we must necessarily accept this, and leave the honest οἰκονόμος without an epithet!

not necessarily as beholding the knave)—"The deceiver has at last gone off craftily enough; that was not a bad stroke; I should probably have done the same myself, if I could have had the wit to think upon it so suddenly."

In all this it is taken for granted as evident, that the commended ἐποίησεν, "he had done," is the last stroke of policy with the debtors—apart from the proper historical matter of the parable, and what the steward had done in the situation in which vers. 1 and 2 find him. Every child would so read and understand the text, and yet the craft of exposition has not seldom taken a view exactly opposite. In particular, we would refer to a certain recent work of an anonymous author* devoted especially to the subject, which has made the parable of the steward the subject of a long examination, in connection with other high and deep matters that pertain to the doubtful questions of exegesis. This writer cannot, at the outset, regard it as otherwise than impossible, that a master in this world would praise as prudent an act of treachery practiced upon himself, and proceeds to give his own judgment and view. He then felicitously makes it appear that the steward gained his end, that is, perfectly satisfied his lord by his accounts, and earned the commendation—"Thou art a wise and honorable man, these slanderers have done thee grievous injustice!" and that this is the meaning of φρονίμως ἐποίησεν, "done wisely." Our Lord praised also, over and above, the unjust man, the knave! Then ver. 9 is perverted, in order to make it accordant, ἐκ τοῦ μαμωνᾶ being made to mean—independently of mammon, in another way and not by its aid; another interpretation is put upon the documents, and everything done to torment away the old exposition, and to establish one utterly contradictory: how all this was done may be matter of marvel, but it is actually to be read; giving us one more example of the facility with which ingenious men go astray upon this parable, over which a special fatality seems to preside! It is scarcely necessary for us to say that in vers. 3, 4, not one word is said about correct accounts. The soliloquy of the steward not only shows, as Jansen admits, that his evil conscience is troubled; but that he had resigned himself to his dismissal as an inevitable calamity, having no thought of re-establishing himself in his master's confidence, and that his sole care now is to provide for himself after the loss of his office. This was his aim, and in prosecuting it he acted φρονίμως, for φρόνησις (prudence) has to do with the means to an end generally, while σοφία (wisdom) has reference to a good end, as Zyro correctly adduces what is known to every one. On the other hand, Brauns brings forward his confident assertion that φρόνιμος, prudent ("wise") never occurs in the New Testament in a bad sense, and consequently that the οἰκονόμος had not been guilty of any ἀδικία or injustice as such. But Matt. x. 16 gives us the word at least as a vocabulum μέσον (word of intermediate import), and it undoubtedly has a somewhat ironical meaning as applied to the Corinthians—1 Cor. iv. 10, x. 15; 2 Cor. xi. 19. But we first have the vox media afterwards when the children of the world are termed φρονιμώτεροι, "wiser;" there is no allusion to bad sense at all, for the κύριος or "lord" praise the prudence as something in itself good. An good it is, and must undeniably ever be, as the Lord here testifies, exhibiting the greater prudence of the wicked in compassing their ends as an example which shames the good: if any one has too fine a sense of morality, or too keen a critical acumen, to tolerate this, let him contradict the Lord Jesus if he pleases, but not misconstrue and pervert his plain words!

In φρονίμως and φρονιμώτεροι we have the obvious key of the whole parable; he must be blinded who does not see this. The earnest diligence with which the children of the world pursue their end, to wit, to deliver themselves from temporal calamity, may, and indeed should put us to shame, even while we have ourselves a much nobler aim; we should copy their example, not indeed in their unrighteousness, but in the diligent wisdom of the just (Luke i. 17); we should make to ourselves friends, or provide for our own reception in eternity, even as they make careful provision for their earthly life, beyond which they have no care. And is not this application perfectly just—may we not preach it in every congregation, without being troubled by any such scruples of feeling as we have referred to?

The children of this world, to which class all the personages of the parable belong in common, pay much regard, as a rule and in the mass, to prudence and crafty thrift—hence the commendation of this lord. Jesus, in adding this explanation, describes and at the same time qualifies the ambiguous character of this praise, in order to found upon it the general application—Suffer not yourselves to be surpassed and put to shame by such cunning! It is incorrect to assume, as Olshausen does, that the υἱοὶ τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, "children of this world," are not quite identical with the πονηροί or wicked, and not absolutely hostile to the φῶς or "light," only, as it were, oscillating between the two; for we should thereby lose the sharp point of the rigorous contrast, which goes to the same issue as the exhortation to the Apostles to be wise as serpents. It is equally wrong to take υἱοὶ τοῦ φωτός, "children of light," ironically (as Braune does, understanding by them the Pharisees); the contrast has the same fulness, reality, and earnestness as in John xii. 36; 1 Thess. v. 5 (Eph. v. 8). The φῶς or light indicates here, first of all, truth and sincerity as opposed to the falseness and overreaching of this world; but much more than this is contained in it. The children of the world are children of darkness in their self-deception, which makes their narrow and limited prudence unutterable folly; and in this view the dullest child of light is wiser than the wisest of the children of this world—who only thinks of and provides for this present life. Now, this wise steward has forgotten from the very beginning that he is only a steward, and may expect a day of reckoning in the lower as well as in the higher sense; it has never occurred to him to ask—What will become of me in my injustice if I should die to-day or to-morrow? Rather is it his sole care to provide for himself a lodgment in the interim, till he can procure another οἰκονομία or office, and play the old game more wisely. Hence the Lord's saying is only true with the addition—εἰς τὴν γενεὰν τὴν ἑαυτῶν, "in their generation." Here lies the irony directed against the wisdom of the children of the world, here is the full solution of the question how they can be a pattern to us.* Not, as has been most superficially said—they are wise and cunning erga cœlaneos, i.e., invicem, inter se, unus erga alterum (mutually); but assuredly its first meaning, and that applying to both parties, is—in and after their kind. (For this meaning of the word, see what is said upon Matt. xxiv. 34. Erasmus: "In natione suâ" (in their nation)—for the two kinds of children are actually of a different origin, race, people, and kind. But again the εἰς, to ("in"), is to be regarded as essentially τελικῶς (telic), as the deep meaning of γενεά, "generation," actually involves—for their life, their space of time, the children of which they know themselves to be, and act as such. Thus they care for things which pertain to time, and their share of it—but let your higher prudence provide for everlasting habitations! They give their best attention as a whole (not reckoning individual examples of indiscretion) to the great question how, especially in time of urgent pressure, they shall get on for this life, and their zeal is in itself commendable; while ye, alas! are far from being so prudent in your preparation for death, and that eternal and real life which follows it. Pastor Flattich of Wurtemberg explained this phenomenon (the simple ground of which is that the light of true wisdom unto salvation slowly and hardly enters into our earth-bound nature, cleaving to this world) more quaintly than correctly, when he said—"to be sure, the dog is more knowing than the sheep!" This is something like the interpretation of Ebrard, who says—"since the children of light are often too much inclined, in thinking upon heavenly things, to pretermit and neglect their earthly duties, and to forget their worldly prudence." But this scarcely touches the meaning of our Lord, who does not commend to his sheep the dog's wisdom as such, and is not speaking of attention to earthly duties as such; but is exhorting us to give as much earnest diligence to the pursuit of eternal salvation as the worldling does to his temporal well-being. "Fidelity in earthly relations, and in the administration of earthly good," is indeed required from us, vers. 10–12, as merely our wisdom, but yet it is as wisdom towards the attainment of our eternal and abiding good; apart from that the children of light may forget all earthly things in their contemplation of the heavenly—which has its place, when the question is the highest wisdom of simplicity.

Verse 9. The originator of that conjectural reading—κἀγὼ ὑμῖν λέγω· οὐ ποιήσατε, κ.τ.λ. (But do not ye so!)—had not the slightest notion of the true meaning of the whole discourse. Are we then, according to his view, to retain the unrighteous mammon, spending it upon ourselves or heaping it up, supposing we have it? That is not what he means, but—we should use it for the good of our neighbor. He takes offence at this, that as the words run, the Lord seems to counsel stealing and overreaching in order to make friends for ourselves—but he simply does not read the words aright. The mammon is assumed to be μαμωνᾶ τῆς ἀδικίας, "mammon of unrighteousness," just as the οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας, "unjust steward," before. It is evident of itself that we are not to imitate the unjust steward (that title surely was enough), and not to acquire the mammon in his method; and when the Lord goes on to say to us, what now nevertheless follows, he places himself on a parallel with the lord in the parable, and tells the Publicans who already had such mammon in their possession, and could not possibly now adjust all the individual claims of others in making specific restitution, how they shall henceforward act with regard to it. The clear and unbiassed view which we take of his lofty but condescending words is this: As that lord discovering too late the fraud, pretermitted, and, as it were, forgot it, in his consideration of the craft displayed, so I, the true Lord, in the name of my Father say unto you preliminarily—that not only does the righteousness of God permit, but the grace of God requires from you absolved sinners, the prudent use, in all good works, of that earthly property which has been in times past gathered together by unrighteousness such as cannot now be otherwise repaired; and that ye use the utmost wisdom in administering it for others, with a full faith in an eternal recompense of mercy to ensue. This gracious permission Flattich has this time somewhat better illustrated by the master who tells his maid-servant that he has fruit in his garden which she may take for herself and distribute among other people, that his fruit may raise up friends for the poor orphan.* Hiller: "God somewhat recedes from his right; press into it thyself: he gives up his goods that you may turn them to good account; make thyself by another's goods rich in good works; it is no loss to him," he notes it not." If a pious king places men in the situation of stewards over a charitable foundation, they should not accumulate either for him or themselves, but keep it before them as their one object to give out as much as possible in beneficence, and bring as much satisfaction as possible to the charitable wishes of the founder: and so with God the true "rich man" whose stewards we all are in the occupation of earthly property. And indeed we have all been, and not only the Publicans, more or less unrighteous in the past; though in reckoning with us our repentance and conversion are accepted, and it is said to us—Ye may be henceforward, and ye must be, stewards, but better, more faithful and more wise, for your own salvation and my good pleasure.

The Lord, at the same time, takes the most favorable possible view of the unjust steward's selfish and earthly-prudent conduct, when he takes as the tertium comparationis, the expression: Make to yourselves friends! More prudently, indeed, and more safely, than he in the parable, who, with all his self-seeking, only reckoned upon the gratitude of men equally sinful and selfish with himself—so that indeed all his calculations might, after all, have been miscalculated. When the Lord in this condescending comparison* sets the enjoyment and advantage of this friendship before his disciples as the aim of their well-doing, it is presumed and taken for granted, even because Jesus says it, that his disciples are only to make to themselves true friends by the exercise of true friendship, and only to ensure to themselves a compensating gratitude by acts of genuine love. The φίλοι, "friends," are assuredly not (for then it would be an expression wonderfully out of harmony with the parable) "those in heaven, God and the angels" (as Ebrard says); but they are to be sought among our fellow-men and brethren. The covetous and hard-hearted man prepares for himself in the poor whom he does not help, no other than accusers at the eternal bar; while the benevolent man who ministers to their wants makes them, on the contrary, his friends. "Many understand well (says Zeller in the Monatsblatt) how with their mammon to make servants, tools, and companions, but these are not—friends. A man cannot buy or hire these with gold; he only makes himself friends by what he gives, and by the manner of his giving it; that is, by the love with which he imparts his goods. He who wins hearts, makes himself friends." This is not inappropriately enforced upon the Lord's words; for when Jesus begins to speak, he uses every word in its only befitting and right meaning, elevating and illustrating everything subordinate and common in the parable; and this is the right transition from the parable to its interpretation. Further, the receiving into everlasting habitations intimates to us what kind of people we before all things should make our friends, the poor children of God, the brethren of the Saviour, the heirs of the inheritance; as Zeller goes on excellently to observe, "not the people who are cast out in eternity, since they will not be able to receive guests into heaven." But, again, since we are not the searchers of hearts, and judges before the time, and cannot beforehand know who will be one day the inheritors of the kingdom, our love and benevolence must be universal; regarding every man as one called to salvation, turning away from no object of distress who may one day, as the brother of the Judge of all, witness and plead for us, or who, by our good deeds in the name of Christ, might be aided in coming to Christ and to salvation. Thus Neander is not quite right in drawing the conclusion that good deeds shown only to the pious are here intended; for is it not our bounden duty to distribute our benefactions with the view and in the hope of making the objects of our benevolence grateful, and thus pointing to them the way of piety?

Of forgiveness and remission of debts the discourse does not directly speak (though many, Jensen for instance, digress in that direction, supposing thus that they interpret the parabolical element); for it is said expressly, with the mammon—consequently the distribution and giving away of substance is enforced upon those who possess it, as such. Ἐκ του μαμωνᾶ, "of the mammon," may be either understood as referring to the means by which, the source whence, we may accomplish the making of friends; or (as Braune says, and, it may be, correctly) we may regard the ἐκ as a proper material out of. "Let mammon go, and make for yourselves out of it—that is, ἐν τῷ ἀφιέναι καὶ παραδιδόναι (by forgiving and bestowing)—friends."* The advisableness and wisdom of thus freely dispensing our mammon for our true advantage in the interest which eternity yields, is further grounded upon the fact that it is, and must ever be, a mammon of unrighteousness—which pregnant expression,† so much twisted about by expositors, is very probably connected with a proverbial description of it among the Jews—עֹשֶׁר בַּוְלָא, according to Lightfoot. The most obvious meaning involved in this, that of an unrighteously obtained substance, has given much needless offence to interpreters: this certainly is the point of connection between the interpretation and the parable, where we find the steward giving away that of which he robs his master; and it precisely suits the Publicans as it answers the question which they must ask, as to what they must do, as the children of light, with that unrighteous mammon which they had acquired before their conversion. They must do no other than seek, in the manner most pleasing to God, and at the same time most truly and

* Which, indeed, stands upon the same ground as the exhibition of fidelity towards God as being prudence for ourselves (see Matt. xxiv. and xxv.), and the general phraseology of Scripture which speaks of our σώζεσθαι or salvation as the good pleasure of God. Is this essentially different?

* It is incorrect and artificial with Hartmann to regard μαμωνᾶς as abstractum pro concreto—the rich—and connecting this with ἀδικίας, to make it—the transitory, worldly rich. Make to yourselves friends of, or among the rich of this world, that they, in your ἐκλείπειν into poverty, or when old age requires it, may take care of you!

† Very unnecessarily and impertinently by Stein compared with μισθὸς τῆς ἀδικίας, Acts i. 18, which refers to something very different.

eternally profitable to themselves, "to disencumber themselves of the last farthing" (as Loskiel says in his "Etwas fürs Herz auf dem Wege zur Ewigkeit"). Of course it is supposed that they acquire no more unrighteously; and equally obvious is it—for the Lord would never teach a violation of the law of Moses (Exod. xxii. 1–4)—that unjustly gained property must be restored, when and where it is possible; but that, for the most part, is regarded as possible no longer, and then conscience itself recommends the hearty distribution to the poor—Zacchæus does both at once and together (ch. xix. 8).

But this first and more obvious meaning is very far from exhausting the depths of this word, spoken not to the Publicans only, but to us all, so far as we are in any wise similarly situated. Worldly substance is termed mammon by our Lord (as we saw on Matt. vi. 24), not as it is a creature of God, but as it is a possession in our hand, and more directly as it is the false good and the eagerly-coveted desire of our hearts, that is, as it is made an idol: there lies already, without its having been obtained by any unjust dealing with our neighbor, the fundamental unrighteousness which ever adheres to it. Mammon, as such, is never, in the first place, righteous; but all earthly possessions, in the second place, in their course and process through the hands of men must more or less certainly and manifestly become a mammon.* Thus most of these Publicans had already, for the sake of mammon, in the unrighteousness and idolatry of their hearts, become the slaves of a foreign dominion against their own people, who therefore scorned and cast them out; and so now every man whose heart is set upon retaining and accumulating the substance which, as he may suppose, has been acquired in legal and honorable ways, is only carrying on the same ἀδικία or unrighteousness of the heart. In sum, sin is, as matters actually are in the world, the origin and principle of all property and personal substance; selfishness and self-appropriation, indirect acquisition in the sight of God or man, idolatry and uncharitableness, adhere to it necessarily as it has come from its former possessors, as well as in the hands of those who now hold it. Is not this so? The consciences of all who are truly converted to righteousness, in the possession of much substance, must everywhere confirm this declaration. It is "either the fruit or the seed of unrighteousness and sin"—as Gossner says. Jurists seek for the security of title-deeds from something external to the possessor, and aiming to go back to the origin of all dominium, imagine its first beginnings either in an ideal condition of nature, or repose upon a necessitated possessio and its bona fides: but God allows no such rights to human hearts, he neither utters any beati possidentes of φιλαργυρία (covetousness), nor admits any bona fides for the retaining of what a man has; his bona fides is grounded upon his dispensing and ministering, as a steward, the manifold grace of God. "The superabundance should be common; if it is not so, but is perverted to self and becomes mine, then it becomes unrighteous mammon" (Berlenb. Bibel). As the parable, in its application to us, makes us all no other than the stewards of God, it actually abolishes the idea of property in its strictest sense as being ours; and all retention and accumulation of mammon for its sake it makes ἀδικία. Similarly the simple-minded Loskiel, from whom the ingenious critics might often take a hint—"The unrighteous mammon is money or money's worth, which does not appertain to us of God or of right, but has been appropriated to ourselves, nevertheless, in this or the other way." Either there adheres to it through the acquisition and possession of former owners, from whom it has been transmitted or has come into our hands, an injustice which must be rectified by ourselves; or that unrighteousness is imparted to it by our own covetous and selfish clinging to it.

Therefore is all mammon taken again from the temporary possessor; it is no abiding and real good, but deceives and betrays its lord, who becomes its slave (Prov. i. 19). This is not, indeed, expressed in the word itself (as Von Gerlach: Which is unrighteous to you, deceives and disappoints you)—for ἀδικία must have a like meaning in vers. 8 and 9. But we may and we should deduce this as a consequence, since that which is unrighteous can only inflict a rightful retaliation of unrighteousness; and, as such, this thought is the profound under-tone of the whole discourse. Money and earthly property has in itself no value; as soon as any such is attached to it, it becomes an ἄδικον or unrighteous thing. This is the ἀδηλότης πλούτου, "uncertain riches," of which Paul speaks, 1 Tim. vi. 17, whose whole discourse in that place down to ver. 19, corresponds generally with the fundamental thoughts of our Lord's sayings in this place, and gives us its best scriptural exposition. Schleiermacher's remark—"Money has no obligation to remain with us, it is its well-known nature to circulate," is more sprightly than devout; and forgets that everything, as a creature and gift of God, should be continuing and not deceive and disappoint any one, an ἀληθινόν or true thing (as it indeed fundamentally always is): but that the unrighteousness which converts gold into mammon is avenged by the very circumstance that its expectation from it is deceived. Thus Bengel is right, as things are among men, "injustus mammonas, quia non jure fert appellationem bonorum" (unjust mammon, because it does not justly bear the appellation of goods). Similarly Augustin before—"de mammona iniquitatis, i.e., de pecuniâ vel divitiis, quæ malæ fuerant acquisitiæ; aut etiamsi bene, non tamen veris, sed quas iniquitas putat esse divitias, quoniam nescit quæ sint veræ divitiæ" (of the mammon of iniquity, i.e., of money or riches ill gotten; or though well, yet not true, but what iniquity thinks true, because it knows not what true riches are) (Civ. Dei, 21, 27). It is the best, therefore, and the wisest plan, to let this "unsanctified gold" simply pass through our hands, that the heart may not come to depend upon it. It must be diligently given back again! The children of the world in gathering and heaping it are practising a self-deception which will issue in eternal want: they are unjust to that God who requires of his stewards that their gathering should be a scattering abroad. He is not an accumulating ἄνθρωπος πλούσιος, "rich man," increasing his capital, like that man in the parable. He desires no other putting of his money out to usury (Luke xix. 23), than the restoration to it of its true and only value, and its diligent use for the kingdom of heaven in all the ministrations of self-denying charity.

The prudent man in the parable provided for houses, into which he might be received; and that is the reason why our Lord here names the αἰωνίους σκηνάς, "everlasting habitations (lit. tents). The Israelites journeyed into the land of their inheritance in their tents (Jos. xxii. 4): and in this expression there was both a backward and a forward reference—even the houses of stone and the walls encompassing their cities were still but as the pilgrim tabernacles of the wilderness, an interim provision only, before those peaceable habitations and sure dwellings which God's people expected at the end. (Isa. xxxii. 18). These are the everlasting habitations, with typical allusion for the Israel of God;* yet not now precisely corresponding with the parable, not received into their habitations, as before into their houses; but those who are received themselves may through the grace of God receive others, just in the same sense as we may dispense to others of his gifts. The δέξωνται, "receive," must clearly correspond with that in ver. 4; the recompense at the resurrection of the just (ch. xiv. 14) comes from God, but in connection with the testimony, desire, and supplication of the friends who had been acquired in life; and this is the real truth and ground of reality in the δέχεσθαι or reception. "Heaven is, as it were, the estate of the poor, out of which they can bequeath legacies to their benefactors."† What a most gracious representation this is, far from being merely an unreal accommodation of the idea! We will not disturb its simplicity of presentation by any eschatological investigations as to how, and how far, its truth will be made manifest in a progression of accomplishment; for these last things are not clearly revealed. Thus much remains certain, that both the Old and the New Testament, rightly understood, exhibit alms-deeds to us as laying the foundation of a treasure in heaven, that charity bears its interest in eternity even to the unforgotten cup of cold water (Matt. x. 42). We may confidently rest in this middle interpretation, without "going astray, either into what would be a decided, though disguised Crispinism, or into the undoubted papistical perversion of the doctrine of merit in good works" (Zyro).

There is yet one expression which we have not closely examined—ὅταν ἐκλίπητε, "when ye fail." The reading preferred by Schulz and Schleiermacher—ὅταν ἐκλίπῃ (ἐκλείπῃ) seil. ὁ μαμωνᾶς (when the deceitful mammon fails you, departs, and leaves you deceived; and the Peshito confirms this—דמא דנמר, si defecerit; comp. moreover ch. xii. 33, θησαυρὸν ἀνέκλειπτον), seems at first sight to be recommended as introducing the fundamental idea which we have just been dwelling on; but when we look more closely into it, we must perceive that it is opposed to the internal connection of the whole discourse, and can only have crept in as an explanatory gloss. First of all, the making of friends with our mammon which is here enjoined, presupposes a distribution of our substance and a severance from it; and we cannot suppose at the same time any such cleaving to it as would be disappointed by an ἐκλείπειν or "failing." And then this reading is in general not sufficiently comprehensive, and harmonious with the context; for, in this injunction of ver. 9 every expression used in reference to the course of conduct recommended must embrace in itself both a strict applicability to what is laid down in the parable and a reference to its more extended interpretation. The ὅταν, "when," of this verse must correspond with the ὅταν μεταστα θῶ, "when I am put out," ver. 4 (from which similarly the ἵνα δέξωνται, in connection with the σκηναῖς is derived), and consequently the persons addressed must be the subject of the change of circumstances here represented as contingent; similarly to preserve the conformity with the αἰωνίους, "everlasting," this contingency must be generally the dismissal from life upon earth. And so we find it in fact in the ambiguous expression which is pertinently chosen—ὅταν ἐκλίπητε (or, with very respectable MSS. ἐκλείπητε); that is, first, when ye fall into the ὑστερεῖσθαι or want, of ch. xv. 14, become involved in utter failure like the man in the parable; but also as the interpretation of this—when ye incur that certainly impending bankruptcy of life which abolishes all personal possession, and the goods and powers of life fail and give place to the reckoning of death! This is the foundation of the well-known phraseology of the Sept.—ἐκλείπειν, decease (giving up the ghost, Gen. xxv. 18)—but here the general expression falls back upon the specific defectum pati suggested by the parable. "Since ye cannot by any worldly craft or prudence evade that, make it the care of your nobler prudence to provide in time for an imperishable possession and an abiding lodgment in the future γενεα. Especially ye Publicans, whom the Pharisees not untruly reprobate as sinners, for ye are all of you unjust stewards of the goods both of body and soul, in the sight of your true Lord! And all, whoever and wherever ye are, who cling to your mammon, with all the unrighteousness that adheres to it —think of the end!" Finally, let us steadily regard in its true light this most gracious accommodation of our Lord to man's innate self-regard and earthliness of thought (found constantly occurring throughout his teaching); for he here condescends to point out to us the way of true thrift and prudence, by which we may most surely secure our possessions against the fires of judgment, and, as it were, preserve the heritage which we leave here or the superabundant restitution of another life (Eccles. xi. 1). "As in earthly things ye are prudent enough not to let all your goods lie at the mercy of any one calamity. If ye really loved your money, ye would desire to enjoy it more than merely these few years. That farmer would not really love his corn who should not be glad to throw a few grains of it into the earth in order to reap it again with ten or twenty fold increase. I would counsel you prudently to ensure your worldly goods against the spoil of time, and constantly lay up your produce beyond the walls of this transitory field; for you will carry nothing hence away. See how both faithful and prudent the Lord is in his way of teaching, how he strives to win you in all kinds of ways, even adapting himself to this passion of men, and showing you how you may eternally enjoy your possessions!" (This is the pithy homiletic-exegesis of G. R. Rieger, and is not to be contemned.)

Verses 10–12. The progression and connection of thought in this epilogue were exhibited in our general review of the whole at the beginning, which now may be referred to again with advantage. It is not the "true charity, assuming, when embodied in outward acts, the form of a dissipation of our goods," which is pointed out as true wisdom, but a real fidelity (the word four times occurs) as it respects God's commandment, which would have his earthly goods thus applied. This is the process of the advancing interpretation; for the fundamental idea of our Lord's instruction here appears to be not the love which we owe to our neighbor, so much as the accomplishment, on our own part, in the obedience of faith, of the divine will of the Great Proprietor, in order to our own standing before him in final acceptance; in order, as it were, to our own desert of eternal possessions. This true fidelity is the prudence of righteousness, for the final account, as in Matt. xxiv. 45. Fidelity in the steward of earthly substance is the dispensing and scattering of seed for the better harvest which is abiding in eternity. Let it be observed, once more, how in the inverted relation between the parable and its interpretation, this unrighteousness, ver. 10 (in which the unjust steward does not stand as a type), is placed as the opposite of fidelity. First of all, ver. 10 presents a general introductory and convincing truth admitted by universal experience and consciousness; which has its application to the province of the administration of earthly property, and then, as a proverb and similitude, bears a further and higher application. Count nothing slight, be it great or small—was the sentiment of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. v. 18. The essential fidelity of the heart keeps this precept; it is the same for all objects alike. Fidelity in little things is itself something great, it is indeed the greatest and only true fidelity. If a man begins aright with little things, his conscientiousness is assured and disciplined for the greater things which may bring greater temptation; he who is not unfaithful with regard to the smallest farthing, will not be so afterwards with thousands of pounds—hence the first clause stands in the first place. But he who is unjust in little things is unfaithful also in much; that is, if not at once in open apparent reality, he will soon be such; and still more clearly, the many ἐλάχιστα already make up the great πολύ. All fidelity in great things without similar fidelity in the little, is but outward seeming; and similarly all petty, micrological straining out the gnat while the camel is swallowed, is no true fidelity of the heart. Consequently also the converse holds good: He who would be, and continue to be, faithful in that which is great, let him be so preëminently and perseveringly in the petty details continually occurring in life—for there is an inseparable connection between the two. But it is not the Lord's design only to say—"Whether ye possess much or little of mammon, deal with it as I now counsel you, for two mites well laid out will gain you friends in eternity, will bring you interest and recompense for the kingdom of heaven." But vers. 11, 12 immediately carry the idea further, and show that all earthly possessions generally, be they Rothschild's millions, are only ἐλάχιστον —"the least thing which God can and will bestow upon man"—comp. 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3, which almost sounds like a citation of our Lord's words. Yea more, the whole of ver. 10 is reproduced with its application to the domain of spiritual possessions and the gifts of grace—as we find it in Luke xix. 17.

All these antitheses, with their various expression, are obviously resolved into one great antithesis between the earthly and the heavenly, the temporal and the eternal. All earthly substance, which the children of this world turn to mammon, is in itself ἐλάχιστον, a "least" thing; also, through the deceitfulness of sin which clings to it, an ἄδικον, or "unrighteous" thing; and must ever be to the inner, immortal nature of man, by reason of its adventitious value, and transitional possession, an ἀλλότριον, "another's." As opposed to this, every the faintest spark of spiritual grace from the gift of God is πολύ, "much"; such possessions alone are the ἀληθινόν, "true," which never deceives (mark now ἄδικος μαμωνᾶ in opposition, manifestly equivalent to ἄδηλος ψευστής), and by right divine this only is essentially and eternally our own. The alien earthly good, not a real personal property, which cannot become essentially our own,* changes its owners with every generation, when the inevitable ἐκλείπειν, "failing," asserts its rights: we dwell "in our houses" all of us only as tenants, and like those whom we receive (just as the תּוֹשָׁבִים before God, Psa. xxxix. 12) are only usufructuaries; and not indeed that with free discretion of our own, for we are stewards, and that which is another's is God's, who hath entrusted it to our fidelity, to be so faithfully employed as to win the nobler and only real good!† This indefinite neuter in τὸ ἀληθινόν, τὸ ὑμέτερον, "the true," "you own," stands emphatically significant, intimating that it is left to our own intelligence to observe what that means—for it is the discretion of wisdom which is here enjoined. But as soon as our right apprehension has reached this first stage, there is opened to it a new view. In the words of our Lord, which retain the wise indefiniteness of their hinting and warning character, the two contrasts of vers. 11, 12 do not remain strictly parallel, but the reference before intimated to a progressive confirmation of fidelity passes over to spiritual things also. It is most assuredly obvious that it is the gift of God's grace, the pound given wherewith to gain other, which the Lord terms τὸ ὑμέτερον; that is, according to Meyer's note—"that which is appropriate to your true nature, that which was originally (in the Creator's counsel), and shall be again (in redemption), your own, the true dominium restituendum of the lords of the earth created in the image of God, which was promised to the heirs of heaven by a θεὸς δώσει ὑμῖν" [God will give you]. Moreover, this critical question τίς ὑμῖν δώσει, "who will give you?" concerns not merely unfaithfulness in the use of earthly good, but unfaithfulness in regard to the earnest of that inheritance already received in the time of probation. Wilt thou certainly retain what thou hast, given to thee only preparatorily as a trust, and will God then one day give thee the full inheritance of eternal life?‡ Thus we see that even the true riches cannot become ours with perfect right and full possession, before we ourselves have become true or faithful; in the other case even the ἀληθινόν, "true," is taken from the unfaithful as being ἀλλότριον, "another's," instead of yielding up to them all its fulness. This is the progression of the double meaning in ver. 12 as following ver. 11; as this again finds its fundamental reason in ver. 10.

Verse 13. This saying, as reproduced here with great significance from the Sermon on the Mount, needs no further interpretation than we gave it there; as here uttered it forms a transition to those further repetitions of what had been earlier said, which the Lord, vers. 16-18, designedly here introduces. In this connection* it has two aspects; according to the one, it says (in Jensen's words)—"The servant of mammon makes (most unwisely!) that his master, which he, according to his true Master's design, should dispose of with absolute authority:" do ye make mammon subserve your eternal salvation! According to the other, it declares that fidelity consists in serving one Lord alone, and unfaithfulness in attempting to unite with it the service of another lord. Your true Lord is God, as your true good is the heavenly inheritance! By this, in conclusion, the discourse gives it to be understood that the entire parable and its doctrine were to apply to the Pharisees also; and hence ver. 14 springs up in immediate connection with these words, their ἐκμυκτηρίζειν, "murmuring," bursts forth, for their consciences convict them of being φιλάργυροι, "covetous." As it regards the contrasted and different yet essentially similar, position of the Publicans and Pharisees, between God and the world, Olshausen well says that "the former (that is, those who now turned to Christ) were outwardly most deeply involved in the world, but internally they were under the powerful influence of a longing for the divine; whereas the Pharisees, on the other hand, were outwardly linked with things divine, as the born representatives of the Theocracy, but their inward life was attached to the world, so that they turned their theocratical steward-relation to earthly ends." Thus the Lord's exhortation cries aloud to the hearts of both, to make their decision.

* As Beyschlag comments upon this saying, in the above-mentioned beautiful treatise—"Die Gütergemeinschaft im Lichte des Evangeliums" (Community of goods in the light of the Gospel), Rhein. Monatschr. 1850, 3: "Thou art Spirit and life, and therefore only by spirit and life to be enriched: earthly property is dead matter, which leaves thee in death, and then proves thee to have been a fool for having thought to make it thy own. Luke xii. 20."

† When Grotius translates ver. 11—the true mammon, or genuine possessions, he overlooks three things—that mammon in itself has been used already to describe the ἄδικον of earthly property, and cannot bear a good application; that μομωνᾶ as the name of an idol and master (in ver. 13 opposed to God) cannot bear a neuter adjective; and that τὸ ἀληθινόν is parallel with τὸ ἀλλότριον, ὑμέτερον, ver. 10 having begun these neuters. Erasmus has it correctly—quod verum est.

‡ To this essentially belongs, in the consummation and fulfilment of the προστεθήσεται, Matt. vi. 33, the possession of all the riches of the world in the restored powers of the spirit to which matter should ever be subservient; the dominion over the earth, and the heirship of all things glorified. "We cannot attain upon this earth to a perfect possession of our lost divine attributes and powers, because the Divinity may not commit them to our trust on account of our external nature" (Christianæ Käpplinger, Beschreibungen über das Wesen der Gottheit, etc., p. 63, comp. p. 91).

* For the sake of which the οἰκέτης is here appended, first of all (for it was to be supplied in Matt. vi. 24), equivalent to δοῦλος, in contrast with the κυρίοις; but then also at the same time as parallel with οἰκονόμος, who is no other than an οἰκέτης after all. This allusion to the steward is well preserved in Luther's "Hausknecht."

THE UNCONVERTED SINNER'S FIRST PUNISHMENT AMONG THE DEAD, AFTER REJECTING THE WORD OF REPENTANCE AND FAITH: THE RICH MAN IN TORMENTS, AND FATHER ABRAHAM.

(Luke xvi. 15–31.)

Every unprejudiced reader who is not under the mischievous influence of the fragment-hunting, disintegrating critics,* will observe that this parable stands in close connection with the former; and that their fundamental ideas lie so deep as to be perfectly one. The Pharisees also have discerned something, in what had been said, appropriate to themselves; for, they scornfully set their faces as if they would justify and exalt themselves: but it is shown only in their features and gesture, not as in chap. xv. 2 with a murmuring λέγειν, "saying;" it is as if they thought ταῦτα πάντα, "all these things," scarcely worth a word of reply, though in reality their courage was abashed. They would have said, if they could have uttered it: "Why all this trouble to teach such unjust Publicans as these a righteousness which we, the pious dispensers of alms, and we alone, have long exhibited?" while at the same time they were thinking in their hearts—"and we are shrewd enough, withal, shrewder than thou counsellest, for we can dexterously contrive to serve God and Mammon too!"† Such thoughts, however, must have been transmuted in their secret conscience into self-accusations, while the Lord, whom they had better understood than they professed, throws his clear, calm, and piercing words into the tumult and hypocrisy of their secret imaginations, directing to them immediately the discourse which had scarcely been suspended. Yea, verily, ye too may hear this; would that ye might! But ye will not receive counsel, ye will not be converted; though ye are ἐγγίζοντες (drawing near) where I teach, it is not for the sake of truly ἀκούειν or "hearing" but in order to γογγύζειν and ἐκμυκτηρίζειν (murmur). Ye are rich both in mammon and in righteousness; over whom, however, there is impending a miserable penury and failure of both! Thus does our Lord's discourse oscillate between the two parties around him: it passes from the penitent Publicans who condemn themselves, but whom God receives and justifies, once more to the impenitent self-righteous, who justify themselves while God knoweth their hearts, who will condemn and cast them down. On the one side are the Publicans, excluded from the rights of Israel, and contemptuously brought down to a level with the heathen; on the other the proud and secure children of Abraham, who have the word, but use it not for their salvation, who hear indeed, but hear not, who believe not, because they will not repent. Let it be observed, moreover, how, in this disclosed foundation of the whole discourse, the conclusion of chap. xvi. returns again into the beginning of chap. xv.; and let us note preliminarily what the wealth and sumptuous living of this man, with the frightful ἐκλείπειν or "failing" predicted against it, was designed to signify for the Pharisees and the ὑψηλόν of their καρδίαι (lofty thing of their hearts)! While it may here be presumed, from the analogy of the elder son in the former parable, that in the profoundest background a warning, threatening Love is still seeking their souls; yea, that the tormenting flame in Sheol, of which we shall afterwards hear, with the Τέκνον, μνήσθητι, "Son, remember," of Father Abraham, may actually summon even these to a late ἐρχεσθαι εἰς ἑαυτόν or coming to oneself, which the Publicans, entering into the kingdom of heaven before them, had already experienced for their good.

It will be seen that all the individual sayings, vers. 15–18 (which precede the last parable as an explanatory address, just as vers. 10–13 followed the middle one), are most accurately adapted to the innermost position of all. Possibly we have here an epitome of the chief points of the Lord's description, which had other links of connection;* though it is more probable that the whole was spoken by our Lord to these hearers in this unconnected and designedly enigmatical way, for the awakening of their attention and the rousing of their consciences.† "Yea, ye are they whom I mean, the so-called righteous (ch. xv. 7); who, however, before God are only on that account greater sinners in the pride of your hearts, an abomination instead of cause of rejoicing in heaven! ver. 15. For ye scorn and reject with hateful violence, and pervert in sinful transgression, that revelation of the truth and love of God which is brought plainly before your eyes. Law, Prophecy, and Gospel in their full inseparable harmony are exhibited to you in this day of grace, offer themselves to your acceptance—and ye despise the grace of the Gospel, ye

* The singular Sepp seems to have become one of these; for we find him saying: "The parable of the beggar Lazarus seems as if it had dropped down unintroduced from heaven among the other disjecta membra of the discourse!"

† This seems more probable than the intimation in Braune: "He makes light of riches, for he is poor: let him talk ever so long, he will accomplish nothing!" The reply to their secret thought, ver. 15, will not suit the supposition that such was its tenor.

* Not, indeed, as Von Gerlach too strongly says—a brief hint of a much longer reproof.

break the truth of the law!"* The former is the βιάζεσθαι εἰς αὐτήν, pressing into it, of ver. 16. The latter follows in vers. 17, 18. "For why is it that ye revolt against the preached kingdom of God? Because ye perceive and have heard from my lips, that in that preaching the law is not and cannot be abolished, but fulfilled, ver. 17. But ye have never humbled yourselves under the law, your hearts being filled with pride, unfaithfulness, hypocrisy, and adultery; ye have perverted and broken it (like false stewards of the λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ or oracles of God), for the gratification of your lust and avarice, and for your own base political ends!" This will approve itself finally as the true meaning of ver. 18.

Verse 15. The δικαιοῦν ἑαυτούς, "justifying themselves" (comp. ch. x. 29), is the trusting in themselves that they are righteous (ch. xviii. 9) which, however, does not fully sustain itself in their consciences before God; hence they all the more anxiously seek to justify themselves, exhibit themselves as righteous, and acquire the reputation of being such before men. Fundamentally no man can justify himself before God (however daringly he may use the language of ch. xv. 29, and xviii. 11)—for God knoweth the hearts of all (Psa. vii. 10; 1 Kings viii. 39): he who will absolve himself is, nevertheless and on that very account, not absolved of God. This ὑψηλόν, "that which is highly esteemed," as being the most essential, inmost idolatry, is the essential βδέλυγμα "abomination," in his sight (Rom. ii. 22). Τὸ ἐν ἀνθρώποις ὑψηλόν, "that which is highly esteemed among men," is by no means altogether parallel with, and the same as, ἐνώπιον τῶν ἀνθρώπων, "before men," before, although the opposite is set down again as ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ, "in the sight of God;" but as the Lord had just been speaking of their hearts, it means that pride of spirit which was actually present in these perverted and corrupted ἄνθρωποι, "men"; and it is this alone which is the abominable thing in the sight of that God who looketh at the heart and not at the outward appearance† (Prov. vi. 16, 17, xxix. 23). But this pride of heart exhibits itself in a twofold manner, inasmuch as they who are inwardly lifted up make themselves great before other men, and further celebrate and magnify (enviously, yet admitting it) the external, or self-arrogated loftiness in others: so far ἐν ἀνθρώποις, "among men," includes (with a natural double-meaning which occurs elsewhere) the ὑψηλόν "highly esteemed" among and before men, both at the same time; as the Vulgate endeavors to express it by hominibus. Much that is extolled by men, yea, all that regards this outward commendation alone, is most highly offensive to the God who searcheth the heart (1 Sam. xvi. 7). Thus it is here—"that which men regard as highly estimable in you," just as foolishly as ye seek their high estimation. The reason of this, however, remains: That which is high, ironically spoken, that is, what would be high and exalt itself (without being raised up on high by God, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1), and thus rob the only lofty One of his honor; that it is which is abomination and idolatry in his sight. This is the ὕψωμα, "high thing," of 2 Cor. x. 5, and thus appears the loftiest human virtue and "righteousness" to be no more than a wicked pride of heart! Before grace has humbled and justified and exalted the abased sinner, all the highest excellencies to which any man may have attained, however they may have exalted him in his own estimation, or given him value in the estimation of his fellow-worms, are but τὸ ὑψηλόν (the lofty thing), abomination in the sight of God. (So does John Newton, in his letters, pertinently expound our text.) Thus profoundly does our Lord's first word penetrate the hearts of these unhappy sinners, to whom he speaks "as unto wise men," with his piercing—"God knoweth your hearts!"

Verse 16. Let the reader consult our exposition of Matt. xi. 12, 13. The ἕως Ἰωάννου, "until John" (which in its conciseness emphatically refers to something well-known, and already before urged against them), must not be supplemented by merely supplying—"were valid till John" (then being abolished, against which ver. 17 protests); nor will it help the meaning to insert κυριεύουσι, δεσποτίζουσι, rule, as if the contrast were simply between the rigor of the law and the mildness of the Gospel (for the Prophets are not without gentle consolation); but the right complement, the true antitheton to εὐαγγελίζεται, "is preached," is already in Matthew προεφήτευσαν, "prophesied," which has been consequently inserted in some codd. as a gloss.* But this προφητεύειν, "prophesying" (of which Rom. iii. 21 also speaks), is assuredly a preparation, since the law and the prophets together do what John does at the end—prepare the way for the grace of Christ, and that preëminently by humbling to repentance. The ὑψηλόν or self-esteem of the Pharisees had never submitted to that; they cannot, therefore, and they will not comprehend or tolerate the kingdom of God which, with its preaching to the poor, plainly declares itself to be the fulfilment and realization of all that had gone before; but it may be said of them in a bad sense—πᾶς εἰς αὐτὴν βιάζεται, "every one

* Roos: Ye are a people prepared neither for the old time nor for the new!

† Thus it is far from intimating what has been superficially extracted from it—that the high, eminent, and rich as such, kings, and masters on their seats, are despicable before God! Schleiermacher would find here an oblique glance at Herod, such as might with some reason be applicable to ver. 18. A large portion of the Pharisees were his sycophantic adherents; and it is supposed that the Lord would bring it to their minds, that while they were despising the Publicans on account of their serving Rome, they themselves occupied a similar relation to the untheocratic dominion of the Idumæan family.

* Schleiermacher supplies insufficiently—ὁ νόμος . . . . ἐκυρίευσε, ἰσχυσε, for this is not the true "antithesis of εὐαγγελίζεται."

presseth into it." We shall not now repeat what was said on page 203 to justify this interpretation as necessary for the passage here: it is obviously required by the δέ, "and," of ver. 17, and the entire connection as it appears when closely examined. Thus the πᾶς, "every man," in a certain sense corresponds with the πάντες, "all," of chap. xv. 1, but by way of contrast—"Among you there is not one that repenteth to the joy of angels; every one of you, rather, that is, the first, the best, acts in refractory opposition. Ye rebel and strive mightily against the kingdom of God—instead of using a nobler violence in prayer, and striving to enter into it—in spite of its being the fulfilment of all preparation and prophecy, the end of all your service of God (Acts xxvi. 6, 7), and of its gracious evangelical announcement of itself.* Ye think, in your scorn, that such a Gospel and such a kingdom is only fit for publicans and harlots. But ye are no sinners! Is it so? How stands it between you and the law, which ye set against my Gospel, and which ye condemn me for breaking?"

Verses 17, 18. Ye know by the exhibition of my leading principles given on the Mount, or if ye have forgotten I repeat it to you, that —I am not come to abolish but to fulfil the law! We do not make void the law through faith—this must be ever an impossibility before God. Here we have the strongest formula with an εὐκοπώτερον, "easier," which exalts most emphatically the minimum of "moral order" (to speak in modern terms) above the maximum or totality of the physical system of nature: rather would God destroy his entire universe than suffer one tittle of his law to fall away.† Observe the great contrast between παρελθεῖν (vanish away, pass, go out of existence) with the simple πεσεῖν or ἐκπεσεῖν, become invalidated, or remain unfulfilled (Rom. ix. 6; 1 Cor. xiii. 8; 2 Kings x. 10; Josh. xxi. 45, xxiii. 14). "And as it does not enter my mind to desire that which is impossible before God, to relax any of those essential, permanent obligations and requirements of the law, in the case of those sinners whom I so graciously receive as my disciples, and continue so condescendingly to teach (so, e.g., counselling them no unrighteousness)—so no more shall ye be able, with your βιάζεσθαι or pressing, either to endanger the kingdom of God, or to do away with one tittle of the law which in that kingdom is to be established and confirmed. Though ye are actually striving, as much as in you lies, in your cunning to do both: ye revolt not less against the law than against my Gospel, ye keep not but violate the commandments of God. This very law which ye hold up to confront me, will nevertheless remain in force an will condemn you with its eternal, inevitable, righteous requital, ye adulterers!" This gives us the transition to ver. 18, which seems so singularly unconnected, and in which Olshausen, despairing to trace any connection in its literal sense, would find a figure analogous to Rom. vii. 1–4: Ye have become divorced from the law as from a wife. (On which view the marrying of this divorced wife in the second clause would not simply be superfluous, but meaningless: for his interpretation of this—that while they divorced themselves from the law in its spiritual and eternal significance, they nevertheless married it again in its transitory aspect, holding the Old Testament economy in that externality to which they had first reduced it—is most strangely forced and artificial.) We have only simply to bear in mind that the oriental and scriptural style of teaching, especially when dealing in gnomes and words of cutting reproof, does not expressly interject the connecting words, which, however, we must supply. Here it should be: "As for an example your disorderly divorces, which I have only to mention as exhibiting your laxity of practice (as was said before, Matt. v. 31), which the inviolable law, confirmed with new force by me, condemns."* This demonstration was all the more intelligible to them, because, only a short time before, their national judicature, receding from the high standard of the law of God, had tolerated the public scandal which Herod's marriage with his brother's wife had occasioned. (Tertullian found an allusion here to this occurrence.) Thus the reference which Schleiermacher would assign to the whole discourse, will hold good so far at least as this outrage of Herod gave a pertinent exemplification. This circumstance stood in close connection with the death of John just-mentioned, and the end of his ministry (by which the way was prepared for the kingdom of God and the preaching of the Gospel); they had not, like John, done their duty and boldly said to the adulterer upon the throne—It is not lawful! The πᾶς, "every man," thus obtains the force of—"even if it were the king;" similarly the striking ἀπολελυμένην ἀπὸ ἀνδρός, "divorced from her husband," instead of ὑπό, "by," does not merely strongly emphasize the invalidity of the divorce, but includes the circumstance in connection with Herod's crime, that a woman herself had abandoned her husband.

We are by no means to suppose that the rich man of the parable was a Sadducee, as many have thoughtlessly assumed; for vers. 29 and 31 would then be quite inapplicable. But the Lord seems to say: "Ye Pharisees live a Sadducean life like Herod and his adherents, with whom ye quarrel about the law and the prophets, and the life which is after death; ye live

* Roos would very artificially defend the interpretation of Luther, which is not in harmony with the connection—"Every man—save you, presseth in." This needs no refutation; let who may supply it!

† See, moreover, the exposition of this saying in all its breadth and depth on the parallel passages of Matthew.

* Roos thinks that it was not necessary here for our Lord to insert any condition or exception (as in Matt. xix. 9, v. 32), because their divorces were altogether, and as a whole, adulterous. We have corrected this on page 66.

as if there were none, ye do not hear the word which ye possess and which ye deal in—ye clothe yourselves and eat and drink very differently from the preacher of repentance." Then follows the last parable of this trilogy, which with its ἀνθρωπος δέ τις ἦν, "[now] there was a certain man" (only observed, so far as we have seen, by J. Von Müller), follows in immediate connection:* "But how is it with you and how will it be? Hear yet one thing more, in addition to all this, your own history—and even down to Hades—if ye will continue to be rich and highly esteemed upon earth!"† This parable, with its progressive application to the Pharisees instead of the Publicans, joins on to the beginning and end of the preceding one, inasmuch as it shows a πλούσιος or "rich man" in his ἐκλείπειν or "failing"; but it descends therewith into the kingdom of the dead, just as the first had gone up into heaven: Joy in heaven—Torment in hell! It depicts the torments endured there by one who had been a luxurious sinner upon earth, who had refused to abase himself, but had remained impenitent and unbelieving to the end; and depicts it most awfully, if, peradventure, the word may yet pierce their hearts, by the double contrast with the comfort there of the pious man who had been so miserable here. And although there might be involved an intimation that love, even in those depths, had not utterly given up the sinner, but was still seeking to bring him to reflection; yet here, in these words of father Abraham to the νῦν δέ ("but now") rejected son, as before in the great Father's words to the elder son who had remained in the house, the warning against unbelief sounds out much more distinctively in the ears of these Jews, against that unbelief which, in its process of hardening, had deserved such doom, and brought the impenitent man to the flame which held out small prospect of any further salutary μιμνήσκεσθαι and μετανοεῖν ("remembering" and "repenting").‡

In the first and briefer portion of the parable, the scene of which is still upon earth, there is exhibited before our eyes a rich man living in carnality and all the enjoyment of life, as an unfaithful steward of the law and the prophets, an unbelieving servant of Mammon—in the sharpest contrast with a poor, despised, righteous man; towards whom he does not act as the preceding parable required, and therefore constantly accumulates guilt. The inward character of both is only hinted at; just as their private thoughts and dispositions were concealed from the sight of men till the time came when the vail of perverting appearances falls off, and each takes his true place and condition. First we have this unnamed and yet well-known rich man's condition and manner of life, indicating the end for which he lived, ver. 19. Over against him is the helpless God-help, as his name written in heaven declares him to be, ver. 20. Then in ver. 21 we have the relation of one to the other; wherein, again, the piety of the poor man, and the neglect of the rich man, are preliminarily hinted at. But now comes the suddenly disclosed second part, the essential heart of the parable—"a narrative, with its scene laid in that other world; and which, if Christ were speaking in our day, would be called by our polyhistors a romance of heaven" (as Kleuker says)—we would say rather, a romance of hell! For although it is certainly true—"so much that is deep, true, and transcendently suggestive is said of the two great regions of the other world, that every stroke of the delineation becomes the basis of a widely extended system"—yet the man in his torment must ever be the prominent central figure: the dead and buried unbeliever (whom the generation of the children of this world, and all his brothers above esteem meanwhile, according to Psa. xlix. 13, 14, to be happy and approve his sayings) in the torments of the kingdom of death. What a picture, and with what sublime assurance and repose presented!*

Again there are two parts: the former brief and transitional, the other being the proper and most important scene, most dramatically developed. First is the change of circumstances gen-

* For this δέ in the middle of the discourse is something quite different from that in εἶπε δέ, ἔλεγε δὲ καί—see e.g. similarly at chap. xvii. 1.

† Though this parable may possibly be fashioned upon other similar narratives used in the teaching of that age, yet we find in it abundance of what is proper to itself, and profoundly new, down to the κεραία. It is the blending of given elements, the arrangement and harmonising of the simple groundnotes everywhere heard, that exhibits the master of composition.

‡ A friend made me acquainted, during the publication of the first edition, with a sermon of the excellent Harms on the first Sunday after Trinity, which represents this Gospel as being inopportune and alien to such a season. But this alien out of Hades vindicates his own significance. As the portion selected for Trinity Sunday itself, refers to the inscrutableness of the ways and of the nature of God, and to the new birth, in which alone we can practically know the Three-One; so the institution of the Church begins with that high teaching which places this world in its true relation to the next, warning us that the exhortation of the Holy Ghost to repentance towards God and that faith in Christ which exercises itself in love to the brethren (comp. the Epistle, 1 John iv. 16–21), is contained in that word which we already have. This is a better vindication of the Gospel and Epistle than that which Strauss in his "Kirchenjahr" gives; comp. Nitzsch (Prakt. Theol. ii. 2, 391) who refers to "circumstances unknown to us" as the ground of the selection.

* To quote Kleuker (Menschl. Vers. über d. Sohn Gottes. p. 194) once more: "It was not possible that Jesus should assume, for its own sake, a mien of mystery, or aim to create a mere vacant astonishment, or use the tone of affected lamentation: for he spoke out of his own nature, even as Æsop did when he made his lions, asses, nightingales, and trees speak; and it was not his aim to make proselytes to faith by prodigies exhibited to the eye, any more than by those uttered to the ear."

erally, with the ever impending ἐγένετο δὲ ἀποθανεῖν, "and it came to pass that he died," of every-day life; the one in Abraham's bosom, the other shut out from the place of happiness which he beholds, and in torment, vers. 22, 23. Then follows the more detailed elucidation of the kind, the design, and the reason of this torment, given in a parabolical colloquy between the tormented one and father Abraham, to whom he appeals in vain. Two supplications are rejected. The former, for ever so slight a mitigation of the righteously ordained punishment, contains in itself an intimation of the kind, and receives for answer a hinted explanation of the end, of this torment. In the prayer, ver. 24, it exhibited itself as the pain of deprivation, connected with a consciousness of guilt (clinging, however, to the slender service once rendered in the crumbs which had been thrown out), but without any application to the alone-helping mercy of God.* The repelling answer, vers. 25, 26, hints at the justice and well-adjusted design of love, in the torments which for the present are rigidly fixed. In the second colloquy the ground of guiltiness is referred to: the request for extraordinary revelation to his brethren (which hardly conceals his own stiff-necked apology for himself as having lacked it) is rejected with a reference to the word which was in their hands. The request of vers. 27, 28 exhibits as well the blindness and obduracy of the offender, as his distinct consideration and reflection upon all things, and even his knowledge of the nature of repentance. The refusing father Abraham must now give two answers, for the colloquy deepens into an objection and contradiction on the part of him who is made wiser in his flames. The first reply points generally to the hearing and acceptance of that which before Christ had been given to Israel, as sufficing to lead to Abraham's bosom, ver. 29. But when the objection, ver. 30, carries self-justification even to this point, even while its contradiction condemns itself (for in his blindness concerning the saving ordinance of faith there is yet a knowledge of the way of repentance, in which man learns to understand faith), there follows finally the conclusive answer to the whole—faith in order to repentance, that alone can preserve the soul from future torment.† But these two things are intimated: that God's love furnishes the most superabounding means of grace, and that these are in vain to the unbelief which has been before hardened into reprobation. "Hence then, ye Pharisees, be taught by your Abraham, and use that which ye already have, from his time down to John, in order that ye may believe the gospel of the kingdom (ver. 16), and in him who will rise from the dead.

Verse 19. A rich man: "such as we beati possidentes (blessed with possessions), whom thou, poor Messiah, rebukest, because thou hast nothing thyself"—might these bold mockers have thought within themselves, unless our Lord's previous words had humbled them too much. A rich man: "as that word is used in the Scriptures from Job's time, with the bad and almost godless meaning attached to it in the Psalms and the Proverbs by the rich David and Solomon"—would attentive and observant hearers begin to suspect. A rich man: "such as the great Sermon, Luke vi. 24, had denounced a woe upon"—would the Apostles probably and other disciples interpret the words, at once discerning the aim of their Master's discourse. (Matt. xix. 23 had not yet been uttered.) Ἄνθρωπός τις ἦν πλούσιος, "There was a certain rich man"—altogether like ver. 1 before; for all ἄνθρωποι or men are only stewards of One above themselves, the only God, but this one acts the God himself, and as man thinks himself in the place of God. Nullum adest vestigium vel mentio transitus ullius a Pharisæis ad Sadducæos (there is no mark or mention here of any transition from the Pharisees to the Sadducees)—remarks Bengel quite correctly; but it is equally clear that this Pharisee lives as a Sadducee, and consequently the thoughts of his heart are such as will hereafter be discovered to be pure scepticism or not believing. He is simply a man of this world, a sensual lover of the good things of life (ἐτρυφήσατε ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς καὶ ἐσπαταλήσατε, James v. 5), knowing nothing about administering God's goods as a steward; he makes good living the end of life, his heart is altogether immersed in its pomp and luxuriance, and hence there is nothing more just at this point to be said concerning him. The vain preëminence of apparel is first mentioned, for this with eating and drinking is the heathenish ambition of his mammon; and his one great care is to carry both to the loftiest pitch in the sight of men, as if for his own precious soul. He feeds with the swine of the earth and is perfectly content; therefore has he every day his merry companions around him (εὐφραίνεσθαι, as ch. xv. 23, 29): and it is all λαμπρῶς, "sumptuously," too, so that he does not merely riot, but ostentatiously exhibits his riches and his costly apparel, like King Ahasuerus of old: if his seats are not of gold, his vessels are; if his curtains and fringes are not of fine linen, these adorn his own great person. These are all fine strokes in the delineation, each having its significance. The purple was the coloring of a woolen fabric, the byssus or fine linen was weighed against gold by reason of its resplendent whiteness. The combination not only was beautiful (hence they are always united, from Esth. i. 6, viii. 15, with blue and white, down to Rev. xviii. 12);

* It is only the addition of this third which makes the pains of hell: the two former had been experienced both by Lazarus and the prodigal.

† How can any one help seeing this, clearly as it stands before us! We protest again and again against the ever-recurring interpretation, that the unjust steward exhibits the "blessedness of charity"—and the rich man "the curse of selfishness."

but it was the emblem of high dignity, so that kings and priests could not outvie this fortunate one, who though neither of these himself, was a rich man to whom everything was accessible and conceded. It never occurs to his mind to think how many Lazaruses he might have clothed with the price of his sumptuous array. Moreover, he is not a mean and parsimonious man, for he enjoys his substance, parts with it freely, and has open house with grateful guests always round his table; neither is anything said of ἀδικία or "unrighteousness" in the acquisition of his wealth, or of any obvious want of charity or mercilessness; nothing of notorious sins or blasphemy, although he is depicted with accuracy down to his clothing: so that we may not unnecessarily imagine anything of this kind. Thus he lives and gliters λαμπρῶς, "sumptuously," in his royal magnificance καθ' ἡμέραν, "every day," as if his days would never come to an end, a blind φρονιμώτατος εἰς τὴν γενεὰν τὴν ἑαυτοῦ (most wise one in his generation). The people deem him fortunate and happy: and many look enviously at his palace.*

Verses 20, 21. And now in strongest contrast, in a certain sense (to quote Neander) "serving as a foil to a worldly rich man," we have a pious man "stripped of all temporal good" in the profoundest and most abject misery; on both sides there is a description, as the καθ' ἡμέραν "every day," previously taught, of a permanent condition and state of mind. But the πτωχός τις, or "certain beggar" has a name, for his name alone is written before God and mentioned with honor by Christ—such is the first and most obvious meaning of this most striking designation by name in the middle of a parable. Or might it be implied thereby that in this case the parable actually presents a historical fact? Is the name mentioned by Jesus "as the authentication of an actual incident?" (Roos). The fathers many of them were of that opinion, and Theophylact found evidence that there was at that time in Jerusalem such a well-known Lazarus. Calvin is very decided on the same side, on the ground that throughout the entire Scriptures we never find a man mentioned by name in a parable; but this is not sufficient reason to reject what may be a solitary exception. It is possible that Christ may have seen such an occurrence, not merely including the death of both, and the funeral pomp of the one, but even the recorded continuation in the other world which was not hidden from his eye; but it is highly improbable and out of keeping, to suppose that he would single out and make prominent by name one case out of many similar constantly occurring, as if it had been a rare and special event. Further, if the poor Lazarus had been a notorious person, he would scarcely have been found remaining to the end at the gate with the dogs; and the publicity of his name would be opposed to that obscurity and forgotten condition among men which the Lord evidently intends to mark as the principal feature of his case in this world. Finally, if Lazarus must be regarded as a historical personage, much more must the rich with his five brethren: this appearance of reality in the narrative has been seized upon by many, but the truth will be seen when we come to consider ver. 28. Though the Lord might assuredly have sometimes incorporated true histories in his parables (in the higher sense they are all such); yet must we maintain, on the other hand, that in no parable did he ever specify any one single circumstance of actuality alone.

This poor man lay before the rich man's door, or properly πυλών, that is, the chief entrance and colonnade of his palace; ἐβέβλητο means more exactly that he was cast down there (as βέβλημαι is used of the sick, whom their sickness casts down, Matt. viii. 6, 14; Mark vii. 30). Here there is possibly an additional emphasis—He was laid there by the people, who thus discharged themselves of their obligation; pacifying their consciences by placing him at the rich man's gate: "Let him behold the poor man as he goes in and out; let him see before his very eyes what kind of people there are in the neighborhood of his rich house, and take him in!" But the rich man did not take the advice of Ecclus. xiv. 13–17, although the misery and end of man was thus daily obtruded before his eyes: it is a plain indication of his guilt that there Lazarus καθ' ἡμέραν, "every day," lay and continued to lie. For it is the permanent condition of the poor man which is depicted in the parable; not that he was often laid before the gate of the rich man (as Von Gerlach says)—but he was thrown there once for all. To lie excluded in the dust before the door of the festal conviviality—that was his dwelling: ulcers which he cannot hide, and which invite the dogs—these were his covering (full of sores for ἠλκωμένος), this his costly attire: a craving for crumbs, which at least was never fully satisfied—this was his banquet! Naked, outcast, forsaken and hungry, withal in the skin of Job! All this obviously paints only his outward condition, but it intimates at the same time his frame of mind; and both are exhibited to us in the symbolical, therefore not historical but parabolical, name. That name is probably a Græcised אֶלְעָזָר,* (God helped),

† Professor Weisse doubts not—if we may quote such words—that "this perverse description must be put to the Evangelist's account, who would not lose such an opportunity of venting his spleen against the rich and distinguished in this world." But where do we find a word about "the rich man being punished only for his riches, the poor man rewarded only on account of his poverty?" What doctrine can be found here which is "more poor and barren than the coarsest heathen notions of moral retribution after death!" Would that these worthies would only read in the New Testament what they find written there!

* Which is nearer to the form Λάζαρος than אֱלִיעֶזֶר, Eliezer, Abraham's servant, to whom many refer the allusion (as the hero of many Jewish tales) —on the other hand many of the fathers correctly speak, in connection with this parable, of the poor Eleazar.

Eleazar, but it also has the sound of לֹא עֵזֹר (Chald. לָא) no-help, and thus describes, by its double-meaning, both the external appearance and the inner state of the man so named: before men he is helpless, and he is at the same time thrown before the gate of his mercy for God to help. He now sees afar off the table at which he could not sit, and from which he could not eat; the converse of what afterwards took place. The learned are still contending whether any crumbs fell from that table for him; but they should reflect that according to the whole cast of the parable the man does not linger a few days and then die of hunger (which would have been recorded as the climax of his misery); consequently his ἐπιθυμεῖν, "desiring," must have received something to appease it, by which it was only not satisfied even to χορτασθῆναι, "being filled." Neander is wrong when he says that in his pining hunger he longed in vain for a crumb. Many Codices would repeat here the καὶ οὐδεὶς ἐδίδου αὐτῷ, "and no man gave unto him," from ch. xv. 16 (Vulg. "et nemo illi dabat"); but that is evidently an uncorrected gloss. It is to be taken for granted that he enjoyed something, though only and hardly the crumbs which sympathising servants might gather from the leavings of the rich man's table: for it his habitual condition which is here depicted. He is at least tolerated before the gate, is not cast aside as being in the way; but neither is he lifted up into a better place, where he might receive better attendance: the rich man must have seen him just as in hell it was brought to his remembrance, but only with absolute indifference; full of himself he troubled himself about no one else. He certainly did not himself send him the crumbs. He did not command the offensive exhibition to be removed out of his way: for nothing availed to carry trouble to the hard heart which was covered with purple and fine linen; warmed indeed with wine, but cold to all sympathy. He did not say, in passing, to any of the people who with alacrity did his bidding—Take this hideous object away; the servants without any merit of his, threw to him the scanty ψιχίον or "crumb" occasionally; but the meanest kennel of their master was too good for him to be brought under its roof. Then come out to him the dogs, which had more than crumbs for their fare (as many a rich lord now-a-days fattens his horses and dogs instead of feeding the poor),* supplying the lack of men: this is the obvious meaning of this trait of contrast in the picture, and settles the question raised by the critics whether their licking was sympathy or greed, mitigation or exasperation of his pains. The dogs (with the article) are not merely animals as opposed to men, the unowned and hungry street-dogs of the East (Psa. lix. 15, 16), who might not only have licked his sores, but done far worse to him; but they belong to the house and establishment of the rich man, as Matt. xv. 27 teaches us that even in the East other dogs had "their masters." These know him, according to the wont of dogs, and their half-friendly, half-instinctive, dog-nature proves itself (unconsciously, of course, in this rebuking figure) more full of sympathy than the swine-nature of their lord, thinking of nothing but the trough. Olshausen thinks that their licking the wounds denoted their eagerness and greediness rather than their sympathy, because dogs bear in the Old and New Testament a character exclusively evil, and certainly are never used as the symbol of fidelity or even kindness; but to this we reply that they are not said as dogs to be thus sympathetic, but (and let this exquisite touch in the signification not escape us) their true Master sends them to his poor Lazarus, because there is no one to bind up and mollify his wounds; just as aforetime he sent the ravens to feed the Prophet.* "To make his sufferings endurable to Lazarus, it pleased Providence to make the dogs propitious to him: and thus to put men to shame who abandoned him in his misery" (Müralt in a passage to be quoted again). So that Bengel is not correct here—ἐρχόμενοι, venientes, non Lazari sed suâ causâ, quasi cadaver esset (came not for the sake of Lazarus, but their own; as if he had been a dead body); and afterwards —"dolorem exasperant" (they exasperate his pain).† For, as dogs solace their own sores, so their licking would mitigate the smart of the wounds of Lazarus. Finally, that our Lord did mean to express alleviation we are convinced by the ἀπέλειχον, "licked," itself; and still more clearly by the decisive ἀλλὰ καί, "moreover," which would be meaningless if an exacerbation of his pain was intended.‡ The poor abject man cannot drive the dogs away, nor would he, for they do him good; if he could only get food enough—that remains his only desire and lack, more humanly expressed than a similar one of the lost son, ch. xv. 16, who even amid his husks thinks still of his former good fare, while he is compelled to discover what does really satisfy and what does not.

Might not this Lazarus, then, be a sinner in this state? Oh yes, for he might have raged and blasphemed in his heart, as it is in Rev. xvi. 9–11; he might have given way to murmuring and envy; he might have cried aloud for the help which was due to him while there remained any breath in his body. But all this is denied of him in the narrative; his calm

* My practical theological readers may be supposed to know Pestalozzi's Leinhard und Gertrud. This will remind them of it. That little book does not teach sound dogmatics, but there is much good in it, which they may comprehend and apply better than Pestalozzi himself.

* Melancthon adduced this parallel.

† Gersdorf and many others: They increased the misery of his situation! Stein thinks that this would give the best point of connection for the cessation of his troubles and miseries in ver. 22: but there was misery enough before, and without this, as we know full well.

‡ How this ἀλλὰ καί designates the dogs "as wretched competitors of the helpless man," I cannot understand, though Lange says it.

patience, which we all the more are conscious of because it takes no pains to exhibit itself, and into which his wounds and sores have purified the soul which had been rebellious and sinful before, is intimated in that single word ἐπιθυμῶν, "desiring," which is far from being "almost without specific meaning," and indicates far more than the circumstance (as Ebrard thinks) that he failed to get any supply. He did not, indeed, get enough to supply and assuage his need: but that he only desired that partial supply, that he was content to eat it with the dog as with a companion, that he did not envy or condemn the rich man within the house before him, that he did not murmur and send forth his cries, but only sighed out his unsatisfied hunger—all this is the essential grandeur and glory of this wretched man's character, who lies there with his sores (mentioned, at the end, as his only heritage) a mass of misery, in that profoundest distress which makes death welcome (Ecclus. xli. 1, 2), and of whom it is not once said that he had desired deliverance or death. For in his self-abasement, Abraham's bosom was not counted upon so assuredly as it was by the rich man in his blinded pride.

Verse 22. So much the nearer to him was the redemption and consolation which awaited him, and for which he in patience waited: but to the other the torment of want! But it came to pass: by this trivial formula of narration (corresponding to the former—There was a certain) is designedly introduced their dying; that great transition, and reversal of positions for eternity which in this great world of confusion is daily taking place; of as universal occurrence as the contrast everywhere seen between rich and poor, and which the commerce of the world is constantly rendering more wide, can make it. He who upon earth was number two, nay, the lowest of all in the roll, has now the precedence, for his comfort makes haste. The beggar died—how do we rejoice in this as the end of all his trial and need! But his sorrow, tribulation, and misery are to come to a blessed and joyful end. There follows immediately something transcendently beyond that. What became of his body, from which the scent of corruption already issues; whether there is any one to say—Let us bury the body, or whether the corpse is again contumeliously thrown anywhere, is not now recorded, for it is no more matter of concernment to him. The essential Lazarus, who was in that body—καὶ αὐτόν, "and [he]," sublimely recognises a personal immortal continuance of being, according to the simple consensus gentium in human language—is suddenly given to the charge of other hands, and transferred to other regions. He had no brothers upon earth like the rich man, nor had he any friends, nor any mammon with which to make himself friends; but the dogs give place to the angels, who had long ago rejoiced over the repentance, and afterwards over the patience of this sinner, waiting upon it with longing, those ministering spirits of the most miserable man who should ever inherit blessedness, and expecting their permission to carry him there. They appear, as it were, attendants and helpers in his real birth into life. He who had lain there forsaken, is now carried, carefully, tenderly, and with high honor, so that no finger may come too near to the wounds of the soul (corresponding in susceptibility with those of the body), in the moment of their eternal healing. One angel, as Chrysostom preaches, would have been strong enough for this service, but it is the joy and emulation of the angels in common to bring one sinner out of his last prison-house into the wealthy place. They carry him into Abraham's bosom, which was most probably already in Christ's time the Jewish designation of the place of the blessed fathers in Hades,* since we can hardly suppose that our Lord is here introducing a new designation. As John lay at the table ἐν τῷ κόλπῳ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, "on the breast of Jesus," and the eternal Son himself, before time began, was εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, "in the bosom of the Father," so shall they that are of faith be blessed with faithful Abraham (Gal. iii. 9), who is called the father of them all, and can receive them into everlasting habitations. (Hence ver. 23, ἐν τοῖς κόλποις which at the same time includes the idea of fellowship.) The outcast has the most exalted ministry and fellowship: the abandoned one enjoys the most intimate communion with all the princes of God, in whom Israel boasted. This is very different from lying at the gate upon earth, and is even more than only sitting at the table with Abraham, Matt. viii. 11 (which meal, moreover, has another reference, and belongs to the βασιλεία or "kingdom" upon earth, not to the other world; hence Bengel is inexact when he says—"sinus præsupponit convivium; convivium, regnum cœlorum" [the bosom presupposes the feast; the feast the kingdom of heaven]—for here the discourse is of Hades).

But the rich man also died, not merely when his time came as it cometh to all (Job xxi. 23–26), but, as the condensed narrative signifies, only a little afterwards; his death speedily ensued. This Lazarus before his gate was probably the final probation of his life, to try whether such a sight would move him to reflection; or was he the last and only intercessor who lengthened his day of grace, for the crumbs' sake, which were imparted to him? Suffice it that he died: the bitterness of his death is veiled—how under his silken covering he found that medicaments could not save him, how he thought one moment with the heathen king Agag that the bitterness of death was past, and in the next was ruthlessly seized by the unflattering devil and hurried away.† And was buried—

* According to Lightfoot, בְּחֵיק שֶׁל אַבְרָהָם (in the bosom of Abraham) was equivalent to Paradise.

† A question which may be passed over by him whom it offends! In the case of Lazarus the carrying away of the soul by the angels takes place immediately after his dying; in the case of the rich man, the burying comes between the death and the doubtless with great pomp and splendor, which however in vain would conceal his equality with the poor beggar in death; if funeral orations and monumental inscriptions had been in vogue then, in both it would have been said—Here rests one, who is now eating and drinking at a higher table in Abraham's bosom! Such was the last of him; hurried away with such fatal falsehoods in his ears, there soon remains of him upon earth only—There was a certain rich man; till that itself, with his name, is forgotten. And is the history ended when we hear that he also died? Oh no! as in relation to the dying and the being buried, so now there follows yet one more fearful and direful and.

Verse 23. And in hell—that is, in the realm of the dead, in the other world—it was otherwise with both respectively; the happy man is now in torments, the miserable man in Abraham's bosom. And both immediately, without any sleep of the soul or any pause of interval—their dying is the turning-point of their destiny. A common realm of the dead, in which here first both are found, is intended in this expression; and they who regard ἐν τῷ ᾅδῃ, "in hell," as already equivalent to ἐν βασάνοις, "in torment," and as the antithesis of κόλπος Ἀβραάμ, "Abraham's bosom," do so simply because they do not understand what ᾅδης or שְׁאוֹל, "hell," is. The same Lord Jesus Christ who speaks in Matt. xvi. 18 of the gates, and in Rev. i. 18 of the keys of hell, uses the word in both passages according to its well known signification for all the world; only that he, the conqueror and living one, contemplates dying, death, and the realm of the dead in itself as being part of the dominion of the devil, and as exhibiting the subjection of man to his authority in a prison-house on account of sin. The necessity of dying, the being held captive in the realm of death, is the mournful fundamental idea of the expression; and it is very consistent that the Lord should speak concerning Lazarus, already in a place of peace and joy, without mentioning that dreary word; but now, when it is to be taken in its evil side, it comes forth into its own prominence. (Let Bengel's note be understood and carefully noted.) Assuredly we must admit here a transition into the narrower and evil signification of the word (such as necessarily afterwards became universal in the phraseology of Christians); but we cannot admit that it was according to a phraseology then already in use (of which this would be the only instance) which made ᾅδης, Hades, by metonymy of the whole for a part, simply equivalent to no less than γεέννα, Gehenna, or τάρταρος, Tartarus. A heathen, speaking of the final consolation of a blessed man in the Elysian fields (which also belong to Hades) would have similarly expressed himself; for, as the ἀποθανεῖν, dying, of the poor man has in itself a different and more gracious tone than the ἀπέθανε καί, "also died," of the rich man, so is his place in the region of the dead no longer, as it were, the kingdom and domain of death. Although, for the rest, Grotius is perfectly correct in saying—"fuit ἐν ᾅδῃ etiam Lazarus, disterminatis ᾅδου regionibus" (Lazarus also was in Hades, its several regions being distinguished).

The New Testament, like the Septuagint, derives from heathenism the word, and also its fundamental idea as grounded upon internal consciousness and even external perception (appearances of the dead and insights of the living, which are never wanting in its literature); and thus confirms its identity with the Old Testament שְׁאוֹל, Sheol. The etymology of the two words remarkably corresponds, notwithstanding apparent difference, and is less uncertain than manifold in its meaning; for they are actually two pregnantly mysterious words adapted to the views of the ancient world with respect to these deep things. Apart from other baseless subtilties,* שְׁאוֹל is first of all, the unknown place, the undefined whither after which man asks; but at the same time, in an undertone of meaning, the condition and place of asking and longing to those who are found there. Again, as שָׁאַל shaal, signifies to demand, it is the realm which inexorably requires the living and is insatiable in its exaction (as Luther says upon Psa. xvi.); but at the same time a reckoning is demanded of those who dwell there (μετὰ δὲ τοῦτο κρίσις, Heb. ix. 27), and it is the prison of the true Inquisition, of profound and most righteous investigation. Similarly, ᾅδης bears the well-known general signification of the unseen land—"the no place, the land of forgetfulness, the region of shadows and unrealities—and at the same time (which is less generally recognised) the land where no man can see anything (the lifting up of the eyes and seeing, in our parable, in one sense is consistent with this, in another forms a contrast), a land of obscurity in opposition to the light of the living, the life of shadows, the "twilight of severed existence"—and thus, finally, it is the place whence there is no prospect or hope of torment. Does this intend at the same time to give us a profound intimation that, instead of the being hurried away by the devil of which we spoke, the spirit in the case of the latter still hovers about the corpse and the sepulture, scarcely able to get entirely free, and long shivers before the commencing contrast between the glory and the torment? "It might seem by certain experiences to be established that this is one of the most dreadful sufferings of the sundered spirit of the sinner, to remain by its corpse, and to be constrained to be, as it were, partaker of its dissolution" (Kerner's Blätter aus Prevorst, ii. 186).

* Of which we only mention Kanne's derivation from a root cognate with שָׁלָה, the place of rest and stillness, Psa. xciv. 17, cxv. 17 (which says too little and is too gentle); and then Gesenius—tandem indagasse sibi videtur שְׁאִיָּה, cavitas"—which is too external and local, and, properly speaking without any contents. Or it must be regarded as remaining ever hollow, never full, as an insatiable abyss, Prov. xxvii. 20, xxx. 16.

return.* The old theologians had a much better acquaintance with the nature of Sheol than the more modern; though sounder views are beginning now to be admitted in the place of the rash and hasty negative dogmatics of the Reformers.†

Abraham himself, in this general sense, is in Sheol, like Jacob and Joseph, Gen. xxxvii. 35; and Samuel also is there where Saul comes to him, 1 Sam. xxviii. 19. Καὶ ἐν τῷ ᾅδῃ, and in Hades, is the general antithesis to their earthly life, the lifting up of the curtain upon the scene beyond; if this had itself signified—"in the place of torments," there would have been evident an abrupt and violent change in the language; and the solemn ἐν βασάνοις, "in torments," which with its ὑπάρχων, "being," first introduces the absolute issue of all, would introduce a weakening tautology. But the discourse goes on most simply and lucidly thus: "And when he, the rich man, had all the honors done to his buried body, how was it with his soul which not the less on that account was there below; how did he take his place there? In torments!"‡ With almost ridiculous force of language and dogmatism De Valenti explains this hell of the rich man to be "a New-Testament description of the place and condition of the eternally damned, such as cannot be interchangeable with the Old-Testament Sheol," and so he regards Lazarus as a "New-Testament saint made perfect," and the rich man as an absolute contemner of the Gospel! He wilfully overlooks the fact that the entire parable as a narrative belongs to a period before the death and resurrection of Christ (by which the Old-Testament Sheol first lost its sole prerogative); and that, in ver. 29, the revelation given before Christ is appealed to, most decisively and designedly, as already sufficient. In like manner this period must be regarded as before the resurrection of all the dead to their definitive judgment; the discourse consequently refers only to an interval and middle state, just as before the habitations or tabernacles, albeit eternal, yet as tabernacles, referred to an interim. The detailed exposition of all that follows will variously and decisively confirm this view. Nor can we derive from it the notion that there is a torment of the wicked which falls short of eternal condemnation; according to the opinion of one who has been "taught by a continual study of the Scriptures, and reflection upon the Divine nature, to think, or at least to hope (!) that the Divine righteousness would never affix to the transitory errors and failings of this short life, the doom of eternal woe."* There is, indeed, κόλασις αἰώνιος, "everlasting punishment," which no investigation of Scripture, and no reflection upon the righteousness of God, can explain away; but that is not the subject of the discourse which we now expound.

The sometime rich man is regarded as being, in the first transition and on his first entrance into this place, dark and involved in self; but there immediately ensues a lifting up of his eyes, a contemplation and pondering of the condition in which he now is,† and that not induced by desire or curiosity, but enforced by torment: it is this which drives him to the first involuntary perception of the horror of his condition. Every lexicon will tell us that βάσανος, "torment," in its original and fundamental signification indicates a testing and investigation;‡ and then subordinately the pains which ensue as the tortures which extract confession. If the application of this sense to our passage is declined, on the ground of New-Testament usage, we are constrained to admit that there is strong apparent ground for doing so; since βάσανος, Matt. iv. 24, is used for the sufferings of sickness, βασανίζω for the being tormented and suffering without any adjunct idea, in Matt. viii. 6, 29; Luke viii. 28; Matt. xiv. 24; Rev. ix. 5, and βασανισμός for eternal woe, not only in Rev. xviii. 7, 10, 15, but also actually in Rev. xiv. 10, 11. But, on the other hand, it is overlooked that even in the New Testament the fundamental idea of the word is not unrecognized, as the title given to the tormenters, βασανιστής, Matt. xviii. 34, shows; whence Wahl says quite correctly, with reference to this wider application of the term: tortor quæstionarius, qui interest torturæ, ne adversarius servum ultra modum præscriptum vexet, quique testatur de enunciatis a servo, pretiumque hujus æstimat, si per tormenta ita læsus est ut domino fieret inutilis" (the examining torturer, who is concerned in the torture that the opponent do not torment the slave beyond the prescribed measure, and who testifies concerning the utterances of the slave, and also estimates his value in case he be so wounded by the torture as to become useless to his master.) We think, however, that the aim of this torment to work repentance is not so much indicated by this plain, though uncertain and ambiguous term βάσανοι,§

* See Von Meyer's Blätter, vi. 239. Other echoes and allusions in the word we now pass over: see Kerner's Blätter aus Prevorst, iii. 93–95.

† We may refer especially to three books—Von Meyer, Hades (Frankf. 1810; Salzmann, Was ist der Tod, Todtenbehältniss, etc., (Strasburg, 1810); König, Die Lehre von Christi Himmelfahrt (Frankf. 1842). Against this De Valenti's Eschatology urges an unfounded and perverted protest.

‡ Thus there is no ground for Hengstenberg's assertion (Ev. Kirchenz. 1849, p. 5) that the word Hades is used in the New Testament only with reference to departed sinners. In Acts ii. 27–31 the Old Testament phrase is recognized and affirmed; and, further, Rev. xx. 13 means the realm of the dead simply, as is plain from ver. 12.

* As Rössler of Merseberg publicly expounded this parable, and, at the wish of very respectable people, printed his sermon.

† This only is meant, and not—as Lange interprets it, one cannot tell why—an outward looking, high and beyond himself.

‡ Hence it is found simply βάσανον διδόναι τῆς πίστεως or τοῦ πιστὸν εἶναι, to give proof of fidelity.

§ As Meyer's note: "refining, testing" (and elsewhere "in the furnace of purification"), since as by the process of the whole subsequent colloquy; we must aver that at least there is a slight preliminary allusion in the word which gives an intimation of a torture which may extract an acknowledgment before God, who searcheth the hearts. In this "certum πού" (fixed point) of Hades (ver. 28, τὸν τόπον τοῦτον, "this place,"—as Lazarus also experiences ἀπενεχθῆναι or "being carried"), which implies in itself the soul separated from the body, each man comes to his own place (Acts i. 25) according to the law of affinity—as he has fitted himself; and according to the law of retribution—as he has deserved: consequently in the case of the unbelievers and earthly-minded the torment which commences is self-understood.* Now all is over with mockery, a fearful reality and earnest begins! He who probably had scarcely known what want, sorrow, and woe meant, now suffers them all in immeasurable extent in consequence of this sudden ἐκλείπειν or "failing," this bereavement of every object which could satisfy the desire which still remains; through the removal of everything in which the wretched soul had found its life. "Suppose the case of a child, who, as a punishment, must give up his plaything, with the apprehension of never having it restored, and observe how he cries and laments, how he shrieks and rages as if impaled, while there is no positive woe in the case at all, only a mere deprivation and sacrifice of self-contentment and personal feeling" (Von Meyer). For the desire remains, the thirst without water, the craving and nothing to supply it. In addition to this, the envious soul beholds others enjoying happiness which it cannot have, and this increases the torment (in various degrees, the lowest of which would be the knowledge of that happiness in others; here, however, it is in higher degree, a kind of beholding it afar off); and there is the misery of being constrained to say—I might have been there too! For, finally, this consciousness gives birth to the direst torment—It is my own fault!

Against that easily-contented and impoverished, not to say wilfully-restricted exposition which allows Neander to say that it is foreign to the scope of this parable to give us any clue to the nature of the future life, we have only to quote the honest Val. Herberger—"We have in this parable a veritable window opened into hell, through which we can see what passes there." The Saviour, indeed, does more than merely paint pictures upon the vail; he removes it entirely, so far as we with our present eyes are capable of beholding. With all the indefiniteness, figurative character, and enigmas of the delineation, we have declarations and solutions enough in its few words. They teach us of a passing over of the dying, just as they are, with their consciousness, sensibility, and memory; an existence independent of the body, yet with thought and sensibility analogous to that pertaining to our incorporation in the body; they reveal to us a place of consolation and a place of torment (not merely hell in their own breasts, and the torment of remorse, but a flame)—both conditions and both abodes are rigidly defined and sundered, and yet not utterly without communion; finally, that the lot of the miserable is most decisively apportioned, yet not at once and as yet unalterable. In the broad, common region colloquies are possible to both; this is here only intimated to us in Scripture, but, notwithstanding the parabolical nature of the whole, we cannot but think that the conversation held must correspond to something possible, actual and real. We must attribute it to the eschatological dimness of the evangelical fathers of our church, who had too much to do with the πρώτους or first things, to see far into the distance of truth, that Luther and others following him, could so rationalistically say—"This whole conversation passed in the conscience, even Abraham's rejoinder was only the voice of an accusing conscience—Oh that I had believed!"* Strange indeed would it be, if this instruction could come to the ignorant man in such a fashion from his own self, as if his condition and what is wrought upon him were identical! Thus the Lord assuredly goes on to speak of an actual Lazarus, whom the rich man now sees and recognizes because he had seen him on earth (by no means merely thought that he would certainly be in Abraham's bosom); and with equal certainty the person and voice of Abraham is not merely an imagination of the tormented man. How this speaking could take place in that state, how far its figurativeness is to extend, we know as little and suspect as much as will appear hereafter in the elucidation of the finger and the tongue.

Verse 24. Instead of truly returning into himself, like the prodigal son, and thus finding his own heart so as to call upon his God,† he turns, with a persistence in his ancient tendency, to that which his eyes behold though only from afar. His punishment is his woe, and not his sin: he prays not for mercy, but for water. The "have mercy on me" was well in itself, but not addressed to the right father. That which had been in life the ground of his presumptuous confidence (see Luke iii. 8), is the starting point of his cry now: thrice does he cry and appeal with a vain—Father Abraham!

the predominant tone of the word is only parallel with ἀδυνῶμαι, ver. 24, and δύνωσαι, ver 25.

* Though the text has not the article with βάσανοι as with κόλπος Ἀβραάμ. Luther's "in der qual," in the torment, we may interpret as above, but must be on our guard against pressing it to the extreme of Theremin's—"the torment, that is, the only torment which deserves the name, absolute and eternal torment."

* To which Von Gerlach gives his adhesion.

† For that he absolutely could no more do this, because God was to him already in his final torment a consuming fire, is fundamentally untrue; applying the orthodox standard improperly. He cannot do so yet—that is certainly true; nevertheless, he is supposed to be capable of calling upon God, and probably did in the end.

against which, if he had hearkened to the prophets, Isa. lxiii. 16 would have been an effectual protest. Thus he furnishes the one solitary scriptural example of the invocation of a saint, and that a very discouraging one (Job v. 1). Although he sees only from afar, ἀπὸ μακρόθεν ὁρᾷ, he discerns and knows Abraham in the midst of his company, and among them even Lazarus himself. The truth which is thus clothed in a parabolical vesture gives us sufficing assurance that in the next world there will be a knowledge, that is a recognition, of other's persons. Whether he had asked and heard and thus known how the beggar was named upon earth, is a point not decided by this: the naming is more probably the parabolical method of conveying the recognition of his person. Why then should father Abraham send this Lazarus and no other? Bengel thinks—"adhuc vilipendit Lazarum herus" (the master still disesteems Lazarus), deeming him good enough to be sent on such a mission; and Lange even discerns in this "the most refined and subtile master-trait of the whole parable, that the rich man should treat Lazarus in the spirit of an unconscious continuation of his old earthly assumption and prerogative." He thinks that "he regards him still as a born servant of the rich—and grudges him his rest even in Abraham's bosom!" For our part we regard all this as not merely too finely drawn and far-fetched, but as utterly false. Has not the rich man been by this time constrained to acknowledge that high honor and dignity in which he now beholds Lazarus? Can we call it scornful treatment to desire from his finger one drop of mercy? We take the answer to be two-fold: it is because he knows this man and can point him out; and then also, it may be, because he had lain before his door, and had received an occasional crumb from his table. This latter supposition would, indeed, indicate the obstinate pertinacity of human nature in clinging to the slightest straw of merit: be that as it may, it shows supplementarily that Lazarus had not been altogether unobserved by the rich man. Suffice it that the rich man is now in his turn a beggar at the gate of him who once begged: and his soul does not loathe to lick the finger which had once been ἡλκωμένος or licked by dogs. As Lazarus formerly in the deep feeling of his abasement only desired the crumbs, so does the rich man now not cry for deliverance, but only for the slightest mitigation of his agony with the tip of his finger; for the conviction of guilt in his conscience (by which he anticipates the judicial sentence of ver. 25), forbids him to ask more.* And is there a tongue and a finger in Hades, as there were eyes before? This is not, indeed, used in the sense of perfect corporeity, for that has been put off; it is not on that account, however, a mere figure, but indicates a certain corresponding corporeity of the soul, with which it is already and essentially invested as in its ethereal garment, and in the analogous after-feeling of which the disembodied (though not altogether unembodied) soul can alone go forth, and be susceptible of its new existence. "The various energies and faculties, which find their outward expression in the hands and feet, and so on, are essentially in the inner corporeity; and the external bodily organs are but the patterns and expressions of that." So says the speculative seeress in Von Meyer; and the excellent father Zeller, otherwise no friend of such speculatists, seems to agree in the sentiment: "In our coporeal life it is not the eye of the body, properly speaking, which sees; but the soul sees through the eye. It is not the bodily tongue which speaks, and so forth. Thus there exists a spiritual capacity of seeing, hearing, speaking, which may find its operation and act without the organs of the earthly-corporeal body." We would add to this that it must assuredly have its operation thus when the soul lives in a disembodied state; and further that it can only be conscious of itself in the analogy of corporeity, since the laid-aside body again to be put on constitutes the formal life of the soul, which can only by this consciousness maintain in continuance during the state of interval its individual personality.* As in the heat of fever the mouth and palate are scorched and dried up, so the tormented one feels the raging of the fire on the tongue; but this is distinctively mentioned as the ἄκρον, "tip," of the languishing, thirsting mouth for the touch of the tip of the finger, not without a concomitant, profound allusion to the awful retributive change which has passed upon that organ, once so dainty and luxurious. It may be regarded as the tongue of that soul, which had once derived so much enjoyment from it, and now suffers so much misery" (Kleuker). After the withdrawal of that mortal draught which had been used, as a wretched succedaneum, to satisfy the desires of the soul, there remains the internal fire of the full, unsatisfied and raging thirst of the spirit: and, besides this, and corresponding to it, there is an external flame—let the emphasis of the singular in this expression be carefully noted. It is not that he is "alone with his naked, empty, and miserable I; and suffers torment in the flames of lusts and passions which he has carried with him;" as he was never left alone upon earth, but always accompanied by the condemning and persuading influence of God, so the same influence now returns upon him in righteousness. In that state all disparities are reconciled, in strong contrast with the inequalities of this present condition of things: the outer and inner world perfectly correspond to one another. Nor must it ever be forgotten that in the personal life of the creature the inner world is never to be regarded as if independent of God and his universe as the other factor.* The pious Lazarus would have remained undamned in patient endurance even in these βασάνοις; but even at Abraham's table the rich man would have been ill at ease, so that its provisions would have only added to his raging fire. What he suffers is, indeed, a worse outbreak of an inward poison than all bodily sores upon earth; and because in spite of all his sense of guilt he cannot truly confess and pray, his frightful confession at first is merely—I am tormented in this flame! In which is painted the same horror of his inexorable present condition which is afterwards uttered again—In this place of torment.

* It is impertinent to say that he still feared any farther touching on the part of the one formerly unclean. For now everything is fundamentally changed: Lazarus is now the rich and pure, and the man in torment knows this full well.

* The condition of those in the realm of the dead "is, indeed, independent of the body; but all the organs of the body, eyes, ears, tongue, have left behind their traces and operation in the soul"—the dead "carry with them the fashioning of their former condition" (Oetinger). Dreams furnish us a mysterious analogy. [The scenic representations of the parable furnish too slight ground for the above theory of semi or quasi corporeity in the case of disembodied spirits.—Am. Ed.]

Verse 25. Brouwer well says: "Abest a responsu divitis omni crudelitas aut injuria; blande miserum hominem alloquitur patriarcha" (there is an entire absence of cruelty or injury in the response to the rich man: the patriarch blandly addresses the wretched man). Not like the ant in the fable, who tells the cricket that he may now dance after having sung so long; not like the blessed mocking the damned in the Koran; nor even with that "sorrow of the blessed over the lost" which Klopstock sings of; but Abraham speaks to his wretched, tormented, and imprisoned son in calm and measured words, dignified and well-supported, full of tenderness and fatherly condescension. He does not harshly and concisely reject his petition—This should not and cannot be! but graciously speaks of the ground of rigid justice, of the design of sharp pain; and himself begins to point out and facilitate the topics of his remembrance, making this, as it were, his own counter-request. The τέκνον, μνήσθητι, "Son, remember," which comes first is, indeed, much more gracious than that of Josh. vii. 19—"My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him: and tell me now what thou hast done!" For inasmuch as Abraham still continues the father of this unworthy son (John viii. 39), not simply according to the flesh, for that relationship holds good no longer now,† but in that fulness of love and graciousness which his faith had wrought in him, and which had gone with him into another world—this τέκνον, "Son," is a manifest parallel with the long-suffering loving-kindness of the true Father in ch. xv. 31. What thou askest should not be granted, in essential justice, ver. 25, nor can it be, from external circumstances, ver. 26. But this therefore is not rigorously asserted: in its stead there is besides all this (ἐπὶ πᾶσι τούτοις), with an almost apologetical tone of grace—And even if we, Lazarus and I, were ever so willing to help you, we cannot go over to you! Remember, that is, ponder, think within thyself, go on to think as thou hast begun: for he can do this, since nothing is wanting either to the remembrance of the past, or to the seeing and feeling of the present. This is the more definite end of torment as intimated in the first word—In Hades there is time for this! This μνήσθητι, recordare, "remember," of course refers pre-eminently to the past of his vain carnal life, and the guilt contracted there. As we find preparatorily in this world that in old age the memory is very remarkably quickened with respect to the remembrances of youth; so we may suppose that when the roaring cataract of earthly things is still, and the ever new and ever-shifting scenes of this sensible world disappear for ever, that the internal voice of the soul will be distinctly heard; the voice of that soul which forgets nothing, but preserves all things in the treasury of its essential memory; and that then all will find the truth of the opium-eater's representation, that the whole of the past life may be lived over again, and that all the most petty circumstantialities and the most insignificant occurrences may rise in the most lucid distinctness before the eye of the soul.* But on this account we may regard the μνήσθητι as demanding not merely such a glance backward at the past; but reflection upon this is supposed to go further, and the remembrance becomes pondering and consideration, in the full sense of the word; and the νῦν δέ, "but now," presents forthwith the proper object of that thoughtful and anxious reflection.

"Thou in thy life-time (before this state of death), even down to the burying of thy body, receivedst thy good things, that is, all which thou countedst good, and desiredst, and didst adhere to as such—thou didst grow old in the enjoyment of thy days, and never for a moment wert afraid of hell and the grave" (Job xxi. 13). It is not said—from God; for the offender must think of that himself, and bring it to mind that his possession in this life was the substance and treasure of God (Psa. xvii. 14): hence it was enough to say—Thou receivedst, reflect from whom! This, alas! he had forgotten while in life, albeit he may have often

* Not as if the immense Not-I had been spun out of the petty I, but the I sprung out of the Not-I existing before it, and ever maintains its relation to it. Alford asks here very excellently: "Where lies the limit between inner and outer to the disembodied?" This remark holds good especially in the case of these, while it has its meaning now and universally.

† This concedes no such recognition of sonship after the flesh, as the supplication appealed to; so that no carnal Jewish hearer might say, as the Talmud afterwards—At least the preputium is not restored, he is called son still! Against this supposition the continuation of Abraham's words gives ample testimony—Son or not, this avails not here, where thou receivest thy due!

* This book, "Confessions of an Opium-eater," has appeared in a German translation (by Amalie Winter, Weimar, 1840). The author, resting upon his own experience, expresses his conviction that to the human spirit forgetting is a thing impossible, and that the dreaded book of accounts is a man's own soul.

uttered the hypocritical ascription of all to the "blessing of the good God." And at the same time ἀπέλαβες τὰ ἀγαθά σου, "receivedst [in full] thy good things," here is quite equivalent to ἀπέχεις τὸν μισθόν σου, "hast [in full] thy reward," in Matt. vi. 16. "Likewise Lazarus evil things"—thus concisely by design: for it was not properly his evil, and it was in an altogether different sense that he received it—he patiently accepted and endured it all. These opposites (τὰ ἀγαθά, τὰ κακά) in all their complex contrast embrace the abundant matter of consideration which remembrance and reflection could awaken: while to us who hear the parable, these extreme opposites in the allotment of wealth and poverty indicate the diversified distribution of earthly good in all its intermediate degrees within the widest extremes. The expression of this first response sets out with an enigma, which it is for our reflection to solve. It is well with the wicked, and evil with the good—this is a pure contradiction, in which our thought finds it impossible to repose. The solution is at once facilitated by what is immediately added—in their life-time, that is, in this world, and not for ever. (Let it be noted, by the way, that this parable protests against the delusion that great distress must necessarily presuppose great guilt; as if a Job is to be compassionated or condemned on account of his boils.) But we ask further: Wherefore is it evil with the pious man even for a moment before eternity? and then we learn, secondly, that it is only of the seeming appearance of things that the word speaks, and we reflect that external evil is as the appointment of God essential good; while good is not in itself evil, except when we take it to ourselves as our good, the evil being the result of our method of receiving it. Abraham himself was rich in his life-time, the blessed of the Lord; but on receiving God's gifts, he knew better what was true blessedness than Laban did. Hence he can now say to this his son—Curse not now thy former wealth and prosperity: that was in itself good, equally with the evil things of Lazarus which have opened his way to consolation in my bosom. The speculatist before referred to, says: "Every evil, regarded from the right point of view, ceases to be evil. The fool and the wise man, both are a contribution to the great whole. God is just, he is love, order reigns in all his works. Disorder is in us, and has its origin in our lack of true knowledge." On which Meyer remarks: "And since this great disorder so arose at first, God must restore all things to their first eternal order again, by seeming disorder, which, however, is the purest consistency." Thus God appoints nothing but good, and hence the ὁμοίως, "likewise," in this most glaring contrast assumes its true importance, the deep meaning of which we must not be hindered from perceiving by the popular German translation dagegen, on the other hand. Thus, humanly speaking, it is better to suffer for a while in order to eternal consolation. If once more it is asked—and this introduces the last solution of the mystery—Wherefore did not the Lord afflict the rich man with sores in his palace, or cause his riches to melt away, in order that he might earlier have learned to reflect? The answer is plain: he might not have reflected even then, for God knoweth the heart, ver. 15. He distributes his good in the form of good things or evil things, with the highest wisdom and righteousness, according to the need and corresponding disposition of every man, and with the most profound adjustment to every case. The rich man's character of soul required from God that the harder problem of life should be set before him—to receive riches and fortune without damage to his soul. If he has solved it wrongly, did not God know that he would have still worse endured the probation and test of Lazarus; and is it not possible that by the bitter contrast of ensuing torment alone he was yet to be won?

"But now he is comforted and thou art tormented, as thou seest and feelest; thus it is, for thus it is meet at the hands of that God from whom each of you receives the righteous recompense of his justice" (2 Thess. i. 5–7). Even the Old Testament saints in Sheol (of whom only we can think in connection with Lazarus in Abraham's bosom) do not by any means possess merely a "painless, pleasureless, and dreary rest in the realms of the dead" (as De Valenti says in direct opposition to the Old Testament), but are graciously comforted and quickened and solaced. Abraham rejoiced beforehand in the day of Christ (John viii. 56). But in the tormented begins even there already the eternal justice of retribution and compensation: how much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her! (Rev. xviii. 7). Why is this? Remember, my son, saith Abraham, think upon it, and thou wilt discern that thy present torment is just, and therefore the best thing that God can and will send thee: thus may thy pondering find the right way out of this present into another future. For the νῦν δέ, "but now," does not constitute an irrevocable and final end, if there is yet left him a μνήσθητι, "remember." If a father graciously says to his son under chastisement, "Reflect, my son!" there glimmers through all the punishment the distant design of love, and in the very words there is an exhortation to a right return into self, and to an earnest μετανοεῖν or repentance. The tormented and so far disinherited man is here dismissed with a warning similarly indefinite with that which the son who was in the midst of his father's possessions heard in the former parable: in both cases a long-suffering and enduring love cries—Son! Though repelled and outcast he is not yet entirely abandoned to despair. But will he who heard not in time past, hear now; will he come to reflection who, during a whole life-time, when it was easier to him, reflected not? The relation between There and Here is in this case similar to that between repenting in the propitious days of health and amid the pains of sickness: the exceptions of a late repentance are possible, but yet improbable and rare. On the one hand it might be asked:

Would not this man—when he is brought by his own torment, and by the distant sight of another's consolation, to the πείθεσθαι or "being persuaded" of ver. 31; when it is brought visibly, palpably, and experimentally home to his conviction, that there is a living God, as gracious as he is just, as just as he is gracious—become a penitent sinner, in his repentance giving joy to the angels in heaven? On the other hand, this true narrative shows us at the outset, that a fool like this man in his torment, though he may hear Abraham at least, and Moses and the prophets too, whom he may and should remember, yet hardly bears to receive instruction, contradicts instead of humbly learning, is only at first provoked to pride by "this place of torment," and finds it hard to reflect or moralise in the fire. Suffice that the matter remains undecided, and it is the design of Divine wisdom in this record to leave it so: let us not go beyond that word, and enforce upon it the certainty either of his eternal damnation, or of his final restoration.*

Verse 26. Between us and you—a sudden multiplication of persons on both sides: "Look around thee once more, after having looked afar off; thou hast also a fellowship of thine own, even as we are in fellowship here. And if I myself would come to thee or to you, we cannot!" A χάσμα μέγα, "great gulf," between the blessed and the miserable, even in the interim condition of Hades is fixed, which cannot be overleaped, either by presumption on the one hand or sympathy on the other; that is, obviously a yawning, profound, bridgeless interval of separation. To see and to speak to one another over this profound, remains possible; but while there is this wide latitude among the disembodied hosts, all διαβαίνειν and διαπερᾶν or passage is forbidden—ὅπως μὴ δύνωνται, "so that they cannot." Thus the interval between Gehenna and Paradise is not, as in the later Jewish fable, merely a hand-breadth (Eisenmenger, ii. 315); but there is a χάσμα, chasm, which is generally the signature of the τόπος or locality for the disembodied souls, in its vast extent and limitless desolation; just as the heathen speak, using the same expression, of their Hades (see, in Grotius, Hesiod, Theogon. v. 740) naming the χάσμα μέγα. Not as if the power of God was unable to fill up even this χάσμα; but it is not in the power of the θέλοντες, or those wishing, to pass from the one side to the other; the mere willing of "we" or of "you" cannot avail against the fixed necessity of the νὺν δέ, "but now," which makes the gulf.† One, indeed, as we now know, having risen from the dead, passed over this gulf when he descended into hell, and preached to the dead: his mercy opened a new way. And while the gulf between the believing and the unbelieving upon earth is just as great, the repentance of the heretofore unbeliever makes a bridge over it; and to this Abraham at the same time directs his remembrance—There was once no impassable χάσμα between Lazarus and thee. Hadst thou then gone over to him, in lifting up him out of his misery to thyself!*

That he himself is now tormented he has well known by sad experience from the beginning: nor is he ignorant of the interposed gulf of which he is reminded, since he could not emerge from the flame; and he therefore asked that one should come to him for the mitigation of his woe. His conscience did not permit him even to think of asking for an entire deliverance from it: with all his sense of guilt, he could not pray in penitence; and in this we may discern the inward ground of the real permanence of that external gulf. He now resigns himself (half-proudly) to the declaration—"Thou art tormented," and this is all at present! But a glance upon his fellowship around awakens a new thought within him; one which is good in itself, but which, however, he turns to evil by appending it to something which is not good.

Verses 27, 28. The undertone of this second, and apparently unselfish request, is in reality a murmuring objection tending to self-justification, which emboldened by Abraham's words, he now ventures indirectly to urge, preparatorily to the bold nay which is confidently thrown out in ver. 30. "Had I but rightly known; had I had sufficient testimony that such a place of torment as this, in all its frightful actuality, existed for all who repent not!" "If it is hopeless for me, yet would I pray thee, father, for my brethren, also thy sons—this will be a more acceptable request to thy graciousness." He has the clearest consciousness of all that he has left behind in the upper world; he has a perfect remembrance of his growing up, and his brothers in his father's house (he names Abraham father only, without this personal appropriation); but he neither knows nor names that third and only true "Father" (chap. xv. 18–20). Müralt, with an otherwise admirably profound penetration into the spirit of the entire parable, has very incorrectly understood this individual point; for he supposes that the rich man is here speaking of God, as their common Father, and of his people or family upon the earth: this is so unnatural and alien to the narrative as to need no refutation. The father whom he mentions is his natural father,

* [Rather the whole tenor of the parable, and especially the impassable gulf, ver. 26, renders it clear that the rich man's present torments are but the prelude to eternal pains.—Am. Ed.]

† Neither wandeln in a visit, nor hinüberfahren in perpetuity—as the German text would intimate: but the original merely strengthens the διαβαίνειν by introducing the πέραν into the second verb. Moreover (as König critically remarks) the notions of above and below are not made prominent, κατά is not substituted for διά; for both places are in the lower world.

* The ἐστήρικται holds good for the νῦν, now commencing, and not soon to end, but εἰς ἀεί is not added. This expression alone, consequently, does not, (as Alford says), preclude the supposition that the supplication which followed was the commencement of a better mind; though there are other reasons which oppose it.

in the same sense as the brethren: and it is all but plainly stated that he no longer lived, when he goes on to say—I have five brethren; for this means—I have yet (in life, as the soul cannot cease to think according to its habituated manner)—consequently, a father no longer living. Alas, for this father! Where is he now, on this side or on that? Possibly he was happy, and his degenerate son must now remember him with new anguish; he has forgotten to seek for him in Sheol till this moment. Why does he not forthwith ask—Send me! that I may most fervently and earnestly warn them, as a brother his brethren? In part, because he dare not think of this on account of the conclusion, σὺ δὲ ὀδυνᾶσαι, "and thou art tormented"; in part, because he has no desire for the yet greater torment of recognition, nor for that short respite, after which the return into his woful confinement would be all the more horrible. But it was with Lazarus that he began his former request, and he adheres to Lazarus still: a preacher to his distinguished brethren who would not have been in old time honorable enough; but coming from the dead would invest him with ample dignity, and insure him profound respect. Our feeling revolts against the latent vilipendere (disesteem) which has been discerned here, as if he should say—"He who is least among you may surely forsake his high consolation for a while in order to prevent others from falling into torment." We suppose that as Abraham had said nothing about a gulf between the under and upper worlds, the petitioner thought nothing would stand in the way of his being sent thither. "And although that might not depend upon the will of those who wished it, and not all who would go can, yet thou, the Prince of the house, and the receiver of the guests at thy table, hast surely the prerogative to send him. That he may testify to them; that is, not simply that he may give them intelligence of that which they have heard of already, even as I did; but that he may enforce it, and urgently warn them—Believe my testimony, there is awful justice in Hades, the 'legends about hell' have their tremendous truth!" O ye soft and sentimental preachers, discharge as sent of God the mission upon which Lazarus was not sent; keep not silence concerning hell and destruction, but testify with becoming earnestness to the earnest realities of that other world!

As it regards the five brethren, it is well-known that many are disposed to find an allusion here to the five sons of Annas whom Josephus mentions (Antiq. xx. 9, 1); in which case the man in hell might be Caiaphas, the son-in-law of Annas, and therefore the brother of the five. Thus they regard the historical character of the parable as ascertained, and account for the mention of the name of Lazarus—a most perverse idea! How utterly unlike the constant dignity of our Lord's teaching, would be all such offensive personality as this! and even apart from that, how marvellous would it be that the Lord should record the doom of Caiaphas in hell during his life-time, and include his whole story in the vague introductory phrase (ἄνθρωπος δέ τις ἦν πλούσιος)! Finally, the death of Caiaphas did not take place before the death, descent into Hades, and resurrection of the Redeemer, and ver. 31 therefore refutes the idea: besides which, it was impossible that our Lord should describe the guilt of Caiaphas as consisting in this, that he had been a sensual man, and that—he had not heard Moses and the Prophets. Consequently the number here is only symbolically significant as in chap. xv. 4, 8, 11. The five with the one are together six, over against whom as the seventh Lazarus stands in many respects. This Lazarus, consequently, is not a historical person: at most his name is chosen with some such additional allusion as ver. 31 may disclose. The brethren of the rich man are at the same time his true brethren in affinity of disposition and manner of life; so that the preacher may point his application and say—He has yet many brethren more; Oh hear, hear, all ye whose consciences tell you that you are they!

As it regards the good will of the dead man, that his brothers might not through a sinful impenitent death come into the place where he now is, appearances are deceitful now as they were upon earth. At furthest, we could only detect in it some natural feeling, a certain carnal family-love to the brothers of his own dear self; such, moreover, as would have no value before God, and avail not for himself. They who are disposed to go further, would say with Müralt: "Love belongs to his natural character; and this circumstance makes it plain to us, that the whole is a representation of a meritorious, and not thoroughly wicked, kind of man." But we think that this goes much too far: it is too much to attribute even that softness of good-nature, which would not have others suffer, to a man who could let Lazarus lie suffering before his eyes; and assuredly he knows nothing now of God and God's mercy, of genuine Divine love. Or might this egoist, in the process of his discipline of torment, have learned some little sympathy with others (although, in the first beginning of it, he might not even have looked round to see if others were there with himself)? Thus Olshausen thinks that "in this prayer there is clearly expressed a loving remembrance of his brethren, as well as the germ of faith in the compassionate love of God," and not merely as now arising, but as "still remaining in his soul." We doubt whether this is the obvious meaning of the parabolical exhibition in our Lord's intention; and agree with the Berlenb. Bibel (which indeed restores him in the end), that his continued petitioning, instead of reflecting upon the "but thou!" which had sounded in his ears, indicate only "the perfect unrest and confusion of the condemned man, wherein he is ever seeking something which he never finds, revolving like a wheel in the torment of his self-will, torturing and consuming himself." If it was with a view to apologise for himself that he offered the second request, its meaning cannot be pressed beyond a desire to lighten his own misery; for if selfishness had brought him into this torment, we can hardly suppose that the beginning of this fire would melt it away. The brethren (whom his influence or example had helped to lead astray) will only increase his torments by their reproaches; or, by their fellowship, aggravate the frightful contrast with their former reckless fellowship in the merriment of life: for here that saying does not hold good—"Solamen miseris socios habuisse malorum" (It is a consolation to the wretched to have companions in their ills—"Misery loves company"). This his selfish and prudent prevision is well aware of; and in thus interpreting his thought, we do him only justice, giving him neither too much nor too little.

Verse 29. Abraham in his discreet dignity, does not repeat his gracious τέκνον, "son"; as the bold and urgent petitioner had repeated his πάτερ, "father." He points the too forward or rather too backward applicant to the already sufficient revelations and means of grace: that is, of course, to those pre-revelations and preparations for the gospel which were mentioned in ver. 16; for this history must be placed in a time previous to its full establishment. Thus does the parable significantly revolve round again into the former condemnation of the impenitent and unbelieving Pharisees: but as their βίαζεσθαι, "pressing" against the kingdom remains unmentioned, it is perfectly free from any tone which might hinder its influence upon its first hearers, the enemies of the Lord Jesus; and it fastens conviction all the more firmly and deeply in their consciences, inasmuch as the cause and the guilt of their last unbelief in his gospel is traced up to an unbelief of earlier origin, and in an earlier object. Abraham speaks as Jesus speaks elsewhere, John v. 39, 45–47, comp. Isa. xxxiv. 16. He places by his instant ἔχουσι, "they have," persons whom the petitioner very well knows, in opposition to the person whom he asks for: "They have (in a much stronger sense than that in which thou sayest—I have five brethren)—they have had hitherto, and still have, without the additional testimony of one returning from the dead, valid witnesses enough. Not only have they the law and the prophets in the Scriptures so denominated, but with them they have Moses and all the Prophets themselves (who are now here with me), as much as if they were personally living in their midst. For, in their spiritual heritage and use, a witness to the truth continues ever to live, although he be dead: thus Moses no less than all the Prophets is a forerunner in the faith (Heb. xi. 24–27), a preacher of life after death (Luke xx. 37). Let them hear these; for faith cometh of the voluntary hearing and acceptance of testimony, and is not the result of seeing manifestations, visions, signs, and wonders. But no man is constrained to believe; for, enforced repentance is no repentance, faith such as that of the trembling devils is not the faith which renews the fallen nature of man." Should not a people seek unto their God? Should they ask for the living of the dead? (Moses and the Prophets are the living unto God.) Wherefore, to the law and to the testimony! According to this word, in which there is no wizard deception and no delusion of spirits (as in questioning the dead there may be), Isa. viii. 19, 20.* This testimony is sufficient, the wisdom of God is equally displayed in refusing and concealing as in the more abounding revelations. In regard to his Israel, the children of Abraham, the extant revelations of that time was sufficient for the degree of blessedness to be obtained at that time (Abraham's bosom); certainly sufficient for the avoidance of torment. Thus the dogma of the practical sufficiency of the word of God is taught by him who himself before Moses and the Prophets received the simple word of the Almighty in order to his walking before him in perfectness. As it respects the poor heathen, it remains certain that they have no such word, no preachers and witnesses: and for them the request has its force: send unto them—not messengers from Hades, but ambassadors of the kingdom of heaven (Rom. x. 14, 15). Yea, even with regard to the blinded Jews, we can scarcely say now what held good then—that they have Moses and the Prophets; so far as the being able to hear them goes. Where we can suppose them now to hear Moses and the Prophets, they would be sufficient in this day as of old to lead them to repentance and faith, yea, to lead them now to Christ.†

Verse 30. Excited rather than humbled by the protest and reproof which he received (ἀκουσάτωσαν, "let them hear," that is, at the same time—Thou also mightest and shouldst have heard!) he becomes more bold and confident, and his parching tongue throws the οὐχί, "nay," of his contradiction over the gulf, into father Abraham's face. Very likely he had many times in his life upon earth proudly and contemptuously arrogated to himself "Moses and the Prophets whom we Pharisees hear!" though without ever actually hearing them. Hence he has become so infatuated that he will not rightly receive instruction even now. As the works of the blessed dead follow them, so follow this man his ignorance of the way of salvation, his neglect and practical contempt of the extant word, his self-will and self-vindication, his pertinacious demand of signs and wonders from the mighty hand of God. In his folly he thinks, like many others, that God might regard it as necessary to preach with other lips, and to use other extraordinary and fearful means independent of his own wise

† Alford's well-meant observation seems to us unfounded: "This verse furnishes a weighty testimony from the Lord himself of the sufficieney then of the Old-Testament Scriptures for the salvation of the Jews. It is not so now." The difference does not lie in a less sufficiency of the Revelation, but in its more clouded and darkened possession. Even now every genuine Israelite becomes a Christian, when Christ presents himself—or without that attains to salvation in Israel's faith. Christ sees him under his fig-tree, before Philip calls him ordinance, as if man were not free in order to a free faith; and without understanding that a mightier power than that which the grace of God applies, might be much more likely to quench the smoking flax altogether. "If one went unto them from the dead—even though it were not Lazarus: this is the last and lowered petition which scarcely seems to ask at all, but rather goes on with the self-indicating general assertion—"then would they (properly—will they) repent! without it assuredly not any more than myself, who had not that extraordinary call." Here mark how he takes it for granted, though on grounds only within himself, that for him it is altogether too late; and how he utters his own condemnation with his own lips—even when in the very act of justifying himself and charging God with neglect—making mention of that little word which but seldom in earlier times, and when it would have availed, had passed his lips. He has not been altogether ignorant; thus much at least he has heard, though not with obedience, that all depended upon repentance; and he is constrained to utter this now from the depths of his heart. If thou didst know that, why didst thou not repent? No one comes into torment without having more than once or twice received, both from without and within, the exhortation to repentance (Job xxxiii. 14–18). Repentance—that is quite correctly the sum of the law and the prophets, but only the first part or the half of it; hence Abraham, not as the "representative of the law" (according to Olshausen), but as the father of believers, and representative of the Promise, which was before the law, supplements and completes it by pointing to faith.

Verse 31. He does not indeed say, in the transcendently meek answer which he gives the bold man, the great word πιστεύσουσι, they will believe, itself, but πεισθήσονται, "they will be persuaded," which, however, is essentially the same. This latter does not designate, as it might seem, any persuasion to be effected by the appearance of the dead (which would, of itself, do no good), but it means an actual internal principle and living commencement of all true faith in the whole united testimony of Moses and the Prophets—the yielding to and accepting their testimony as a truth which is to be obeyed. The five brethren glory in being believers, but their so-called πιστεύειν or believing is by no means a πεισθῆναι or persuasion, it has never sprung from or deepened into a πείθεσθαι or being persuaded; just as their already condemned brother had been an "orthodox" Jew, and yet had never believed. Conscience cries loudly in us all, as even in all the heathen—Repent! But when the word of revelation solicits and corroborates this cry of the conscience, it adds the great and preëminent exhortation of its preaching—Believe in him who, nevertheless, as thy God, is merciful, and graciously speaks with thee, O sinner! The willingness to repent becomes then the ear for the right and perfect hearing of this word. Thus, father Abraham himself, whose teaching the rich man possessed through the history of Moses, had borne witness against his folly upon earth by that "faith which was reckoned unto him for righteousness;" and all these things, never altogether unknown to him, would be wakened into vivid remembrance by the μνήσθητι, "remember," which the tormenting flame suggested. This conversation with Abraham, however, is not to be regarded as bearing only this signification: it is also a parabolical vehicle for the representation of an influence of the divine word which continues even in that world, of the preaching of the blessed to the miserable over the gulf, about the procedure of which we have no adequate conception. Hence we must simply regard the colloquy as being, what it essentially is, the communication and explanation of solemn truth.

The most weighty final declaration, beyond which the conversation could go no further, is to the effect—that even repentance in itself is not sufficient. As at first repentance itself only proceeds from a faith in the severity and truth of the law, so again does it lead to a faith in the promise of grace to which the Prophets especially bear witness, and becomes in the time of fulfilment a repentance for the kingdom of heaven's sake (Mark i. 15), according to the word of John and of Christ. But both hang inseparably together; there is the strictest connection between the preparatory word and that which brings its consummation, between the previous and the subsequent faith, between the ancient testimony and the new superabounding wonders. If they hear not the first, neither will they be convinced of the last, and be brought to true faith. "The true susceptibility for the acceptance of the witnesses of the resurrection must be mediated and produced by a true fidelity in the school of Moses and the Prophets" (Lange). The warning prediction of a refusal to believe is true in far the greater number of cases: properly speaking, it is always true, for the apparent exceptions, as in the case of those who were murderers at the Crucifixion and believers at the Pentecost, are to be explained by the assumption that in them there was, nevertheless, a preparatory hearing which was not found in the case of others. To those who have not believed the ancient wonders and the ancient words, the new, greatest, and most impressive miracles and words are vain; they who have neglected the right Beginning in God's alphabet will never come to understand the End, unless they are taught by that end to recommence with its first letter. "If thy five brethren are stronger spirits than Moses and the Prophets, they will most assuredly not believe one of the dead; a phantom from the realm of shadows would assuredly bear but shadowy authority for people, whose souls have more tongue than reflecting reason" (Kleuker). We would rather say—more tongue than ear! Tyre and Sidon might believe if they received signs and wonders; for they have not yet disordered and beclouded their spiritual apprehension by unbelief in a preparatory word: they have not, through persistent opposition to the truth, through ever learning but never coming to the knowledge of it, rendered themselves unapt to faith, like Jannes and Jambres in Egypt, where Moses himself was in person (2 Tim. iii. 7, 8). The word itself comes out of the other world speaking of the state beyond; and God's living ones in the scriptures live it and speak it, and speak with far more emphasis and force than if a spirit visited us from Hades. This parable which we here have, is a most impressive revelation of a spirit: Lazarus is continuously sent in it to us, serving with his sores to point the world through successive ages to the way of eternal consolation; and has been the means of founding many a Lazaretto, monuments of honor to his own name.

For the rest, Luther's marginal gloss is quite unsound: "Here we are forbidden to believe hobgoblins and appearances of the dead"—for the text does no more than prophecy οὐδὲ πεισθήσονται, "neither will they be persuaded," assuming this πεισθῆναι, or persuasion, to be something good in itself, but by no means declaring the appearance of a departed spirit to be impossible, or an occurrence that never took place. There is, as we have said, no gulf between the earth and Hades, only the concealment of a veil.* But inasmuch as we all have assurance enough in the Word concerning the condition of the dead (though not specific charts of their domains, or answers which may gratify curiosity as to how they may employ their tongues and fingers there), nothing more copious or precise would avail to supply the deficiency of man's repentance. It may, indeed, appear to be otherwise in the case of some of our own times, for whom magnetism and spiritual noises may appear to have paved the way to faith; but that could have been only a corroboration of the word in which they were not altogether disbelievers, and Abraham's precise and solemn utterance remains unaffected in its simple truth. Did Saul repent, when Samuel, coming from the dead preached to him the same truth which he had preached to him when living? Have all, or indeed many, of those believed, who have verily persuaded themselves that they have seen such apparitions? What avails, then, "second sight" to those dissolute men of shattered nerves, to whom ordinarily such things occur?

Finally, let it be observed that Abraham in the ἐάν τις ἐκ νεκρῶν, "if one from the dead," actually admits the ἐάν τις or possibility of the request;† but even goes beyond inasmuch as ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀναστῇ, "rose from the dead," is something very different from, and greater than, an apparitional manifestation ἀπὸ νεκρῶν or from the grave. God will even do that, the required sign of Jonah will be given—and to those who have been hitherto unbelieving, it will be given in vain. In this last τίς, "one," there lies an intimation which to many of his hearers was even then intelligible, carrying back this entire connected discourse to its beginning again, and revealing that it was the οὗτος, "this," of chap. xv. 2, by them rejected and scorned, who should rise from the dead. Even before this an actual Lazarus rose out of his four days' grave before their very eyes; the name might have been selected, doubtless, with reference to that event,* but the main and most important reference is to Christ himself. Not as if Lazarus here, poor and afflicted, was intended to be a type of Christ, who had not where to lay his head (according to Vitringa, to whose fancy the sores of Lazarus are the blasphemies and sins of men which he bore; the death of the rich man, the downfall of the Jewish polity; the request for the sending, the vain desire of a Messiah; the five brethren, the Babylonish Jews; the licking of the dogs, the conversion of the Gentiles); but we shall see presently at the close whom he exhibits as the contrast of the rich man, and may observe now thus much, that Abraham's τίς or one does omit the person of Lazarus, as he had already fulfilled the request. Suffice it that a resurrection from the dead did take place and was amply attested, but yet they believed not (see John xi. 53, xii. 9, 10; Matt. xxviii. 11–14); nor was Herod the Sadducee transformed by it into an orthodox Pharisee. Therefore the Lord did not appear, when he had risen, to all this people: that would have been still less helpful to their faith than the testimony of his resurrection preached to them.†

This Resurrection of Jesus is not a naked argument of immortality in the sense of the Rationalists: that truth needed not such a demonstration, and the rising again of this solitary virtuous Jewish Jesus, seen only by few, would have been but a slender proof; but the manifestation of this Only one before and after his death has its deep root, both as a power

* Of which even the poet can say, "Leicht aufzuritzen ist das Reich der Geister, Sie liegen wartend unter dünner Decke," etc. (Easily entered is the realm of Shades, and thin the veil which hides them from our view.)

† And not as Schiller's bold saying represents, "Sechstausend Jahre hat der Tod geschwiegen: Kam je ein Leichnam aus der Gruft gestiegen, Der Meldung that von der Vergelterin?" (Six thousand years hath death deep silence kept: Came e'er one back from out the deep abyss, To tell of doom?)

* This would, however, require a better foundation than Wieseler's, who (Chronolog. Synops. p. 322) derives it from the circumstance that just at that time the death of him of Bethany had excited these feelings. We confess, for our own part, that we cannot sympathise with such an illusion.

† The unbelief of some people is incurable. "It might have occurred to them, even after death, to endeavor to persuade themselves that there was no continuance of life, no Hades, no resurrection; as in dreams men hold long conversations, which have no meaning, and exhaust themselves in disputations to which a turn in the bed puts a happy end. We read in Swedenborg, that many of the separate spirits imagine that they are still in life; and refuse to believe that there are spirits and another world around them" (Blätter aus Prevorst, iii. 117).

and a doctrine in the word of prophecy, torn asunder from which and regarded alone, it loses its significance to the unbeliever in that word. (Comp. Von Meyer's Bibeldeutungen, p. 149.) This is once more plainly attested in our parable, as it is attested by the fulfilment in fact of its οὐδὲ πεισθήσονται, "neither will they be persuaded," down to our own day.

The superabounding grace of God even towards the dead, corresponding to the raising up of Jesus for the living; the highest and deepest love of the Son which led him to descend into Hades to the tormented, to make himself known even to them; the descent of Christ into hell; constitute a subject of engrossing interest, kept here entirely in the background, but which forces itself nevertheless upon our thoughts. The Living came there to the dead, as here in the upper world the Dead came to the living. But will they who sometime believed not, when the long-suffering of God waited (1 Pet. iii. 20), believe when the Living preaches to them in the realm of the dead? This is the great question. The preaching is recorded, but not their believing in it; thus in this parable, as throughout the entire Scripture, the voice of warning closes all and leaves its echo in our ears.

Have we now fully expounded and sufficiently explained this parable? As a history which goes into Hades, using a figurative vehicle for the representation of man's condition there, assuredly we have; but the parable is not yet fully exhausted, for the first act of it upon earth requires its interpretation. In Luke we find these three parables united, which seem to be histories and yet are not such. If the good Samaritan has a further and higher allusion, and the figures of the Pharisee and Publican in the temple signify more than the mere delineation of two then existing types and historical examples; most certainly in this parable we should not limit ourselves to the mere integument, and, following the common current of exposition, regard it as preaching only about the externally rich and poor in this world. It is altogether inadmissible to make the rich man (as Schleiermacher does) "a representative of the house of Herod;" we have discerned in him from the very beginning a Pharisee, whose assumed prerogative over the Publicans it was preëminently to hear Moses and the Prophets. But we fall very far short of its meaning if we restrict the parable to that allusion; and forget that it has a deeper application to us Christians, especially in its internal significance. Von Gerlach reminds us that these parables were pointed at the Pharisees, as it were through the persons of the disciples; but we are reminded again most emphatically that they were directed also through the Pharisees to all his disciples. For ch. xvi. 1 holds good of all our Lord's discourses. We have intimated our view from the outset, as Bengel aptly and concisely expresses it on ver. 19: "Dives, exemplar Pharisæorum; Lazarus exemplar pauperum spiritu" (the rich man is a sample of the Pharisees, Lazarus of the poor in spirit). But the Pharisees are of various kinds and aspects; and are themselves again to be regarded as a symbolical type, going beyond and yet resting upon, the specialties of their relation at that time to the word at that time spoken: just as we learn on another occasion, ch. xviii. 10. We have nowhere found so profound and clear an application of this parable as that given by the repeatedly quoted Müralt, whose work, L'instinct divin recommendé aux hommes, (Divine instinct recommended to men), Von Meyer has translated (in the Bl. f. höh. Wahrh. vi.).* We may therefore do well to hear him. "This enigma of the buried rich man, unrightly termed wicked, and of Lazarus covered with sores and with contempt, is well worth the attentive notice of all whom we too readily term worthy and estimable people; it is especially intended for them. The external riches are a figure of the internal; and the sores, by which the body is purified, signify something analogous in regard to the soul. The most sensible men mistake their friends in this condition, and condemn them instead of comforting them." It is so, alas! and the sad and "specious bye-path of merit," the subtle trust in the excellence and holiness of these their spiritual treasures, is so deceitful, that many in this condition go astray, and mistake even themselves. For it is not the common Pharisee alone who is pointed out and warned in this parable, but those who are most eminent also; not only those who luxuriate in art, science, and learning, but also even the proud sitters in our most holy Christian sanctuary. How many a follower of Menken or in its worse form Collenbuschian (this will be understood in Wuppertha1, and, it may be, elsewhere), clothes himself self-sufficiently in such priestly and royal attire, looking down upon the poor around who can go no higher than pray for—the forgiveness of sins! In how many a priest, with or without office, breaks out the Pope which, as Luther says, is latent in every man! How many a man has so far declined in his "consecration," that he can only now enjoy himself at his own rich table, and laud his own good things to his wondering guests with the most abundant variations of the cherished prayer—"God I thank thee," etc.; forgetting the miserable at his gate, as well as his own wretchedness! Such people have repented once, and therefore they are Abraham's children. But they have gradually come to neglect "daily repentance and contrition," till the complete old man emerges out of their regenerate state once more, and now—acts his pride in the garment of a Christian! They have indeed whatever may be had, Moses and the Prophets together with Christ and his Apostles, and the Apocalypse which reveals all that may be revealed; but they hear no longer what these say, because they deem themselves already so well furnished with everything good. Happy that sinner whose sores break out for his spiritual healing: thrice happy would that proud and rich sinner be if he could become in time a poor Lazarus in God's sight, before his rich garments are torn off and his full table disfurnished for ever! Woe to the converted publican and sinner, if the poison still remaining should break out in the disease of spiritual pride, and he, too, should become a rich man, himself such a Pharisee as those who once despised him!* These are the voices with which this inexhaustible parable cries out from both its opposite sides, for the warning of Christendom: may its expositors and preachers find a better hearing for them than they have done hitherto! It cries on both sides: for, as the unjust steward is first of all exhibited to the Publican-disciples, and yet may be regarded as full of keen application to the Pharisees; so this figurative rich man, though most immediately a mirror for the Pharisees, is full of warning also for the Publicans. If Peter, as the prince of the Apostles, according to the meaning of his successors, had regarded the "hundred-fold houses and lands" responding to his "what shall I have therefore?" as a spoil which he might prematurely acquire in this world and not in the world to come, thus perverting the servus servorum into a title of lordship—he might indeed have been the incarnate Pope of this parable; for the papacy is the colossal historical collective-exhibition of the transformation of the poor Christian into the rich Pharisee. As the parable of the steward had obviously for its first intention to warn the converted Publicans against a second punishment ensuing upon unfaithful administration of worldly good; so this last parable subordinately shows them, at the same time, this second punishment as the result of a greater unrighteousness, of unfaithfulness in much: if the true riches entrusted to them must be taken away again as another man's—all, that is, which they have but do not rightly use. This is the consummation of that which is hinted at in the prodigal son's well-meant offering of himself to hired service; he exhibited in that a germ of danger which grace must take away, or he would become again a proud fulfiller of the law in his father's house. Wherefore, ye disciples, when the Lord speaks to the Pharisees, take good heed yourselves lest ye also condemn them without thinking of the application of his words to yourselves—for so doing ye would become such as those Pharisees yourselves!

THE TRUE FAITH WHICH OVERCOMES OFFENCES.

(Luke xvii. 1–10 [Matt. xviii. 6, 7, 15, 21, 22, xvii. 20].)

Whether the connection of this with what precedes rests upon historical sequence, or is the result of the Evangelist's selection and arrangement, cannot by us be satisfactorily determined; yet πρὸς τοὺς μαθητάς, "to his disciples," appears to intimate that it is to be read and understood in direct union with what has just occurred, while the brief εἶπε δέ, "and he said," without καί, "also," or any other definite note, simply says—On another occasion, a little later. The article in τὰ σκάνδαλα, "[the] offences," seems to presuppose something out of which the question of offence suddenly springs into our Lord's discourse; but this may itself be explained variously: either as referring to some offence which had arisen from previous discourses, of which those which we have heard were made prominent; or as having been occasioned by some specific occurrence which, in a time of such general stumbling, and surrounded by such men as our Lord then saw around himself, was constantly liable to take place; or, as the simple emphasis of the expression renders most probable, the reference is to those well-known σκάνδαλα which, alas! were certain to come, which would everywhere be found in the path of his servants, and of which, therefore, he must speak in such absolute terms. It was doubtless in the design of the Evangelist, as being his own first view, that we should regard the offences here alluded to as exemplified in the murmuring and mocking Pharisees, who would keep back others from that way of penitence and faith which they would not enter themselves; just as the rich man in the parable had been a misleader of his brethren (comp. Matt. xxiii. 13 with Luke xvi. 16). Here we may apply the principle which J. Von Müller lays down for all similar cases—"Even if the Lord had uttered these words in another connection, it was doubtless his intention that they should descend to us in this connection too."* But we cannot agree with him in de-

* Compare also Matthes Weyer's ingenious and pregnant oral sayings, which touch the heart of true Christianity (published by Kaune, Nürnb. 1817). There we find—"In the spiritual carnal life a man lives in honor and joy, and is clothed in purple, like the rich man. Dying to this higher life of carnality, he becomes poor, hungry, full of sores, sorrow, and tribulation, like the wretched Lazarus."

* Indeed, it is further his will that we should not merely thus take them, but that we should pro-clining to apply this to ver. 1, while he asserts it of ver. 5; nor can we think for a moment that the Apostles' prayer for the strengthening of faith was an unconnected fragment inserted here without any specific relation to the context. The καί, "and," of itself, ver. 5, most manifestly indicates such a connection with the preceding subject. Did the Lord design by his words, vers. 1-4, to bring to their consciousness the necessity of a strong, patient, benevolent faith, in order to the overcoming of the evil world, and the amendment of erring brethren? If this discourse followed close upon the former parable, the close of which had pointed so strongly to faith, assuredly he did; and in any case we are always justified in regarding our Lord as constantly aiming, in all that he said, at the increase of his disciples' faith. We may easily apprehend that the Apostles would so interpret his lesson, and be led by their Master's high requirements to that internal principle without which they could not be met; even though they did not revert to father Abraham's injunction—whose πείθεσθαι, or "being persuaded," indeed, had an entirely different reference, that is, to the saving of their own souls.

Enough: we embrace the contents of the entire colloquy, ver. 1-10, under the one general superscription—Of the true faith which overcomes offences. The Lord proceeds first to speak of the offences; asserting both that they are in themselves inevitable in this evil world; and further, that the solemn, judicial Woe does not the less on that account rest upon that man, by whom they come, ver. 1, 2. He then goes on to speak of truth and love as the only means of overcoming these offences, by and among his own disciples, vers. 3, 4. The general warning, Take heed to yourselves! which is uttered to all who were his disciples, is followed by the specific injunction of truth in the rebuking of sin, and of love in its forgiveness: and this latter being the more difficult, is again and more definitely enforced as an indispensable duty in ver. 4. When the Apostles answer him by that appropriate petition, which touched the very vitals of the question, he further speaks, as the connection will make evident, of that true faith, in the third place, which can alone give birth to such truth and love, in the endurance and forgiveness of evil. Faith in itself lays hold, generally, of the omnipotence of God in order to the victory over offences, makes that possible in God's power, which is humanly impossible; and even a little true faith, if it be consciously and courageously exerted in the matter, is sufficient to that end, ver. 6. But—and this is the subtle, much misapprehended turn given to the whole discourse*—inasmuch as it does not avail only to pluck up external trees, which ofttimes simply adds to the offence, but to obviate and prevent sin in its root, therefore the true faith which in this overcomes is as diffident as it is confident, as humble as it is bold, perceiving and realising both the real need of the world and its own undeservingness, yea, its own absolute worthlessness independent of the grace of God, by which everything good is effected.* This is the profound meaning and connection of the parable concerning the laboring servant, to whom in strict justice neither thanks nor reward is due for the performance of his bounden duty. In the application, ver. 10, the ἀχρεῖοι, "unprofitable," carries the argument further than the limits of the parable itself; for we in the sight of God are without power and worth of our own, in a much more unconditional and absolute sense than can be predicated of any servant in relation to his master.

Verses 1, 2. (See on Matt. xviii. 6, 7.) Ἀνένδεκτον, "impossible," is like οὐκ ἐνδέχεται, ch. xiii. 33. "It is not otherwise to be expected;" not merely (as Richter and Lange say), it is to be asumed, presupposed; but the ἐν of the expression points to the thing itself and its persistency; ἐνδέχεται has an impersonal signification—res ita admittit, it may be; hence ἐνδεχόμενος is just equivalent to being possible, admissible, feasible. In harmony with this, let not that deeper signification be overlooked: The destruction of the world—its offences being at once, by power, and without endeavor for its amendment, punished—is incompatible with the wisdom and love of God. (On the probably spurious τοῦ, see Winer, Gramm. § 45, 4.) Happy is he, therefore, who does not take offence at the long-suffering and patience of the Saviour of the world, and who does not himself increase the sum of the offences which are, alas! inevitable. Woe also, at the same time, to every individual offender in his own guilt! And δι' οὗ, "by whom," obviously sigceed from the exemplification then given, to the general truth and its application to ourselves.

* Julius Müller, with many others, denies any connection whatever. On the other hand, C. H. Rieger traces it incorrectly: The Lord gives it to be understood that many seek a gift which they have not yet humility enough to receive and worthily to use. That would be such an absolute and peremptory refusal of the well-intended and laudable petition of the Apostles as we cannot admit. Lisco, similarly (who mixes up the lunatic of Matt. xvii. with this discourse, moreover assuming it to be identical with that of Matt. xviii.), thinks that the Lord's reply was a rebuke to their unwarranted demand, which referred only to faith in the performance of miracles! No, their request finds a better solution in its connection with vers. 1–4. The same expositor (in his parables) finds in the πρόσθες a self-complacent reference to the degree of πίστις which they already possessed, and a demand of its increase by way of merit, such as the Lord was constrained to repel: but all this is unjust to the Apostles, and involves an entire misapprehension of the parable of the servant.

nifies the world in all its individuals who are individually to be judged; as also the indefinite expression (and yet more plainly τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ ἐκείνῳ, Matt. xviii. 7) itself forms a transition to the little ones of ver. 2, the disciples and brethren, who, as they are not to be offended because weak beginners, so they are themselves to take heed (ver. 3) lest they keep alive the offence by lack of truth or love, and to be careful that they do not themselves make a new offence. We were taught in Matt. xviii. that in the μικροῖς, "little ones," we are not simply to understand actual children, but slight and feeble believers, who yet in their childlike humility, are to be esteemed as great; so that this emphatic τούτων, "these," by no means indicates (as Grotius thinks)—"in medio fuisse parvulos" (that children were in their midst). We might almost regard this τούτων as immediately following upon ch. xv. 16; and assume that Publicans and sinners, as contrasted with the offence-occasioning Pharisees, and in their commencing weakness of faith were indicated, as being then present; though without any such allusion it may be explained as a general reference, μικροί, "little ones," who (like τὰ σκάνδαλα) were ever present to the Lord, and not without a designed reminiscence of his earlier words in Matt. xviii. 6. Finally, and concurrently with this, it signifies—These despised of the world, and lightly treated, so-called little ones! For, the impetuous and superficial spirit of censure cries—Wherefore are they so little and so weak, as to take offence at everything? Who can be always taking such thought how he acts towards them? But the Lord, on the contrary, exercises himself and requires from others, the most solicitious condescension to those who are thus little and weak; he declares every one of them to be as precious and inviolable, as every one who causes their offence is guilty.

Verses 3, 4. See, once more, Matt. xviii. 15, 21, 22; the seven times" of which, by Peter deemed sufficient, our Lord now echoes. But the addition τῆς ἡμέρας, "a day" (certainly genuine in the former clause, if not so certainly in the repetition), most solemnly strengthens and intensifies the number used, just as in the former instance the "seventy times seven" did. In ver. 3 he turns his discourse to the μικροῖς so much offended in this evil world, and gives them the warning προσέχετε ἑαυτοῖς; and this means more than merely—Take heed of these Pharisees and of the wicked world!—or even —Separate yourselves from them! (as if to fly from the stumbling-blocks and offences; but is not that impossible?) This is only the transition from the previous words, and the words which follow adjoin something much broader and deeper. Take heed to yourselves: first, guarding against the causes of offence in the world; and then being cautious not to take offence, and that at brethren, from whom its ἐλθεῖν or "coming" is equally ἀνένδεκτον or inevitable; and, finally, in order that ye may not give offence yourselves, take heed of the κόσμος, world, and ἄνθρωπος, man, among you! All this we have explained already on Matthew. We cannot concur with Olshausen, in making our Lord's keen and searching words distinguish between the malicious σκανδαλίζειν, offence, of the Pharisees, and the ἁμαρτάνειν, sin, of the brethren springing from infirmity; he rather regards every ἁμαρτία as a σκάνδαλον, which must for the sake of truth be resisted, but also in love, in order that new sin may not rise out of it. We find nothing here of a "gentle reprehension and persistent forgiving" (as contrasted with rigorous severity and abandonment of a sinful brother to his sin, which alone must be guarded against); for ἐπιτίμησον, "rebuke," is sharply enough expressed, even in the case of brethren. (We have not here the ἔλεγξον of Matt. xviii. 15, taken from Lev. xix. 17, for this is a different point of view.) If even thy brother aggrieves thee with his sin, that is a sad case, but then the principle applies—Suffer not thyself to be offended, offend not thyself! It is not for thee, indeed, to judge him (Rom. xiv. 13); but to set him right and amend him in the patient long-suffering of love (1 Thess. v. 14). But merely to be patient and keep silence, submitting to it resignedly because he is a brother—that would itself be an offence. The ἀγάπη or love begins with ἀληθεύειν or truth, and this speaking the truth must be at the outset sufficiently earnest, without any weakness or false kindness of toleration, with rebuke and threatening of the sin, which otherwise may proceed to a worse extreme. Leave nothing on thy part undone, that may excite him to a true μετανοεῖν or repentance. Thou art supposed, indeed, to have already forgiven him in thy heart; but thou must enter into the assured peace of forgiveness with him; no more remembering his sin for reproof, only when he gives assurance of repentance. (Luther misapprehends this in his translation—If he amends himself!) Should we ask further—How am I to know this, not being able to read the heart? then comes in the reason why in the following verse ἐὰν μετανοήσῃ, "if he repent," is substituted by its explicit explanation in the simple λέγειν μετανοῶ, "say, I repent." Seven times in a day to sin against his brother, and again the seventh time after being six times forgiven, bespeaks no mere infirmity. Nevertheless, thou shalt not refuse thy forgiveness, if he only conquers himself so much as to say for the seventh time his μετανοῶ. This does not mean —If after so many sins he gives thee ample proof that he actually repents. The church may demand this in the name of the Lord, having a higher prerogative and deeper insight; but thou, an individual brother, must be contented with the apparent and visible *ἐπιστρέφειν or "turning." But this permits no license or lightness; for if the six times before the seventh should excite suspicion against the μετανοῶ, "I repent," the seventh return and declaration of repentance is, on the other hand, such a token of self-humiliation as must remove that suspicion. This is not a λέγειν, "saying," mockingly and carelessly thrown out; nor must we forget that the ἐπιτίμησον, "rebuke," on every repetition of offence, and before every repeated ἄφες, "forgive" will necessarily be more severe. Let it be observed, finally, that the Lord indirectly exhorts also the sinning brother to an humble conversion and confession; he will have his disciples, as brethren, never weary of avowing their faults and praying forgiveness, even as they are never weary of exercising forgiveness. Beautiful picture of a church and its fellowship, as it ever ought to subsist! The lack of truth in rebuking and confessing, and still more the lack of rebuking and yet forgiving love, is the secret reason of all offences in the church, as in the world itself!

* The ἐπί σε or πρός σε in the Received Text which the Vulg., Luther and Meyer retain, is a gloss, which is so far correct as it teaches that the ἐπιστρέφειν here is not of itself the undiscernible return to God, the true repentance of the sin.

The Apostles, the Twelve as a body, make answer to this,* and we must consider them as remembering their calling to stand before a world full of offences, illustrious examples of such fidelity and of such love; and probably as bearing in mind also what was said to themselves in Matt. xviii. concerning the future church. We may suppose that they were in common deeply penetrated by this hard and severe saying, that they spoke to one another about it, and then that they brought their concerted supplication to the Lord by the mouth of one of their number; and thus the connection becomes so much the plainer. The translation "Increase" presupposes too clear a knowledge on their part, that it was their own existing, albeit weak faith which was to be intensively increased from within; on the other πρόσθες is spoken of an increase to be added rather from without, though the prayer is not offered with a thorough understanding how that may be. But not the less on that account is this word analogous to that normal saying, Mark ix. 24; since it is only an existing faith which can thus pray for an increase of faith.† This believing desire for a greater and stronger faith is the grain of mustard seed, which presently plucks up other trees by the roots; and itself grows, if we continue in such desire and prayer, into a strong tree. What a strength of faith is already presupposed in their confiding in the Lord that he could add to them more faith! Indeed, if any man, being an entire unbeliever, should say—Give me faith as a free gift and from its very beginning! that would be no more than mockery, responded to throughout the Scriptures by repulsion, as by father Abraham in the other world.

Verse 6. But the Lord does not repel the request of the Apostles; he actually grants it, he does increase or strengthen their faith; although he can do this only by first encouraging their confidence in the already existing grain of mustard seed (see upon this at Matt. xvii. 20), and then by abasing in order afterwards to lift them up. When he assures them that even a slight and weak faith is, through its internal principle and energy of life (a grain of mustard seed, not a grain of sand), strong enough to do great things, if a man only possesses it, holds it fast, and uses it, he thereby contradicts, at the same time, the external προσθεῖναι, "increase," of their request, and tells them that they had already not received too little. Συκάμινος is scarcely the mulberry-tree which was very rare in that country (though this has been a meaning strenuously attached to this terminus without affix); but it is the expression derived from the Sept. and vulgarly used, though without precision, instead of συκομοραία or συκομορέα "sycamore," ch. xix. 4. For the Lord is here speaking proverbially of plucking up trees, as in Matt. xvii. of plucking up mountains; the figure is varied here, because this tree stood before his eyes. The thick-stemmed sycamore is, like our oak, wide-branched; and has in consequence strong and deep roots: so that it is significant of something very great, to say to this tree as to that mountain—ἐκριζώθητι, "Be thou plucked up by the roots!" Still more—Again take root, be planted, there to remain and grow! And where? Ἐν τῇ θαλάσσῃ; that is, not on its banks, but actually in the sea, the tree is to take root and stand! In the same sea, into which the man with the millstone about his neck, is cast. This is more than sinking mountains in the sea (Matt. xxi. 21), or as when men, having gold as grains of sand, abolish whole hills: it is a perfect ἀδύνατον or impossibility in the course of nature, and (as Bengel observes) becomes thereby a type and symbol of the spiritual, supernatural abiding of believers, firm in the tumultuous shifting sea of this world, full as it is of offence and sin. Thus the bidding the trees without to be removed and to be planted elsewhere, has more immediately to do with external σκάνδαλα or "offences," which would be compelled to retire before the might of all-powerful faith, if, and in such cases as, it might be advisable to command them thus: the love of enduring faith, which in long-suffering strives to amend the sinner, works still deeper; and it is of this our Lord proceeds to speak further.

Verses 7-9. The true and perfect faith which overcometh the world, is a firm reliance upon the power of love, received from God and by Him implanted in the soul; consequently it is confidence in the power, and yet higher confidence in the humble power of love.* This lies

* Actually the only example of such a common appeal so described, on the part of the Apostles; hence Schleiermacher thought it a suspicious circumstance foreign to the primitive records.

† The anonymous writer of Die Evangelien, ihr Geist, ihre Verfasser, und ihr Verhältniss zu einander (Leipz. 1845), regards the Jewish Apostles as saying—Give us faith in addition to our legal holiness! And the reply denies to them any faith at all—If ye had it! Woe to the writers of such books full of offence!

* The power and energy of Christian souls infiin the expression But, with which our Lord continues his discourse: loving from the love of God, is more than the laying hold of His Almightiness; it is faith which overcometh, but in the humility of enduring love, not as an imperative master, but as a ministering servant. It is the taking away of all self-confidence and of all pride which increases the faith, thus becoming so much the more pure in its energy. "The lack of faith has its ground preëminently in self-righteousness, in the reliance upon our own merit" (Von Gerlach). Ye are in all your influence and acting no more than servants of God—now how stands among yourselves the relation between servant and Lord? The servant is not at once treated as a master, but must perfectly serve till his time of rest comes; and that is his duty as a servant, for which he is entitled to no praise. So likewise ye: All those things which are commanded you, ye must do—that is your obligation—and in doing all ye are, over and above, no more than unprofitable servants; that is, ye cannot place God under any obligation, or do Him any service of yourselves; worthless in yourselves, God must first give you, and then preserve in you, whatever capability ye possess.

It seems to us a perfectly useless question, to ask whether there was any among the Apostles who had a servant; ἐξ ὑμῶν addresses them simply as men generally. (Between τίς and ὃς there is to be supplied, of course, an ἐστί). The discourse does not refer to hired servants (μισθίοις or μισθωτοῖς), to whom Rom. iv. 4 applies, but to servants who, either by birth or purchase, are the personal property of their master, whom he hath, or possesses, who could only demand for all their labor their meat and drink, in order that they might be able to perform that labor. In that case, each man must unhesitatingly perform the duty devolved on himself (τά διαταχθέντα, ver. 10); the ploughman not desiring the herdsman's duty, nor the reverse. This is the obvious reason why two are mentioned, the one having a harder, and the other a comparatively easier duty; for the herdsman, especially the careless and idle one, might seem to the ploughman to have an enviable place. Moreover, both these duties taken together symbolise the apostolical office, in which, however, the ἐπισκοπεῖν, or "pastoral care," would seem the more difficult task in comparison with the preparatory toil of the husbandman. It is for you only to perform faithfully and patiently the duty incumbent upon each. Count it not your chief concern to accomplish great things by strong faith, to celebrate glorious victories during a short warfare to be suddenly followed by triumph; but the great point is an unwearied continuance through the whole day's labour, fully and righteously measured out. Count not the time long before the rest cometh, or the great reward. Let your faith patiently hold fast the word of promise, which the Lord has given to you his servants—afterwards ye also shall eat and drink! This is and must ever be μετὰ ταῦτα "afterwards," not an εὐθέως, straightway. (by-and-by); for this antithesis of itself shows that εὐθέως is to be construed with the following words, and that to read ἐρεῖ εὐθέως together is incorrect (as in our version). (Nam sive hoc sive illud herus servo dicit, dicit ei statim, ut ingressus est ex agro. Cito cupiunt accumbere, qui missis ceteris officiis fidem sibi summam conferri oportere putant. Placent autem Deo, qui modeste incedunt, nil postulant arroganter.) [For whichever expression of the two the master addresses to the slave, he uses it as soon as the latter comes in from the field. Those desire to take their place immediately at table, who, laying aside other duties, think that the highest confidence is due to them. But those please God who walk humbly and ask nothing arrogantly.] The servant's rest and refreshment come afterwards, that is, when he hath done all; and more than that, what he has is only his food, not obligatory thanks. First all must be unweariedly done which the Lord requires. Hast thou all the day long ploughed or fed cattle in the field, and then comest home, there yet remains an evening work, within the house, which must also be done. Zeller makes an interesting application of this to the "inner world of the heart," in which there is no going straightway to sit down at the table when we come from our external calling and sphere of labor, but we must gird ourselves, serve the Lord, and prepare ourselves for the time when he will receive us to his supper. We doubt whether just this was intended by the parable. Either we are to limit its interpretation to the idea of obedient service rendered to the very last, as the one point of comparison; or we must regard the day as the whole period of life, the διακονεῖν or "serving" then being its concluding work, that of sanctifying and finally preparing the soul for the Lord and his table—such a final preparation as follows the external labor of a life, and is the finishing task which consummates obedience and patience. Suffice it that while this feature of the parable seems to have an indistinct allusion to a deeper meaning, the main point in it comes ont in all its distinctness—that when the day's work is already done, rest does not immediately follow, but there is a new girding and serving unto the end. For even in the eating and drinking, the Lord comes first, then the servant; first the master's δειπνεῖν waited on, then may the servant also—eat and drink. Finally: Doth the master thank that servant?* Is he indebted to him for this, as the one is master and the other servant? With great condecension, but at the same time with convincing, though gracious abatement of all his servants'

nitely transcends what the proud song says—"Wo Kraft and Muth in deutschen Seelen flammen!" (Where strength and courage flame in German souls.)

pride, this Lord himself answers by his οὐ δοκῶ, "I trow not," as if—This is at least my frank thought, can ye assert it to be otherwise? The Lord does not design, in these words, to commend the common practice of men, who maintaining only strict right in their commerce with one another, as a rule thank not their faithful servants; he takes the case as it is, and uses it as a similitude for the illustration of a higher truth which is shadowed forth in it. For the rest, and independently of the parable, it is a matter in itself sufficiently plain, that no man ought to regard himself as so absolutely the master of any other man; that no man should count his ploughmen and herdsmen as being no more than the field they labor in, and as only to be fed like cattle for his own profit. That the supreme, all-holy Lord, whose absolute property we are, in body and soul, by creation and redemption, does not thus regard his servants, but rather that he does superabundantly both thank and reward them, has been earlier shown in another parable, chap. xii. 37, which must be taken as the complement of this. But this is here concealed in the background;* for the present parable is obviously dealing with the prerogative and obligations of servants as such.

Verse 10. So long as we regard our performance, past or present, of that which is commanded us, under any delusion of its meritoriousness, such a peremptory declaration as this of our Lord befits our slavish thought: such only, no more and no less, is the meaning of this rigid and severe sentence, in which we have indeed much to abase us, and the humiliation of which is long necessary. Luther has this marginal gloss: "Here Christ speaks most simply concerning external works, and in the manner of men"—that is, according to our slavish thought. Elsewhere he graciously calls us not servants but friends (John xv. 14, 15); but this holds good of affectionate and humble children, who know well that he hath chosen them, and ordained them, that they should go and bring forth fruit. And with this the other point of view, concerning the obligatory obedience of Christians as servants, Rom. vi. 16–22, is perfectly consistent. Of this we need constantly to be reminded, on account of our tendency to abuse our freedom in the grace of God (1 Pet. ii. 16); this we ourselves gladly acknowledge as obedient children (1 Pet. i. 13, 14); and far on into the Apocalypse "servants of God" remains the title of honor given to the sanctified holy ones before the presence of the supreme Majesty, Rev. i. 1, vii. 3, xix. 5, xxii. 2. Not to serve him, not to perform as our absolute and bounden duty all that which he has commanded us, would entail a Woe (1 Cor. ix. 16), would make us ourselves a shameful σκάνδαλον; but the opposite never constitutes a ground of merit before the Lord. To esteem the words of his mouth, beyond what we are bound to do, mehr denn wir schuldig sind (as Luther's incorrect translation of Job xxiii. 12 runs), or even in love to perform more than is expressly commanded (as Neander intimates, perverting the whole)—is matter of absolute impossibility. There are n works of supererogation in the sight of God. The fulfilment of the law in love remains ever a debt never to be fully discharged, urging upon us incessant obligations to yet "other commandments" (Rom. xiii. 8, 9).

Thus, the application goes beyond the analogy and similitude of human things. For a faithful servant is among men profitable to his master (Philem. 2, εὔχρηστος), and may, by the service of his loving zeal going beyond his absolute duty, deserve his master's thanks; yea, even the slave, however rigorously regarded as a mere personal property, is yet a benefit to his owner, so that if his hand should smite him to death he would lose his worth in money, and do himself harm (Exod. xxi. 21). Further, we are of service both to our neighbors and to the world, as the salt of the earth, and the light of the world; and so far are serviceable to the great and good Master of the house, as being vessels of honor for the purposes of his love (2 Tim. ii. 21). But, as soon as the question arises, whether God is indebted to us in any degree, the answer is eternally—δοῦλοι ἀχρεῖοί ἐσμεν, "We are unprofitable servants." Nothing is to be qualified in this strong expression; it does not signify here idle, indolent servant (Syr. quite incorrectly, עַבְדָא בַּטְלָא); for, they are regarded as doing all; nor is it merely abject, lowly, or insignificant (as the Sept. translation ἀχρεῖος for שְׁפָחָה, 2 Sam. vi. 22, has been strangely adduced, where David will be had in honor of the meaner maid-servants through his own humility). So also "unworthy" is not enough—as Neander e.g. translates. But even as the Lord will in the great judgment cast out the servant who is worthless and unprofitable for the service of his kingdom, so must we all on our part be fully conscious and acknowledge that we never could have been in any sense profitable to God—that he never needed us, his worthless creatures, but that all which we have was received from him. The Etymologicum Magnum explains ἀχρεῖος simply and well—οὗ μὴ ἔχει τις χρείαν, of what one has no need, and so it is betwixt us and God. (See the true interpretation in Job xxii. 2, 3; xxxv. 6–8; xli. 11; comp. Ecclus. xviii. 6. For Acts xvii. 25 holds good respecting all that man may present to the great Supreme.) Is he, then, to thank us because we did not rise up in rebellion against himself? Is he under obligation to give us recompense because we yielded up ourselves to be dealt with in mercy, to be saved, to be prepared for all good works, and to be made capable of them? The Lord does not introduce the servants as saying, under the baseless delusion of presumption—We have been of great service to thee! nor as saying, in the well-grounded truth of an humble avowal—We are far from having done all, much has been lacking! (Ecclus. xviii. 5). He actually allows it to be taken for granted in the ὅταν, "when," that they might have done all; but only to place in their mouths all the more earnest confession of their obligation, to convince them that the ὠφείλομεν ποιῆσαι, "doing what was duty," takes all glorying away from the πεποιήκαμεν, "we have done." For although this πεποιήκαμεν πάντα becomes at length a glorious truth in the saints made perfect, whose sins are all expiated and covered by the δικαιώματα, or righteousness, of faith (Rev. xix. 8), yet is this only by grace conferred on such as were before worthless and unprofitable. This is the last and deepest meaning of the words, and in it the truth of the saying, 2 Cor. iii. 5, finds its superabundant justification. Thus was it that the greatest of the Apostles avowed himself ever the chief of sinners; and he that is righteous remembers abidingly his shame (Job x. 15). How many times since the first forgiveness have we all had to cry before God and man—μετανοῶ, "I repent!" How often have we had to urge our πρόσθες ἡμῖν πίστιν, "Increase our faith!" in his presence, whose persevering intercession alone has preserved our faith from becoming extinct! chap. xxii. 32. We are only, and never can be more than vessels; whatever good is in us for his service, he must first pour into them: as he gives us life freely, so must he give us power to labor. Therefore all the thanking must be on our side, and our only giving is—to give God the honor; as the following narrative in the same chapter, vers. 16, 18, shows. And not merely as the eyes of the servants look unto the hand of their masters; but we poor sinners must also, and more than that, wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us (Psa. cxxiii. 2). But finally, these Apostles themselves, in the complete performance of their apostolical functions, are no other than—the useless and unprofitable servants, sinful men, whom he had made into such successful fishers of men. As every πεποιήκαμεν, "we have done," in external works is altogether nothing but sin and shame against the true ὠφείλομεν, or "duty," so this expression of our Lord's, which Stein calls a "genuine Pauline saying," applies—and not merely by an impressive συγκατάβασις (condescension) to this standing-point (as Luther's gloss explains it), but essentially and pre-eminently, though alas! in experience too often overlooked—to all our acting and obedience from faith itself. Faith is in itself no merit before God, but it is the work of our receiving, laying hold of, and retaining the Divine gift and grace—that by which we become profitable to ourselves, by which we only meet our most true and profoundest obligation, since to reject the grace of God is the most daring rebellion of his miserable creatures.

* Παρελθὼν ἀνάπεσαι (with which the παρελθὼν of ch. xii. 37 is parallel) might here be said to mean—Come hither, and eat with me at your lord's table! This is the prerogative of the children, not of the servants while they remain such. "Mensæ servos adhibere manumissionis erat species" (To admit slaves to the table was a kind of manumission), as here the jurist Grotius remarks from Ulpian.

THE THANKFUL ONE: THE UNTHANKFUL NINE.

(Luke xvii. 14, 17–19.)

We must leave it to the harmonists to settle the chronology of this journey of Jesus, as well as to determine how it stands related, as compared with John xi. 54, Matt. xix. 1, to the end indicated in Luke xix. 11: suffice it that this also came to pass in his last journey to Jerusalem. Passing through the midst, between Samaria and Galilee, that is upon the border; as he was in the way towards entering a certain village (for lepers were not permitted to be very near the gates), there met him ten unhappy men, whom misery had united as misery often does those otherwise sundered; even the unclean Samaritan is admitted on the border into their company, and they are all unclean together. They stood afar off as they were bound to do, lifting up with as much vehemence as possible their eager voices (in the case of him who was healed, ver. 15, it became a loud voice); they pay Jesus, whom they seem not to have inquired after before, and but little to know now, the honor to term him ἐπιστάτα, "Master," as if they would be his disciples—and ask him to have mercy upon them. Certainly there is faith enough here for the beginning, if we think upon the saying of that king of Israel, 2 Kings v. 7, although it be but the faith which need constrains. The Lord saw this less than the misery itself which troubled him; and, as the healing of a leper was one of his first miracles after the Sermon on the Mount, so here, at the end of his career, he heals ten with a single word, without a touch; and, speaking as it were in passing on, does not even say καθαρίσθητι, "be thou cleansed!" just as if the matter was self-understood. But all the more on that account he veils the great work of his own honor, and orders all things wisely for all sides: he prevents all ostentation, exercises their faith through the promise scarcely expressed on the condition of their going (in Matt. viii., on the contrary, the leper was first healed), and gives to the priests now at the last the same testimony of their rights which he had given from the beginning. And it should be observed here as well as there, with what persistency he deferred to the existing ordinances of God even in their deep degradation and perversion, as witnessing against the spirit of separation which would falsely vindicate itself by his example.* The plural

* Schlatter pointed a good application (see his sermon in Brandt's Magazin, i. 2): "From the law upon this subject we must perceive that this requiτοῖς ἱερεῦσι, "to the priests," is very appropriate, since while the ten were to go at first in a body, afterwards every one was to go to his individual priest, not all together in a too imposing body. And was the Samaritan to go to his Samaritan priest? That is a hard question, inasmuch as we need not assume in an unqualified manner that Jesus was supposed to see that one was a Samaritan.* In the first edition I gave my decision (with Tertullian) that Jesus would direct the Samaritan also to the only recognised true priests, τοῖς ἱερεῦσι, then in Israel; but I am now doubtful on this point, and can scarcely be content with that view. It might be said—why should he not in such a difficult case (and it may be presumed that the Lord penetrated the subject as such), without further entering into the matter, allow the Samaritan ordinance to pass as valid for this occasion? Why take such an occasion to institute an objection against the theocratical constitution which the Samaritans in some sense thought they retained? (Comp. Sepp, ii. 454.) To direct the poor man to the Jewish priests would not only have been highly paradoxical, but severe to the man himself, since he would be sure to meet with only an unfriendly reception;† and that would have been contrary to order, implying a reforming tendency in such matters as our Lord never elsewhere interfered with. Let the reader consider both, and decide for himself.

As they went they were cleansed, even as it is with us when we walk in the path of obedience, if our faith lays hold upon the not instantly fulfilled promise. Thus all these ten have believingly laid hold on this gracious word; they entertain no Naaman-objection fatal to their own hopes; and therefore it is done to them presently according to their faith. The thankful one had not yet gone far, as the history evidently shows, connecting with the ὑπάγειν or "going," of the beginning the immediate ἰδὼν ὅτι ἰάθη, "when he saw that he was healed," by an instant ὑπέστρεψε, "returned." The whole narrative is set before us with the consecutive clearness of the report of an eye-witness. Thus the man was yet so near that as soon as the ἐκαθαρίσθησαν or cleansing became visible and felt in his whole being, a matter of indubitable certainty, he could at once turn back to Jesus. Those who suppose that he had been by this time to the priest,* forget that the brief narrative with its double καὶ ἐγένετο, "and it came to pass," would be marvellously protracted, and that they must keep the Lord standing before the entrance of the village during the whole time. And the entire tone of the record precludes the supposition of Von Gerlach that the Samaritan had gone on with the rest to Jerusalem, and, afterwards returning, had met Jesus in the neighborhood of the city. Yet how often is this notion enforced in our sermons on the subject! We are convinced that the turning back was the instant result of the thankfulness which carried away his feelings, and that the others with colder hearts went on as they were bidden.† We might, indeed, find some sort of apology for them in this commandment of the Lord which they so punctually obeyed; but the Lord looks deeper, and values this obedience but lightly. He also regards the occurrence as having a typical significance. He beholds in these nine, contrasted with the one, the thanklessness of men as a whole. He sees in them the ingratitude of heart which many whom he had before healed had manifested, never having yet learned to glorify God; and regards this incident but as a prophetic type of what will also ever take place. Gratitude is the "beginning, middle, and end of all true human morals," or rather devotion (see Heb. xii. 28 rightly translated); ingratitude is the origin of all heathenism according to Rom. i. 21, and the root of all apostacy in Israel according to Deut. xxxii. 6. All true thankfulness goes straight up to God, even while, as this honest Samaritan shows, it does not forget the person of its helper and benefactor; hence also the Lord, himself, as the Son meekly giving the honor to his Father, makes prominent this very δοῦναι δόξαν τῷ θεῷ, "giving glory to God." This is what he everywhere seeks, desirous everywhere to find it; hence the εὑρέθησαν, "there were found." Not as if he was eager to receive thanks for himself! As everything may be perverted, so this has been perverted by misunderstanding it to imply that the Lord exhorts to the diligent exaction of all thankful obligation, and to the reproof of all ingratitude; whereas the whole history teaches us in brief sition to show themselves to the priests would redound to the honor of Jesus; not only must his enemies be constrained to admit that the law was not dishonored or abrogated, but rather vindicated by him, while its impotence to do anything for the healing of man was established." It is somewhat trifling with the text and weakening its force, to make the expression an assertion which recommends any special direction of souls, as if the Lord could be supposed to point these whom he himself had healed for further counsel and consolation to the clergy (in this case not likely to afford it).

* Neander thinks, that Jesus "took this occasion" to counteract the Jewish prejudice against the Samaritans.

† For to say with the good Roos—"the care of God over him would provide that he should be admitted into the temple," where no Samaritan might ever go—is altogether to forget our Lord's systematic principles of propriety. [We suggest that his cure by our Lord was surely sufficient to cure his heresy also, and so with a good conscience he may have presented himself (as the others ought) to the Jewish priest, and would thus doubtless have been accepted as a genuine convert.—Am. Ed.]

* Especially Schleiermacher, and on the strange ground, that "a leper, in exceedingly few instances, was in a situation to judge himself whether he was clean." Then here might be one of those few instances.

† The Berlenb. Bibel even supposes that the priests might have restrained them from returning, but that the one leper overcame the impediment. This might do for the nine, but better still to impute to them the cold calculation that there was time enough for thanks, when they might meet Jesus at the feast.

those two things—to avoid, and to be patient with, ingratitude.

The Lord had counted the ten, and knows very well that all had been healed. But he reckons still the unthankful nine, as it were, with some further design: they are still held bound. "How will they appear, when they must stand before their benefactor?" His love asks after them now, in disquiet because of their sin; just as he will one day as Judge put the fearful question which has not forgotten their ingratitude. He knew beforehand that the ungrateful always abound, and there was nothing unexpected in this; but for the honor of God and the good of men, he seeks and desires man's thankfulness.* He thinks, while his glance goes beyond and deeper than this present incident, of the many who have received bodily benefits without acknowledging the gift of God—and further, of those who have enjoyed the baptism of regeneration, have gone away in the peace and consolation of the atonement, but have afterwards forgotten their past sins, and so lived that even the Pharisee's prayer, ch. xviii. 11, would not be true upon their lips. Have they not refused to be found as turning back? For here the Lord points impressively to the evil which is prominent in the case of these healed ones; their thought instantly was how most quickly to go forward, first to the priests, and then to their homes, and to the occupation which had been suspended by their leprosy: thus does man's foolish mind ever falsely look forwards, instead of first returning backwards into a profound and thankful contemplation of the grace and gift of God. Gratitude is the true turning back of the heart. And is it only this stranger,* who received his benefit from his chance fellowship with Israelites, and who might easily have thought that he got his healing merely as included with the rest—and whose ignorance as to true worship (John iv. 22) might have excused him if he had been wanting in the δοξάζειν τὸν θεόν, or glorification of God—is it only this poor Samaritan, who, albeit Samaritan, is found to be so powerfully moved by gratitude? Here, also, again, our Lord points out the true ground of this gratitude and his own saying—thankfulness is infrequent because humility is so rare. The faith of the nine looked more at the power, and their theocratic prerogative in it; the Samaritan, on the other hand, apprehended and embraced the compassionate love—and his thankfulness overcame all the "restraint of being the only one," and acted quite differently from the rest. We see that there must after all have been something good in Samaria: here and in John iv. our Saviour's parable of the good Samaritan has its justification.

Arise—remain not lying at my feet! Go thy way now to the priest, thou wilt carry thy offering with a full heart! Finally, the customary, oft-repeated word—Thy faith hath made thee whole—has here a specific emphasis. Has not their faith also made the nine whole; how else were they cleansed? But thy faith, thou Samaritan unsound in the faith, is that true and genuine faith which I seek for, and therefore thee alone hath it truly saved!

* Steinmeyer's sermon (Beitr. z. Schriftverst. i. 218) is too refined in making the requirement of gratitude on the part of Jesus an act of humility and self-denial, as it might be among us.

* Ἀλλογένης—which expression seems to militate against the usual derivation from an admixture of Israelites and heathens.

WHEN COMETH THE KINGDOM OF GOD?

(Luke xvii. 20–27. [Matt. xxiv. 23–28, 37–41, 17, 18].)

That these sayings were not merely collected together by Luke, we shall be surely convinced by a right apprehension of the connection of the whole discourse as delivered by our Lord. But does the sequel down to ch. xviii. 14 continue the connection as others think? It seems exceedingly probable, inasmuch as ch. xviii. 8 still speaks of the coming of the Son of Man; and then the parable, verse 10–14 turns back to the first secret commencement of the coming of the kingdom of God into the individual heart, in the already existing separation between the two who come to worship in the temple. But these relations may have been devised by the controlling Spirit with or without the consciousness of the collating Evangelist, the formulas of connection, ch. xvii. 20 and xviii. 1, 9, not of themselves indicating any strict historical sequence.

With the mocking impatience of unbelief in him, whom they have in their midst, but will not hear; of unbelief in the miracles, concerning which the people could testify that when Christ cometh he could do no greater (John vii. 31); and with injurious malice in the guise of docile inquiry, these Pharisees demand in bitter irony, and after having already received their answer in a thousand facts: When cometh this so-called kingdom of God, so long announced as at hand and already come? (The where is self-understood — among ourselves!) Because they would have another salvation than that which saved from sin through faith, they regarded the testimonies and appeals which miraculous benefits to the sick so loudly uttered in its behalf, as nothing worth; almost at the end of their time of visitation their eyes yet behold nothing, and they ask in their murmuring—Will it then be soon? When shall we see only its beginning? Certainly we must regard this as the predominant spirit of their question (as before in Isa. v. 19), for Luke concisely mentions the Pharisees; although in the case of many it might have more innocently proceeded from that Jewish ignorance generally, which ch. xix. 11, and even Acts i. 3, 6, testify to have been shared, in some degree, by the disciples and apostles themselves. The Lord's love cannot be embittered, his patience cannot be exhausted: he answered them, concisely indeed, as became his dignity, in despatching their bold and abrupt words, but most profoundly and pertinently giving them the fullest satisfaction of their inquiry. The answer speaks of that which the question referred to, the beginnings of its first coming, but correctingly refers the "kingdom of God" to something very different from that which the question intended. He might elsewhere, and on another occasion, have said—Your kingdom of God, that which ye expect, cometh never! But the coming true kingdom (his own, which their taunting unbelief inquired after) is still the same with that which was falsely expected, since the divine promise at least lay at the foundation of their hopes, and thence only could they have its terminal designation: his grace brings and offers the true gift for the satisfaction of their erring desire. Let us then be thankful to the wicked Pharisees for so full and good an answer which they procured for us, and which may we be able to put to good account for ourselves!

In order to indicate this, the Lord, after his first reply, turns again to the disciples; and in a sense blending all together, since in ver. 22 we find they are dealt with as still, like the Pharisees, overlooking and neglecting the present day of grace. He gives, consequently, on occasion of the Pharisaical question (for the slightest touch causes his doctrine to pour graciously forth in all its fullness, always giving the remedy for that sore need in man which utters the challenge), a preliminary instruction to his disciples concerning the entering in of the kingdom of God. But by this he does not intend merely its first introduction at the beginning, its essential coming, but also that future full Revelation (chap. xix. 11), for which he well knows the disciples' question waits. Hence his discourse falls into two parts, the second of which gives in preparatory detail, though only by way of intimation, what was afterwards to be brought into full light as the answer to another question of the disciples, in Matt. xxiv. Such is the true relation between this and the later discourse.

Thus we have first the rejection of the falsely conceived question concerning the kingdom of God then actually present, and allusion to the misunderstood, unobserved beginning with which it comes. The kingdom of God cometh (now and always regarded in its first coming), not with observation and external show—it cometh not thus (in my own person and manifestation), ver. 20; and not as thus come shall it be announced (its true messengers and witnesses after me shall not thus announce it), ver. 21. But it is, even with reference to these foolish questioners, already present—ἐντὸς ὑμῶν, "within you."

Then comes the preparatory instruction to his listening disciples (which the docile Pharisees, if such there were, might also hear for their continuous answer) concerning the future manifestation of this now hidden kingdom. Here, first, is the general contrast: The days will come which, after these present "days of the Son of Man" are over, will bring to manifestation his day; but this is first future, and then suddenly manifested, vers. 22–25. Such a day will, in their necessity, be desired in vain (first of all as one of the former days); and will be falsely offered to a premature satisfaction; nevertheless it will break in—as the lightning at last, but only after a first coming, manifestation, and period of the suffering Messiah. This is, at the same time, a perfect elucidation of what had been spoken to the Pharisees; and there now follows, especially for the disciples, a closer detail in the style of prophetic intimation. At the day of the revelation of the Son of Man—which is preceded by similar days of preparation—unexpected judgment will break in upon the secure world instead of the expected salvation, as all previous typical epochs teach, vers. 26–30. Even the saved will be able to save themselves only by a perfect devotion and abandonment of all earthly and personal things, vers. 31–33. Finally, the separation between the condemned and the saved will become manifest even to the severance between the nearest intimates; for that was already existing, though unobserved, at the beginning of his kingdom and reign, vers. 34–36. Does not thus the close go back to the beginning again? And is there not a distinct connection of thought in this perfect solution of their question?

But the blessed disciples are not yet content, and their curiosity asks further concerning the ποῦ, "where," of these things; they then receive preliminarily, as the third and briefest portion of the whole discourse, a yet more curt and repelling despatch of their question than even the Pharisees had received: they are pointed back to the whole previous development in order to the judgment, ver. 37. This utterance, now first given, is brought out into its full prominence afterwards in Matt. xxiv.

Verses 20, 21. Although what the Pharisees term "the kingdom of God," and what the Lord so terms, are very distinct, and even placed in opposition, yet the Lord graciously uses the expression common to them both; not as admitting the validity of their meaning, but because they rightly hold that which, though as a promise misunderstood, waits for a corresponding fulfilment. The kingdom of God cometh! This assurance given in Israel, and indeed to the orthodox in the community, is obviously a confirmation of the great expectation of a kingdom, in its foundation and in all its uncorrupted meaning; comp. chap. iv. 22, where the οἴδαμεν, "we know," embraces all that was yet pure in the doctrine and knowledge of Israel. The expectation is justified (Acts xxiv. 15), the hope of Israel (Acts xxviii. 20) is no delusion; and we ourselves as Christians are referred to a further waiting for the manifestation of Christ and his kingdom. But this προσδέχεσθαι, or "expectation," has become altogether false when it degenerates into a παρατηρεῖν, or "watching," the noting and observing of the eye of sense, the looking out for externally great things and for the setting up of a kingdom like the other kingdoms of the world, such as forgets the essential nature of the kingdom of God, and what is the true σωτηρία, or "salvation," of men through his redeeming mercy. This παρατήρησις, "observation," the universal expectation and inquiry of the Jews, had frequently come into conflict with our Lord, as we find in the often-mentioned παρατηρεῖν, "laying wait," of the Pharisees; and it now finds its full expression in the blind πότε, "when," which overlooks that which was now present and obvious among them. Thus the answer runs first: "The kingdom cometh not for such observation and espial as yours, not as corresponding to such a lust after externally glorious things, generally not as ye Jews suppose, and quite differently from your expectation." But this meaning passes over into one more general, which the μετά, "with," as well as the omission of any ὑμῶν, "you," indicates: not with any such observable pageantry or even external evidence (παρατήρησις, may also signify —id quod observari potest), that men must observe it whether they will or not, as if it must make itself noticeable and known like any other βασιλεία, "or kingdom." Luther's otherwise excellent rendering, "with external features" (mit aüsserlichen Geberden), does not precisely hit the point, in so far as it expresses the second sense without including the transition from the former out of which it springs, omitting that rejection of all false παρατηρεῖν, or "observing," which we think essentially included. Pity that we dare not change such expressions as these in our people's Bible, else would the double meaning of "mit Aufsehen" (Engl. vers. "with observation"), perfectly correspond to the sense. Even the second meaning would be better secured by "augenschienlich"; for "Geberden" are always external, and with it creeps in the notion of man's appearance, including the preacher of rumors, the devotee, etc.—whereas Luther's meaning is that the kingdom itself cometh not, doth not increase with external manifestation. The βιάζεσθαι, "pressing," Matt. xi. 12 (see our exposition), with all its self-demonstration and even violence of entering in, imports less an external exhibition than a loud call, has less to do with seeing than hearing, and has its power in penetrating the inner heart and conscience. For this kingdom—thus further does the far-reaching meaning of the great word develop itself—is now at the first, and will be for long ages through, so far as it is coming, only a concealed preparation for a kingdom which is to be externally manifest; consequently it is not in and for itself, any external constitution, any visible church, although it is ever calling out and raising many such; it is no ready when and no geographical where, it is therefore no state, either State-church or church-State, it is not limited to place or land. "It can not be marked out on the map," says Roos. The making a demonstration and exciting rumor is not its usual rule or essential method, for it cometh not with legal works, nor with externally striking "awakenings," conversions, separations, societies, although all these are connected with it, and, indeed, are testimonies of its inner existence.

When it is come, and wherever it is come (this is involved in the continuous οὐδέ), those who shall rightly speak of the kingdom of God in its reality, that is, all who better understand this word, and use it more properly than ye, its witnesses and heralds, shall say concerning it no ἰδοὺ ὧδε or ἰδοὺ ἐκεῖ, "Lo here! or, Lo there!" even as I Myself, its first Promulgator, say not of that kingdom which is come in Me—See here, it is Myself; but only intimate to faith—The kingdom of God is already come, it is already among you, and in your midst! Assuredly, on the other hand, Preaching has at all times cried Behold! Lo there! (Isa. xl. 9, 10, xli. 27), and the church bears her witness to all ears and to all eyes, with her ὧδε or ἐκεῖ, here or there; but the sure and certain substance of this testimony remains ever the preaching of the word. Where the Gospel of the kingdom is preached in the church, and through her missions works its way into all the world, there finally comes the kingdom raising up many an overlooked ἐκεῖ to confront the presumptive ὧδε. If its true messengers sent forth should not or may not say—It is here or there! so consequently other men also, though they might desire to do so in their misunderstanding, cannot say so with essential truth. All this lies in the simple and pregnant ἐροῦσι, "shall say," which excludes every human judgment, according to appearance, concerning the When and the Where of the kingdom of God. Let it be observed here preparatorily: first the kingdom cometh, then it is, as come, actually present; where then is the application of the true ἰδού, "lo!" connected with the ἐστίν, "is," which may not be lost sight of? Assuredly in the hearts of believers; yet it is not in us from the beginning, before its coming to us and in us, for this would contradict this coming; least of all could it be already in these Pharisees, who bring their unbelieving πότε, "when?" to the Lord, and ask the King who has appeared when his kingdom should come! Consequently the ἐντὸς ὑμῶν, "within you," cannot have this unqualified meaning, but only leads the way to it, as we shall go on to prove at large.

Three statements are consequently to be accurately distinguished in this compressed saying: the first speaks distinctively of the proper commencement of the coming; the second of what may be said when it comes, or rather is come; and the third gives, after a twofold repudiation of error, the true information in answer to the question which still remains—Where then cometh it? The first clause refers pre-eminently to the time of Christ himself, which already typifies and enfolds every future coming of the kingdom in any particular place during this first period "on earth." The "Son of Man," or the expected Messiah, the incarnate Son of God, came just as a son of man, that is, not as Israel expected him, not as the thoughts of all the world would have supposed that he must come. First the still Christmas-eve; then the humble appearing unto Israel after long concealment; then, accompanying all his continuous signs and wonders, and which even these did never remove, the veil and obscuration of his abasement to the lowliness of common humanity, so that, notwithstanding all, he might ever say—Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in Me! Then the Good-Friday with its Ecce Homo! (Lo here!) with the question of the earthly vicegerent to the King of truth, turning away from such a kingdom as his with the offence of the cross; then, indeed, the resurrection, but still no manifestation before all the people; and the equally noiseless ascension to heaven; and finally, the Pentecost, visibly, indeed, and loudly enough, saying—Behold here lives in us the crucified and exalted One! Yet even now, with no "See here! or see there!" in the sense of the Pharisees, but only a Word, and in and through that an inward influence of the Spirit! As long and as often as the world asks, in the sense of the Pharisees, the answer is ever—Not thus! The second clause, again, indicates immediately the apostolical period, which is continued onwards through all times to the final revelation. Assuredly the Apostles, and all their successors, were confirmed by the power of the Spirit, were approved as the witnesses and ambassadors of the kingdom of God, by signs and wonders, which attested their pre-eminence over the powers both of nature and of the world, and which becoming ever more spiritual became ever more real, convincing, and historical; yet there was in them no form nor comeliness, no marks of greatness or glory for the world's eye, any more than in their Master. Even they, scorned and cast out, were πάντων περίψημα ἕως ἄρτι, "the offscouring of all things unto this day." Paul before king Agrippa and his πολλῇ φαντασίᾳ, or "great pomp," bound like his own King; a man who had done nothing worthy of death, and yet is not set free; a preacher of the Truth who, royally in his bonds, wishes for all who hear him, to be what he himself was! The same Paul again in the metropolis of the whole world, a preacher of the kingdom of God in bonds! Peter in Babylon instead of Jerusalem, the writer of epistles to the elect pilgrims of the διασπορά, or Dispersion, who are partakers of the sufferings of Christ in hope of the glory that should be revealed, who are vilified by the heathen, persecuted by the raging lion, but yet are submissive to all the powers that be—and can he be the prince of the church and the Pope? John also, in the solitary island of Patmos, a companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, receiving the Apocalypse in the Spirit, and by the same Spirit testifying to the church from the Lord—Behold he cometh, and every eye shall see him! himself beholding it already—Behold the tabernacle of God! And this ἀποκάλυψις, or Revelation, again, what a σκάνδαλον, or "offence," for the world and for Christendom, apparently bordering on the limits of the apocryphal! Such was the aspect and form of his kingdom at first, and such must it be till the Lord comes again, no longer to rule merely in the midst of his foes, but to make them all his footstool. Till then the Jewish and the heathen world may put their question and demand as here, and all the misunderstanding and impatience of Christendom may join them, and the answer here given retains its permanent and deep significance.

Alas, how often has the warning of this silencing answer been misunderstood or forgotten; how often have even Christian men (as presently ver. 23 prophesies) held out to the παρατήρησις, or "observation," a false gratification; but as soon as, as often as, and wherever it has been said, "Lo here, or Lo there it is!" there, on that very account, has been the kingdom of God no more. (For this reason the Lord carefully avoids appending the ἐστίν to this ὧδε ἢ ἐκεῖ in both verses; for it is nothing but a mere ἐροῦσιν ἰδού, which was in the former case at once rejected as worthless by the οὐδέ.) The King seemed to have come at the destruction of Jerusalem, but it was not yet the true coming of his kingdom; Rome succumbed with her majesty before the Cross, persecution ceased, and Constantine gave to the church visibility, peace, and dominion, but all this proved soon to be a false ἰδοὺ ὧδε, "Lo here!" Men thought they had the kingdom, and found it a popedom, to which Jer. vii. 4 finds sad application. The reformation erected anew the banner of the Word of God, and sang for a while—He is with us now in his own way, with his spirit and with his gifts! The kingdom must now abide with us! But has it therefore remained with either Lutheran or Reformed church as such; has it remained in the English mixed church, whose proud "with us!" is contested by a thousand varieties of dissenters, and disproved by a thousand infirmities? Let all this show with what absolute propriety and right the Lord's οὐδὲ ἐροῦσι, "neither shall they say," was spoken, applicable as it is down to our own day. The kingdom of God, we say it once more, for now there is need, can absolutely not be any constitution or organisation of external continuance, in the fashion of earthly kingdoms and states; it cannot be any ecclesiastical state, or state-church, or Christian empire—generally speaking it can be no church as such, although all these in their shifting forms may serve as instruments and materials for its consummation.

When, where, and how cometh then the kingdom of God? It is, indeed, truly in the world, and has been since Christ hath come.

He does not go on to say—For it doth not come at all, will never come as a present reality; but a distinctive and conclusive "for" brings with it its own ἰδού. "Lo!" the absolute and only truth of which turns all the others to a lie. What then is this true saying in the mouth of Truth, which is to be further affirmed and incessantly testified? He spoke then to the Pharisees—The kingdom of God is ἐντὸς ὑμῶν, "within you." To understand this let us begin with the ἐστίν, "is," which as the evident answer to the πότε ἔρχεται, "when cometh," must mean—It is already come, already present. Where then, and how, for these Pharisees? Just as it is elsewhere testified to them—Because Christ is come, because he liveth and worketh in their presence and in their midst! Thus the expected time is already come (John iv. 23; v. 25). So had the Baptist at the beginning announced to them—μέσος ὑμῶν ἕστηκεν, "standeth in the midst of you," and the Lord himself said at the end—ἔτι μικρὸν χρόνον τὸ φῶς ἐν ὑμῖν ἐστι, "yet a little while is the Light with you," (John i. 26; xii. 35). There we have most assuredly the first signification of this ἐντός, "within;" here, as alone, rigidly understood, it can suit the ὑμῶν, to the plainest apprehension. (Compare, moreover, Luke vii. 16, ἐν ὑμῖν.)* That is, as Schleiermacher at first rightly expresses it—"The kingdom of God is being built up in the same sphere as that in which ye also live"—although he then very superficially goes on—"in that of instruction and communication." The miserable perversion of Hegelianism, which hangs upon this ἐντὸς ὑμῶν, "within you," the assumption that the kingdom of God is no more no less than something in the interior of every human spirit,† is contradicted by all Christendom, by all scripture, by every testimony of the Divine Spirit. This ὑμῶν, "you," rather embraces for the first the Pharisees generally as a basis, then in them the people whose representatives they were; and in these contemplates for its wider meaning the entire of humanity, which might hear the answer when it should put the question: Within, that is, in the midst of, within the circle and among, the Pharisees, the people of Israel, humanity at large, the kingdom of God is set up; just as Christ then stood in the midst of the questioners lurking around him. Thus the kingdom is everywhere near at hand, where men can ask concerning it because it has been preached; it comes down really to us without any looking for its coming from afar or from heaven, in order that it may be in us; this its coming and presence is only to be sought within the domain of ordinary life. But when it thus proffers itself and is among us, it will actually come into us and there establish itself, and build itself up, internally approving and manifesting itself. And this "inwendig" (internal) (by which Luther once more seizes the second meaning without the point of connection with the first from which it springs) can never be regarded as an erroneous translation; all the less as ἐντός (which in the only other passage of the New Testament in which it is found, Matt. xxiii. 26, is essentially equivalent to ἔσωθεν) is here evidently opposed to every ἔξωθεν, or outward, of an observable, visible Here or There. All the saying and pointing, from the ἰδού, "Behold," of the Baptist pointing to the Nazarene (in which the finger of God's Spirit, referring in all the prophets to the great Fulfiller, was, as it were, embodied) down to the witness of heaven and earth around the cross and the sepulchre; and all the ἐντὸς ὑμῶν of the doctrine which filled Jerusalem, of the church which consisted of multitudes saved by the only name of Jesus in their midst, all had been in vain to the unbelieving Jews—and why? Because in them there was no faith which came in seeking and receiving to meet the testimony. Thus have we a transition to this other meaning or the expression: The kingdom, as coming, as come, that is, acknowledged (for the question is about that), consists absolutely in nothing external as such; even my person in the midst of you is nevertheless no better than not there for you, because and in so far as I cannot in you bear witness to myself. If it comes not to that point with you, if ye seek not and find not the kingdom there—then is all your questioning, expectancy, and observation vain; ye lose the answer, and that which is actually in your very midst! It might, and it ought, and it would become to you, as generally to all, an ἐντός. Thus (as chap. xvi. 15, ἐν ἀνθρώποις) there is a pregnant double-meaning in the concise expression, which our innerhalb (yet better the Swiss innert), within, might reproduce; he who would wilfully reject this, must consider how his exposition, only seizing the one sense, can obtain its foundation for the other. Lange (ii. 2, 1080), for the rest agreeing with what is here advanced, prefers to find the one, proper, simple ground-thought which he supposes the word must have expressed, in the proposition that the kingdom of God generally and everywhere is a matter of the internal man, and we cannot contend against him on that point; yet it does not appear to us how the Lord could say this to the Pharisees with an unqualified ἐστίν, "is," without the former meaning as a point of junction for this latter—It is already secretly present within the circle of your position and circumstances, even bearing its own witness to the inner spirit of each. Olshausen sees, and states this clearly, when he sums up the progressive declaration which is involved in the three clauses: "The Lord, in the first place.

* As also the pertinent parallel expression, which Alford quotes as decisive, in Xenoph. Anab. i. 10, 3, ἀλλὰ καὶ ταύτην ἔσωσαν (οἱ Ἕλληνες) καὶ τάλλα ὁπόσα ἐντὸς αὐτῶν καὶ χρήματα καὶ ἀνθρωποι ἐγένοντο πάντα ἔσωσαν.

† On which seems to border the generally doubtful, often unscriptural Rud. Matthäi, when he maintains: "The kingdom has been long grounded in the deepest interior of all men's spirits in all times, although only through Christ it may rise into their higher consciousness." Never is it to be testified as an ἐντὸς ὑμῶν till Christ has come to a people, till the preaching and embassage have brought and offered him.

annihilates their expectations of its glorious manifestation (which were comprehensively expressed by the term παρατήρησις); in the second place, the Saviour withdraws the kingdom of God from the visible world, as it exists in space; and in the last place, he transfers it entirely to the inner world of spirit." Thus the emphasis falls upon the ἐντός, "within," in connection with which the ὑμῶν, "you," must not be especially urged (as Schaubach, Stud. u. Krit. 1845, rightly says)—yet the ὑμῶν is however said, as paving the way for the other deeper meaning. But he who insists upon explaining ὑμῶν by the assumption that ἐντός is merely ἐν μέσῳ, in the midst, must reflect that even then the answer might be taken as a concise irony: It is in your midst, and yet for you it is not come, for it must first be in you before you can find it needless to come to Me with your question about the πότε!* He should consider also, what Olshausen expressly declares,† "that the Redeemer by no means intends to represent the Pharisees as absolutely excluded from the kingdom of God, but would rather indicate to them the possibility of their entering into the true and spiritual kingdom; that is, if they would stoop to seek it where, by its very nature, it must first manifest itself, in the depths of the inner life." Yes, verily, this is the secret, most heart-piercing, and gracious point of the answer, which otherwise (let the expression be pardoned) would seem to despatch their mocking question in the same style,‡ if it did not just by this enigmatical ἐντός direct them to look for its hidden meaning. Now if one of these questioners turned to his own inner being to seek the kingdom there, he would find indeed no Christ in his spirit, but the Christ before him would then become a Christ for him, and that because in him. Thus Braune says correctly: "There might coexist with the most unlikely beginnings and most suppressed thoughts and feelings, the possibility of its appearance and entrance," manifesting itself even where it excites opposition, and Christ is yet ruling in the midst of his enemies. We would add that even the carrying away, and the involuntary pondering, of the instruction which the Lord gave in his reply, was for all these questioners the slight, rudimentary, first ἔρχεσθαι, or "coming," of the βασιλεία, or "kingdom," in their inner spirit.§

The question which the Jews still urge, and which, founded upon the good warranty of the promises of the old Testament, has been developed into an unbelieving delusion as to their accomplishment, runs thus: When will the kingdom at length come? The Christian question which has similarly degenerated, though based upon a similarly good foundation, runs on the other hand: Where then is it come? (To this the Lord, ver. 21, at the same time already began to reply.) It is far easier at first to answer the question, where it is not. We must pretermit, lest our comment should become preaching, the manifold, almost inexhaustible exposition of this—not here or there! We testify merely once more as the last thing which the Lord declares that it is nevertheless here and there, more and more everywhere upon earth! Where then? Where the Gospel is preached! ch. xvi. 16. Thus cometh the kingdom, thus it is come and is ever coming; it is proclaimed and offered at once as already having entered in, and as ever in the act of coming. But only where the word is preached with the outpouring and influences of the Holy Spirit, with those operations and energies which have never been suspended since the day of Pentecost, yea, since the beginning of our Lord's own preaching (Heb. ii. 3, 4); for here holds good 1 Cor. iv. 20. "If our Father in heaven giveth us (in our human spirit) his Holy Spirit, so that we believe in his word and in it live a divine life"—then cometh the kingdom of God in us. If his ambassadors first receive the Holy Ghost, and then become witnesses for the Lord even to the ends of the earth—then will it come to all who hearken to the Holy Ghost (Acts i. 6, 8, v. 32). Where the Spirit is, there is the kingdom; this is its true characteristic in opposition to all externality without the Spirit (Rom. xiv. 17). "Its glory is in the hidden life of Christians"—and in their word, their confession, their works, and their life. The preaching approves itself to be God's word concerning God's kingdom, in the consciences of all, even of the unbelievers (2 Cor. iv. 2, v. 11). It is in strong demonstration of the Spirit and of power, but then it may be said again—See and observe, how inwardly in the heart this power of the Spirit lives and works! The kingdom of God externally exhibits itself in truth only as an internal principle; and all its outward expression and externality is, alas! still mingled with infirmity and baseness, and sometimes concealed amid the specious lies which confess not the truth, but hold it nevertheless in unrighteousness—so that it has never yet been a kingdom in the external full reality of this word. And if thou askest after that, thou must ever be directed from all that is external to that which is within.

Is this, then, always to be the case, and is the kingdom ever coming never to be entirely come, that which is internally prepared never to be externally consummated? Assuredly it will be, for the preaching of the Gospel and the Spirit witnessing in those who believe it, testifies it from the beginning to be a future kingdom, one which will truly correspond to all παρατήρησις, or "observation," in even its external characteristics—The great and notable day of the Lord must come (Acts ii. 20). Of this the Lord goes on to speak.

* "For the kingdom of God is internal among you—but because it is not, O Pharisee, in thee, thou wilt never see it" (Dräseke).

† Only that we take it cum grano salis, without heresy!

‡ Where is it then? they ask. Ye have had it long enough he replies.

§ But when Shaubach discerns in the first meaning of these words "among you" a contradiction to the declaration that it was not local, not ὧδε ἢ ἐκεῖ, he falls into a misapprehension, which we obviated above by the admitted "lo here!" of the preaching and offers of the kingdom, testifying of its coming.

Verses 22, 25. To the disciples he discourses of that future, as to the Pharisees of that which was already present for them. Ἐλεύσονται ἡμέραι, "the days will come," a new antithesis to the heretofore ἐστίν, "is." Nevertheless as that which was spoken to the Pharisees contained what was appropriate to the disciples also, so now in the transition to the disciples the words are so ordered that the Pharisees may receive them too, and ponder what is brought out into sharpest prominence in the first of these verses. For what are the days of the Son of man? Most obviously this is first of all a continuous explanation of the indefinite expression which the first answer shaped by the question had made use of—kingdom of God; consequently it is an avowal and testimony that Jesus Christ would have his days (יָמִים, lifetime or age, vers. 26, 28, Matt. xi. 12) regarded as the time of the Messiah, that is as the introduction of the kingdom of God. I am here, Daniel's Son of man; consequently the kingdom is come. He does not, however, enforce this clearer utterance directly upon the attention of the Pharisees, but meekly turns his words to the disciples, in whom he might presume such faith in his person. Those who would understand by μίαν τῶν ἡμερῶν, "one of the days," the beginning already of the day of final manifestation, ver. 26 (as if—only a dawn at least of that great day), disturb the whole chain of thought, according to which the now present days of his bodily presence, in the future vainly wished back, are closely connected with the ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἐστι, "is within you"; and besides so modest a desire of the future of the Lord can scarcely be thought of in any certain sense. The matter so far as we may understand it has this bearing: the disciples and Pharisees will (in a different degree on either side) wish back these lesser and slighted days of the Son of man—slighted, though in a different way, by both.* For those days of distress and perplexity (of that rejection, ver. 25, and of that judgment which will thence follow) which can alone satisfy the signification of ἐλεύσονται ἡμέραι, "the days will come," (comp. ch. xxi. 6, 22, 23), the disciples will desire through their infirmity that the Bridegroom taken from them were with them again as before; but the Spirit will comfort them and point them forwards instead of backwards, will reveal to them the returning "Son of man," as Stephen and John beheld him, and teach them to wait for that one great and all-important Day, vers. 24 and 30. But the Pharisees, and the unbelieving Jews generally (with whom the disciples in their weakness of faith are classed), will then discern too late that they have neglected the day of Christ (John viii. 56); they will seek in vain their rejected "Son of man" or Messiah, and find him not. Thus this saying has a force for them like John vii. 33. 34; and seems still to cry out—While ye are spending your time in questionings, I am passing away and the day of grace is going!

Now first ver. 23 turns directly to the disciples: the general interpretation of what is here said may be seen upon Matt. xxvi. 23-27. Let not your longing for me be seduced by any delusive gratification! Such ὧδε and ἐκεῖ, "here and there," is not the right,* therefore let it not interrupt or divert you in the slightest degree from your way of patient faith (μὴ ἀπέλθητε), nor let it hurry you with impetuous earnestness to follow after a great delusion (μηδὲ διώξητε). For my coming will, like the lightning, be sudden and indubitable. The expression ἐκ τῆς ὑπ' οὐρανὸν εἰς τὴν ὑπ' οὐρανόν, "out of one part of heaven into the other part of heaven," is to be understood (by supplementing χώρα) of the opposite ends of the earth, as the parallel passage in Matthew shows; ἡ ὑπ' οὐρανόν is neither the whole earth, as Bengel supposes, nor is it a single land, as if the revelation of Christ extended from one land to another, as Grotius interprets, misunderstanding the lightning. The Lord speaks here of the day of his coming and manifestation in a prophetically indefinite manner; and in these preparatory words blends into one the distinctive epochs, the discrimination of which his subsequent prediction in some degree enters upon. But in ver. 25 he gives the great decisive explanation which would annihilate all false παρατήρησις, "observation," that the Messiah must previously, in his first manifestation, suffer and be rejected; see already upon Matt. xvi. 21, xvii. 12. And inasmuch as he sets this over against his last parousia (coming), this παθεῖν, "suffering," and ἀποδοκιμασθῆναι, "being rejected," at the same time embraces the whole period of his Cross-kingdom (τὰ εἰς Χριστὸν παθήματα, 1 Pet. i. 11).

Verses 26-30. There immediately follows a second great explanatory declaration, that his "days" in the second sense will only bring judgment to the unbelieving world instead of the rejected, and hitherto vainly expected redemption. Once more we have, what in Matt. xxiv. and Luke xxi. is more distinctively developed, the destruction of Jerusalem and the final judgment typically blended together in one. Only thus much does the once more repeated ἡμέραι of the plural intimate, that before the ἡμέρα of ver. 30, there will be interposed periods of preparatory warning, preludes, times of approaching and ever-increasing judgment and manifestation, which will, however, down to the last be slighted and misunderstood. As to the particular details, see on Matt. xxiv. 37-39. Eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, first; for sensuality was the fundamental sin of the antediluvians, which will assuredly be reproduced in the last days. Only here are adjoined the days of Lot with their higher culture in buying and selling, planting

* Neander: Desire to have him only for one day in their midst again.

* Alford finds here a "warning to all so-called expositors, and followers of expositors of prophecy, who cry ἰδοὺ ὧδε and ἰδοὺ ἐκεῖ, every time that war breaks out or revolutions occur." Well said, for English Christians especially!

and building, which again will be reproduced in the wide-extended institutions of universal industry filling the earth which is no longer to exist: thus all sensuality and all worldly culture are together included. Κατὰ ταὐτά, τὰ αὐτά, "even thus," that is, after this model and type will be the last judgment: generally upon the secure world turned into a Sodom like the Flood, but with fire like that which consumed Sodom before established as a ὑπόδειγμα, or example (2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 7).

Verses 31-33. Moreover that in this preliminary, indefinite view, there may not be altogether wanting a hint at the destruction of Jerusalem, the holy city, the Lord here already utters what is more plainly stated concerning that in Matt. xxiv. 17, 18—although even their first hearers might have connected this with the parallel of Sodom if they had thought of such threatenings against Jerusalem as Isa. i. 9, 10, iii. 9; Jer. xxiii. 14; Ezek. xvi. 48. For the rest, the utterance proceeds in three clauses: first, the typical warning—Let not him who fleeth turn back! which looks forward to the typical coming of Christ in judgment upon Jerusalem, but indeed does not mean that alone; then a corroboration of this by a plain typical backward glance at Lot's wife; and, finally, the undisguised expression of the fundamental principle—more than once repeated already, Luke ix. 24; Matt. x. 39, etc., etc.—which will then hold good in its strongest sense.* There is, however, in this an advancement upon the former warning; the subject previously was the judgment upon an unbelieving world, but now the danger is alluded to which threatens the fleeing righteous, if they tarry; as afterwards, vers. 34–36, a final and rigorous separation even between the closely linked laborers in the kingdom is threatened. As they were not to come down from the house-top to fetch their stuff from the house, so they were not in fear disobediently to turn back upon the judgment at their heels—as Lot's wife had done, whose history Wisd. x. 7 had early thus symbolically explained.

Verses 34-36. So in Matt. xxiv. 40, 41, to which let the reader turn back. Here as there, we find a two-fold reference; first, an assurance that the redeemed of the Lord will live and move down to the last in the midst of the world, will have the society of life ἐντὸς τοῦ κόσμου, within the world (but as the children of the kingdom, so that the inward separation already exists); then, parabolically, the intimation that even the laboring servants and handmaids of the Lord will not all be found prepared. The order of Matt. xxiv. is reversed, and there is a third member added here, and placed in its strength of meaning, first: the bed indicates the closest fellowship of life (as in marriage), then the mill a fellowship of labor which is in some sense intimate; and finally the being together in the field (without any mention of labor) indicates any kind of fellowship generally.* Oh ye impatient questioners as to the when and the where, separate yourselves not externally before the time! It is further observable, that the Lord once at the beginning speaks of a night instead of his "day," ver. 30. This is not casually introduced from the allusion to the bed, but the ταύτῃ τῇ νυκτί, "in that night," emphatically taking the lead, is descriptive of the world's condition when the lightning of the day of Christ shall burst upon it; thus it is not properly (as Grotius supposes) the nox atra calamitatum (dark night of calamities), for the judgments are rather already ἡμέραι, "days," of the Son of man, but the darkness of sin and unbelief, comp. presently ch. xviii. 8, and 1 Thess. v. 2–8.

Verse 37. This ποῦ, "where?" of the disciples, to which a ὅπου, "wheresoever," plainly replies, has been erroneously regarded as the undefined outcry of apprehension—How is this? when can this be? They ask strictly concerning the where, because their Master's words have been hitherto so local, and the undertone of their question is—Can it be that this shall happen in the holy land, in Jerusalem itself? In this appears a delusion in them similar to that which caused the Pharisees not to ask about the where of the kingdom, taking that for granted. The Lord here preliminarily answers by a concise, prophetical-typical, enigmatical word, the true meaning of which we have unfolded upon Matt. xxiv. 28; it remains only to remark how that meaning here applies in its simple ground-thought—Everything in its time and order, everything as it is meet! Ask not curiously after the Where, the How, or the When, but see, where the corruption of death is, there will the eagles come!† Where it is night, the lightning gives its frightful glare. Let it be your only care to be found as the living, and as the children of the light!

THE IMPORTUNATE WIDOW BEFORE THE UNJUST JUDGE.

(Luke xviii. 2–8.)

Hear now, what the true and faithful Witness, the only begotten Son, saith to us concerning the Father! This goes far beyond the analogy between our paternal love and the divine, between our friendship, loth to rise at midnight, yet overcome by supplication, and the divine:

* It would be instructive to collate (as Braune does in a tabular form) the five, properly six, variations of the expression, each one with a distinctive emphasis. Matt. x. 39; xvi. 25 (Luke ix. 24); Mark viii. 35; Luke xvii. 33; John xii. 25.

* Ver. 36 must not thus be given up; it has not simply passed over from Matthew, but has been omitted because of its similarity with the first.

† "Now should the Apostles discern how the Jewish people appeared in the sight of God" (Roos).

we have now the boldest word used in this kind of analogical argument, which no man would have dared to use concerning the holy God and righteous Father, had not the Son of God himself given it to us. But with all its condescension, the highest majesty is yet vindicated, which can never deny itself or derogate from its own dignity. It is this which is gloriously illustrated in the inexpressible and adorable benignity with which the righteous Judge of all the earth appeals to us short-sighted mortals—If I were such an unjust judge as those which ye have upon earth! But am I such?

Verses 2, 3. A history this, too common in the affairs of this evil world, and even in those of God's people Israel, as the prophetic denunciations against the corrupt judges, and promises to the oppressed widows, abundantly show; two well-known personages, therefore, appear upon the scene, with a third—the enemy—in the background, as we may now observe preliminarily. Judges and officers were to be appointed in Israel in all the gates of all their cities, who should judge the people with just judgment (Deut. xvi. 18), and in the time of Jesus we find still existing the judicatures mentioned in Matt. v. 21, 22. But this κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας, "unjust judge," despises all those injunctions which were given to the judges in the law (Exod. xxiii. 6-9; Lev. xix. 15: Deut. i. 16, 17; comp. 2 Chron. xix. 6, 7); and that not from any forgetfulness of duty, but with a bold and proud confidence rebelliously spurns it all—I know it all, but I fear not (the possible sometime punishment)! If there were only the fear of God, the beginning of wisdom and the foundation of the supplicating trust of faith, that of itself would teach him to have regard to the urgent supplications of a poor mortal, the cry for right and the complaint against injustice. But this is meant in the delineation of this bad character, in its wider sense, as it expresses the thoughts of his own heart in ver. 6; and not in the other sense which ἐντρέπεσθαι, "regard," might bear as a stronger word for reverence or awe, see Matt. xxi. 37; Luke xx. 13; Heb. xii. 9. The presumptuous man thus inverts the true relations of the two sentiments: the higher dignity, which demands consideration and regard, he only thinks of in connection with man; and, as it regards God, thinks only of the power to be feared, which he first scorns as the less thing, and then afterwards declares to himself that not even has he respect for anything human—as more immediately concerning him. Ah, thou proud worm, who settest thyself up for a god, because thou art a judge in a city! Hess is far from extracting the meaning when he superficially says: "He had neither religion nor honorable feeling." For φοβεῖσθαι τὸν θεόν, "to fear God," after all only suggests the slightest beginning of all religion; while ἀνθρώπους ἐντρέπεσθαι, "to regard men," on the other hand, expresses not merely the fear of people's judgment, the restraint of regard for others' estimate, but the respect for anything apart from self, and then the consideration to regard and alleviate the misery of others, the hearing of their supplication, and fear of their righteous complaint. What worse could be recorded of a man than this? And yet there follows the much worse thing, that he himself in the daring of his heart thus speaks of himself! Over against this man there is the widow, as such troubled and bowed down, and besides that, as is too commonly the case, oppressed by an enemy—not a hard-hearted believer, or anything of that sort, which might allow it to be supposed that the right was not on her side, and that the judge could not be induced to bend to her request by sympathy; but he is a persecutor, against whom she has cause of just complaint—ἐκδίκησόν με, "Avenge me." Schleiermacher would understand this—Give the verdict at any rate, be it for or against me, that I may know the end of this wearisome litigation; but he forgets in this unhappy violation of the spirit of the parable, that in the parallel, ver. 7, ποιεῖν τὴν ἐκδίκησιν, "avenge," both the certain right and the great distress of the petitioner are taken for granted. It is better to translate generally—Do me justice! in which the consequence of the judgment, her being saved from oppression, is of course included. Thus she came to him, that is, repeatedly, for she is to be an example of the μὴ ἐγκακεῖν, "not fainting":* and that is here assumed as afterwards in vers. 4, 5. Consequently ἤρχετο, "came [often]," is equivalent to ventitabat (by which she complied with her own obligation in the city where a judge dwelt); and the οὐκ ἠθέλησεν, "he would not," is a continual refusal of her request and repulsion of the applicant. The enemy was not necessarily mighty or influential (considerations which the proud judge did not take into account, and which would rather have moved him to maintain his official authority by a rigorous sentence), but might have been the judge's friend or favorite; or the poor widow had no largess to bring, without which it was not his fashion to undertake a cause, or she could not pay the costs; or it may be that when she came first he had no inclination to pursue his function, and afterwards persisted in refusing for the sake of proud consistency. What else could a poor widow expect from an unjust judge? Nevertheless she does not desist from urging the judge even as the enemy did not desist from urging her; she does not abandon the hope of pressing through every obstacle by the tenacity of her cry; she adheres simply (possibly with something of hope in God at the bottom, or if the parable must abide in the mere human domain, with eager expectation of man's help in her need) to this one note—Art thou not placed here as a judge to do right and execute justice, especially to the oppressed widow (as many times in Moses, from Exod. xxii. 22 to Deut. xxvii. 19; then also inculcated often in the prophets), and therefore to me? just as in chap. xi., the one makes his appeal to the other—Art thou not my friend?

* On this word, which occurs also as ἐγκακεῖν, from the uncertain and various derivation, see my exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians, ch. iii. 13. It signifies—to desist, give up, especially through lack of strength, to yield in fight; also, to be overcome of evil, to succumb.

For the rest, it must be observed in reference to the interpretation which follows, that the widow represents, not so much an individual soul oppressed and bereft of help, as the people, the congregation of the elect, the church apparently forsaken of God, especially in the last time, as predicted in ch. xvii.; so that in this point we see the connection of the discourse which is either continued in itself, or attached designedly by Luke. Although the church is ever the bride waiting for the marriage and entrance into her home, yet is she, as otherwise described in scripture, the widow, forsaken and solitary (שְׁמָמָה, Isa. liv. 1), a prey to her persecuting enemy. We note well, too, who he is—the same, of whom Richter's Hausbibel says that he is a yet greater jurist than all the Popes and all the Napoleons—the antichrist with Satan behind him.

Verses 4, 5. Ἐπὶ χρόνον, though elsewhere χρόνος signifies a long time, does not mean in in Luke's phraseology the "per multum tempus" of the Vulg., but rather the "aliquamdiu" of Erasmus, or what the English Bible translates "for a while." Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα, "afterward," only indicates generally a certain space; but this formula, as well as the sense of the whole parable, rather requires us to suppose a proportionably hasty overcoming of his inflexibility through her incessant coming, and ever-urgent supplication—for the shameless man could not long endure this, as the words spoken in his heart betray. These words, however, must be carefully observed, and an undertone will be perceived in them which most expositors overlook.

First of all, assuredly, the Cyclopæan arrogance* of this language spoken ἐν ἑαυτῷ, "within himself," exhibits his shamelessness in full perfection; for he is thinking of God's undenied existence and presence even while he contemns him, and puffs from him all mankind (יָסִיחַ בָּהֶם Psa. x. 5, xii. 5) when an unfortunate child of man thwarts his purpose. And thus he will as godless and as shameless apologize to himself, as it were, for acting inconsistently in once doing right, overcoming the εἰ, "though," by a διάγε, "yet." Did he refuse before, and that absolutely—wherefore will he now do the right? Because this widow troubleth me (this exacting I is more than God or man!)—compare ch. xi. 7, 8, and note the slight oblique reproof which these words might suggest to the Apostles, who once, Matt. xv. 23, presumed to impute to Jesus the being accessible to such a motive for helping a poor woman. This becomes intolerable to the judge, he must make an end of it, that she may not by incessantly coming with ever-waxing boldness utterly destroy his peace. We understand ὑπωπιάζειν (literally to smite so as to discolor, and especially the face, then used proverbially, as in 1 Cor. ix. 27,) as a strong expression of vexatious harassing; as we should now say—"The woman torments me to death!" Not that he actually feared violence; εἰς τέλος does not mean that in the end she might even proceed to blows, but as belonging to ἐρχομένη it implies ceaselessly coming, in which sense it is a translation of לָנֶצַח. (The Syr. is here quite correct—לבבל צרך). It is this incessant coming which he terms ὑπωπιάζειν or obtundere, and he will endure it no longer. Quite correctly has Luther for ἐκδικήσω—Ich will sie retten, it is my will to right her, I will μετὰ ταῦτα, "afterward," do what ἐπὶ χρόνον, "for a while," I would not—Tel est mon plaisir, (such is my pleasure), or with the Cyclops—θυμός με κελεύει, (my spirit bids me). That is, so thinks the daring man that he means, but it is nevertheless not so; rather is his θυμός, "or spirit," overcome, as himself confesses, he can endure it no longer and must make an end of it. And why is this? Might he not have thrown off the burden by preventing her coming at all, inflicting upon herself the blows. Wherefore then did he continue so long to hold on to the mere "I will not!"? What makes him feel her coming and beseeching to be as blows in his face? We see, in short, that the man is not so utterly without feeling, not so hopelessly wicked as he had predicated of himself, and as the Lord on that account had spoken of him as being; it is not quite true that he feared not God nor regarded man. For he actually regards τὴν χήραν ταύτην, a poor, helpless woman, who besides that ran to him with her trouble; he has within him a respect, not confessed to himself for the supplication of a wretched woman for her rights—for he is a judge, and it cannot but remind him of God, whose prerogative it is to hear the cry of the afflicted widow and the fatherless child (Exod. xxii. 22, 23). Here we find, then, in the midst of the apparently awful contrast, a secret transition to the application, and a ground whereon to rest it. And shall God, who has placed this almost inextinguishable feeling in the heart of man, which prevents him from finally rejecting persistent supplication, not himself hear our prayer? He who planted such an ear shall he not hear? (Psa. xciv. 9).*

Verses 6-8.—It might seem that the application should obviously be—Behold here what the poor widow did! But more to the point, more striking, more convincing, and more in harmony with the distinctive tendency of the parable, is the impressive inference from the ἐκδικήσω, "I will avenge," of the judge, whose

* Οὐ γάρ Κύκλωπες Διὸς αἰγιόχου ἀλέγουσιν, οὐδὲ θεῶν μακάρων, ἐπεὶ πολὺ φέρτεροί εἰμεν· Οὐδ, ἄν ἐγὼ Διὸς ἔχθος ἀλευάμενος περιδοίμην οὔτε σοῦ, οὐθ' ἑτάρων, εἰ μὴ θυμός με κελεύει (Odyss. ix. 275-278). Now latterly our philosophers and critics have become such Cyclopes with the one eye of their θυμός, just as according to Seneca, Epist. 29 (cited by Eyth), philosophy influenced one—ut sine metu deorum hominumque vivas!

* This, at least, corresponds better to our feeling of the subject than to regard the judge as κριτὴς τῆς ἀδικίας absolutely, and to the end utterly without feeling; or as Alford says, His very ἐκδίκησις was ἀδικία, because he did it from self-regard and not from a sense of duty.

ἀδικία, "injustice," even in spite of himself is obliged to give way to the willingness of God to rescue man, and especially to help his crying elect. Shall he not avenge? * and, moreover, whom? Even the poor woman goes to him also as a Judge; but he is much more than that upon the throne of his kingdom: for here are his own elect, loved from eternity and called according to the purpose of his grace, to whose good all things must minister, and for whose salvation's sake the times of judgment and calamity are to be shortened (Matt. xxiv. 22). They must indeed for a while suffer from the enemy, but they cease not to cry for help before the throne of the Highest—day and night being a proverbial expression most significantly used for the πάντοτε of vers. 1 (Luke ii. 37). He who prays by night can be no hypocrite before man in his prayer; his soul is possessed by such fervor towards God as permits him not to rest. Further, the μὴ ἐκκακεῖν,† "not to faint," which was not tautological at the commencement, appears now, in the light of the parable, to denote the ever-increasing vehemence and zeal of a fervent and impetuous βοᾷν, or "crying." Let there be no darkening question here interposed—Art thou who criest certainly one of the elect? It is enough just to convert the proposition—Those who cry day and night unto God are by that token the elect! They implore not the ἐκδίκησις, or "avenging," of God, simply inasmuch as they suffer oppression and wrong from the evil world and its prince (Psa. ciii. 6, cxlvi. 7); for they know well that this injustice is, on account of their sins, no injustice as before the highest tribunal of God. But their faith in the promise, through which they have received the election of grace (see presently ver. 8), pleads with a sacred importunity, such as the Lord in ver. 1 impresses with intensity in the expression δεῖν, "ought," for the merciful deliverance which is their appropriate right now as being the elect, as much as the ἐκδίκησις was the due of the poor and oppressed widow. That ἐκδικησόν με, "avenge me," corresponds with the frequent prayer in the Psalms (κρῖνόν με κύριε, Psa. xxvi. 1, liv. 3; εἰς τὴν δίκην μου, Psa. xxxv. 23; ὅτι ἐποίησας τὴν κρίσιν μου καὶ τὴν δίκην μου, Psa. ix. 5), comp. furthermore 1 Macc. ii. 67.

How does the Lord then point the application? Assuredly what is involved here is the crying day and night, the waiting in faith for the certain answer to the question—Will he not grant the request, and avenge? For there is in the ἐπὶ χρόνον, "for a while," the appearance as if he would not come. But now when the Lord indicates this point of incidence between the parable and its interpretation, he designs to make prominent in it the contrast for stronger assurance, and as preparing the way for his own λέγω ὑμῖν, "I tell you." Luther's translation of that most important and most profound additional clause: "und sollte (er nicht) Geduld darüber haben?"—and have patience with them?" is most assuredly incorrect, and contains no clear sense at all; apart from the fact that μακροθυμεῖν, "bearing long," does not signify the merciful hearing of the request, but obviously a tarrying and putting off to grant it. Others read it as a question—"And doth he linger and hesitate about it? No, he certainly doth not, but is willing at once!" But this would be contrary to that doctrine of the divine delay and lingering which we find recognised in other parts of Scripture, and even in some of our Lord's other parables: the appearance, yea, the reality of such delay is essential here to the entire matter in hand. To change the reading μακροθυμῶν for μακροθυμεῖ*, would not essentially affect the sense; and we cannot but think that it corresponds with the fundamental idea of the parable, which is concentrated upon this point, to regard the καί as here standing for καίπερ; and hence Meyer corrects it—Although He forbears towards them; and the English translation has very properly—Though He bear long. But it is not just as Hassler seizes it—For he is forbearing towards them, not troubled and harassed by their unjust importunity. The most obvious and plain sense of this well-known μακροθυμεῖν† must ever be the letting them pray on without granting their prayer, the lingering with the help, the keeping silence, (Psa. lxxxiii. 2), which causes the impatient petitioners to cry out—Alas! O Lord, how long? How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood? (Rev. vi. 10). Why withdrawest Thou Thy hand, even Thy right hand? pluck it out of Thy bosom—and make an end! (Psa. lxxiv. 11). But we see (as Roos hits the point most pertinently) that what in the unjust judge is hardness of heart is in God forbearance"—since wisdom and love move him for good reasons to delay his relief, and protract their prayers. This forbearance is not to be regarded here, first of all, as forbearance towards a wicked world, lengthening the limits of probation (2 Pet. iii. 9), though that also is combined with it; for the ἐπ' αὐτοῖς, "with them," shows the elect to be its object. There is a mystery here, the solution of which is left to the enforcement of a faith that will not be baffled by it; an indication of important reasons, which God must have for such delay in the case of his own elect. If we seize this aright, then may we go on to observe, penetrating still deeper, that there is now a col-

* This is of itself much stronger than the German—Sollte Gott nicht auch?—(Should not God?) The reading ποιήσει is acknowledged by Winer, among others, to be more admissible, though Lachmann prefers ποιήσῃ: but both readings would in truth concur in the same sense.

† Strangely by Schleiermacher made to refer, in spite of the aim of the whole parable, to the blending of working with prayer!

* Which Bengel prefers as insignis lectio, and says: "Prioris membri verbum in textu transit in participium βοώντων, alterius membri verbum stat immotum, μακροθυμεῖ, longanimis est?"

lateral idea which was prematurely urged before: Although he indeed does not help on account of his being fatigued with their prayer"—for he significantly abides the crying much longer than the unjust judge, yet it is to him the pleasure of his love to be urgently and fervently and perseveringly prayed unto; he would be overcome by the true Israelites as he was by their forefather Israel!* Thus we see that he does not once drive away his petitioners as the judge had done many times; he merely keeps silence, and does not grant the request, though he patiently listens to the pleading continually. Here find we the "exceedingly refined meaning of μακροθυμεῖν" which Olshausen refers to, which, though as a fact seemingly discouraging, itself becomes an argument of confidence—"Thou hearest my request, however; therefore thou wilt assuredly grant it!" For faith thus tested and disciplined can cry, "It was only to purify me wholly, that thou couldst delay so long!" The patience of the Lord towards the world is at the same time a patience with us in order to our salvation: see 2 Pet. iii. 15 as following ver. 9.

Oh how will he then avenge and vindicate his own elect, and how speedily! Oh how will he reveal himself in superabundant kindness to the desolate one, when the reproach of her widowhood is remembered no more, declaring himself to be her Bridegroom and Husband! (Isa. liv. 1–5). Every act of salvation, and every urgent request granted, is indeed in a certain sense a coming of the Lord, oftentimes taking place when "least hoped for, and when the energy of faith and prayer was almost extinguished"—and this preliminary application may therefore be justified.† But the ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, "on the earth," is not only a coming from heaven, a descending with his saving power generally; it signifies the coming of the Son of man, that is, in his personal, visible presence (chap. xvii. 22)—as everywhere so here it is to be eschatologically understood. We have already referred to the question whether a connection with chap. xvii. may be here established; the αὐτοῖς, unto them, chap. xviii. 1, cannot be said, "without doubt," to continue the former discourse, still less must the καί, and, be pressed to mean item de præparatione ad futura illa (also concerning preparation for that future). It may be so, it may not: for ἔλεγε δὲ καί is after all the general formula for something new, as αὐτοῖς is a general definition of the disciples. We can very well understand, without any other aid, why in this last period of his teaching (since Luke ix. 51) the Lord often came back to his Parousia (coming).

The ἐν τάχει, "speedily," may be regarded as the Divine measurement for the whole period of forbearing delay. He cannot hasten to deliver his people, and reveal himself sooner than this wise μακροθυμεῖν, or long-suffering, prescribes (hence, e.g., Rom. xvi. 20). His operations are ruled by his prudence, one thing after the other, everything must be done that is preparatorily required; and in the end this ἐν τάχει will have its proper and essential truth, in the sudden conclusion of all: this fulness of meaning the same expression is found to bear in all its comprehensiveness in Rev. i. 1. "But will the Son of man, when he cometh, find faith?" Thus generally taken the word would be too rigorous, especially after the crying saints have been referred to; and it seems to verge upon an entire failure in the work of redemption. This is not, however, the language here used; the article in τὴν πίστιν, "[the] faith," points especially to that faith of unwearied and unwearable prayer, as it were, that absolute, perfected, consummate, faith which the parable has set before us. It is true, viewed under two aspects, first, that the slightest, weakest faith (often being encouraged as such) has, as being faith, much power; and then, on the other hand, that "a slender, tottering faith is something infinitely little, yea, as nothing, when we compare it with the great substance of the Gospel, with the immeasurable love of God: the father tells his child that he has learned nothing when he has only learned a little, and that he shows no obedience, when his obedience is but slight" (Roos). We think, moreover, that the Lord in his gracious strictness thus puts the faith of his elect in question, only that he may found upon it a great assurance, and say: The Son of man, on that account, will not push his delay to the uttermost, for then even his elect might not be saved, they themselves might fall altogether into the ἐκκακεῖν, or "fainting," of despair, as if there were no Judge in heaven, and as if there did not sit upon the throne of grace a Redeemer who long ago judged and triumphed over the enemy. Let us ever humbly mourn over our want of faith, and acknowledge that the ἐκδίκησις τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν, "avenging of the elect," will finally spring from that unmerited grace which will put an end to their trials, and that it will not be the result of the efforts of our wrestling prayer alone.* For the ἀντίδικος, "adversary," as he has the power upon earth, so has he to the last a minimum of right against the elect, which, however, the consummating mercy, that always and conclusively perfects our faith in answering it, will utterly annihilate and extinguish; so that we shall obtain justice against Satan, and rejoice in it for ever. Thus will the Lord judge the cause of his people, and make them to rejoice in his mercy (Ecclus. xxxv. 21).

* Lange, according to his view as given above—"Though he deals with them in his great and incomprehensible way."

† As Baxter (Saints' Rest) begins his book: "When the Son of God comes with recovering grace, and discoveries of a spiritual and eternal happiness and glory, he finds not faith in man to believe it"—with a spiritual application to the Lord's coming into the heart.

* For it would be blasphemous to say, "Faith doeth it all!" If Jehovah had not mercifully said, "It is enough," Israel would never have overcome.

THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN.

(Luke xviii. 10–14.)

The πεπεισθότες ἐφ' ἑαυτοῖς, who trust in themselves, in the fixed and presumptuous imagination that they are righteous, have not the πίστις, or "faith," which the Son of man seeks upon earth; their unqualified assumption ὅτι ἐσμὲν δίκαιοι, "that we are righteous," is contradicted by the counter-testimony of their undeniable ἐξουθενεῖν τοὺς λοιπούς, "despising others"—words which, in this superscription of the parable, sound almost like that previous haughty ἄνθρωπον οὐκ ἐντρέπομαι, "I regard not man." These self-righteous ones to whom the Lord spoke were not Pharisees; for in that case (as Schleiermacher scarcely needed to insist) the figure of a Pharisee would not have been held up to them as a *similitude. The πρός τινας, "unto certain," indeed continues within the circle of the αὐτοῖς, "unto them," ver. 1, and refers to certain disciples, whose spirit is thus indicated as being peculiar, improper, and perverted. We can scarcely assume that these τινές had given occasion for our Lord's words by any outward expression whether of trust in their own righteousness or of contempt toward others. The πρός, "unto," is, as in ver. 1 ("to the end that"), the Evangelist's intimation of the tendency and aim of the parable, the superscription of which is thus given; and he bids us understand that it was not intended merely for those who were then addressed, but that we must find the τινές of the Lord's application among his disciples of all time, and possibly in ourselves: and it is to this that the significant article in τοὺς πεποιθότας, the ones trusting ("which trusted"), and the present εἰσί, are ("were"), belonging to it, seem to point. It is often said, one expositor echoing another, that these proud μαθηταί, or disciples, might, after hearing the preceding parables, have declared their spirit in some such way as this—"If prayer be the question, we can pray well enough, better than others; and as to faith, that is not lacking in us," and so forth; but we regard such a connection with what precedes as neither indicated in Luke's words, nor probable or indeed conceivable in itself. Assuredly the brief, condensed, and diffident prayer of this first publican-repentance, does form an excellent pendant to the persistent crying of God's elect; and, taking the two parables together, we have in conjunction the boldness of faith and the depth of humility which co-exist in all true prayer; but all these allusions and coincidences, like those before mentioned, must be referred to the tenor of Luke's purpose, according to which he, from ch. xvii. 1 onwards, binds together, in a profoundly pregnant design, individual subjects of various kinds, and not in immediate historical sequence. (See further ch. xvii. 11, 20, xviii. 1, 10, 15, 18, 31, 35, where are merely parallel formulæ, quite distinct from those which we find in ch. xix. 1, 11, 28.) If on the assumption of a historical connection after ch. xvii., the Pharisees would have to be regarded as among his hearers, this of itself would not, as we have already said, prove anything to the contrary; for Olshausen's assertion goes too far when it declares the exhibition of a Pharisee in a παραβολή, or parable, before Pharisees themselves to be an altogether inadmissible theory.

Our Lord, moreover, persisted in his unvaried, unbroken, uniform controversy with the Pharisees, from the Sermon on the Mount down to the final Woes. But this parable has too often lost to our ears its simple power and grandeur, in consequence of our neglecting, through our very familiarity with it, to transpose ourselves into its scenes and realise its living impression upon those who heard it first. The simple narrative begins with the every day occurrence of two men going up to the temple; though the sharp contrast which is suddenly called up to the mind (a Pharisee and a Publican, sounding very much like in India—a Brahmim and a Pariah,) would excite the attention to a high pitch, and lead the people to expect something anti-pharisaical in what was to follow: although the righteous man comes off very well at first, his thankfulness before God seems well-grounded, and all that he says in his prayer is literally true. The hearers around must have said—"Verily they are just such, these holy men, even so do they in their very hearts regard their righteousness! And does not all this avail before God?" Then comes, forward in contrast with him the penitent, broken-spirited Publican, so graphically drawn in his reality, that one cannot but say—Such a Publican must often have exhibited just that same penitence, since the kingdom of heaven commenced among men. Many among the listening people (for this parable we feel was spoken openly before all) might say, yielding to their first impulse—"Now this poor sinner will be also justified and accepted with the other;" and with what a flash of sudden amazement would they hear the supreme utterance of God's own decision on the prayers—This man justified and not that! This unveiling of their hearts before God is almost like the sudden withdrawal of the veil of Hades in ch. xvi.; but that the prayers themselves, the contrast of which must have seized all consciences, had prepared the way for it.

* Lange, indeed, opposes this obvious and often-repeated remark, by putting the converse—in that case, he says, no Publican can be supposed to be present, and no Priest or Levite when the parable of the good Samaritan was delivered. But, apart from the incongruence of the last example (for the Priest and Levite there are not the central figures), this argument overlooks the distinction between the mere listening of the Pharisees and Publicans, and their being expressly the persons addressed in the parable. Assuredly we think that the Lord would not have addressed to Publicans, as Publicans, a parable concerning a justified Publican. [The force of this argument is not evident to us at least. To a mixed audience of Pharisees and Publicans the contrast in this parable would rather seem to be highly pertinent.—Am. Ed.]

Verse 10. Two men go up to pray: in this simple introduction the right hearer will discern the aim and spirit of the whole; for whatever one man may be in the estimation of others, "his name hath been named already, and it is known that it is man," that is, a sinner before God, who "cannot contend with him," but must sue for mercy, (Eccles. vi. 10). The Publican's prayer is the only true prayer, not simply as the genuine expression of a first repentance, but also as the continuous ground of all prayer. But the name of God is not at once uttered, it is left to the petitioners themselves: they go into the temple, that is, their contemplated "praying" appears at first as a similar external work in both cases; the process of the parable will show, whether they both did actually go to God and truly pray to him. And it was altogether right in both cases, for the house of God is especially a house of prayer, and remains so even in the New Testament, where, however, Solomon's word concerning coming to hear (Eccles. iv. 17), has much more weight than in God's ancient typical service it could have, before the Word of reconciliation was set up. A Pharisee and a Publican—this sounded, to the people long bound and habituated to the teaching of their judges (their Gooroos, to refer once more to India,) very much like—A pious man, a saint; and a right proper sinner! We can scarcely realize vividly enough how astounding was our Saviour's declaration of war against the Pharisees; not less directly in the teeth of all prejudice and habitual custom than when afterwards his servants went forth announcing among the heathen—that their gods were no gods! For the specious sanctity of such devotees is more dazzling, and less revolted against by the instinct of the conscience, than all the names and glories of false gods. These two men presenting their prayers will probably suggest Cain and Abel (just as at Matt. v. 23)—but which in that case is Cain? The Publican, who yet strangely dares to tread the sanctuary? Let us hear what and how they pray, and mark how great a difference there may be in the praying of two different men.

Verses 11, 12. The great man has appropriately the precedence, and he was first named. But before we hear him, we must look at him, and so livingly reproduce the scene before our eyes. Then follows immediately, and very significantly for the ears of those who hear aright, πρὸς ἑαυτόν, "with himself," whereas we should have expected προσεύχεσθαι πρὸς τὸν θεόν, "praying to God." The prodigal son came εἰς ἑαυτόν, "to himself," the unjust steward pondered prudently ἐν ἑαυτῷ, "within himself," this man turns back again still, even when designing to pray to God only, πρὸς ἑαυτόν, "with himself," these are three not capricious gradations of the expression. But we must not, if we rightly understand this, construe the πρὸς ἑαυτόν, "with himself," with προσηύχετο, "prayed," for that would not harmonize with the ταῦτα, "thus," additionally following:* but it belongs to the σταθείς, "stood," as the corresponding μακρόθεν ἑστώς, "standing afar off," shows; and both design to set before us the two men in the most expressive manner, as the Lord proceeds to set forth their several prayers as heard by God. What then may be the precise meaning of σταθείς, "stood," thus absolutely used, with regard to the former? Alford thinks that, as contrasted with the ἑστώς, "standing," afterwards of the Publican (who stood merely, and remained as he came in), it is equivalent to placing himself in position (answering to being seated of the other usual posture)—in a studied place or attitude. This is involved in the expression, as we shall presently admit, but scarcely in the expression as it stands alone and without the additional clause, which, apart from that, will not harmonize with προσηύχετο, "prayed." Externally the position of both seems just similar, for each stands apart by himself—but what a difference under this seeming similarity! We must somewhat anticipate in order to catch this striking trait in the delineation of their character. Ἑστώς in itself indicates the prodigal's unstudied standing immediately after his entrance into the sanctuary; indeed it is almost left uncertain whether the fear-stricken man entered at all εἰς τὸ ἱερόν, into the temple; the μακρόθεν, "afar off," might be taken in a more emphatic sense—he dared not enter in, deeming himself unworthy; for his earnestness in prayer looked towards the sanctuary of God, from which his humility felt itself justly excluded. On the other hand, the σταθείς signifies something intentional, he placed himself, (ch. xix. 8,)—and we naturally ask, where and for what purpose? The answer is—in a separate place, alone by himself, which πρὸς ἑαυτόν, as the external expression of an internal involution in self, must imply; even if, as Rosenmüller observes, πρὸς ἑαυτόν should never mean solus or seorsim, like καθ' ἑαυτόν, yet this lies in the symbolical significance of the word. Thus it is not as Von Gerlach says (though otherwise rightly interpreting)—"He placed himself apart boldly, in his usual place;" but he turned only to himself (not to God), withdrawing himself into himself (from others), consequently carefully retreating from the impure neighborhood of the other despised offerer of prayer whom he met there, exhibiting himself apart, as much as possible, from all others as the worshipper, the righteous man (as the Publican terms himself the sinner:) thus he stands not, properly speaking, before God at all, but only before men,* and does not even confound himself with other Pharisees, who are included among the "other men" of his prayer. It was an offence to him, at first, that he was obliged to go up with the Publican at all, and with all the more solicitude, on that account, he takes his own proper place.† Thus both stand apart, each for himself; but the one is designedly in the spirit of pride turned to the contemplation of himself, the other involuntarily in the spirit of humility remains far off from that God in heaven whom he truly supplicates.

And now for the so-called prayer of that one. Ταῦτα προσηύχετο, "prayed thus,"—profuse and stately enough, at least in comparison with the Publican's λέγειν, "saying," bursting from the depths of his heart in one deep sigh, concerning which we might suppose the Publican himself saying—"Alas! I a sinner also went up (but once, or this time in full earnest) to pray; but as I stood there, I could not pray, I could only utter one word—God be merciful to me a sinner!" The Pharisee is not thus embarrassed: let us hear him! First comes the unrestrained and bold invocation of the name of God—so far well, happy they who lay hold of their privilege of entrance into his presence! "I thank thee" —that comes next, and, as it might seem, still better; for is not thankfulness to God proper, and seasonable, and blessed in all places and at all times? The angels only praise God, they have at least in their happy sufficiency nothing to pray for; we men have to thank God for the double benefit of creation and redemption; and that may be a high and heavenly prayer which, forgetting petition, lifts up before the presence of God thanksgiving alone. Still more: this holy man does not praise God for any earthly blessing which might have been vouchsafed, nor for any common benefit or aid such as less pious men than he might be ready enough to acknowledge to God's glory; but he thanks God for this, that he commits not sin, that he is not a sinner like other men. And is it for God's grace that he is thankful, that grace which had brought him to this, which had saved, and purified, and preserved his soul from sin? Ah no, far enough is he from that; for what read we next? That I am not as other men are—in this treacherous, this presumptuous am, the wretch within suddenly shows himself as he is; and all that good beginning is resolved into mere hypocrisy and factitious conventionality of words! Only a deceitful compliment to God, assumed to give his words the form of prayer. We mark at once, as the degenerate prayer goes on from worse to worse, why he has not anything to supplicate like other men have, and why his "I thank thee!" is a mere empty form of words, in which God only is the receiving party. Genuine thanksgiving, even if it begins, must proceed onward to confession —for I am worthy of nothing, less than the least of thy mercies. Turn to 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10, and see how another, once likewise a Pharisee, thanks in genuine gratitude the grace of God that he is what he is, a laborer above all the rest of the Apostles. But our Pharisee knows nothing whatever of sin or of grace in relation to himself. "I am a righteous man fundamentally, and since I am such, I was never anything else." The wretched man intends to pray, and has made his beginning with "O God;" but since he finds himself wanting in nothing (nay, out of his external πάντα ὅσα κτῶμαι, "all that I possess," he can give his tribute), he passes by praying altogether, and proceeds forthwith to thanksgiving. But even in this there is nothing but himself for him to think of, himself, the complete and consummate Pharisee is all—that he is not like other men! Yes, it is even literally—he is not ὥσπερ οἱ λοιποὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων, like the rest of mankind; for he despises τοὺς λοιπούς, the rest, ("others,") totally and in mass. There are only two classes of mankind in the presence of God, and himself alone constitutes one! If we do him injustice, his own foolish lips are to blame: indeed he seems to have lost all propriety and rational understanding in what he tells his God. Alas, thou prodigy of mankind, thou single and preëminent man! didst thou not go up as man to the temple to pray, and art thou no longer a man like other men?

Let us hear further: who are then the other men, like whom he is not? Naught but sinners; and he can most magisterially describe and condemn them in all their forms. And does he then so accurately know all other men, far and wide, their life and their hearts? As to their hearts, he thinks as little as he does of his own; but he has seen sins enough externally committed among them (that is assuredly true); in himself, however, he has seen none (and that, alas, God pity him! is true also). Extortioners they are—selfishness places that first, mammon being its supreme good, and the aggression of others upon that being the most grievous offence; we will leave it undetermined whether there is here a secret side-glance at this Publican, whom as his abhorred fellow-worshipper he has in view from the beginning. Then come the unjust of manifold sorts in common; and then again immediately (for he must sum up hastily in order to arrive at himself), that one more great scandalous sin may be named—very familiar to his thoughts, though he repels it from his own soul—the adulterers. But the enumeration is very far from running through all the commandments and prohibitions: idolatry at the beginning, and evil desire in the heart at the close of the decalogue, never occur to his thoughts. If we could suppose God to answer him by setting before him the true catalogue, with the question appended in each case—Art thou not such thyself, at least in my sight? then might a revealing light have penetrated to his soul, and he might have recognised in himself the extortioner, and even the adulterer (according to John viii. 9, and especially in the spiritual meaning). But he has never allowed the word or prohibition of God to speak to his conscience, and therefore he can speak to God with yet greater confidence; reaching the climax of his presumption when he scornfully points with his finger, and utters those fearful words of vanity (Isa. lviii. 9; Prov. vi. 13)—Or even as this Publican! In all this he condemns himself; for it is his misery, not to be like other men who are conscious of their sin, and that he does not pray like this petitioner standing before him. Invading God's prerogative, he gives judgment before either he or the other had been answered; he has no eyes and no feeling for the humility which loudly speaks in the external appearance of him who was truly praying; for what is prayer to him, what can he know thereof even while he is appearing to pray? Thus his inmost thoughts come frankly and plainly out into expression in this first portion of his prayer—in that he is no hypocrite, but "sincerely trusted in himself that he was righteous, and therefore he tells that to his God in the prayer which God alone heard" (Wesley). The Saviour shows in this parable, how "the internal character of the soul reveals itself in prayer, that is, when it is uttered not according to prescribed forms, but in its own words and without dissimulation" (Roos). There is a profound gentleness in the circumstance that this parable, which would graciously create shame in the sinner by the promise of mercy, does not exhibit one of those hypocrites who could never have undertaken to say before God that they were not as other men, but one of the better sort, *one who in his profound self-deception may be regarded as sincere. The Lord makes the experiment with such a one, whether he would learn wisdom by seeing himself thus exhibited in a glass (for the parable is doubtless intended for Pharisees generally); and to his disciples he exhibits such a character in parable, confronted with which the sincere "God be merciful to me a sinner!" might lead some of them to smite upon their breasts, and be a deductio ad absurdum. In the hearing of men, many Pharisees among his own disciples might be very ready with their "merciful to me a sinner!" at the same time that they think in their hearts, "I thank thee that I am not like the children of the world and other natural men:" both a mere form of speech, the first in that case the worst of all.* This man here under the law has not gone so far; he would, indeed, justify himself before God (ch. xvi. 15), since he altogether forgets that God knoweth his heart —and how ill he succeeded in that! He places the abused name of God first, which taken in vain at once condemns him; the lying thanksgiving follows; and, finally, his contempt of others, and uncharitable condemnation of his neighbor whom he sees before him in God's presence, makes evident the groundlessness of his πεποίθησις, or self-confidence; as the violation of the second table ever presupposes a trespass against the first.

* So that the same sense comes out which has been sought in προσεύχεσθαι πρὸς ἑαυτόν, only more conformably with the occasion and the phraseology.

† Does the Lord mean to say—Separated from the unclean Publican according to the usual custom? Grotius denies this, and says—Nam mos id ferebat, ut publicani in atrio Gentilium, Pharisæi in atrio Israelitarum starent (for custom required that Publicans should stand in the Gentile's court, Pharisees in that of the Israelites). But it is this very custom which our Lord paints, only he exhibits this Pharisee, who would have a distinct atrium iustorum for himself apart from other people, as carrying the matter beyond mere custom.

But the Pharisee-prayer has also a second part, a second table, in which the beloved I, not like other men, must come forward with its evidence, and impute to self all its authentic righteousness; so that instead of receiving his thanks God himself must conversely be made its debtor (Isa. lviii. 2). After he has repelled every imputation of violating the prohibitions, he does not pass to the positive ordinances of rectitude and mercy (not knowing anything of these, as it seems); but, making a great leap over this chasm, mentions at once the works of supererogation! His prayer, as a whole, may be variously arranged. First of all, he shows what he is, then what he does, and yet again what he gives. Or it may run thus: My conduct to my neighbor—all this I am not! My service to God—I diligently fast, and beyond the commandment! My fulfilment of the law —I go beyond its requirements, tithing even in things doubtful! (ch. xi. 42). He now reaches the end, and knows no more; even the alms (which, indeed, might be part of the fasting) are remarkably enough pretermined while he thinks of his mint and cummin; as to his official duty to help other people, so that they may become such as he is (Acts xxvi. 29), of that he has not the most distant thought. Even the fasting, which should have led to his internal mortification in order to true prayer, he despatches or achieves† twice in the week as a work of supererogation (Mondays and Thursdays beyond the commandment, according to the then custom). On the Sabbath itself he enjoys all the more complacently his meal; and the question may arise, whether or not with ἁρπαγὴ καὶ ἀκρασία, "extortion and excess," Matt. xxiii. 25. (Thou Sunday-Christian, dost thou pray only once in the week, when thou goest into the temple?) Finally, in his beautiful conclusion, πάντα ὅσα κτῶμαι, "all that I possess," he reposes serenely, over against the God whom he invokes, on his mammon (jactat possessiones); as we popularly lay the emphasis upon the last word—of all that I possess! When we look narrowly it is not κέκτημαι, hold as property, but κτῶμαι, that is, "of all which I acquire, obtain by my efforts, produce;" thus making the words still worse in their significance, for he procures for himself all that he possesses. Even this κτῶμαι, which might at last have driven him to a repetition of his thankfulness for what God had given him, stands in blunt contrast with his εὐχαριστῶ σοι, "I thank thee"—thank thou me for what I give out of my acquired possessions! He can connect God and his own poor, wealthy I with its appendage, much more comfortably to his own mind than can the Publican, whose own probably not inconsiderable πάντα ὅσα κτῶμαι, "all that I possess," begins to weigh down his heart.

* "And in that fashion there are enough found to imitate this Publican, as they pray Our Father; they have heard the word that God is ready always to forgive poor sinners, and they have learned to smite upon their breasts, and in word and gesture closely to copy the Publican, so that one might swear, even they themselves might almost swear, that they are precisely in the state of this poor penitent. But all, meanwhile, is mere deception; they are Pharisees like the other, no better." So Luther in his sermon, fundamentally expounding the narrative as a parable.

* For "this self-deception, such a self-justifying estimate of self is possible, without any rank hypocrisy; it is to be found, alas! only too often among so-called excellent and sincere men" (Zeller, Monatsbl. 1844, No. 10).

† And, indeed, without much difficulty, like the Romanists now. "What was easier in the warm east, and where the day ended at six, than to fast a whole day? The great meal of the day would be in the evening" (Braune).

Verse 13. That the proud worshipper had most formally and ceremonially prayed, with uplifted eyes and hands, we may gather from the contrast which is now given: the humble man, remembering in the temple God and his throne in heaven (Matt. xxiii. 21, 22), and the invocation of that God being a great reality in his mouth, regards himself as unworthy even to lift up his eyes (Ezra ix. 6. Prayer of Manasses ver. 9, comp. with Prov. xxx. 12, 13)—οὐδὲ τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς, not even his eyes, not to say his hands, which the Pharisee stretches forth as a model statue of devotion. We strongly doubt whether it may be said that "the Publicans in Jerusalem were not so utterly godless, but that they remembered to go up to the temple at the time of prayer;" for these "sinners" had the reputation of not being hypocrites in their sinful life, and the appearance of a Publican in the temple might have been a very infrequent thing. The Pharisees were at home there, and their piercing glances would repel all whose thorough earnestness did not drive them to the house of prayer; and, as a rule, he also whose profound sense of need did not urge him would the rather absent himself, as his coming would never be imputed to him as an act of righteousness while he continued a "Publican." But this one has come under the mighty impulse of a first repentance, and as the whole makes evident, has gone up his sorrowful and burdened way; so much the more does the nearness of God in his sanctuary seize upon his spirit, so that it seems to him as if every man who beholds him sees into his sinful heart with the eyes of God himself.* The concentrated pang of deepest shame so keenly afflicts him, that he, without well knowing what he does, adopts and uses the ceremony of repentance in profound sincerity—he smites upon his breast, as the people did afterwards under the cross (ch. xxiii. 48)—with the ancient expression of sorrow and bitterest complaint, see Nah. ii. 8, comp. with Luke viii. 52; xxiii. 27; Matt. xi. 17. Ubi dolor, ibi manus (where the pain lies, there the hand presses). He has looked inwardly, and feels that God looks inwardly to his sinful heart; and therefore, as he will not lift up his eyes, so he will not open his mouth to recount and confess his individual deeds, the countless sins of his life: it does not enter his mind to come before God with an enumeration—This, and this, and this, have I done! For that might be, as, alas! it is with many—But other things I have not done, sometimes I have done good things, I am not altogether sin and evil; believe that, O God! Ah no! he does not even dare to say, in all the full bitterness of the word, what he most unconditionally avows and gives to be understood—I am a sinner. Τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ, (lit., to me, the sinner,)—in this τῷ * there is not the comparison which cold observation has detected in it—τῷ καθ' ὑπερβολὴν ἁμαρτωλῷ (the sinner by preëminence). Oh no, he makes no comparison here! The Pharisee, although σταθεὶς πρὸς ἑαυτόν, "standing by himself," casts his eyes around, to mark who was present to behold him; but the Publican has no glance to throw anywhere, he thinks of no other person under heaven. He is thus saved from the error of beginning to think—"Would that I were like other holy and righteous people, like this Pharisee!" "To the Pharisee all are sinners and he only is righteous; to the Publican all are righteous and he only the sinner."† There stands the great word in the parable, in all its luminous force, for ever uttering its mighty testimony from that broken and smitten heart; a word which the Pharisees pass by and never find, and which the disciples of Christ are tempted too often to forget to hold fast, as the Apostle Paul did, to the end of life—I the sinner! ‡

* Remark, that the Lord still vindicates the sanctity of the temple as the house of prayer, and does not make the Publican pray there in secret. (Bahrdt was very infelicitous in his observation upon this; commending the Publican because, rejecting all positive religion, he is exhibited as uplifting his heart to the great All-father, with an humble sense of human infirmity!).

* Which Thomas Scott, on his death-bed, most impressively remarked upon. Alford (against Greswell, and without noticing Scott's life, which mentions the circumstance) denies any emphasis in this τῷ, with that philological tenacity which he sometimes manifests. The parallels to which he refers, ch. vi. 24 and xi. 46, are not decisive in his favor. At least ch. vi. 24 retains a similar emphasis; and the singular here is something quite different from the general distinction of a class by the article.

† Westermeier, in his Fortsetzung der evangelischen Hauspostille von Uhle. Roos, too, says with great simplicity, and for our time almost prophetically—"The Publican does not say, I am a creature dependent upon God," etc., etc.

‡ We do not agree with Lange in his contradiction of this general view of the parable: "The

But before this word of penitence has escaped from his overcharged breast and comes to his lips, his faith has already discovered how it may be uttered before God without despair. His shame is not fear or horror; for he, ignorant Publican as he was, has apprehended and understood better than the scripture-learned Pharisee, the gracious promises of the earlier covenant; and he has embraced them with his heart. Be merciful to me! Thus does he urge in his prayer, most probably without knowing it, the beginning of Psa. li., and in the selfsame spirit of penitence and faith. He places this between God and himself the sinner; and thus, with infinitely more boldness than he was conscious of, he perfectly fills up the wide gulf between. Whether in the expression used to that end, ἱλάσθητι (ἱλάσκεσθαι, e.g., כִּפֶּר, Heb. ii. 17), we have here intimated a knowledge on the part of the Publican of a "necessary propitiation" in order to the forgiveness of sins,* so that we may ground upon his words, as a locus classicus, our dogmatic theories, is exceedingly questionable. It is assuredly at first no more than the unbiassed apprehension in his correct feeling of the term of the Israelite phraseology for the forgiveness of sins, which afterwards his better knowledge might explain. As elsewhere the Sept. has ἀφιέναι, and very commonly ἵλεων εἶναι (see e. g. Heb. viii. 12,) for כִּפֶּר (condonare, properly disburthen, remove the load, cognate with כָּפָא and כָּפַל), so also we find it translating sometimes ἱλάσκεσθαι, as in Psa. xxv. 11; Dan. ix 19. Let us not disturb, by our premature and inappropriate dogmatizing, the incomparably profound and affecting unity of this most simple of all penitential prayers, which condenses into its heartfelt brevity the quintessence and sum of Psa. li., and which is either the easiest or the hardest prayer, as it is apprehended by the heart. For the heart of such as this Publican it is for ever easy and obvious enough; almost the only perfectly sincere outpouring of the most internal sorrow and supplication of the wounded heart. One glance upwards, which the heart sends without the eyes—one glance inwardly, where the sinner has sinned against heaven and before God—one groan breathed upwards again—nothing more—brings down the reconciling grace for his justification: then can he joyfully lift up his eyes, and utter now his own genuine—God, I thank Thee!

first repentance and conversion are not depicted here, this Publican is already a man of prayer; all through his pious pilgrimage his petition would be ever for mercy, and even as a ripe believer would thus enter into the house of mercy, profoundly humble." Quite true, and beautiful as an application for us—but as the first meaning of the parable? The Lord makes use of well-known characters, when he speaks of a Pharisee, and a Publican; and no man would have thought of such a rare thing as a pious Publican, ripe in faith! The whole representation assumes that he comes for the first time, and stands before God as a type, the sinner.

* Comp. e. g., Sanders, Papstthum, p. 35, according to which the Publican thinks of the typical mercy-seat in the Holiest: hardly!

Verse 14. And now let us feel the sublime majesty of this Λέγω ὑμῖν, "I tell you," in the mouth of the Son of man, as it indicates God's answer to the respective prayers of these men. "I tell you, for I know; I have seen, I have heard, all this, in many such a case, and in many such prayers." The Lord not only knoweth what is in man, but what also is in the heart and counsel of God concerning man; here he shows himself to know what God worketh in men, and what he giveth to them. The Publican is justified, the sinner is acquitted and pardoned, as soon as and because he has sighed for it. The simple, and indeed singular, ἢ ἐκεῖνος, "rather than the other," is probably the true reading (quite corresponding to ch. xv. 7); but the MSS. have variously changed it for ἤπερ, ἤ γάρ, etc.; and many are even of opinion that παρ' ἐκεῖνον, or ὑπὲρ ἐκεῖνον was originally found in the text. The γάρ which Griesbach admitted, would simply, according to Winer, indicate the question—Or the other? But this so entirely disturbs the emphatically decisive distinction between the two, that even Winer prefers the emendation ἤπερ. Suffice it that its most obvious meaning is assuredly just the simple Hebrew מִן, and means to say—this man was justified before the other; that is, the other was not! For this Luther aptly compares Matt. xxi. 31. How could such a Pharisaical prayer as the one here described, attain to any kind of δικαιοῦσθαι, or justification? The man literally supplicated nothing, least of all justification! We cannot, therefore, imagine how Von Gerlach can say that "all justification before God is not denied to the Pharisee, he is only placed below the Publican!" Was it then that he had only "little forgiven" in his thoughts, like that debtor in the other parable, which is incorrectly paralleled with this? When the application of the parable can be safely detached from its original historico-typical figure, as it is described in the strongest lines by our Lord, and we can clearly discern how far the "Pharisee" may reappear among our Lord's own disciples, then shall we be able to see the milder force of the not undesigned comparative expression.* If a δεδικαιωμένος, or "justified" person, again begins to trust in his righteousness (Ezek. xxxiii. 13, πέποιθεν), the consciousness and the possession of justification begin to depart from him; and he recedes in comparison with the Publican who comes first before God. Therefore despise not such, and never forget that the same grace which ye have received is ready to be offered to the very first and faintest ἱλάσθητι, "be merciful," of the most abandoned reprobate, with the same fulness of love which ye yourselves have experienced.

The contrast and conflict of the two great parties which our Lord so truly describes, goes on through all ages of the church and people of God: the trusting in works and personal merit down to its most subtle forms, and the appeal to free, unconditional grace. Most assuredly our Lord takes one side in his decisive word: and as it respects the great demarcation of character before God, this alternative holds good in all its rigor. But we must be on our guard against the parable, and ourselves distributing all men dogmatically, as they are actually found in various degrees of progress towards that great final demarcation, into the two classes, whose extremes stand here before us in their two exemplars. The young man, for example, who comes forward a few verses further on in the same chapter, who had kept the commandments, and to whom, nevertheless, something is lacking, is in truth neither like this Pharisee nor like this Publican, but his character is conceived as in the intermediate transition. Finally, in its deepest principle we think that they are not always "two different men" who thus "move onwards to the courts of the common temple;* but they oftentimes come together in one and the same man, so that the Pharisee and the Publican put up together one marvellous prayer. Not merely as Westermeier has it, "The mouth often says—God I thank Thee! but the self-seeking heart turns round and gives itself the glory. The confession is—We are all sinners! at bottom, however, all are indeed sinners, but ourselves not." But in the poor heart itself the two voices conflict with one another long after regeneration, like the accusing and excusing in the natural conscience. And it is the masterpiece of the divine grace to consummate at length the great distinction between the two: His μακροθυμία, or long-suffering, bears, forgives, and heals, even when as yet it does not find τὴν πίστιν, the pure trust and reliance upon the foundation of grace without any Pharisaical corruption. It is this which the great utterance at the close is designed to teach us, concerning the being exalted and the being abased, as we have already expounded upon Matt. xxiii. 12, and Luke xiv. 11. In Luke xiv. it proceeded from the expression of pride or humility, but here their internal principle and root is disclosed; Matt. xxiii., however, shows, for the warning of the disciples themselves, that the exaltation and abasement embrace a long process, and many various degrees, before the end of either is attained.

There is another feature which must not be overlooked. The Publican went down to his house: this is not intended simply to round off the narrative which commenced with their going up to the temple; but has a significance of its own. And, first of all, the Lord thereby commends, by a silent antithesis, the Publican's having sought God's consecrated place of prayer, and not having hastily sent up his prayer at his receipt of custom, or in his chamber. Or if the reader thinks commendation here too much, he does not blame him for it. Further, this κατέβη, "went down," in its close connection with δεδικαιωμένος, "justified," indicates that the Lord refers to the consciousness of both, in which the one experiences and is sure of his justification, the other not. Thus the Pharisee goes down as he came, without having silenced that evil conscience which, in spite of all his candid pride, secretly troubled his peace; indeed there impends over his head, while he thus continues to exalt himself, a fearful humiliating blow which will finally alight upon his head, and crush him into the dust. But the Publican, although he returns to his old dwelling (that is, as a bye-thought, although he remains a Publican), goes on his way as a new man, no more a sinner! Justified at first, he is therein, and it will be soon manifestly seen, sanctified also; furnished and ready now to say—God, I thank Thee, that Thou art merciful to me! In this gratitude he performs all good works, of which he had promised nothing, for grace now begins and goes on to exalt him. He gives to his God not a tenth merely, but all that he has, all the pleasant fruits which now grow in his new paradise (Cant. iv 17).

* To use the language of a miserable hymn, which has been fabricated upon the words of our text.

THE TARRYING WITH ZACCHÆUS.

(Luke xix. 5, 9, 10.)

According to his design, the Lord had only passed through Jericho, as the διήρχετο of Luke intimates at the beginning, thus harmonising the accounts of the two blind men whom he met on entering and on departing from the city—see our remarks on p. 384. But, always seeking souls, a sinner suddenly arrests him in his way; and in order to ensure the finding of this soul he very gladly interrupts his διέρχεσθαι, "passing through," to interpose his δεῖ με μεῖναι, "I must abide." And behold there was a man, ἀνήρ and not ἄνθρωπος, that is, a man of consequence, for he was a *chief among the Publicans.

* We may without damage leave it uncertain, whether it was an actual farmer of the revenue, a publicanus, or only a chief receiver of the revenue (a comptroller who received the dues from the portitoribus and rendered them to the general-farmer). Although, according to the rule of the Romans, only a Roman eques (Knight) was generally a farmer of the revenue, yet we find in Josephus that Jews sometimes attained to this dignity—hence it was quite possible in the case of Zacchæus. (The Jewish name is found 2 Macc. x. 19, Ezra ii. 9.

And the same man (Erasmus: et idem, in addition) was, as it appeared, rich—yet did he desire to see Jesus; and that not with Herod's curiosity, but with a longing after salvation which places him by the side of the Greeks in John xii. 21. He was nearer to Jesus than those poor strangers at the feast, but had been long in beginning to concern himself about Jesus; his time, however, was now fully come. It is strange that he had never yet become acquainted with the person of this friend of publicans, whose passage through that country so near to Jerusalem, must have been frequent; but we find that he would see τίς ἐστι, "who he was," though the sequel shows that he was influenced by a deeper feeling than merely that. He is not poor, and not needing the Lord's help like the blind and the lame who fly to the Son of David for compassion; but his soul is the seat of that penitence of the publican which impels him to seek for grace. He must have heard much of the kindness and the earnestness of this Jesus, who had not long before called Lazarus out of his grave; but now he will and he must see Him for himself. And what then? The excellent Schubert (in the history of Jacob Häufer) does him injustice when he says that the desire of Zacchæus was to have a good view of Jesus. Probably it was his design afterwards to venture on such an approach as that of Nicodemus, or in some other such way as might suit him; what might follow was indistinct to his mind, for the present he would not intermingle with the company of His followers, certainly not press forward into the immediate presence of Jesus, for he does not presume to think of detaining the Lord who is passing through, by publicly and pressingly obtruding his own heart's need. Thus there is a befitting humility in this eminent man, who deems that an invitation to his house would not be honor enough for the Lord; a kind of diffidence of the right sort, the first commencement of a coming like Nicodemus from afar. At the beginning of His official career Nicodemus comes to the Lord from the high council, at the end of it Zacchæus comes from among the publicans. Zacchæus has less in him than Nicodemus, for he will merely at the first see, and not approach—so it would seem; nevertheless he has at the same time more than Nicodemus, and is entirely won more easily. The Publicans enter before the Pharisees, sinners before the righteous, and this is once more seen here. As a token of his inward earnestness, better than Nicodemus, Zacchæus comes in open day, in the middle of the town; although not in the presence of all the people (for he runs before), yet not without spectators, for the high official is not above climbing into a tree as one of the curious, sight-seeing multitude. As he was little of stature, he thought that among the people (ἀπό like ענ instead of ἕνεκα) he could not attain his end;* there was no stone, no block, to help (as Pfenninger expresses himself), nor was it necessary, for there grew the sycamore tree just at hand.† He hastens to climb up, that he may have a secure place before the crowd comes, and thus behold Jesus, unmarked either by him or by the multitude.

But he is seen by him who also beheld a Nathanael under the fig-tree. When Jesus came to the place, he looked up—why did he this, for there was no imaginable occasion to do so? He was sensible of his presence there—as Luther's translation has it, but the εἶδεν (like the ἰδών, ver. 41) includes a looking before the descrying. The Lord perceives the man who was as much as possible concealed, penetrates the secret of his heart, calls him by name, invites himself to his house: now the Lord was not accustomed in such journeyings to look up into all the trees, or to offer his visits to those who were wont to gaze at him from their branches. Thus it is not "petty and foolish, to seek anything wonderful in all this" (as Schleiermacher scrupled not before his auditory to say); but there is in it a real wonder of grace, the guiding providence of the Father guiding a soul to his seeking Son. The Lord might indeed in the ordinary way have known the name of this chief among the Publicans, and might indeed have seen and remarked the man who nevertheless knew him not;‡ but that he should now look up, and find him in the tree, still more that he should penetrate his heart in order in so extraordinary a manner to offer him salvation, surpasses most assuredly what is purely natural. Zacchæus! Thus he calleth one of his sheep by name, crying into his inmost heart—I know thee, I know what thou desirest! Thus does he summon the diffident man with wholesome promptitude to announce his decision before all the people; and overpowering his fear, invites himself to the house to which he had not been invited, thus anticipating in his grace the desire of the Nehem. vii. 14.) For the rest, Jericho, as a great mart and place of transport, and then on account of its dates and balsam (on which there was a special impost), might well be the seat of a general office of the Publicans.

* How often does the multitude hide from us the person of Christ! The multitude of the indifferent, the followers without earnestness, the watching enemies! These are the true little of stature, however lofty and great, who are so "petty of spirit, that they cannot even leave the crowd, in order to see and to seek the Lord" (Gossner).

† The sycamores are not very high (that would have been unsuitable in this case), and therefore the easier to ascend; hence travellers report that they are often resorted to for pleasure, and that beds are hung among their leaves. Gossner says further—"Little soul, is there then no tree grown for thee, which thou mayest ascend, and thine eyes behold him who bringeth salvation to thy heart?"

‡ That he acquired the man's name (as Neander thinks possible) from the people standing round, having observed him casually, is not to be supposed: any such interposed question cannot be conceived of in the account, which gives the looking, the seeing, and the address, simply. Any such, "What is that man's name?" would be altogether inconsistent with the dignity of the everywhere typical conduct of our Lord.

man who had not dared even to draw near.* Make haste, and come down! Not altogether without a gracious though slight blame of the strange method which he had taken; we may indeed symbolically generalise the words: "Leave all thy own inventions and devices in thy fearful coming — I come myself to thee!" Climbing up and coming down, everything has its time. Zacchæus had gone before in haste, but the Lord is more in haste than he; for there would be no time for any later visit, this was the last passing through Jericho, and now was the time for one last testimony before his entrance into Jerusalem, one final public testimony to all the people before his passion, in the conversion of a Publican. I will come to thee at thy house, where thou wilt better see me and hear me; I will tarry, and interrupt my journey by resorting to thy dwelling! (Μεῖναι, equivalent to καταλῦσαι, ver. 7.) Not merely I will, but I must. What dignity in answer to every objection of precipitation and surprise in this σπεύσας, "make haste," and δεῖ, "must;" and at the same time what an impulse of love, which testifies that it must be so, that it is bound thus to tarry in the way! For it is in the Lord's commission to act thus, as is stated afterwards in ver. 10.

Zacchæus is not terrified, protests nothing good or evil, is no longer ashamed; but he is instantly won, and with joy receives his high guest, whom he may lead to his home. Each had found what each sought—the Saviour and the sinner. But that the Good Shepherd has found a stray lamb, that the Merciful One should now begin again to exhibit his mercy, excites new murmuring among all the beholders of this remarkable scene; that is, of course, only among that all which was composed of mere beholders, those who were accompanying him, ch. xviii. 39, and the inhabitants of Jericho. "He is gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner!" Oh wretched and blind people, to murmur at that! An ἀνήρ, "man," but yet a ἁμαρτωλός, "sinner," because a Publican, and even a chief among the Publicans—there is the deep-seated delusion of the people, condemning the whole class without any respect to the character of the person. On another occasion they might have spoken more respectfully of an ἀρχιτελώνης, "chief-Publican," but now, as it has to do with Jesus, he is no more to them than a τελώνης καὶ ἁμαρτωλός, "Publican and sinner."

The narrative, which is itself hastening towards Jerusalem, leaves it to be understood that between vers. 7 and 8, we are to interpose the whole time of the καταλῦσαι, "or sojourn;" for Zacchæus cannot have advanced so far as to speak as he did, before the Lord's visit, and as it were precipitately at the very door. There is more than this presupposed, also, in the εἰσῆλθε, "entered," and in ver. 11, just as in ver. 28, the journey is regarded as continuing. Schleiermacher thought, like many before him and after, that the καταλῦσαι must be taken as a tarrying over night (which the people hastily presumed when they spoke); and consequently that it was on the next morning that the proceeding of ver. 8 took place.* But the σήμερον, "to-day," ver. 5, did not stand in such close connection with the μεῖναι, "abide," as this assumes; rather must we regard the σήμερον, both of ver. 5 and ver. 9, as indicating that one and the same day of grace which had come to Zacchæus and his house, and which was so prominently intimated already in ver. 5.† A sojourn through the night would scarcely have been so hastily dismissed in the σταθεὶς δέ, "and he stood;" and ver. 28 continues the record of the διήρχετο, "passed through," after the interruption with a definite ἔμπροσθεν, "before."

But what must the Lord have spoken in the house of Zacchæus, whether his visit were for one hour or many! This host certainly acted more like Mary than Martha; for with what confidence of new life does he stand forth, after salvation has come to him! "With one that is a sinner—do the people say? Yea, verily I have been a sinner, but he, whom ye blame for not having despised me, hath taught me righteousness." Thus as a new-born child he justifies the wisdom of God, thus does he bring the quickly matured fruit of a still repentance which had received the blessing of grace, in a public avowal of penitence, of faith, of new-found righteousness. He does not address the mockers—for whose sake, however, now at the close, he speaks these words, not within the house, but outside (ἀκουόντων αὐτῶν, ver. 11)—but his new Lord, from whom he cannot separate himself, whom he joyfully calls his Lord, and in whose honor, and to whose praise he now makes his vow before the people. In his wealth there is much unrighteous mammon, and much of other men's goods, the restitution of which in the proper place must be ever impossible; his conscience teaches him what the parable which he had not heard had counselled to converted Publicans. Not indeed all that he had, but yet the half he gives to the poor: δίδωμι, "I give," is distinctive; it is as good as if done, for he now assumes an obligation before the whole town, the poor of which will soon claim its fulfilment. And if I have taken anything by false accusation,‡ I restore fourfold! and for meeting his official responsibilities, as the Lord had not called him from his office, he retains the other half. It is quite clear that the εἴ τινός τι, "if anything from any man," does not involve anything like a bold challenge (as 1 Sam. xii. 3), or even express a doubt whether any such could come forward: but, on the other hand, it is equally clear that he is not conscious of overreaching having been his common practice, and it is his intention conscientiously to watch

* The only case in which we read this, but not, probably, the only instance in which it occurred.

* Many even add that it was the Sabbath, and a day of rest.

† This Neander urges against Schleiermacher.

against it in such matters as had afforded occasion for it in his earlier thoughtlessness. In every case in which I have overreached, I will make compensation; if I have done it (alas! indeed, sometimes), here let a new righteousness begin! Now, then, he is a righteous man according to Ezek. xxxiii. 15. Now does he voluntarily and joyfully determine to do more than what the law, which grace does not supersede, requires of him.*

The Lord answers, as he was addressed—πρὸς αὐτόν, "unto him," actually speaking to Zacchæus; but with an indirectly expressed testimony to those who are around, he confirms in his good pleasure the confession and vow; rather he crowns it by the fullest assurance which he now gives, putting it upon its right foundation, and at the same time appends a testimony to his own person. The new righteousness of the sinner has a good foundation—thus must we understand the not unmeaning ὅτι,† "forasmuch." Salvation is come, for the Saviour has entered; hence there is joy in the tabernacles of the righteous (Psa. cxviii. 15). Again there is almost an open—I am he! almost a gracious illustration now in the last days of his life of his name of Jesus. This day, forsooth, for other days will now soon come; at the same time, now first to-day the day of grace hath dawned upon this man and his house! It was before—To-day I must abide in thy house; this is not all that the expression now involves, but it gives an intimation to Zacchæus, that he must henceforth guide his whole house to salvation and peace; comp. ch. x. 5, 6, and what was said upon Matt. x. 13, 14, on p. 173. The reference to the house as the foundation, as of human, so of political life generally, and of the church to be raised up, begins thus early to occur in the Lord's discourses, and then runs through the entire New Testament. Do ye despise him as a Publican? But I say unto you —he was yet a lost sheep of the house of Israel, though given up by you in your loveless bigotry, having his own claim to the Messiah, the Shepherd:‡ and now he is in truth through faith a recovered, renewed, and genuine son of Abraham (Comp. ch. xiii. 16.§ The Son of man is come for Israel, and indeed for the world at large, not only to save the lost sinners generally as ye all are, and those given up as lost by yourselves (as this Publican was), but also to seek them, to enter in unto them before they can invite him or receive him. Thus we may dogmatically say, in a sense not to be unconditionally exaggerated, that "compassionate love effects as well the beginning of the higher life as its full consummation, so that all is its work." But we have already declared in relation to this utterance, and now freely repeat it, that God seeks in man something which comes to meet his eternal love with the susceptibility of receiving it, and with all his seeking is far from always finding it, and consequently that it is not always produced by him.¶

PARABLE OF THE SERVANTS OF THE NOBLEMAN WHO GOES AWAY TO RECEIVE A KINGDOM.

(Luke xix. 12–27 [Matt. xxv. 14–30].)

The disciples themselves were involved in the erroneous ideas of ver. 11; and this notwithstanding all the Lord's declarations concerning his impending passion: see ch. xviii. 34. The Lord therefore adds a public and plain parable in connection with his public departure from Zacchæus; not the only instance of eschatological discourses, first pronounced in a wider circle, and then reiterated to the disciples: see Luke xii. 36–46. Jesus has just testified (not in the house of Zacchæus, but at his door, where the people, not having dispersed when he entered in, were awaiting his egress, comp. ver. 28) for what purpose he had come, and what was the true σωτηρία, "salvation," for the children of Abraham. And as they heard such things, so contradictory to all their expectations of the Messiah, he appends to this utterance before the people a parable, which should also be an appendix to all the previous announcements of his passion and departure which the disciples had heard. This is the meaning of προσθεὶς εἶπε,

* The reference to a Roman lex de furto which prescribed fourfold restitution disturbs the significance of this beautiful saying, and is not strictly pertinent, since there was a lex de publicanis which was content with the restitution of the simplum, after the expiration of a year. The law of Moses (Exod. xxii.) requires only in a special case, ver. 1, fivefold and fourfold restitution (hence 2 Sam. xii. 6); else, as in vers. 4, 9, only a doubling was required in compensation, just as was customary in Athens. This Zacchæus goes beyond, and doubles again.

† "Just because this day salvation has come to this house" (Lange).

‡ I have not gone in to a Gentile!

§ This view of the losing and finding again justifies the second sense, without any necessity for a γέγονε having been used. Most strangely did Erasmus refer the αὐτός (in which the ἁμαρτωλὸς ἀνήρ of ver. 7 is evidently made prominent) to οἴκῳ, translating — "eo quod et ipsa (domus) filia sit Abrahæ!"

¶ We may be permitted in a note to remark upon the wise and comprehensive discrimination which selected the history of Zacchæus for the Gospel of Consecration-day, in connection with the Epistle, Rev. xxi. 1–5. In the latter we have the consumma-

"he added and spake," and ταῦτα, "those things;" the latter is not intended to indicate that he had previously continued to speak on the subject. The excitement of expectation is strained to the utmost by his public approach to Jerusalem, where his avowed enemies were gathered to wait for him; and he speaks of his coming death but as a setting out on a journey from which he will return. Thus he shows how this first coming of the Son of man to seek the lost, this coming of salvation into the hearts and houses of penitent sinners, is related to the expected kingdom of him who was to come. He gives, further, to the converted Zacchæus, an admonition similar to that which he had given to the converted Publicans in the parable of the steward; only that as his conversion had been a deeper fact, and he had already, by anticipation, dealt rightly before all men with his unrighteous mammon, the Lord at once passes over to the administration of spiritual goods, which in that parable (ch. xvi. 10–12) had only been hinted at. The ἐν ἐλαχίστῳ πιστός, "faithful in a very little," here, ver. 17, is intended to recall that discourse; just as we have the cities here instead of the habitations or tents there.

When in Matt. xxv., after a short interval only, the Lord repeats what is here said to his apostles, we must understand him as impressively intimating: It still holds good, and ye must not forget what I said before in Jericho to all the people and yourselves! And in Matthew the delivery to the servants on occasion of the setting out becomes an actual fact, while here it is a prophecy. This relation of the two discourses, as well as all the fundamental ideas of the essentially similar parables, we have already discussed upon Matthew. The side-glance at the punishment of the citizens who protested against his dominion, as well as his entrance upon his kingdom, is there omitted; and these, with the other variations of the parable, have their profound significance, as we have already shown.

Verse 12. Is εὐγενής, "nobleman," private man of eminent lineage, not a βασιλεύς, or "king," by birth, and his βασιλεία, "kingdom," therefore a subordinate jurisdiction? Assuredly not, but the word contains a concealed μείωσις (meiosis) with reference to his heavenly origin. The kingdom here spoken of belongs to the Son of God, a born King, as an allodium; it is, on the other hand, a feudum which the Son of man is to receive: there remains the testimony, too, that in the person of this Son of man these δοκοῦντες, or "thinkers" (ver. 11), have actually before them their future King. Nothing is said here of a going away to receive a kingdom in another place, in heaven (as Roos mistakes); but it is a departure in order to receive the crown and return. The ground-work of this part of the parable is derived from the political relations between the power of the house of Herod and the superior authority of Rome. Herod, under the government of Antigonus, journeyed to Rome, primarily and ostensibly seeking the βασιλεία for Aristobulus, but was himself consecrated king in the Capitol (amid idolatrous rites), and after three years of troubled war, obtained possession of the kingly authority with which he had been invested—an exceptional instance—as no more than a private εὐγενής. And, more to the point, his son Archelaus, mentioned in his will, went first to Rome, where the emperor adjudicated between his claims and the claims of Antipas, mentioned in a previous will. But the Lord's kingdom is confirmed before the highest throne on manifold grounds of right: as the Son of man he is invested or rewarded with the crown, for his worthiness' sake; as the Son of David he receives the patrimonial heritage, which belonged to him from eternity as the Son of God by right of eternal birth. The going away to heaven, to the Father, is a πορεύεσθαι εἰς χώραν μακρήν, or "going into a far country;" for that world is an actual region opposed to this, and we cannot but think of ch. xv. 13, where the departure of the son from his father's house into the world is similarly described. Not merely is "heaven, to many confessors of Christ, a far, unknown, indifferent land" (as Lisco here preaches); but Christ himself anticipated the hard journey of death through the rent veil of his flesh.*

Verse 13. It has already been remarked that the ten of His (collective) servants is equivalent to the article in Matt. xxv. 14, and has the same meaning, as also in the case of the ten virgins; Schleiermacher incorrectly supposes that these servants might not be the highest, and not the only ones. Every one who adheres, in fidelity and obedience, to the future

tion of salvation in the new world, the tabernacle of God, of which all houses of God typically prophesy; in the former, the gentle commencement of salvation in the individual, in the midst of the confusion of the old world, in the hastening of the Redeemer to his cross. There all is new and openly revealed, here we have the new heart with its first confession wrought by secret grace. There is the tabernacle of God, here our own house, whose best guest is the Son of man abiding in it. There we have the word of preparation for the bride's throne, here the first call of the Saviour for the seeking of the lost. What would this salvation be, if it did not come to me and my house? This is the beginning to that end—behold the tabernacle of God among men! Hence also the intimation to press through the interposing tumult of the people, to press forward to Jesus himself; the exhortation to charity to the poor; the mention of external sonship, the priority of the seed of Abraham; and finally, in the background, the warning of judgment against the old Jerusalem. Two exhaustive ecclesiastical pericopæ (passages)!

* Sincerus Bibliophius (Die Leipziger Religionsfrage; Wie dünket euch um die Höllensfahrt Christi? Magdeburg, 1844) finds here the descensus ad inferos intimated, and understands by the far country the region of the head—but this is a well meaning error. The above is the only view which suits the receiving of the βασιλεία, or "kingdom," the establishment of which is regarded as upon earth. Elsewhere the Lord has hinted at the descent into hell, as in Matt. xii. 40, and most plainly in ver 29.

King, and thus is distinguished from the opposing citizens, is in the widest sense his servant and true minister, and is entrusted with office and work in the preparation of his kingdom. Hence it is not the twelve whom the Lord mentions; for then the people would have thought of the Apostles, and Zacchæus would have deemed himself excluded. In the meantime the departing Lord puts into the hands of his adherents a little authority and a slight gift, as the test of fidelity; and this appears under the figure (almost like a parable within a parable) of a sum of money to be traded with.* The question may arise whether the μνᾶ, "pound," is the Hebrew mina of a hundred shekels, or the Attic of a hundred drachms (about $15 of our money); but the parallel of the talents, and the general selection in the parables of money then current, are in favor of the latter. In relation to the Lord and κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν δύναμιν, "according to his several ability," every one received alike; in relation to others there is a difference in each case: and this is indicated by the variation in the parable as repeated. "Occupy, trade till I come—in power, judgment, and recompense;" emphatically said in contradistinction from—till I return. So at least in the common reading; more properly it is, perhaps, ἐν ᾧ ἔρχωμαι—While I am departing and returning, while I am on my journey.

Verse 14. These lesser gifts, to be used in calm diligence, the King has apportioned to his faithful ones; instead of weapons, against the rebellious people, who will not bear his dominion, and whom he bears with for a long time, till his return. The confused state of the Jewish land, split up into factions, and vexed with partizanship, had led to a deputation of fifty persons being sent to Augustus to complain, though vainly, against Archelaus (who had restored the country wasted in war, especially round Jericho, where he had built himself a stately palace): and thus does the Lord illustrate the enmity of his people, of the πολῖται, "citizens," of his βασιλεία, "kingdom," as being a solemn and formal protest sent against himself to the throne of God. There was in ver. 7 an outbreak of this enmity, which would not have the Saviour of sinners (οὗτος, ch. xv. 2) for the Messiah; but here the Lord signifies the utmost daring of their contradiction after his own death (ὀπίσω αὐτοῦ), the opposition of Jerusalem especially to the apostolical witness: this reaches the presence of God,† and is regarded by him as a πρεσβεία, or "message;" it is received at once and rejected. We must note the scornful τοῦτον, "this man," and the οὐ θέλομεν, "we will not have," which gives no reason for their complaint—"He is contrary to us, he is not a persona grata (agreeable person), we hate him, for all his love!"

Verses 15–19. See upon Matthew the notes upon what recurs there. The ἐπανελθεῖν καί, "when he was returned, then," involves in itself an obvious ἐγένετο, "it came to pass," for the supreme liege Lord, the Father of the Son, receives not, like Pilate, the protest of those who hate his Son. But he having received the kingdom, does not at once return in all his authority to take vengeance upon his enemies; but graciously judges and rewards first his own special servants, dependents, and confessors. Oh that he had only to praise and reward! The διαπραγματεύεσθαι, "gain by trading," which only occurs here in the New Testament, means elsewhere — to propose, undertake, arrange, and execute a plan, but passed naturally like negotiari into the meaning of negotiando lucrari; just as we might say—What business each had carried on. And, with reference to the verbum simplex in ver. 13, we might attribute to the διά, in composition, the additional idea—What each had carried on in the meanwhile, through the whole intervening time. The faithful servants humbly and rightly ascribe the increase, not to themselves, but to the Lord's pound—προσειργύσατο, "See what Thy seed has grown to!" But the Lord did not seek the τοκός (interest) for himself, as he might seem to do by his accommodating himself to the delusion of the slothful one (ver. 23); but the diligent retain their acquisition, and receive a great reward besides. (Let the designedly striking τὸ ἀργύριον of ver. 15 be rightly understood, and further the ἵνα γνῶ—that he might know how each had acted therewith.) In Matthew the first dispensation of gifts is various, and the reward of increase is the same in all; here, on the contrary, the pounds are the same in the case of all the ten, but the reward is different. And this is a significant variation for the two sides of the question, according as the difference of the result depends upon more or less diligence, or otherwise springs from equal diligence in the use of differing gifts. The former is made prominent here, and therefore the second does not receive, as in Matt. xxv. 21, 23, similar commendation with the first, but merely a brief καὶ σὺ γίνου, "Be thou also." What is elsewhere promised generally to the ὑπομένοντες, or "enduring," as a συμβασιλεύειν, or "joint reign" (2 Tim. ii. 12), appears here as a manifold gradation of dignity, for the more mediate future of the kingdom is here spoken of.* The cities, the government, the administration of which the King now distributes to his tested and approved servants (much more than the receiving into habitations), are indeed in the territory of the rebels which has nevertheless become his kingdom; and consequently indicate a further

* Πραγματεύεσθαι is found as the peculiar expression for commerce in the Rabbinical פְּרַגְמַטְיָא, πραγματεία (even Eccles. v. 9, etc., in the Targum), פְּרַגְמָטִין, πραγματεύς, פְּרַגְמָטוּת, πραγματευτής, etc. The conjecture of Michaelis, who detects an error in the translation of minæ for מָנוֹת, portions, is refuted by vers. 16 and 18

† This feature in the parable refutes the exegesis of the little book before mentioned—which in itself may be highly recommended. What would be a protest sent to Hades?

* "Ten minæ would scarcely purchase a house; and the superabundant recompense of grace is ten cities" (Von Gerlach).

continuance of their active service, in the analogy of their former service, in the established and manifested kingdom. On the one hand, this distinguishes it from the final consummation of all in equal glory; but, on the other, it may not be said that even now "the servants are appointed to rule over the hosts of the enemies of Christ." For the enemies are already destroyed, rooted out of the land; there remains between them and the servants only the great middle-class of the undecided, hitherto not led to salvation; among whom the true "vicegerents of Christ" will have enough to do, while they are spreading the holy land over all the earth. See Rev. ii. 26, xx. 4 (Psa. cxlix. 6–9, in a good sense). It will be easy, peaceful, and blessed work with them, to rule, and feed, and guide home the remaining sheep, when the wolf is gone, and Satan is bound!

Verses 20–26. References to wrapping up and depositing money or other precious things in handkerchiefs are frequent enough; what might be subordinately hinted at, over and above this use, in the σουδάριον, we have mentioned already in commenting upon Matt. xxv 18; though the word, its etymology being forgotten, designates a handkerchief of any kind. J. Von Müller's note, "This is the body"—may be regarded as trifling, just as is Chrysostom's interpretation of the earth in Matt. xxv., as the earthly sensual heart. The indolent leaving unused, the foolish hiding up, is the gist of the figure. The judging of the wicked servant out of his own mouth and confession, generally a common principle of justice (Job xv. 6; 2 Sam. i. 16), has an application here different from that of Matt. xii. 37; for here it is the mildest judgment, which, accommodating itself to the position of the defence, finds the crimination even in that. The παρεστῶτες, "they that stood by," are essentially ministers of the King distinct from these servants, who execute his commandments, and who are brought with him; that these venture the objection—"Lord, he hath already ten pounds (and ten cities besides!)," is not to be attributed to oblique envy, but to mere astonishment at the strangeness of the judgment. Thereby the great distinguishing principle which follows in ver. 26 is only prepared for and made prominent; and in such a manner that the Lord Jesus makes a sudden transition, in the interpretation of all, to himself as the βασιλεύς, or "King."

Verse 27. Thus, in his own person, majestically making the prediction present, he pronounces now this judicial sentence upon his enemies; instead of which we significantly find, on the repetition of the parable in the circle of the disciples, the (here presupposed) casting out of the unprofitable servant. "My enemies, citizens who should be my subjects, who consequently are rebels against my βασιλεία—my hand now findeth them out! (Psa. xxi. 9). They would not my dominion unto their salvation—I judge them out of their own mouth" (chap. xiii. 34). But this involves a most fearful irony, for there is another βασιλεῦσαι which they must endure! "Since they would not have the Lamb, the Lion will tear them."

And when he had thus spoken, had thus judicially in his own revealed royal person decreed the destruction of his foes—he went onward to Jerusalem, there to deliver himself up as the paschal Lamb into their hands!

THE ENTRANCE INTO JERUSALEM: THE STONES CRYING OUT. THE GREAT DESTRUCTION.

(Luke xix. 40, 42–44.)

We have already explained upon Matt. xxi. 2, 3, and must here assume as known, the design and significance of the Lord's kingly entrance into Jerusalem, this first and last public and festal proclamation of his coming and honor; as partly intentional on his own part, and partly permitted with regard to others. Some, the most audacious, of the Pharisees, although they do not venture themselves to suppress the voices of the multitude of his disciples, reinforced by the multitudes of the people, yet appeal to himself and require him—not to permit such impropriety! Not so much that "they were filled with anxiety, lest the great outbreak should take place at once," but with infatuated, scornful bitterness: "Suffer not thyself to be called that which thou art not! Take heed to thyself, we warn thee of the shame and the punishment which the beginning will involve!" For all this he has the right answer at hand. "Should these whom ye call my disciples, but all of whom I do not reckon as such, as they now encompass me with shouts—keep silence? I say unto you—you who not only hold your peace, but even protest—It is nevertheless the voice of truth in their mouth, this loud testimony, so hateful to you, is decreed for this time, it must be so and for your sakes! This blind people—Oh! that they were all my true disciples and subjects!—know not what they cry,* but are constrained to bear their witness this day. Therefore, I tell you—Lacking them, the stones must cry out, would proclaim in your stead and in theirs, what the great question is between me and Jerusalem!"† This

* Not "seized by a sacred inspiration," else we should have to understand this word as a prophecy from divine impulse.

† The 3 Fut. Pass. κεκράξονται is in this verb the is, primarily, a common proverbial expression, similarly humiliating as in Matt. iii. 9; comp. 2 Pet. ii. 16. "Are ye then of stone, that ye feel not the truth, and harmonise not with it?" Yet we are not to understand in the λίθοις, "even the most obtuse" (according to Neander), stony hearts to be aroused; still less (according to Von Gerlach) that God, if humanity remained insensible, would give to inanimate nature hearts and voices for his praise; or, as Hess puts it in the strongest way, "These stones around, which have witnessed so many of my deeds, echo of themselves my honor and my praise!" But the indication, immediately following, of the stones of the temple and of Jerusalem to be destroyed, ver. 44, gives us the right clue to our Lord's meaning when he uses the prophetic future: "These will soon cease with their Hosanna, without any injunction of mine, they will soon exchange it for Crucify him! fulfilling your desire, and obviating the danger you fear —but then will there arise a very different witness to my kingly power, which will cry out very differently against your unbelief!" For in the back-ground of this proverb there lies a hint of a saying in the Scripture, which we must consult in connection with this passage.

The prophet Habakkuk, after he has announced, in ch. ii. 4, life to the just by faith, and the opposite to all proud opposers, when he that cometh will come without delay,* turns in ver. 5 to the prediction of judgment upon Babylon, yet in such a manner as to include in his far-reaching threatenings a denunciation of similar doom upon unbelieving and unjust Israel. What woe should then break in upon the empire of robbery, upon the magnificence founded upon spoil; how should then the fearful account be demanded! For עֲבֹטִים, ver.6, is not thick clay or mud, according to the Syr. and Vulg. (as also it is rendered עב של טיט in the Rabbin. Commentaries), but as the Targumist rightly expresses it —תקוף חיבין, pigneratio, copia æris alieni quod quis contraxit (pawning the amount of others' money which one has accumulated). Now must the spoil be rendered back; suddenly rise up נֹשְׁכֶיךָ, that is, with prophetical double-meaning — those who bite thee, and thy creditors! Thou shalt be robbed of that which thou hast robbed—in righteous recompense. The nest on high is not secure enough. Ver. 10 says—Thou hast consulted shame to thine house, brought disgrace wilfully upon thyself, by cutting off many people; thou hast thereby sinned against thy soul (comp. Prov. viii. 36), or, thine own soul, thou thyself hast sinned, and incurred this penalty—which better suits vers. 4 and 5. And now for the words of ver. 11: For the stone (each one) shall cry out of the wall and the cross-beams of the wood-work shall answer it, agreeing to testify against thee! These are not the stones and the beams of the cities laid waste by Babylon, which complain against the destroyer (as in Sallust the devastated walls, and burnt beams of Saguntum manus Punicas ostentabant [showed the Carthaginian hands]), but the firm and well-built stones and beams of the house, vers. 9, 10, built in wickedness, of the city, ver. 13, established in vanity and blood-guiltiness—"proclaim the guilt and shame of their original." They should cry out and witness (comp. ch. i. 2); and that not merely as poscentes justitiam a Deo ut suo loco restituantur (demanding of God justice that they may be restored to their place) (as Burk quotes), but in the laying waste of their bootless labor (ver. 13), when the individual stone comes out מִקִּיר, "out of the wall," and every beam מֵעֵץ "out of the timber," they will cry out; and the doom will bear witness of the guilt! But the Lord will then appear in his holy temple, that all the earth may keep silence before him! ver. 20. Let it be observed, then, with what profound significance the Lord uses this expression to indicate the destruction of this Jerusalem, transformed as it were into Babylon; how in this preliminary word he already announces the judgment which presently comes distinctly before his contemplation.

The jubilant cry had begun when the procession reached the κατάβασις, "descent," of the Mount of Olives; the Lord comes now nearer and nearer to the city, as it is here termed not without emphasis, the holy city, the city of God in its external glory. He beholds it from that very position where afterwards it was beleaguered by its enemies, at a similar paschal feast. His eyes, which everywhere look for faith, which had looked through its streets and into its sanctuary for faith in vain, now behold the city near, and in its naked reality. No external appearances of glory, where the way of peace is not known, can deceive him; no Hosanna of his disciples can give him joy, for thus cometh he not nor the kingdom of God. In the midst of the acclamations, which he does not repress, his heart breaks out in lamentation over the people of this city and the city of this people—Have I been so long with you and ye have not known me! Do ye thus surround me with Hosannas, who will so soon crucify me? Not that a "silent flow of sorrowful tears mingles with the general festivity;" not merely that he ἐδάκρυσεν, "wept," as in John xi. 35; but much more than that, he ἔκλαυσεν, wept with the lamentation of consummate sorrow, and ἐπ' αὐτήν, "over it." It is said in the letter of Lentulus that Christ never laughed, and we could believe that; weep indeed he did, much oftener than we know of. At the grave of Lazarus the Lord saw Mary weeping, and the Jews who were with her weeping too; but here he alone is the weeper amid the universal joy. But now, as then, he thinks not of his own honor or of his own sorrow; the tears of the sympathising High Priest even now, before Gethsemane, concern our sins, usual form instead of the unused regular form; as in other cases, when the Perf. acquires the signification of the Present, it is also used—formed from the Dor. verb κεκράγω. Hence it is not necessary or proper to refer to the Attic signification of this paullo-post future — it should and it must so be. (Erasmus: mox clamabunt.)

* See my exposition of this passage, as cited in Heb. x. 37, 38, in the Hebräerbrief, ii. 74.

which are his sorrow and his heart's deepest woe. "The man of God wept"—that was a great thing as said of Elisha, when he beheld in spirit the evil which Hazael would inflict upon Israel (2 Kings viii. 11). The Son of God wept over the guilt and doom of Jerusalem and her children—and that is infinitely greater, a μυστήριον προφορικόν, (divulged mystery), to which corresponds an ἐνδιάθετον, (conception), in the depths of the σπλάγχνα οἰκτιρμῶν τοῦ θεοῦ, "bowels of the mercies of God." Love, after doing all in vain, can only weep; were God to become man, he could but do this; rather God is man here and therefore weeps.* In what multitudes of his members upon earth have these tears since continued to flow! And "how many have been converted by these tears of our Lord, in the place of those who would not then be converted!"

Verse 42. Passion permits no parable, as Hess remarks, and mighty indeed is the passion which seizes the Lord's heart, when he first looks upon the scene of the events that were then to transpire. But the first, and the predominant question, is lamentation; just as in Matt. xxiii. the undertone of lamenting love is heard even amidst the predominant anger against those who would not be saved. The construction of the former clause with ὅτι and εἰ, "that" and "if" (both omitted in our version), together is to be narrowly observed. The ὅτι, coming first, gives, as it were, an answer to the astonishment of those who saw and heard him weep: Therefore I weep, that is the cause of my tears! The εἰ is evidently equivalent to utinam, as in the Sept. for אִם, and as in Luke xii. 49, xxii. 42. Luther's translation by wenn (if) involves the easily perverted, and often abused idea, that apology, and not accusation, is to be sought here. In truth, this is a lamentation, the bitterness of which is its accusation. Nor is it right to say that our Lord here regards their guilt "in its mildest form as ignorance," for he has already spoken in ver. 27 of their not willing and their refusal; consequently he here means no other than wilful, self-condemned ignorance —else wherefore the terrific judgment? Ah if thou hadst known — only then wouldst thou have escaped the judgment—then could I have saved thee from it! Even thou entire Jerusalem—is this in contrast with the multitudes of disciples who were greeting him as their King?† Scarcely; for even these Hosannas were not the result of a real knowledge, and it is this word which has here the emphasis. Or does the Lord oppose the pre-eminently corrupt inhabitants of the metropolis (as Hess thought), to the Israelites who followed him from Galilee and the land generally? We think not, for to us this καί, "even," involves no such comparison. The Lord is thinking altogether and only of the city over which he weeps, as the elect metropolis and nevertheless the murderess of the prophets, about to reject and slay the Messiah himself. The first καί consequently signifies—Oh that thou especially, whom it concerns and who needed it so much! (for even thou, or it is no other than thou who art blind!) The following καίγε then adds—And truly, or even now at least in this day of final invitation! In this thy day. To interpret ἡμέρα as merely time, is also inexact; for although all the ἡμέραι τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, "days of the Son of Man," constituted one great time of grace "for which two thousand years had been preparing" (Tholuck), a καιρὸς τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς, "time of visitation," as afterwards more generally embraced in ver. 44, yet the Lord had now in his soul this one last day of gracious offer, the day of his entrance into Jerusalem as a king into his own city—not without allusion to Psa. cxviii. 24. This was thy day; then came thy King to thee yet once more in meekness, as the Prince of peace, offering peace to thee: and yet thou remainedst in thy enmity, discernedst not τὰ πρὸς εἰρήνην σου, "the things which belong unto thy peace," and knewest not how to be the true Salem of thy Melchizedek!* Oh what could not the Lord have done, what achievements wrought, with this excited people, had he only become, but not in righteousness, their King and their Messiah! But it was not this which would subserve their peace—this he knows, but not they. Therefore they plunge themselves into ruin through their foes, instead of receiving his peace. This last and vainly obtesting lamentation repeats now at the end what Moses in the beginning (Deut. xxxii. 28, 29) had proclaimed and denounced against this people. But now it is hidden from thine eyes—although thou seest with thine eyes "thy King riding upon an ass"—although thine eyes have seen the wonderful works which are praised (ver. 37), and among them the resurrection of Lazarus (John xi. 18, 19). It is hid through thine own fault, according to the righteous judgment of the Father, who can make his revelations only to babes (Matt. xi. 25). Hidden from thee is thy sin, my salvation and my peace, hidden from thee the word of prophecy in thine hands; hidden therefore is the swiftly coming judgment. For this latter is not to be excluded, as the continuous ὅτι, "for," of the following verse shows. The Lord takes this last expression from Isa. xxix. 9–12; a chapter to which his ensuing announcements point our attention.

Verses 43, 44. "Because thou hast neglected thy day, the day of peace, therefore days of conflict, tumult, and abasement will come (as

* Compare the beautiful observation of Von Gerlach, against the error of universal restoration, as against the other error of predestination. Jesus did not weep through "short-sighted grief," instead of contemplating the ultimate disappearance of all sin and all misery. Rather does he give expression to God's sorrow over the lost!

† Or — Thou also, as thy King. (So Lange, though far fetched and confused on the whole passage.)

* Not only Sepp, but Wetstein also, recognises the profound allusion to the name of the primitive, holy city of peace: Utinam quæ diceris Jerusalem re ipsâ esses Jerusalem, ac videres ea, quæ pacem tibi præstare possent!

xxiii. 29)—they will break in with frightful horror upon thy blind security," as is expressed in the additional ἐπί σε, "upon thee." Now comes the plain and undisguised description of those days, as they are even now before his eyes; the tres gradus angustiarum (three steps of distress) in living presentation, as they lead to that final consummation—not one stone upon another! Thine enemies—thus does he plainly designate the Romans, whose Cæsar they vainly prefer to their own King (John xix. 15); for they must be understood in these words by every reader. Yet should it not be alleged against him that he does not at once name them, since it is very far from his design to summon the people to a conflict with that power to which he assigns the final victory. They will cast a χάραξ, "trench," about thee, an encampment, a line of circumvallation, most firmly fortified; not always the case in sieges, but predicted here in expressions which have a typical meaning, even as they were literally fulfilled in due time. Let Isa. xxix. be consulted (on the prophetic reference of which see on Matt. xxiv. 15), where Ariel is threatened, the city where David dwelt, in which year is added to year of vain revolutions of feasts. Note there the "multitude of thy strangers" (ver. 5); and (ver. 3) וְצַרְתִּי עָלַיִךְ מָצוֹר, "and I will lay siege against thee with a mount" (Sept. καὶ βαλῶ περί σε χάρακα)—which in its first fulfilment, is again expressly remarked in Ezek. xxi. 22. And from this verse is taken the περικυκλώσουσι, "compass thee round," which is carried on in the συνέξουσί σε πάντοθεν, "keep thee in on every side," see there סָבִיב, "round about" (lit. like the circle). But it gives also an echo of the old denunciation of Moses, וְהֵצַר לְךָ בְּכָל־שְׁעָרֶיךָ, "and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates," Deut. xxviii. 52. The συνέχειν implies an entire inclosure and shutting in, thus anguish being added to anguish and without hope of salvation; and Titus, as we know, caused the entire city to be surrounded by a wall of thirty-nine stadia when the materials of the ramparts failed him. Καὶ ἐδαφιοῦσι σε, "and shall lay thee even with the ground"—such is the end of all thy proud magnificence! Ἐδαφίζειν is generally to cast down to the ground, and is then used of demolished cities—to make them even with the ground, ἄνω κάτω στρέφειν, "to turn upside down." (See Isa. xxix. 4, πρὸς τὸ ἔδαφος, and Deut. xxviii. 52, עַד רֶדֶת.) The same word applies, in another sense, to the inhabitants put to the sword, and in its most fearful meaning, to the little ones of Jerusalem dashed on the ground—see Psa. cxxxvi. 9; Isa. iii. 25; Ezek. xxxi. 12; Hos. x. 14, xiii. 16, Sept. A spurious reading referred the τέκνα σου ἐν σοί, "thy children within thee," back to ver. 43, not being able to connect with them the ἐδαφίζειν, or "razing." The Lord, who here, as everywhere, utters the language of earlier prophetic contemplation, concentrating all aspects in one human view, embraces in τέκνοις a comprehensive meaning; first, by a usual expression, the inhabitants of the city; then the other children of the land gathered together in one at the feast (at the fulfilment nearly two millions in all) in the metropolis, as the ἐν σοί, "within thee," indicates; and finally, the actual children of this present generation, as appears in ch. xxiii. 28, 29, and as was frightfully realised in their ἐδαφίζειν after the typical judgment denounced upon Babylon (Psa. cxxxvii). Last of all, not one stone remains upon another—and of this we have already spoken on Matt. xxiv. 2. Then indeed will the stones cry out; then will each one of them bear witness—I also am from the walls of desolated glory, am a witness that he whom this city rejected was and still is her King.*

The close of the prophecy turns back to the commencement of the lamentation; but now with the wrathful judicial word instead of the fruitless wish of love. "Ah, hadst thou known! Therefore, because thou hast not known! Because of that, and not because of all thy sin and transgression! If this day thou wouldst receive me, all would be atoned and forgiven." But the Lord knows that this will not be, and therefore speaks of the future as if it were the past: he embraces the whole time preceding the judgment as the time of gracious visitation, although he especially means the days of his manifestation. There are for every land and every people, and even for every soul, definite times of visitation, of which one must be the last: hence it concerns all to know, as well the grace of the visitation, as also that that grace has only its appointed time. Jerusalem knew neither, and was hurled to the dust—but her King and Saviour wept over her! With what joy will he, whose love wept over the impending downfall of the old Jerusalem, glory in the new Jerusalem perfected at last (Isa. lxv. 19)! Thus speaks Baxter; but better still will Bengel's exclamation, on ver. 27 of the same chapter, harmonise with our thoughts—"O meek and gracious King! But who will be able to endure the sword of his mouth, when he shall be seen upon the white horse (Rev. xix. 11)!"

We conclude with the admonition which the mercy of these tears of the Lord Jesus, sealing the grace and the truth of all his sayings, urges upon many who will read this book. Know thou the day of thy visitation, that so thine enemies, to whom thou mayest now be betraying thy King, may not, in the judicial anguish of death, encompass and hem thee in on every side, tormenting thee till thou art cast down into the abyss!
